"Yes," she said simply. And side by side the strange old man and the bright, winsome girl passed through the gateway leading to within the walls of the city of the sleeping, wound their way amid the mounds and the stones and monuments, and cenotaphs, the highways and byways of the metropolis where mortal men and women dwell side by side, with never a note of discord, in a beautiful town that needs no policing, where none beg, or borrow, or steal from one another, where animosity is unknown, where all are lowly, though none are ashamed, where all that there is of pride is the work of those who had not when that work was done taken up the freedom of that city.

Digitized by Google

And soon little Phyllis' Mecca was reached.

Old Mystery, with bared head, stood aside while the little girl laid on a simple mound her wreath of simple flowers, and, taking from her basket her little trowel, planted here and there a fern, uprooted here and there a weed, a thorn.

Her pious task fulfilled, they withdrew. The girl's eyes softened, yet scarce with tears. She had bedewed that verdant mound most bountifully almost from her childhood from the crystal fount of her pure heart, but the time had come when she had only the sunshine of a smile, as pure as her tears, for that spot as green in her heart as it was to the light of Heaven.

And as they walked side by side along between the tombs and in the shadow of the cypresses, the old man wondered whether the spirits of any whose mortal ashes laid beneath the tons of granite and the sculptured marble looked down upon more tender tributes to their memory than those simple flowers the simple little working girl had placed upon her mother's grave.

For instance—— Suddenly he checked his steps.

"Isn't that handsome?" said Phyllis, pointing to a ponderous cenotaph of black marble inlaid with Aberdonian granite, with many tablets on its sides cut deep in granite and in marble, and here and there filled in with lead, where the work of human hands had striven just a little longer to baffle "Time's effacing fingers."

"Geldart!" she exclaimed. "Why, yes! This is the family vault of the Mr. Geldart that we know. Well, Mr. Scrimshaw can say what he likes, he must have been a good son, look!"

And Old Mystery read—

Also to the memory of GEORGE GELDART
relict of the above,
Who departed this life on the 15th day of December, 1901.
In the 65th year of his age.
Greatly respected and lamented
By all who knew him.
An exemplary husband, an indulgent father, a pattern citizen.
This tablet is here placed to his memory by His sorrowing son
Eric Cosmo Geldart, Esq., M.P., for Little Claverton.
In the First Parliament of His Majesty King Edward VII.
In token of filial gratitude and undying affection.
"By their works ye shall know them."

"Why, daddy!" exclaimed the girl. "What's the matter, aren't you feeling well? Your face is quite white. Perhaps it is rather cold and clammy here, let's come away."

"Yes, yes," he said, and together they wandered along the sidewalk, lingering here and there to read some quaint or tender epitaph, to note the long journey ended at this or that tomb, or here and there with a sigh, to read of some tender baby flower cut off in bud, saved from life's sorrows, but at the cost of more sorrow for those death's hand had spared.

While Phyllis, with tender eyes, stooped to read the record of one such little life, Old Mystery, wandering to and fro, peering through the gloom of cypresses and sycamores, caught sight of an approaching form, and, catching sight of it, swiftly withdrew into the shadow of a drooping willow.

It was Ronald—Yes, in that willow shade he watched his son—it seemed his only son, since that other had proved so undutiful—his face all pale and grave with lines of sorrow

(Continued overleaf.)

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS AND OINTMENT

THE FAMOUS HOUSEHOLD REMEDIES.

THE PILLS

have gained their wonderful reputation by sheer force of merit, because every person who uses them recommends them to others. They have positively no equal for thoroughly cleansing the system and putting the liver and kidneys in functional order, without pain or griping. They are the best known remedy for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dizziness, and the common condition of ill-health, known as "run-down" or "out of sorts." Females of every age find Holloway's Pills an invaluable remedy and aid.

THE OINTMENT

is known throughout the world as positively the best and quickest remedy for Bad Legs, Old Wounds and Sores, and Skin Eruptions of every kind, and should be used in conjunction with the Pills. It is also the speediest remedy for Rheumatism, Lumbago, Pains and Stiffness in the Limbs and Joints, Backache, &c. For pains and Soreness at the Chest, and for Throat and Lung Complaints arising from Cold or Weakness, Holloway's Ointment affords most welcome relief in a very short time.

A COMPLETE DISPENSARY IN THEMSELVES.

Digitized by Google

written deep on it, watched him draw near that marble mass, and lay there at the foot of his lying brother's lying inscription, a wreath of summer flowers, saw him linger there bareheaded, then turn away along the path straight to the willow in whose shade Old Mystery stood. And the old man stealthily stole away, threading his way to the gates.

Almost he was impelled to retrace his steps, and there, amid the tombs, reveal himself, and tell the strange, weird story to the son he had disinherited, the only son who in truth had mourned for him. But then—but then—a thousand thoughts surged through his brain.

In that place, at that hour, a shock would be cruel, it might be fatal, and then—there was Blagdon to be reckoned with, and his Scheme—yes, he was testing his System and himself, as well as others.

Anyway, he must have time to think, and so, in place of turning back, he went on his way towards the obscure and lowly lodging where he lived. Yes, where he lived, he whom the world believed dead, lying still and mute beneath that mass of granite and black marble, engraven with a lie from beginning to end.

And on Monday morning, Phyllis Daventry, tripping upstairs with a sheaf of letters, cried:

"Daddy, where did you vanish to on Saturday? I looked round for you and you were gone, I waited, oh, ever so long!"

"I missed my way," Old Mystery stammered. "Yes, yes, I missed my way, and it was so late I thought you had gone home."

"That's what I thought of you," said Phyllis. "But, oh! I say, daddy, whom do you think I met, just by the cemetery gate?"

"I can't tell; that idiot Springle, I suppose—he's always shadowing you, isn't he?"

"Oh, dear, no! not Mr. Springle, someone altogether different; guess, guess!"

"I can't, you silly girl; I'm not good at riddles; besides, I'm busy—it's Monday, I have a lot to do, there's a heavy mail to-night."

"But you must guess, daddy, I've told you so much about him. I met him, daddy—the gentleman who saved me from those ruffians who were trying to rob me."

"Ha! ha! who saved your chain, your chain with its heart charm. Ha! ha! yes, Phyllis, I remember, and who charmed away your heart. And then of course the Garden of Sleep was transformed into Arcadia, with Strephon in a silk hat, with a silk umbrella for a crook; Chloe in a sailor hat and blouse surrounded by a flock—of tombstones. Is Strephon captive yet?"

"Daddy, don't be silly; he never spoke a word, I don't think he even saw me. Poor fellow, he was walking along with his head down, looking quite sad and careworn."

TWELFTH CHAPTER.

Ronald Falls on his Feet.

LITTLE wonder that Ronald Geldart's face when the little lady clerk beheld it, bore signs of care, for in truth since their first meeting he had been experiencing a trying time.

He had set himself to work and turned out matter which he without vanity felt would be printable, and with this under his arm in the form of short stories, he assailed the editorial offices.

Next he awaited results, awaited them with the earnest longing of a shipwrecked man, who, clinging to the rigging, awaits the saving sail. They came—in the form of his own manuscripts—declined with thanks.

Then he set forth to beard the lions in their dens. The lions, however, either didn't happen to be in their dens at the time, or being there, declined to be bearded, their time as a rule being as minutely apportioned as that of an eminent K.C. or fashionable physician in extensive practice.

Ronald was not easily disheartened, but he had gone through a considerable spell of stress and storm, his resources had run out and Mrs. Skimper's bill was overdue, and that lady had impressed on him, with some asperity, that her house was established for the reception of paying guests. And Mrs. Skimper's demand, if acidulated, was a just one, the sting of her sarcasm was as nothing to Ronald compared with the shame of indebtedness to a woman. His watch had already gone, his chain had followed, so also all his overcoats.

There was still Eric. In the morning and evening papers there was his name looming large; at the dinner-table and in omnibus and trains he heard people discoursing on his rocket-like upward flight. No! no! no! not while there was a heap of stones to be broken, a truck to be run along a dock or river quay, a crossing to be swept, never would he approach the man whose brotherhood, whose very name he had renounced.

One night he sat alone in his room while his fellow-guests were dining. He had pleaded indisposition, but the truth was he could not sit there eating the bread and quivering beneath the scorn of the woman who was his creditor.

If land had been in sight it would not so much have mattered, but things seemed drifting from bad to worse; he never could have believed in his better days that it was so difficult for the man who wore a black coat, finding himself suddenly bereft of means, to earn his bread.

A tap at the door. He opened it; it was Arethusa the maid-of-all-work.

"Your boots, Mr. Bligh," she said, "which I have done my best with them."

"Thanks very much, Arethusa," said Ronald, scanning them ruefully; then he laughed, "I'm afraid they're so bad that even your best won't make much of them."

"Oh, bless you, sir, they're all right," said Arethusa; "only I took the liberty of putting in a cardboard sole in case you might get cold. And, Mr. Bligh, sir, if you've got any socks as wants mending I can take 'em down with me, and I noticed that button on your coat was a trifle loose."

"Arethusa, you're a good little soul," said Ronald, feeling for the moment heart and throat as full as his pockets were empty, "and one of these days I hope I shall be able to make it right with you."

"Lor', don't mention that, sir; tips is tips, but there's some people it's more pleasure to work for free gratis, while others, with the wealth of Injies, as the saying is, is gall and wormwood to work for."

Again he could only ejaculate rather huskily: "You are a good little soul!"

"No, I ain't, sir—I'm only a hard working little skivvy in a boardin'-house, but I knows what's what. Lor' bless you, sir, I knows things ain't very bright with you just at the moment, but they will be later on; a smart young gentleman like you, and, as for what Mrs. Skimper said to you to-day, sir, which I heard it, that's nothin' to what she says to Mr. Springle; your bill ain't nothin' to what his is sometimes."

Great Heavens! Ronald bit his lip. What had he come to? To be commiserated by a lodging-house servant whose mistress had dunned him!

Arethusa, going on with her dusting, continued, confidentially:

"And, Mr. Bligh, sir, you won't be offended at what I'm going to say, will yer?"

"No, Arethusa, you're too genuine and good a little girl to offend me, I'm sure."

"Well, sir, if as how you should be in a very desp'rit hole, if you wouldn't mind of my sayin' of it, I've got a bit of money in the Post Office, and if a couple of soverings, sir——"

"What!" almost screamed out Ronald.

"I beg your pardon, sir," said Arethusa, trembling, "only you know it seemed to me perhaps the Post Office wasn't quite so safe as having the money in my box, and I thought if you'd do me the honour of taking care of it for me—— You ain't angry, sir?" for Ronald, his hand in his pockets, was

(Continued on page 318.)

Digitized by Google

ALFOS CO REGD

Call or Write.

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Call or Write.

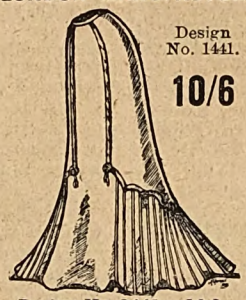
ALFOS CO REGD

BUY DIRECT AT FIRST COST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

Design No. 1240. 10/6

Design No. 1240. 10/6. The Famous Half-Guinea Jacket of the Season, by far and away the best value ever offered. 30 inches long, full sac, single-breasted. Made in Black Vicuna, Grey Frieze, or in a smart Grey Tweed with narrow stripe. Collarless style with stole ends and two shoulder capes, trimmed good ornaments and tailor-stitching. Price only 10/6; carriage paid, 6d. extra. A Bargain. Satisfaction guaranteed. This Jacket, 33 inches long, will be 11/6; 36 inches long, 13/6; or 39 inches long, 14/6. All sizes in stock. Send bust measurement and length required. Money refunded if goods not approved.

Design No. 1441. 10/6



Design No. 1441. 10/6. ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'s leading line in Half-Guinea Skirts. EXTRAORDINARY VALUE. The Skirt is lined throughout good linenette, and is made in an excellent Black Cloth of good quality. Trimmed silk strappings, ornaments, and tucks. Cut full and well made. Price only 10/6; carriage, 5d. extra. SEND FOR ONE.

Design No. 458. 10/6

Design No. 458. 10/6. Ladies' Costume in ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'s Specialite Serge, or Venetian Cloth, or new Zibeline Cloth. Patterns post free. Collarless Coat, pouch front, which can be worn open or closed, trimmed stylishly with strappings of glacé silk. Full, well-made Skirt. Great bargain for 10/6; carriage, 6d. Skirt alone, 5/6; carriage, 5d.

WRITE FOR NEW SKETCH BOOK AND CATALOGUE OF BARGAINS POST FREE.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 GOLDEN LANE, BARBICAN, LONDON, E.C.

TRY

With very little trouble you can earn a

SOLID SILVER WATCH,

and we also tell Agents how to make a regular income of 50/- per week. We want every man, woman, boy, or girl who reads this advertisement to send for 24 of our latest Silver Aluminium Novelties.

SEND NO MONEY. WE TRUST YOU.

You can sell them at once at 2d. each, and, when sold, send us the 4/-, and any present you select from our list of useful articles will be sent you. We are giving away many thousands of pounds worth of Useful Presents to advertise our business. Write now, it costs nothing to try.

GOLD & CO., No. 37 THE WATCH HOUSE,
Delamere Crescent, London, W.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor
66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "I pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 14 stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ross Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

PUNCTURE PUNCTURE PUNCTURE

A Holiday Spoilt Is Pleasure Lost.

Thousands of Cyclists ride in fear of Punctures. WHY FEAR! when the National Puncture Preventer will prevent all Punctures without any Reduction of Speed.

Hundreds of Testimonials! Phenomenal Success!

Thousands in daily use. The only

PREVENTER

on the Market which guarantees to prevent all punctures or refund the money. Average weight, 1oz.

Price 2/- single; 3/6 PER PAIR

When ordering state size of wheels.

Sole Patentees and Inventors:

THE NATIONAL CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.,

27 & 28 King William Street, London, E.C.

Our £5 5s. Cycles have a world-wide reputation. Send for List.

PUNCTURE

PINK'S

MARMALADE

IS PURE.

TRY IT.

TRIUMPH Cycles

£10 10 to £19 19

or by Deferred Payment System.

"The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce."

CATALOGUES GRATIS.

TRIUMPH CYCLE CO. Ltd., COVENTRY.

4 and 5 Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.
30 Deansgate Arcade, Manchester 4 King Edward St. Leeds

Digitized by Google

standing in front of her, scanning her up and down, struggling for a time for words, which were slow in coming.

"You black-visaged, golden-haired little girl, I'll candidly admit you're one of the best-meaning creatures who ever put blacking on tanned boots or left a thumbmark on a plate, but if ever you dare make such a suggestion as that again, I'll—I'll run away, Arethusa—run away!"

Bundling her out he shut the door behind her, then sat down clutching his forehead with his hands. Something would have to be done. Yes! on the morrow he'd sell the few remnants of his wardrobe, buy a set of slops, square up Mrs. Skimper and ship before the mast, if nothing else turned up.

And that next morning there was a confidence in his manner which inspired Mrs. Skimper with a belief that she was not going to add another to her list of bad debts, after all. She was not an ill-natured woman, but the catering for and supplying the wants, reasonable and unreasonable, and coping with the bickerings and idiosyncrasies of indifferently-paying guests had told upon her.

"Better this morning, Mr. Bligh?"

"Yes, thanks; as right as rain!" said Ronald cheerfully.

"Breakfast will be ready in five minutes, and I should think you have an appetite."

"No, thanks," said Ronald; "the fact is I've an early appointment, and I shall no doubt breakfast out."

Mrs. Skimper touched a bell, then Mrs. Skimper put her back to the hall door.

"Mr. Bligh," she said, "you're not going out of this house without bacon and eggs or kippers or cold mutton, whichever you prefer, with marmalade, bread-and-butter, tea or coffee, according to choice, ad lib. Arethusa, Mr. Bligh's breakfast at once.

"Now you come and sit down like a good young gentleman. I was in a bad temper yesterday, and with Mr. Grimmage on one side of the table, Mr. Springle on the other, and Miss Amaranth from half-past ten till one and half-past two till five playing Wagner on that poor piano of mine, which is already showing signs of nervous exhaustion, it's a wonder I wasn't in screaming hysterics. Now, here's your serviette and here's Arethusa coming upstairs with the eggs and bacon; I can smell them. Now, don't waste time, drink your coffee while it's hot."

To have resisted would have been ungracious. Ronald left the house that morning with hope in his heart, hope born of gratitude and faith in human nature.

And not even half a dozen fruitless calls quite crushed that newborn hope, though his handbag was the heavier for some three or four manuscripts returned.

He felt that if he had the chance he could do well, well for himself and for those enlisting him, who took him in their ranks.

The day was wearing on, one by one the covers he had picked on had been drawn blank. What was the next move? Ah, yes! the Meteor, the organ of the cultured world, the newly-prospected weekly, about which there was so many rumours; that it was the venture of a certain leading lady in high society, that it was the bantling of an inner Parliamentary circle, that the Rothschilds were going to run it, that Sir Thomas Lipton was finding the money, that a certain Duke was controlling it to air his own opinions on fiscal and political matters; a hundred rumours were afloat about it.

Ronald, bracing himself to face another disappointment, entered offices spick and span and a trifle odoriferous from the hands of fitters, carpenters, joiners and painters, and inquired of a smart young man across a smart new counter if the editor were in.

"No, sir," was the prompt reply.

"The assistant editor?"

"No, sir!" equally prompt and decisive.

"Have you any idea when I can find him in?"

The smart youth knew his work too well to have any idea. Would Ronald leave his card.

"I merely called to ascertain if the editor had any views about some manuscripts I sent some weeks ago."

"Don't know, sir. Mr. Carnforth is very, very busy with a truck-load of them now; perhaps you'd better write. Good afternoon, sir."

Ronald turned wearily away. Behind him there was the sound of opening doors, a bustling familiar voice said:

"Just going to get a chop, Charles; sha'n't be long, don't let the governor be disturbed. Why—bless my soul! it's Ronnie. Eh, my lad, where have you been? By Jove! I'm glad to see you!" For it was cousin Jack whose left hand was smacked upon his shoulder, whose right was frantically shaking his own; cousin Jack who was asking a dozen questions without waiting for an answer; cousin Jack who took him over the road to the Cecil and, ordering a comfortable lunch, said:

"Now, Ronnie, come on, I am going to sit quite still while you tell me where you've been hiding, why you've been hiding, and what you've been doing."

Lunch was well nigh through ere Ronald had told his story; then he asked:

"Now, cousin Jack, what of you?"

"Oh, my lad," said Jack, rubbing his hands. "I'm going strong. I've struck blue clay."

"You deserve it; you've tried as hard as anybody."

"Yes, but I've kept pegging away though it seemed as if I should never get a bulls-eye, but so long as you keep pegging away at the target it'll come in time, though scarcely ever at the time and in the way you've looked for.

"You know the many things I've tried, the speculations I've dabbled in, mostly burning my fingers; club secretary, insurance broker, theatre manager; as dear Eric in his amiable fashion used to say: 'Jack of all trades and master of none.'"

"You were always ready and willing to do good to others," said Ronald; "perhaps that accounted for your not doing better for yourself."

"No! no! don't believe that, Ronnie, that's very sour philosophy. As a matter of fact, it was just the fact of having been able to lend a helping hand in a small sort of way, years ago that led to my getting into clover when I was on the hardest of hard pan. I'll tell you how it was."

(Another long instalment of this story will appear next week.)

"You say he died from a single blow administered by himself?" "Yes, he blew out the gas!"

She: "I want to get a pint of your best enamel." Assistant: "Yes, madam. Face or bicycle?"

"Did you hear Kusser has dyspepsia?" "No; how did he get it?" "Slugem made him eat his own words."

"Will you love me when I'm old?" she asked. "Certainly," he replied promptly, "if you will love me when I am bald."

The Young Sweet Thing: "I wonder how it is there is no good English equivalent for fiancé?" The Savage Bachelor: "How about 'idiot'?"

"I hear you've given up your proposed trip to Norway this summer." "Yes. The girl who is taking singing lessons next door has been invited to spend the summer with her aunt in Devonshire, so there is really no reason why we should go away."

"I can't understand it," said Mr. Gewgaw at the gas office. "Last quarter my bill was twenty-five shillings, and this quarter it is £2 10s. I haven't burnt a bit more gas this quarter than I did last. Now, how in the name of honesty do you account for that?" "You didn't pay last quarter's bill," said the clerk.

Digitized by Google

Published in the Interests of the Deaf.

Realising that there is a great public need for better knowledge of the causes, prevention, and cure of deafness, a London Popular Medical Journal devotes the whole of its last issue to a treatise on defective hearing and ear, nose and throat ailments. Anatomy, physiology, hygiene, and treatment are described in language suitable for popular reading, the work forming, in fact, a pamphlet which everyone should possess. Ten thousand copies of this work are ready for free distribution, and to obtain one, the reader has only to send name and address with the following coupon to the Editor, 10 Marble Arch, London, W.

FREE COUPON,

Entitling the sender to a Copy of

THE REVIEW OF EAR, NOSE, AND THROAT DISEASES.

In sending Coupon please give name and address plainly.

Send all Communications to

THE EDITOR, 10 MARBLE ARCH, LONDON, W.

BALDNESS.

A French Specialist who has devoted his life to the study of Hair Diseases, having cured thousands of almost hopeless cases, will send a FREE TRIAL PACKET of a genuine inexpensive treatment to all who write enclosing 2 stamps. New Hair grows in 4 to 10 Days.

Mr. C. Rounds writes: "Your small sample has done me more good in a week than another much advertised remedy did in 6 months."

P. HENRI-FRANCIS,
BRIXTON ROAD, LONDON.

Kaputine is not a single dangerous drug, such as has been condemned by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The medical paper "Health," recommends.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache,

Toothache & Neuralgia.

Cures in Ten Minutes.

Safely, surely and without bad after effects.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1 ; Samples 1d. each

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free. Kindly mention this paper.

Plain Women Become Beautiful.

Beautiful Women Intensify Their Beauty.

A Wonderful Book Free.

The Peralia Perfumery Co., of 73 Camden Street, North Shields, will send to every reader of SHORT STORIES mentioning this paper, and enclosing a penny stamp with their application, a wonderful booklet, entitled "Beauty's Boudoir." This book, which reveals many astounding secrets of immense importance to every woman, will be sent strictly under cover. Amongst the many items of information it tells how to remove in one night all Wrinkles, Crow's-feet, Blackheads, Facial Defects, &c. How to make the pimply, freckled face as fair as the lily. If the bust is undeveloped, you can learn how to develop it. If you are too short, how to increase your height. This marvellous book also deals with the hair and informs you how you can curl the hair and permanently keep it in curl without the use of curling irons ; in fact, if you are interested in your personal appearance at all, we advise you to send 1d. stamp and your address in full, at once and the Peralia Perfumery Co. will forward you per return this charming book, which deals in a clear and explicit manner with many matters in which women of all ages are interested. There are some wonderful proposals in this book, and no lady reader of this paper can afford to miss this chance of gaining the valuable information contained therein. Address :—The Peralia Perfumery Co., Dept. 14, 73 Camden Street, North Shields.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%
repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free
C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

If you wish to SLEEP WELL

—TAKE—

BEECHAM'S PILLS

You will SLEEP WELL,

because BEECHAM'S PILLS gently calm irritation of the Nervous system, while by their stimulative and cleansing action upon the Liver and Kidneys, Digestion proceeds with normal regularity, so that at night the tranquillised mind and body are prepared for "Nature's sweet restorer"— peaceful slumber. Should one feel restless after an exciting or convivial evening a dose of BEECHAM'S PILLS will quickly induce refreshing sleep.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills), and 2/9 (168 Pills).

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Cool Young Lady.

"EVELYN" has a young gentleman friend who has asked her to become engaged to him. He is a very good fellow and much in earnest. "EVELYN" cannot decide whether to accept him or not. At times she feels she could care for him, but at others is distinctly cool. He tells her that if she does not say "Yes," life will not be worth living. Should "EVELYN" believe him, and answer him "Yes"? She adds. "You may think it rather strange of me not to know my own mind, but I am neither romantic nor sentimental."

* * * * *

You have known the young man five or six years, "EVELYN," and evidently admire him. You have had every opportunity of knowing whether or not you feel tenderly towards him. Apparently you do not, but you are "neither romantic nor sentimental." Well, you may be one of those luke-warm young ladies who never experience any deep passions. There are many of that kind. My advice usually is that they should marry the man they feel they are most fond of and whom they most admire, and trust to the future to bring the needed love. It often follows after marriage, if on the part of one there is the feeling of love.

Love versus Mammon.

I HAVE had a manly letter from "TROUBLED WATERS," who certainly deserves all the sympathy one can give him. He has a business of his own, and a well-to-do father, who has financed him, and with whom he lives. He has also a sweetheart, who is "the best girl in the world," and the envy of all the fellows in the neighbourhood. However, she is only a cotton weaver, though one of very noble character, and his parents will not hear of an engagement. So strong is his father on the point that he says that if "TROUBLED WATERS" insists on keeping to the girl he must leave home, and get on in his business without another penny from him.

* * * * *

"TROUBLED WATERS" does not want to leave his old home, and cannot yet afford to get married, but his father has given him three months to make up his mind. If he leaves her for one month, he says, all the young men of the neighbourhood will pay their attentions to the girl, as she is much admired. If "TROUBLED WATERS" decides to stick to her, he thinks that by hard work he could make enough money to marry upon in three years, when he will be twenty-four.

* * * * *

The position is a very difficult one. It seems very cruel of your father to take up his present attitude. But if you are absolutely in love with the girl, and feel that she is necessary to your happiness in life and not a mere passing fancy, you should be prepared to make sacrifices for her. It seems unjust that your business should be in danger owing to your love affairs, but as you say you are in possession of it, could you not make a big effort to keep it going without your father's aid? Besides, as you say, there would be the encouragement of love to help you. It is for you to decide. Do you really love the girl sufficiently to sacrifice your father's money and your home on her behalf? Would your future life be unhappy if severed from her? Think it well over, for if your feeling for her is only a passing fancy, you would be doing yourself a great injury to sacrifice your prospects on her behalf.

Taking Girls to Boarding Houses.

"MATER" writes: "I have two young daughters, aged seventeen and eighteen. We shall have two months holiday this year. Should I take them to a seaside boarding house, or would that be unwise?"

* * * * *

Boarding houses drive many a young girl off her head, "MATER." You are sure to encounter there the seaside lover, who is, according to his own painting, a wondrous personage. But if you keep a close chaperonage of the girls, I think a month or so at a boarding house would do them no harm. Girls gain a necessary apprenticeship in the study of human nature that way, and it makes them cautious in future.

Should He Confess His Love?

"I HAVE been going out with a girl for four months," writes "SWEET WILLIAM." "I asked her if she loves me, and she replied 'Yes.' I love her very much myself. Should I wait till she asks me the question, or make a confession of my own love at once? I have kissed her several times, but she has not once kissed me."

* * * * *

You seem to expect the girl to do rather more than her share of the love-making. When a girl has gone so far as to tell a man she loves him, the man is very strange if he does not make some sort of reply. As a general rule, men are only too ready to make those confessions, often without meaning them As you are sincere about the matter, certainly tell her at once. It is strange she has not kissed you. But some people, though affectionate, do not always show their love that way.

Deservable Congratulation.

"I HAVE been the close companion all my life of a girl cousin," writes "PERCY," "who has always asked my advice in everything. Last time we met she seemed very reserved, and was in correspondence with people which I knew nothing about. A month later she told me she was engaged to a man I had never heard of, very much older than herself. Now is it my duty to write and congratulate her?"

* * * * *

Perhaps her reserve was pardonable. She may be the kind of girl who does not like to talk about love affairs unless she is able to announce an engagement, and, for all you know, may be very fond of the man in question. Anyhow, it is her affair whom she marries, and if she has met the man of her heart, then certainly you could write and congratulate her in good faith. An engagement is supposed to mark the happy issue of a love affair, and, as such, one usually congratulates the young couple without considering their merits.

The Attentions of Boys.

"I AM sixteen," writes "M. L.," "and people tell me I am rather good-looking. I am not allowed out much at nights, but when I am there are a few boys who stare at me a great deal. One of them I like very much. How could I get to know him?"

* * * * *

I don't think you had better make any attempts whatever to know strange boys. You are only sixteen, and it is quite right that you should not be allowed out at nights. As to the boys who stare at you, that is usually little more than curiosity and often rudeness, and you should not encourage it. If there is any boy amongst them who is genuinely attracted by you, he will himself try to get to know you in the proper way.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"THE PAPER A BOY CAN TAKE HOME."

THE

BOYS' LEADER

WILL APPEAR

Tuesday, September 8.

24 PAGES.

("Pearson's Weekly" Size.)

ONE THOUSAND FREE GIFTS EVERY WEEK.

FREE FOR THE MERE ASKING.

A Complete ½d. Comic Paper will be given away every week with the BOYS' LEADER.

Digitized by Google

DELICIOUS
WHOLESOME
PURE
&

16 GOLD MEDALS
& HIGHEST AWARDS

JOHN HILL & SONS

RICH CAKES

THE "TUDNO" CAKE.

Splendid for daily family use, of choicest quality and Genoa character,
8d. per lb.

"ROTHESAY" RICE.

A delightful plain cake, rich and fragrant, 6d. per lb.

PROSPECTIVE BRIDES should write for a free sample of Wedding Cake giving particulars, with portion of a cake or biscuit label, and also the name of their grocer.

The "TUDNO" Cake & Biscuit Factories, Ashton under-Lyne.

73,368 PAIRS

Represents the Increase in the Sale of

"OCEANIC" BOOTS

DURING THE LAST SIX MONTHS.

HALF-A-GUINEA EVERYWHERE.

TRY THEM.

MATCH "MATCHLESS"?

Guaranteed free from Acid.

Produces quickly a lasting brilliancy.

YOU COULDN'T DO IT.

There's no METAL POLISH equal to it.

Manufacturers:

THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH CO. LTD., LIVERPOOL.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

№ 767 ⚜ WEEK ENDING SEPTEMBER 12th 1903 ⚜ PRICE ONE PENNY

"AT YOUR MERCY, AM I?" she cried. "TELL ME THAT AGAIN!"

A thrilling incident from the powerful story "THE COURAGE OF DEBORAH". See inside.

Digitized by Google

Kaputine is not a single dangerous drug, such as has been condemned by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The medical paper "Health," recommends

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache,

Toothache & Neuralgia.

Cures in Ten Minutes.

Safely, surely and without bad after effects.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1; Samples 1d. each

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free. Kindly mention this paper.

"Let's Talk of Graves" System

On J. G. Graves' System you are absolutely certain of what you are buying before you pay for it.

You only send 5/- to start with ...

THE "EXPRESS"

50/-

ENGLISH LEVER, (Regd.) 50/-

is then forwarded to you. You examine and test it, and, if satisfied, you complete the purchase in nine more monthly payments of 5/-; or, if you prefer to pay the balance in one payment of 45/- within seven days from receipt of goods, a HANDSOME BONUS PRESENT (which you choose yourself) will be sent you. If you are not satisfied, return the watch, and your deposit is instantly refunded.

SPECIFICATION.

First-grade English Lever Movement, Capped & Jewelled, Safety Winding Pinion, Chronometer Balance, Massive Sterling Silver (Hall Marked) Cases.

Warranted Seven Years.

Guaranteed BRITISH Manufacture throughout.

THE LARGEST WATCH-SALES FIRM IN THE WORLD.

Send for No. 1 Catalogue of Watches, Clocks, Jewellery, Cutlery and Plate, Fancy Goods, etc., Post Free.

GOOD AGENTS WANTED in spare time. Persons in regular employment should write for terms. Good Commission. No Risk.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., SHEFFIELD

TO AVOID INDIGESTION.

That distressed feeling is simply a poorly-working stomach—it needs a little help—but no matter how bad it may be, a dose of will speedily give relief. Take Beecham's Pills for a few days, and the trouble will disappear.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

SULPHOLINE LOTION.

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

The Daily Express

HA'PENNY.

PUNCTURE

A Holiday Spoilt Is Pleasure Lost.

Thousands of Cyclists ride in fear of Punctures. WHY FEAR! when the National Puncture Preventer will prevent all Punctures without any Reduction of Speed.

Hundreds of Testimonials! Phenomenal Success!

Thousands in daily use. The only on the Market which guarantees to prevent all punctures or refund the money. Average weight, 1oz.

PREVENTER

Price 2/- single; 3/6 PER PAIR

When ordering state size of wheels.

Sole Patentees and Inventors:

THE NATIONAL CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.,

27 & 28 King William Street, London, E.C.

Our £5 5s. Cycles have a world-wide reputation. Send for List.

PUNCTURE PUNCTURE PUNCTURE

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 767.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending September 12th, 1903.

THE COURAGE OF DEBORAH.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

"DEBORAH! DEBORAH!" Everard Stanhope glanced anxiously up the white road, winding like a ribbon among the green hill sides. The sun fell full upon his face, kindly and pleasant, though the blue eyes wore a startled look and the sensitive lips twitched in nervous apprehension.

At first sight Everard Stanhope appeared to be an old man. His figure was bent, his steps uncertain, his manner deprecating; but when he spoke, the voice, singularly clear and penetrating, surprised one. As a matter of fact the man was forty-five, though he looked well over sixty!

For a while he scanned the road to left and right, watching with eager eyes for the figure of his daughter. The clatter of horses' hoofs, the sound of the girl's laugh, the deep tones of a man's voice—Deborah Stanhope came riding down the hill with Harold Earnshaw.

Tall, well-built, with long, lithe limbs and the easy carriage that tells of perfect health, the dark beauty of her face was in marked contrast to the good-looking, fair-haired man beside her.

That Earnshaw admired her it was plain to all. The young Squire's infatuation for his agent's daughter was indeed a matter of village gossip. As to Deborah, it was not so easy to discover the nature of her feelings. She was a high-spirited girl, and up to the present had kept Harold at arm's length.

"You're late," said Stanhope, as they drew up at the garden gate. "I expected you a good hour ago."

"It's my fault, Mr. Stanhope," interposed young Earnshaw. "I persuaded your daughter to look round the orchid houses at the Hall. It took longer than we expected," he added, flushing.

"It's very good of you to take such trouble about Deborah," answered Stanhope. There was a suggestion of restraint in the tone that made young Earnshaw flush. He had hoped for an invitation to spend the remainder of the evening with his agent; he had a sincere liking for the man, and had tried more than once to break down the barrier of reserve that Stanhope set between them. To-night this reserve was very much in evidence. Earnshaw responded to its influence and rode back to the Hall.

"Deb," the man caught her by the arm, "Deb, I've something to say to you. No, not in the garden, someone will overhear us. Come inside." He hurried her into the house, locked the door of the sitting-room, barred the window, and in a low voice commenced to speak.

"We shall have to leave here," he said. "I—I've seen that man again. Don't tell me I'm mistaken, or call it the fancy of a distorted brain. I saw him, more, I've spoken to him. He says he will let the world know who and what I am, that he will tell the Squire, deprive me of my place, shatter my peace, destroy my last chance of earning a livelihood. He says——"

With a passionate gesture she interrupted him.

"Let him tell his tale," she cried, "let him do his worst. We can defy him. Be guided by me, father, put your fears of this man from you. See Mr. Earnshaw yourself, tell him your history. He will have nothing but pity and commiseration for you."

"Pity?" said the old man with a gasp. "You forget. What pity did the people show me the last time? Deborah, I cannot bear it. I see again in fancy the mob with angry voices, cruel faces—the mob that chased me to my very doors. I tell you it will kill me if my history is dragged to light. I have striven again and yet again to make a fresh start. And always Fate has been against me. Since we came here, three years ago, for the first time it seemed as if I could escape the past. And now, now—he has traced me—and there is no hope, we must go at once, to-night, leave the place for ever."

"Father, dear father, will you not listen to me? Stay here and face it out!"

"I cannot, it would kill me. You hear me, Deborah, it would kill me—as it killed your mother. If my story were made known, not a man, woman, or child but would turn against me. They would mock at me, revile me, threaten me. I tell you it will kill me to stay here."

His voice rose to a cry, his face twitched convulsively, his eyes, wide with terror, glanced towards the door.

"Save me, save me!" he shrieked. "Deborah, they have done for me."

"Dearest, there is no one here but Deb. Father, I beg of you take courage." Her arms about him, her fresh face raised to his, she strove with tender, loving words to soothe him.

"We will leave to-night if you wish it, dear," she added with a sigh; "but perhaps there is some other way out of the difficulty. Could Martin Heriot's silence be bought?"

"Only in one way, Deb. The way I told you of three years ago. If you marry him he will persecute me no longer. As his wife——"

With a cry the girl broke from him.

"Never," she said passionately. "I can never be his wife. The thought of him fills me with loathing. His face, his hands, his voice—I cannot do it, father, even for you."

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"Then we must leave," he answered wearily, glancing round the room with a look of pathos in his eyes that filled the girl with self-reproach.

"What can I do?" she cried. "If it were any other way but that!"

Her father sighed, and turned to leave the room, but as he reached the door a sudden faintness seemed to seize him.

"I am choking," he stammered. "I cannot breathe. I I——" With a cry of pain he threw up his arms and, staggering, fell to the ground.

That night, on which he had planned to leave the village, found him stretched on a bed of pain, raving in delirium.

The good people of the village of Helstone, though curious concerning them, were kindly disposed towards the agent and his daughter. Offers of assistance in the task of nursing the invalid came from all quarters, everyone seemed desirous of helping the young girl on whom so great a strain had fallen.

Deborah, however, refused all aid. She, and she alone, was with her father in his hours of delirium, listening to his fears, the outcome of a terrible passage in his past life. Harold Earnshaw called daily at the cottage with fruit and flowers, and his kindly solicitude for her father, his tender care for herself, were the only bright things in the girl's life.

If only she could tell him the whole sad history of her father's past! She could trust him, no one could look in his clear blue eyes and not feel convinced as to that. And yet—— She glanced towards the bed where her father lay unconscious.

"No one must know," he muttered over and over again, "no one must ever know!"

With a sigh Deb put away the thought of taking Harold into her confidence. She must bear her burden alone; no one could help her. Of the man, Martin Heriot, she had seen nothing. Village gossip told her that he was stopping at the inn, and seemed concerned at the agent's illness. Deb understood his silence. He was waiting on events. If her father rallied, he would again bring pressure to bear upon her. He would threaten to expose the old man unless she became his wife.

If poor Stanhope died—Deb's thoughts stopped short at this point. She could not imagine a future without her father.

For six weeks Deborah fought unceasingly for her father's life. At the end of that time there came a change for the better. His strength increased rapidly, but though his bodily health improved his intellect remained impaired. He seemed to have lost all consciousness of past events and lived only in the present. He was to all intents and purposes a child, and like a child had to be cared for and looked after.

One evening, worn out with anxiety and fatigue, the girl snatched a respite from the sick room. Her father was sleeping peacefully, the scent of the roses from the cottage garden stole through the open window, the moon, touching the trees to silver, shed a soft light on the woods and meadows.

Deborah felt a sudden longing for the roses and the summer night. She hurried down the garden path and, leaning upon the gate, glanced swiftly up the white road. The next minute a tall figure stepped from the shadow of the trees, the gate was pushed back by an eager hand, and Deborah found herself clasped by two strong arms.

"Sweetheart, I've been watching the house for hours, hoping and praying that you might come into the garden. These past six weeks seem an eternity. It is years and years since I saw you, Deborah——" He clasped her closer, and raising her face to his, took toll from the fresh, sweet lips.

"You shouldn't, Harold, you have no right, you——" He interrupted her objections with a laugh.

"It's not my fault, Deb. Over and over again I've tried to tell you how dear you are to me, and always you've put me off. How many times it has been upon my lips to ask you to be my wife! As I commenced to speak you froze me into silence. To-night I felt the time had come when I must assert myself. It was no use to parley, the citadel had to be carried by force of arms. And now"—he drew her tenderly towards him—"now you can't refuse to hear me. Deb, my sweet Deb, will you take me for better or for worse?"

His eyes, brave and true, looked into hers. She loved him with all the force of a strong nature. Why should she put this happiness from her? Why should her father's sad fate spoil hers?

"Dearest, you must not refuse me. Your father is likely to be ailing for some time. He will want great care, care such as you alone cannot give him. I must help you, Deb—as your husband it will be my right to help you."

For a moment the girl hesitated. If she accepted Earnshaw's proposal she would gain happiness for herself, comfort for her father. If she refused, there was nothing but a future of hard work, a long and painful effort to earn a pittance sufficient to keep herself and the old man who could work no longer. Why should she put happiness from her, why should she refuse the gift of love? And yet ought she to marry any man while the shadow of her father's secret overcast her life? Dare she join her future to another's, her future that must inevitably be darkened by the past?

If she could tell her lover the truth he might find a way out of the difficulty. For a moment the temptation was almost too strong. Harold would not turn against her or her father. He would help and encourage them. But the recollection of the old man's cry "No one must know!" stayed the words upon her lips.

"I cannot marry you," she cried. "I can never marry you."

"You care for me; you love me? Deborah, you shall not say you do not love me."

With a sob she turned towards him, clasping her arms about his neck she drew his face close to her own, and kissed him passionately upon the lips.

"For the last time," she whispered; "darling, for the last time!" and left him in the stillness of the summer night—alone.

* * * * * * *

Martin Heriot, pacing with restless strides a clearing in a thick plantation of young firs, was obviously ill at ease. A tall, broad-shouldered man with a heavy brown moustache and strongly marked features, he impressed most people with a belief in his honesty of purpose; that he was a good-hearted fellow was the general opinion concerning him, an opinion he did his best to foster.

He had come to Helstone with the fixed determination of making Deborah his wife. It had needed time and considerable ingenuity to find Stanhope and his daughter, and now that he had found them he did not mean they should escape him.

Chance had revealed to him certain incidents in Stanhope's life, curiosity had led him to follow up the clues until he learnt the secret of the man's life. Armed with this knowledge he had pressed his suit on Deborah. On her refusal to entertain his proposals he had sworn to ruin both her and her father.

Their flight some three years back had upset his plans for the time being, but the game had seemed to be in his hands at Helstone. Stanhope was older, weaker, less able to withstand him. A turn of the screw and the girl would yield. His victim's illness had thrown out his calculations. Stanhope was not in a condition to understand the significance of threats. There still remained Deborah, however; Deborah whom gossip declared to be in love with the young Squire.

To and fro, to and fro, Martin Heriot paced. In his own fashion he loved the girl, not a fibre of his body but thrilled at the thought of her. The recollection of her proud face with its flashing eyes sent the blood to his head.

"I'll win her if I die for it," he muttered.

The sound of a horse's gallop in the distance made him prick up his ears. Deborah on her bright bay mare—a gift from Earnshaw—was coming down the road. Between the coppice and the highway lay a stretch of meadow land through which a stream meandered, fringed with rushes. Crossing the foot-bridge, Heriot hurried to the highway. Deborah, recognising him, urged the horse to a quicker pace.

"Not so fast, Miss Stanhope," said the man grimly, seizing the bridle of the mare, "I've waited here an hour or more on the chance of seeing you. You've got to listen to me."

Digitized by Google

There was that in Heriot's face that showed the girl he meant to enforce his will. She dismounted and followed him to the meadow, leading her mare by the rein.

"Three years ago I asked you to be my wife," he said slowly. "To-day I ask you the same question."

"And I unhesitatingly refuse. I will never marry you!" His face whitened, his thin lips grew compressed.

"Think what it will mean," he answered slowly. "Your father disgraced, your home broken up, your livelihood gone."

"My father is beyond your power to hurt him any more. Your persecution has done its work. His mind is dead; he has no recollection of that terrible time when he suffered so cruelly, so unjustly."

"Unjustly!" the man sneered. "Your father was tried for murder."

"And found innocent," she interrupted. "Even you cannot deny that."

"One among twelve jurymen denied his guilt, and persuaded the other eleven to give in to his opinion. The public thought very differently indeed."

"There is no one left for you to persecute," she said; "a thing like you cannot hurt me!"

"I do not wish to hurt you. I love you—love you as only a strong man can. I want you for my own, to shield you from all care, all harm. Deborah," he stretched out his arms, "believe me—I love you."

"I cannot be your wife," she answered steadily. "If you truly love me, you will leave me and my father in peace."

"Never. I will not rest until I have you. I will follow you from place to place, drive you from every spot, turn you adrift upon the world. Not a man, not a woman but shall shrink from you—a murderer's daughter! Do you think your lover will hunger for your kisses when he learns the truth? Do you think Harold Earnshaw will marry the child of——"

"You shall not say it!" she cried fiercely. "Father is innocent—innocent!"

"And the blood upon his hands, the old man's screams for help. Are they proofs of innocence?"

"My father found the old man dying—stabbed to the heart. He tried to raise him from the floor, and when he fell back dead, called for assistance. You know the story well."

"Aye, and Harold Earnshaw shall know it also. You have refused to marry him, but in your heart you mean one day to give in. His love you shall lose. To-night he shall learn who you are. There's not a man in all the world would marry you but me—would marry a murderer's daughter."

His eyes burnt into hers, his hands, shaking with passion, clasped her own.

She knew it was the truth! If Harold learnt the story of the past, if this man told him her father was a murderer, he would put her from his heart. A cry broke from her lips.

"There is no happiness for you except with me. You have no future save what I offer. I have you at my mercy. Deborah—my love."

As he spoke he flung his arm round her waist. At his touch the girl's hot blood flamed into fury. With a sudden strength she threw him off, and raising her riding whip struck him across the face.

The suddenness of the attack, the strength of the blow, sent him staggering back. His foot slipped on the wet grass and he fell reeling to the ground on the water's brink.

The stream was behind him. With lifted arm Deborah stood in front, her face blazing with wrath, her figure drawn up to its full height.

"At your mercy am I?" she said in a clear, ringing voice. "Tell me that again!" And the whip trembled in the air.

"To-night I shall tell Earnshaw," he cried foaming.

But Earnshaw, a grim look of satisfaction in his eyes, was standing beside Deborah!

Heriot's power was broken, his career of persecution at an end.

* * * * *

Before night fell the village was agog with the intelligence that Mr. Earnshaw's agent had been tried for murder! The information, strangely enough, appeared to arouse sympathy instead of condemnation in the hearts of the rustics. Their feelings took a different colour towards their informer, however, and Mr. Heriot was glad to quit the neighbourhood with no very serious injury.

"Save me, save me!" he shrieked. "Deborah, they have done for me!"

Deborah, however, felt the kindly wishes of the neighbours almost as keenly as their suspicions, and deliberated the possibility of flying from Helstone and Harold. The latter, however, nipped any such project in the bud.

"There's no argument about it, Deb," he said. "I'm going to marry you whether you like it or not." And Deborah, glad to have the question settled for her, submitted.

"If only father's innocence were proved," she sighed, "How happy I should be."

Fate, however, who had treated Stanhope so badly, did him a kindness at the last. On his daughter's wedding eve there came the news that a certain convict had confessed to the murder for which the innocent man had been tried.

"If it had come too late, my darling," murmured Harold. "If you had let Heriot frighten you into marriage, and put me from your life. Deb, my brave-hearted Deb, I can never love you enough for your courage."

She nestled closer, clasping her arms about his neck.

"It wasn't really brave," she whispered. "I should have been terribly frightened—but for my love of you!"

John K. Prothero.

Digitized by Google

A Terrible Doubt

And the Result of It.

"It is a first night at St. James' Theatre," observed Mrs. Gregory Farquhar.

She was sitting at the dinner-table opposite her husband, Captain Farquhar, of the Guards.

"Aw!" replied that gentleman, being evidently unable to think of any more trenchant remark.

Mrs. Farquhar went on, with a slight nervousness of manner:

"Lord Ferdie has sent me a box—you'll come, won't you, Gregory?"

"Awfully sorry," answered Gregory, indulging in all the accepted abbreviations with which our gilded youth disfigures his native tongue, "but really couldn't. Got an engagement to-night, Bessie—must keep it, 'pon my honour. Be delighted to go with you otherwise."

"Oh, I daresay!" said Mrs. Farquhar, with an angry colour rising in her cheeks—"delighted, of course! I've observed that you always would be delighted to go out with me on Saturday evening, only you're engaged."

Captain Farquhar applied himself to the claret, and made no answer. He was not blind to that angry colour rising in his pretty wife's face; and being a young man of a peaceful disposition, notwithstanding that his profession was that of war, he took refuge in a wise silence.

It is not to be denied that silence was a very easy thing to him, for as a rule he had nothing whatever to say. His claims to the admiration of Society consisted in the superb proportions of his form, the magnificence of his moustache, and the perfect fit of his clothes.

Mrs. Farquhar, on the contrary, had a tongue of her own; and just now she seemed inclined to use it.

"Am I to go alone with Lord Ferdie?" she asked presently.

"'Pon my soul, Bess, I don't know. He's a harmless chap enough; but I suppose it wouldn't look well."

"A harmless chap!" echoed Mrs. Farquhar, in such a tone that the captain opened his eyes wider than usual.

"You want some sort of a sheep-dog, I s'pose, Bess?" he added thoughtfully.

"Yes," said Mrs. Farquhar with intense scorn; "quite in the watch-dog style that would be. But it might be a little difficult to engage one for Saturday nights only—that little difficulty didn't occur to you, perhaps? Gregory," she said, with a sudden change of voice and manners, "I will know where you go on Saturday nights!"

"Oh, come, I say!" was Captain Farquhar's response.

He was a good deal taken aback by this pretty little creature's sudden transformation into a virago.

"You must tell me!" she cried.

"Very sorry," answered the Captain; "can't!"

Mrs. Farquhar looked at him from under her long, dark eyelashes; and then, by a great effort controlled herself, and did a little acting.

"Gregory dear," she said, very gently, "do tell me. It's disgraceful to be such a jealous little wretch, I know; but I can't help it."

"Forgotten the compact, eh, Bess?—each to do as we pleased, don't you know, and no unreasonable jealousy allowed."

"Oh, but we weren't to have secrets, and mine isn't unreasonable jealousy. No woman could endure such a thing—flesh and blood couldn't stand it. Dear Gregory, do tell me, and then I'll be—oh, so good!"

"Very sorry," repeated the captain—"can't!"

"Indeed!" exclaimed Mrs. Farquhar, transformed again, as by magic, into the virago; "then I know what to think. I'm not the ignorant little thing I was when you married me. It comes to 'You go your way and I go mine'—does it? Very well! You used to think me pretty; now, I suppose, you have found a different style of beauty that you like better. Never mind! I can still manage to be the fashion for a season or two, if I choose. You think Lord Ferdie a harmless sort of chap, do you? He's very kind; he seems to admire me very much. I'll send over for Mrs. Vane; no doubt she will go with me and play sheep-dog to-night."

"No, no!" exclaimed the captain; "don't go out with that dreadful woman, Bess."

"Who else am I to get at a moment's notice? Am I to sit at home by myself all the evening, just because it happens to be the night you are engaged? That would scarcely be keeping our compact. Ta-ta! I'm going to dress. I hope you'll enjoy yourself."

"I say, Bess," said the Captain, rising from his chair as his wife turned to the door.

"Well?"

"Don't go with Mrs. Vane and Ferdie."

"Tell me where you are going, Gregory, and I—well, I'll try and get somebody else."

The captain opened his mouth as if to speak, then shut it again.

He looked at his wife in a hesitating sort of way, grew a trifle redder than usual, and at last relapsed into the old formula: "Very sorry—can't!"

Mrs. Farquhar made him a profound courtesy, and then left the room.

She went upstairs to her dressing-room and rang the bell. When her maid came, the door was locked and she was told to go away again. For Mrs. Farquhar, to her own surprise, had burst into a passion of weeping.

After a few minutes this stopped as suddenly as it began. She rose hurriedly, opened her door, and set it ajar. Then she quietly and quickly got a long dark travelling-cloak and wrapped it round her, put a little black hat on her head, and tied a thick veil over her face. She snatched up her purse and gloves, and then went outside her door and stood listening.

In a little while she heard the captain come out into the hall, take his hat, and open the front door.

Swiftly and softly she crept down the stairs. As he closed the front door she reached it, and, after waiting a moment, opened it very gently, went out, and as gently closed it behind her.

She had made up her mind to follow him.

The Farquhars lived in Hyde Park Terrace; there was a cab-stand within a stone's throw of their house.

Lingering within the shelter of the railings, Mrs. Farquhar watched her husband take a hansom and drive off in it. Then she rushed across to the stand, sprang into another, and said to the man:

"Keep that hansom that has just driven away in sight. Stop when it stops, but not too close." The man whipped up his horse, and in another minute they were in full chase.

It was a desperate move, this of pretty Mrs. Farquhar's; and though her spirit was still all ablaze, and her face white with resolution, her heart quailed within her. How would it end? What would she learn to-night?

Digitized by Google

Strange as it may seem, Bess Farquhar cared not one farthing for any man in the world but her own handsome guardsman; and though she pretended to have the fashionable failing of a love of admiration, she was perfectly indifferent to the worship of all the gay chappies of the day, if the especial one of her heart had indeed grown tired of her.

She felt sure he had. She only wanted to have facts, instead of feelings, to go upon; and then, she resolved, she would throw aside her lingering scruples, and drown her regrets for the past in the excitements of the present. She was making a good beginning certainly in her programme of dissipation.

Her mind was a perfect blank to the fact that Lord Ferdie would expect her to be in that box at the St. James' Theatre to-night.

Very certainly she would not be there; for it was now nearly the time of the performance, and she was speeding away Citywards along the Bayswater Road, along Oxford Street—on—on.

"How much further?" she thought to herself, with a rather frightened feeling.

To tell the truth, she had expected to be taken north, to the charming precincts of St. John's Wood.

It was a clear, fine night, and she kept her eyes steadily fixed upon the hansom in front of her, which she could see very plainly. It went on, on, at a steady pace, much as though the driver had made up his mind to drive all night, and meant to keep his horse cool for the work.

And as they went on, it really seemed to Bess Farquhar as if this were the fact.

They got into Holborn, on a straight line, over the Viaduct, down Newgate Street into Cheapside. Then came Cornhill and Leadenhall Street; and then Mrs. Farquhar began to find she was more frightened than anything else.

How deserted it looked! this place that she had seen on her former visits swarming with men of business, who one and all recognised her as an outsider, and stared at her as she was never stared at in Piccadilly or the Park.

Now, the only people about were the actual dwellers in the City, intent on their Saturday night's marketings; the only vehicles, great drays and carts that were still at work.

Now they were in Aldgate; with wide eyes of wonder Mrs. Farquhar looked at the street so full of a life so strange to her. Soon afterwards she saw written on the wall Whitechapel Road. Her heart sank within her. Where could Gregory be going? Was he a Fenian coming to some secret meeting to discuss the interesting subject of dynamite?

Like an arrow they had come straight and direct—along, as it seemed, one broad, smooth road—from Hyde Park to Whitechapel, right through the heart of the City.

Yet on went that hansom in front, straight down Whitechapel Road, that great thoroughfare which might, if fashion, instead of famine, were at home there, be one of the handsomest streets in London. But it looked a very dreary, hopeless, sordid place now.

Oh, what could Gregory want here? Or, on went that hansom straight away up the Mile End Road.

Mrs. Farquhar had heard of Whitechapel as a place the mere mention of which must make one shudder; but she had not even heard of Mile End.

The cab stopped at last—at Canal Road. Mrs. Farquhar felt quite worn out, the drive had been so long and so strange.

Her cabman, wise in his generation, drew up on the other side of the street. He accepted five shillings with an attempt at a growl; but Mrs. Farquhar did not stay to listen, for she saw that the captain was walking very swiftly down Canal Road, and she was afraid of missing him.

He turned twice, down dark and dreary streets, that filled Mrs. Farquhar with a nervous dread; then at last he stopped at a dismal little house, in a dismal little street, rang a bell, and was immediately admitted.

Mrs. Farquhar stood trembling against the railings; she knew not what to do. Presently a crowd of roughs came down the street, rang the same bell, and were admitted. Then came a number of dirty, miserable women. They too went to the door.

Despair gave Mrs. Farquhar courage. She was as much afraid to stay out in this dreadful street as to go into this mysterious place. She went in among the women, and when the door was opened, entered with them.

To her amazement she found herself in a very large room. Four houses had been thrown into one, and this room ran all the length. It was crowded with people—such people as Mrs. Farquhar had never dreamt of; the sight of their poverty, their rags, their strange faces—some fierce, some foolish, some utterly sad—made her feel sick.

Presently there rang out a clear, fine tenor voice; it was her husband's. He was singing an old Scottish ballad, with which of old he had been wont to please his college chums over gay suppers. How these poor wretches listened!

Mrs. Farquhar wondered as she looked furtively about her. And she felt a strange sensation of pride when she saw at the end of the song, that her handsome guardian was a popular favourite—a darling—among these unhappy and unwashed ones.

He was intreated for another song; the audience was familiar with his whole répertoire, and would gladly have had it all. Again and again Captain Farquhar sang; and then, with a good-humoured laugh, he refused to sing any more, and gave up the piano to a quiet-looking lady, dressed like a Sister of Mercy, who began to play some pretty dance-music.

Captain Farquhar went into another part of the hall, where there was a billiard-table. Here he was welcomed with great delight by a crowd of horrible-looking roughs, who were knocking the balls about.

A game began in good earnest. Captain Farquhar was a splendid player, and the men watched him with fascinated eyes when he was at work.

Presently Mrs. Farquhar noticed that a stalwart and very pleasant-looking young clergyman had joined this group, and saw that the men seemed to be as fond of him as they were of Captain Farquhar. By-and-by the clergyman broke up the meeting with a little speech, and when everyone rose to go out, Mrs. Farquhar slipped away unseen.

Cabs are not plentiful on the Mile End Road; a hansom is as strange a sight there as in the depth of the country. So when Captain Farquhar reached the top of Canal Road he stopped an omnibus which was going Citywards. But just as he was going to get into it his arm was touched. He looked and saw a young woman; without further ceremony he put his foot on the omnibus step, when the young woman said:

"Gregory!"

"Good Heavens!" exclaimed Captain Farquhar.

Then he signed to the omnibus conductor to go on.

Captain and Mrs. Farquhar then took a walk down Mile End Road, and this is some of what they said:

"Will you ever forgive me, Gregory? How could I be such a jealous little wretch, and so mean as to spy?"

"All right," said the good-natured Captain; "women can't help it, I suppose."

"And why wouldn't you tell me?"

"Didn't want to be laughed at."

"Oh, I wouldn't laugh at you—I'd like to tell all London!"

"Exactly—and then all London would laugh at me. Couldn't stand that. Don't tell, Bess; should cut altogether if any of the chaps found me out."

"I won't tell, then. But how did you find such a place?"

"The parson there's an old school chum of mine. I read the papers, and wondered if the writing fellows told lies; so wrote and asked Dolly, as we always used to call him. Dolly said: 'Come and see'; he was in the midst of it, trying to humanise the wretches. Dolly got hold of me when I did come down, and made me promise to do some humanising. Don't know that it's much use, but they seem to like it. Wish they didn't look so hungry. I'm going to give 'em a supper next week."

"You are! Oh, Gregory! I must come and help."

And she did. More than that, she kept her husband's secret. For he declared positively that he would go immediately to Timbuctoo if any of "the fellows" heard of it.

Maisie Meadows.

Digitized by Google

Powerful New Series.

THE "BRIDGE" OF RUIN.

Being the

CONFESSIONS OF A GIRL GAMBLER.

Dramatis Personæ.

OLIVE BERESFORD, the writer of these confessions. She is a young lady who is lured into gambling by her friend, Annabel Vernon, whom she detects cheating. Miss Beresford arranges a secret code of signals with a Mr. Tasker, in order to beat Annabel Vernon at her own game.

HARRY VERNON, of Vernon Towers, who with his wife plans to catch Olive in a trap. He manages to secure photographs of the incriminating gestures passed between Mr. Taskot and the relater of these episodes.

ANNABEL VERNON, wife of the last-named. An old school friend of Miss Beresford's. Her husband having obtained the proofs of Olive's alleged cheating, she holds the photos over her victim as a threat, declaring that, unless Miss Beresford does as she is ordered, she will be denounced as a card-sharper. She makes the unfortunate girl a tool to win money from her guests.

MR. TASKOT, who poses as a gentleman of means, but who is really a despicable bounder. He endeavours to force Miss Beresford to marry him.

MR. MAURICE RAY, a gentleman who rescues the narrator from a mad dog, and who since takes a kindly interest in the welfare of the young girl, treating her with great respect, and showing her much consideration.

MR. DEAN FISHER, a "Bridge" expert, and one of the guests of the Vernons at Vernon Towers when Olive Beresford was fleeced.

MRS. GRAINGER, a rich widow and an ardent gambler, another of the guests at the Towers.

MR. HAROLD BAINBRIG, a wealthy bachelor, who with his sister,

MISS EDITH BAINBRIG, loses heavily at "Bridge" whilst playing with the Vernons and the unwilling Olive Beresford.

EPISODE XIII.
Accused of Theft.

"A THIEF! I am no thief! This is an infamous plot!"

Such was my passionate exclamation, and I looked eagerly round to see how far my words were likely to be believed, but not a single face held out the slightest hope for me. The Vernons looked indignant at my presumable ingratitude. The Bainbrigs averted their gaze. And the policeman was stolidly important.

"An infamous plot!" repeated Harry Vernon. "Pray who is likely to have plotted against you? Have we not done our best to provide pleasure and entertainment for you? And is it at all credible that we would bring a serious accusation against a person whom we invited to our house as a guest?"

"And it's no use your pretending to be innocent," was Annabel's coarse remark. "We've missed things ever since you came, but we should never have dreamt of suspecting you if we had not watched you come out of Harry's den in the middle of the night, hours after you were supposed to have gone to bed. When we discovered that a silver paper weight I showed you in the den only yesterday had been taken out of that room, we guessed at once what you had been doing there when we saw you. And that is why we sent for a policeman."

There was such a dreadful mixture of truth with the lies which Annabel poured out so glibly, that I turned crimson with fright, and my treacherous hostess instantly took advantage of the fact.

"See," she exclaimed, "her own looks betray her! Tell me, Miss Beresford, dare you deny that you went secretly to my husband's private room in the middle of the night?"

"I was there," was my desperate admission. "But you know very well that I stole none of your jewellery, and I am sure you never showed me a paper weight yesterday. Our conversation while I was in that room was about something very different, and I know very well why you are forswearing yourselves now."

"After that," was Mr. Vernon's stern interruption, "I am under the painful necessity of explaining to Mr. and Miss Bainbrig that I was taking you to task for cheating at cards. I did not like to mention this, but you compel me to do so in self-defence."

The wickedness and audacity of these people were so colossal that I was struck almost dumb and sank, trembling and weeping, upon the nearest chair, sobbing vain protestations of innocence the while several more articles which did not belong to me were being taken out of the folds of various garments which I had packed in readiness before I went out.

My heart became as cold as lead, and I saw nothing but ruin before me. For who would believe me if I said that this accusation was brought against me in revenge for rescuing myself from the necessity of cheating at cards for the Vernons? The whole plot was so horribly feasible, and every detail had been thought out so carefully that there was not a loophole of escape left to me. Even my careless refusal of Annabel's hypocritical offer of help over my packing was ingeniously construed into fear of allowing her to see what was contained in my dress basket, and I thought things could not look blacker for me than they did.

But I was mistaken. And even if the Bainbrigs had been faintly inclined to believe my protestations, they soon received addition l proof that my accusers were justified in dealing harshly with me.

"Here's just one more thing," said the constable, who had resumed his search. "It's a brooch this time, I think."

"Why, that belongs to me!" cried Miss Bainbrig. "I lost it last night."

It was true. The brooch just produced was one that I had seen Miss Bainbrig wearing. It must have been stolen by Annabel herself, either for the purpose of being eventually turned into money, or to be ready for use in effecting my final ruin.

"Oh, Miss Bainbrig!" I almost shrieked. "I swear to you that I did not put any of the things there! It is a frightful conspiracy intended to prevent anybody from believing me when I say that the Vernons are swindling card sharpers, who invited us here to rob us."

At this apparently wild statement, there was a horrified exclamation from Miss Bainbrig, and her brother bit his lip, so strong was the restraint he had to put upon himself. He looked very stern and white, but he said not a word which could be interpreted either for me or against me.

Digitized by Google

The Vernons showed no such moderation.

Annabel lifted her hands in an affectation of horrified surprise.

"Could anybody believe in such awful wickedness!" she exclaimed. "I declare, it makes me ill to think what would have happened next if we had not found this viper out before she had time to do much more mischief! Fancy her having the impudence to talk about cheating! She came here pretending to know nothing about cards. Yet she won everybody's money, and then she has the nerve to accuse other people of sharp practice!"

"Mr. Bainbrig," I implored. "For Heaven's sake, do not condemn me unheard! Things look black against me, I know, because of the frightful completeness of the plot of which I am the victim. But I swear to you that I am innocent."

"I should like to think so, Miss Beresford," was the grave answer. "And I find it difficult to believe all that is said about you. But, if you knew that the money being lost here by guests was not fairly won from us, why did you take a share of it?"

"I could not help myself last night. But I have been to your house this morning, to try and see you. You had gone out, in answer to a telegram, when I arrived, so I left a letter for you, together with all the money that fell to my share last night. I asked you to retain what ought to belong to you, and to give their proportion to the two gentlemen you brought with you last night. I said in my letter that I could not keep the money because I knew it had not been won fairly from you, and you will find when you go home that what I have just said is absolutely true."

"It is a lie!" screamed Annabel, losing all control of herself on realising that she and her husband had been forestalled to some extent. "This girl knew that she would be found out, and concocted a lame tale to lead you off the scent. I expect she was scheming to be asked to your house, so that she could rob you just as she has robbed us. Policeman, do your duty! Take this girl away."

"Pardon me, Mrs. Vernon," was Mr. Bainbrig's firm protest. "A while ago I was reluctantly inclined to believe the mass of evidence adduced against Miss Beresford. But both Mr. Vernon and you have shown so much hatred and spite over this business that I fancy you have overreached yourselves, for you have convinced me that there is something behind all this, which it will be to Miss Beresford's interest to have explained."

"Harold, I agree with you," were the words which put new hope into me, as Edith Bainbrig, with a look of heavenly compassion on her handsome face, came and folded me in her arms. "The whole thing looks too much like a planned out thing to be genuine, and if that letter and its contents are at our house, I shall believe this poor girl to be innocent, in spite of all the evidence which has been so carefully gathered."

"Thank you, Miss Bainbrig," exclaimed another voice, which brought a sudden joyful revulsion of feeling to me. "Thank you. That is just the kind of speech I should have expected you to make. Happily, your judgment is on the right scent. You hope this girl is innocent. I know her to be so. Now then, Mr. and Mrs. Vernon, what mischief have you been up to this time?"

There was a scream of rage from Annabel, and an oath from Harry Vernon, who both gazed at the newcomer as though he had been a spectre.

The Bainbrigs both looked very much relieved, and I—shall I confess it? I made no attempt to free myself when a manly figure took Miss Bainbrig's place; when a manly arm incircled my waist protectively; and when Maurice Ray's sonorous voice said feelingly:

"Don't worry any more about this business, dear. I'll see that the accusations against you are withdrawn, and that your unprincipled accusers eat every word they have said against you."

EPISODE XIV.

The Vernons are Checkmated.

So far I had noticed that several other people had entered the room, but on glancing hastily round, I saw that Mrs. Grainger was almost at my elbow, and that Mr. Dean Fisher, with an ugly gleam in his fishy eyes, was looking at Maurice Ray as if he would have liked to kill him there and then.

"I do not know who you are, sir," he said sneeringly. "But I fancy you don't exactly speak by the card, and as I was a witness of Miss Beresford's clandestine expedition to a room which she knew to be Mr. Vernon's private den, I fancy it will be difficult for you to compel anybody to eat their words."

"I suppose you are Mr. Dean Fisher?" inquired my champion, who showed no signs of being intimidated by the Bridge expert's evident partisanship of the cause of my enemies.

"That is my name," was the answer, given with much more self-possession than was shown after Mr. Ray had remarked: "I fancy I have heard of you before, sir. There was a little scandal at Carliol Castle about two month's ago, and I know of one or two people who would like to meet once more a certain Bridge expert named——"

"What has that got to do with what is going on here?" interrupted Mr. Fisher, so savagely that one had no difficulty in guessing that he was afraid of further disclosures. "Be good enough to confine yourself to the subject at issue."

Mr. Ray smiled contemptuously as he rejoined: "It shall be as you please, Mr. Fisher. I believe you observed just now that you were ready to bear witness against Miss Beresford?"

"Pardon me," was the sullen reply. "I am ready to do nothing of the sort. If Mr. and Mrs. Vernon have any accusations to make against the young lady, they need not count upon me to support them."

"Wise creature! Even a bird of prey knows when he has pursued his game far enough! Ladies and gentlemen, will you all kindly observe that Mr. Fisher knows absolutely nothing to Miss Beresford's discredit? Mr. Vernon, it is a pity that your principal coadjutor is failing you. Do you think it will be advisable to persist in accusing Miss Beresford of felony?"

Harry Vernon was as pale as a sheet, his wife scarlet with baffled rage. Veritable wild beasts both of them were. But it was evident enough that their fangs had been suddenly drawn, for the woman remained silent, and the man muttered between his teeth "Of course, if my principal witness fails me, I have no case, so it is no use having Miss Beresford arrested. Constable, I will pay you something for the trouble you have been put to, and then you can go."

"What! Without making no arrest, after finding all these things in the young lady's basket?" objected the policeman, who scented more than money enough to pay him for his trouble. He would probably want paying for his silence, and he continued: "Either the lady has stolen the things, or the case has been trumped up, just as she said. and if I'm not to finish making an arrest for stealing, I'll have to make one for con-spy-ricy."

"Nothing of the sort," snapped Harry Vernon. "Miss Beresford denies everything, and we must give her the benefit of the doubt."

"Pardon me," was Maurice Ray's interjection. "To give anybody the benefit of the doubt is virtually to put the stigma of guilt upon them. That will not do for me. Mr. Vernon—once for all, do you believe that Miss Beresford had the remotest intention of taking anything from this house which did not belong to her?"

"Well, perhaps——"

"No perhaps, if you please. Has Miss Beresford touched anything of yours with the intention of depriving you of it?"

"I own that I may have been mistaken, and regret that my wife and I were somewhat hasty in jumping to conclusions."

"You mean that you know she is innocent?"

Digitized by Google

"Yes. I believe her to be quite innocent."

"But what about all those things having been found, packed ready for removal, in her dress-basket?"

"Some of the servants very probably put them there, for some reason or other."

"Not Miss Beresford?"

"No. Now I come to think of it, she could not have done so, as she went out before some of the things disappeared. I'm sorry the mistakes have been made, and apologise most fully to Miss Beresford for having misjudged her."

Everybody else had maintained a breathless silence during this conversation, but there was quite a babel of tongues for a moment or two after my enemies had been compelled to retract all their iniquitous accusations against me. The policeman protested that "he'd be blowed if he ever saw the like of that afore," though he raised no objections when Mr. Vernon sullenly asked him to go to another room with him, where they could settle with each other quietly, and I fancy he extorted a neat little sum out of the man who sent for him to arrest me, for he soon quitted the house with a broad smile on his face.

"Mrs. Vernon, I'm afraid you are not very well," was Mr. Fisher's solicitous remark. "Let me take you away from these disagreeable people."

Annabel hastily took the proffered arm of her confederate in swindling, and the pair left their intended victim in triumphant possession of the restored esteem of the persons who had been summoned to witness her downfall and disgrace!

"You have saved me again," I said to Mr. Ray, the tears of passionate thankfulness swimming in my eyes. "I owe you first my life, and then my reputation and liberty! If I lived a thousand years, I could never repay the great services you have done me."

"Then do not try," was the kindly response. "The knowledge that I arrived here in time is reward enough for me. And now, the sooner you quit Vernon Towers the better. I arranged about your luggage, as promised, but you have missed the train you should have caught, and there is not another until midnight."

"Miss Beresford," exclaimed Edith Bainbrig, coming up to me and kissing me warmly. "We owe you no end of reparation for doubting you even for a moment. Show that you forgive us by coming home with us, and staying there for a few days, till you have got over the shock these events must have caused you. Mr. Ray knows that we are not likely to treat you badly."

"No, that won't do at all," protested Mrs. Grainger. "I have the first lien on Miss Beresford's good nature. She promised to visit me, and don't you forget that you are also both due at my house to-morrow."

I would have preferred to visit the Bainbrigs, rather than Mrs. Grainger, to whom I had not taken much of a fancy. But she seemed to be very kind now, and I left my friends to arrange for my immediate disposal amongst themselves, the result being that, escorted by Mr. Ray, and fortified by the good wishes of the brother and sister, I and my belongings, the latter properly packed, went home with the portly widow.

EPISODE XV.

Out of the Frying-Pan into the Fire.

At the door Mr. Ray bade me good-bye for a couple of days or so.

"I'm very sorry to lose sight of you so soon," he said, looking so earnestly at my blushing face that I blushed all the more. "Unfortunately, my time is not exactly altogether my own. Just now, I am staying at the residence of the Lord Lieutenant of the County, who has been good enough to give me several commissions for miniatures. I finished one yesterday, and am to begin another this afternoon, so I shall be rather busy for awhile."

"I wish you would paint a miniature of me," exclaimed Mrs. Grainger. "I don't mind how much I pay for it, so long as it is pretty."

"Poor Mr. Ray," I thought compassionately. "It will be a difficult task to make a pretty picture from Mrs. Grainger."

But it is a usual failing for us all to want our likenesses to be very unlike us. If we are pretty, we want them to be lovely. If we are plain, we want them to be at least handsome. And if we are ugly, we vow the painter has not done his work well, if he does not produce something quite beautiful. This being the case, it follows that the most successful portrait painters are always those who are adepts in the art of idealising, and it would seem that Mr. Ray had studied this art very diligently, for he showed no hesitation in accepting the commission just offered him.

"Then come straight here from the castle," said Mrs. Grainger. "Miss Beresford will still be here when you come, and we will all have a good time together."

The prospect of seeing Maurice Ray again, and of living for some days in the same house with him, was very acceptable to me, and by the time my genial hostess and I were having a belated lunch together, my elasticity of spirits had almost brought back the usual colour to my cheeks.

The Bainbrigs had gone home, after announcing their determination never to enter Vernon Towers again. They also promised to drive over to Trenewth that evening, but, greatly to my disappointment, Mr. Bainbrig came without his sister.

"Edith turned very seedy," he explained, "and asked me to excuse her at present."

"What a pity!" lamented Mrs. Grainger. "I had so looked forward to a quiet rubber, and now there will only be three of us! I'm fearfully disappointed!"

"So am I," agreed Harold Bainbrig. "But there's no help for it. It was no use pressing Edith to come when her head, as she expressed it, was turning like a mill-pond."

"Is it necessary to play bridge?" I asked timidly. "Cannot we amuse ourselves in some other way?"

I felt it due to my conscience, and to the unhappiness I had already endured, to enter a feeble protest against the game. But I was as eager to have another rubber—under fair conditions—as the others were, and I saw no harm in pursuing a course of amusement which was in itself harmless.

"It is only dangerous," I told myself, "when money is played for, thus offering temptations to cheat. I don't intend to play for money any more, so it would be foolish for me to spoil other people's enjoyment."

It was easy for me to make a wise resolve when confronted by no special temptation. But, as it proved, it was not so easy to adhere to my resolve, for both Mrs. Grainger and Mr. Bainbrig objected to playing for the mere fun of the thing.

"But you shan't be mulcted, my dear," was the former's assurance. "The question is—who will make a fourth?"

At this moment a servant announced a visitor, and our hostess smiled with pleasure.

"Just fancy! Isn't it lucky?" she exclaimed. "I didn't expect him till next week, and he's turned up to-night instead."

"May we ask the name of the gentleman whose advent is so welcome?" inquired Mr. Bainbrig. And I felt my heart grow heavy with a premonition of further evil when the glib answer was given him: "It is a gentleman whom you have both met recently, and whom you will, I am sure, be pleased to meet again. It is Mr. Taskot."

I tried not to think the visit of ill-omen to me. But I could not rid myself of the fancy, and ere many hours were over, I had ample proof that I was not to be allowed to forget the unhappy arrangement which put me in the clutches of unscrupulous acquaintances.

Mr. Maurice Ray had saved me from the Vernons. But could he save me from the man who now began to trade upon the power which "our secret" gave him?

(To be continued next week.)

Digitized by Google

IN SPITE OF IT

Telling of an Experiment which Proved Successful.

They had been discussing a certain evergreen topic that seemed to crop up at regular intervals over the tea-cups at Myrtle Villa.

"I don't care what you say," declared Hetty, the hostess, pouring out fresh tea, "I don't care what you say—a man may be good-looking and clever, he may possess all the virtues under the sun—I wouldn't give that for him if he hadn't perfect manners!"

"Then you'll never get married," returned Kate, the matter-of-fact, with great decision. "Men with perfect manners don't exist."

"The species has died out," put in Miranda sadly.

"They never existed," retorted Kate.

"Our grandmothers tell us——" began Miranda dreamily.

"Oh, I know what you're going to say," interrupted Kate. "Of course, our grandmothers' lovers were paragons of perfection. Fifty years hence we shall talk about our lovers in the same way."

"Because our memories have grown dim along with our eyes, I suppose you mean," said Hetty. "Well, I daresay there's some truth in that."

"But then——" began Molly, who up to this point had been a silent listener.

"Well?" queried the others expectantly.

It was not often that Molly could be roused to argument.

"I was only going to say," Molly went on, "that it isn't only a dim memory that makes one forget people's faults. If you really love anybody, you know——"

"Who's that talking about love?" demanded a masculine voice, the owner of which had just that moment entered the room.

"If you're good, Jack," said Hetty, as her brother shook hands with her guests, "you shall have some tea and listen to what Molly was going to say when you had the bad manners to interrupt her. Go on, Molly."

"Oh, never mind."

"But this won't do, Miss Molly," protested Jack. "Don't you see how badly you're treating me? You're making a wet blanket of me against my will."

"Come, Molly," said Kate. "You see," she explained to Jack, "we were talking about the kind of men we wanted to marry, and Julia said that her man must be handsome, clever, strong, manly, gentle, sympathetic, and unselfish, and then Hetty declared that she wouldn't look at a man unless he had perfect manners, which were more important than all the other virtues put together, and I argued there was "no sich a pusson" as a man with perfect manners—and—and——"

"And that there never had been 'sich a pusson,'" continued Miranda, "and that when our grandmothers talked of the delightful men of their young days, it was because their memories had become impaired."

"And at that, Molly here was up in arms in a minute," added Hetty. "Tell us what you were going to say, Molly."

"I only think," said Molly shyly, "that one can forget a man's faults without the help of a bad memory—if one really loves him, I mean."

"Bravo, Miss Molly!" cried Jack. "It's refreshing to listen to you, in this age of scoffers."

"What Molly says may be true of some people," remarked Hetty, with an air of superior knowledge, "but I'm sure love would never blind me to any man's faults."

"That shows how little you know about the subject," rejoined her brother. "By your own confession, Hetty, you've never been in love."

"That's because I'm hypercritical."

"Hetty expects too much," explained Kate. "She wants a man with perfect manners."

"And perfect good taste in everything," added Hetty.

"Men are only human," murmured Jack. "They're apt to make little mistakes sometimes. But you always were hard on our sex, Hetty."

"Because I decline to fall in love with a man who puts his feet on my mantelpiece and wears scarlet neckties."

"And you honestly imagine that it's because men's manners aren't nice that you've never fallen in love?"

"Yes, I do," replied Hetty firmly.

"My dear girl," said Jack, "you're labouring under a delusion. The fact of your never having been in love has nothing whatever to do with your hypercritical notions about the manners of my sex. To use a hackneyed phrase, you've never met your affinity. I'm quite convinced that when he does turn up, you'll fall in love with him, even if his manners are not absolute perfection."

"Never!" declared Hetty.

"I believe your brother is right," said Kate.

"Time will show," remarked Julia oracularly.

"You're wrong, Jack," said Hetty. "If ever I do fall in love—of which I'm extremely doubtful myself—it will be with a man with perfect taste and perfect manners."

"So you think now. Wait and see. I shouldn't be surprised, Hetty, if you could find it in your heart to forgive quite elementary rudeness, and even a scarlet necktie, when you do fall in love."

At this there was a general exclamation of dissent.

"Oh, Mr. Lawrence, you're going too far!" protested Julia. "No girl could fall in love with a man who wore a scarlet necktie."

"Or who forgot to raise his hat to a lady," said Miranda.

"Or lighted a pipe without her permission," added Kate.

"Of course not," said Hetty. "Jack, you're getting absurd. Have some more tea and change the subject."

"By all means," said Jack cheerfully. "All the same, I stick to my opinion."

"And I to mine," retorted Hetty.

"That's how every argument ends," remarked Kate, philosophically.

"Time will show," repeated Julia the oracle.

* * * * *

"I'm bringing a friend home to dinner to-night, Hetty," said Jack, a few days later. "You don't mind?"

"Of course not," replied Hetty, who was her brother's housekeeper. "Who is it, Jack?"

"You'll hardly remember him—Jim Fergusson. You were quite a kiddie when he was here last."

"I seem to remember his name, but I don't remember him."

"I haven't seen him for years—ran across him quite accidentally last night. He's going to settle down at home for good—been all over the world, you know. He's a decent sort of chap, Hetty. You ought to like him!"

And with that Jack departed for his day's grind at the office.

Her brother's announcement did not disturb Hetty very much. Jack was always bringing friends home to dinner in this informal fashion, and she felt no particular curiosity about Mr. Jim Fergusson.

When he appeared that evening, Hetty's lack of curiosity changed to a feeling of mild disapproval.

She had long ago encouraged her brother to dispense with the ceremonial of evening dress at these little dinners, but it was something of a shock to her to welcome a visitor attired in a light tweed suit, brown boots, and—horror of horrors!—a necktie of the brightest scarlet.

Digitized by Google

When Hetty had partially recovered from this blow, she noticed that Mr. Fergusson was not a bad-looking man. If it hadn't been for that tie, she could almost have thought him handsome! When she had known him for half an hour, she decided that he was one of the most interesting, as well as one of the most provoking people she had ever met.

He talked well, almost brilliantly, on every topic that happened to present itself, but oh, the lamentable crudity of his manners!

"It's evident he hasn't travelled about the world with his eyes shut," reflected Hetty. "Then why, oh, why, hasn't he learnt how to eat peas!"

But, alas! It wasn't only Jim Fergusson's method of eating peas that Hetty objected to. She saw, with pained surprise, that he ate his soup by putting the point of the spoon into his mouth, and that he used his bread to sop up the gravy. Then, too, he was inattentive to a criminal degree. He helped himself to salt and mustard, but it did not occur to him to pass them to his neighbour.

He consumed an unpeeled apple for desert by the simple process of biting into it, and when coffee arrived Hetty was therefore not surprised to find that he ignored the sugar-tongs.

Hetty glanced furtively at her brother from time to time. She wondered whether Jack had noticed their guest's eccentricities. She rather thought he had—he seemed so silent and absent-minded, and sat with his eyes ostentatiously glued to his plate during the greater part of his meal.

Mr. Fergusson himself appeared beautifully unconscious of the dismay he was creating. He talked with cheerful fluency between his bites, and, though handicapped by the fact that he bore the burden of the conversation, contrived to make an excellent dinner.

When Hetty left them to their wine and cigars, it was Jack who rose to open the door for his sister. The observance of such little courtesies did not seem to interest his friend.

And yet, Hetty was obliged to admit that, apart from his dress and manners, her guest was delightful.

He fascinated her in spite of herself, though when he had gone, and Jack inquired: "Well, what do you think of him, Hetty?" She shrugged her shoulders and retorted lightly:

"What did you expect?"

Jack looked disappointed.

"I thought he would interest you," he remarked.

"So he does," replied Hetty, "but his manners set my teeth on edge."

"They are rather odd," admitted Jack, "but one ought to forgive much to a clever fellow like that."

"Just because he's clever, his manners irritate me all the more. He ought to know better."

"He's knocked about the world a lot," said Jack apologetically.

"Which usually has the opposite effect upon a man," rejoined his sister. "A man who has seen the world ought to know how to behave better than a man who's stayed at home all his life."

"But you forget, he chose to rough it."

"I don't care how he acquired those manners," said Hetty, "I only know that they're very irritating."

"I'm sorry," replied Jack. "Does that mean I mustn't bring him here again?"

"No—of course not," said Hetty hastily. "I didn't say I disliked Mr. Fergusson. On the contrary, I—I like him very much; but, oh, Jack, his tie was dreadful!"

"A red one!" said Jack. "How curious after our argument the other night."

"Very," returned Hetty, a trifle shortly. And Jack said nothing more that evening.

* * * * * *

Mr. Fergusson had taken to calling pretty frequently at Myrtle Villa, and it must be confessed that Hetty did not altogether discourage his visits.

She was not very clear in her own mind as to her precise feelings towards Jack's friend.

He interested her. Seeing how clever and well read and all that sort of thing he was, what was more natural than that? she reflected, arguing with her conscience. She had rather fallen into the habit of arguing with her conscience of late. Somehow, it seemed necessary to do so whenever her thoughts dwelt on Jim Fergusson.

Hetty possessed a very fair share of sound commonsense.

She never, like many of her sex, indulged in violent flirtations and called them platonic friendships. She was too sensible and too honest for that.

Neither did she overrate her own charms. She was far from imagining that every man who paid her the slightest attention was bound to be madly in love with her.

On the other hand, she never wilfully blinded herself to to the truth where the signs and tokens were unmistakable.

And so it happened that, not many months after Jim Fergusson's first introduction to her, Hetty acknowledged to herself, with some reluctance, it must be confessed, that it was her duty to discourage certain advances on the part of Jack's friend if she did not wish to merit the charge of heartless flirtation.

"Of course I'm not in love with him," she argued with herself. "I could never be in love with a man who dresses and behaves as he does, that goes without saying."

But, though it "went without saying," she found it necessary to say it pretty often, each time with a queer little pain at her heart.

She had begun, moreover, to invent excuses for Jim Fergusson's behaviour.

"It's absentmindedness that makes him walk into a room in front of me, and sit down when he ought to be handing me a chair, and—and all that sort of thing," she argued. "Of course he doesn't mean to be rude. Clever people are often like that. All the same," she would add, more regretfully than she cared to own, "that doesn't alter the fact that it's bad manners to do all these things, and one can't get over bad manners!"

On the very day when Hetty had finally made up her mind to put a stop to their growing intimacy, Jim Fergusson called when Jack was out.

"I'm not at home," said Hetty firmly.

The maid who announced the visitor looked embarrassed.

"I—I'm very sorry, miss," she stammered, "but I told the gentleman you were in."

"What made you do that?" asked Hetty.

"I thought," explained the girl, "as you'd always been at home to Mr. Fergusson before, miss——"

"I see," said Hetty, turning red. "Ask Mr. Fergusson to come in, Jane."

She was inconsistent enough to feel relieved at Jane's mistake.

At any rate, she had done her duty. She could not be held responsible for the maid's blunder.

When one has made up one's mind, as a matter of duty, to be discreet, it is rather pleasant to be obliged by circumstances over which one has no control, to be exactly the opposite thing.

Jim Fergusson stalked into Hetty's drawing-room in the somewhat blundering fashion peculiar to big men, and sat down gingerly upon a certain fragile structure, known by courtesy as an "easy chair," which his hostess pointed out to him.

"I'm sorry Jack is out," remarked Jim, with obvious mendacity.

"So am I," said Hetty, with equal lack of candour. "He's dining with some friends, so I'm afraid you'll have to put up with my company."

Considering Hetty's recent resolution, it was not a wise remark.

Jim seized it eagerly.

"It's you who are putting up with me, Miss Lawrence," he said. "I sometimes feel as though I were taking a mean advantage of your kindness of heart. But if you only knew the pleasure it gives me to come here in this informal fashion," he went on hurriedly before Hetty could reply. "I—I'm awfully grateful to you."

"Why should you be grateful?" asked Hetty.

Digitized by Google

"For allowing me to bore you so persistently," he returned.

"You don't bore me in the least," protested Hetty laughingly. "I'm not so unselfish as all that, I assure you."

"I'm glad," said Jim, with more seriousness, Hetty felt, than her light tone merited.

Somehow conversation that evening did not progress very brilliantly. Hetty felt unaccountably nervous and ill at ease, and her companion seemed absolutely stupid.

The two started topic after topic with hopeless futility, and finally, as though by mutual consent, lapsed into desperate silence.

Hetty had not lighted the lamps, and only the flickering fire illuminated the room.

It was a chilly night, and they had drawn their chairs close up to the hearth. Each sat staring into the fire, as though for inspiration.

There was a long and painful pause which Hetty felt an idiotic inability to break. The fire seemed to mesmerise her into silence.

Presently she became dimly conscious that her companion was speaking again. She began to listen dreamily, and with a strange lack of interest, to his confused and halting words, until, all at once, she awoke with a start to the fact that Jim Fergusson was proposing to her.

She could see his bronzed, handsome face quite clearly in the firelight, and its expression was more eloquent than the stammering words. It sent a strange, new thrill to her heart.

"I love you," said Jim, and his honest grey eyes shone with a light that was not all reflected from the fire.

He had risen, and stood looking down upon her, waiting for her answer.

Slowly and timidly she raised her face to his, and he bent down to catch her whispered words.

What had come over Hetty?

She scarcely understood herself. She did not doubt or question. She only knew that a wonderful, undreamt of happiness had come to her.

This man had told her that he loved her, and she—well, she knew now that she loved him too.

At that moment she could have laughed aloud at her own past folly. She scorned her old self with a lofty, happy scorn. Scales that had blinded her seemed suddenly to have fallen from her eyes.

How mad, how little, she had been to weigh her lover's imperfections in the balance against this splendid, wonderful thing called love!

And so she laid her soft cheek against the scarlet neck-tie, and sealed her fate upon Jim's lips.

"Now I'm going to confess," said Jim, when Jack came home and had taken in the situation. "Will you promise, darling, not to be hard on me?"

"What do you mean?" demanded Hetty, feeling vaguely alarmed.

"You'll have to forgive him, Hetty, because it's all my fault," said Jack, beginning to laugh.

"What's all your fault?"

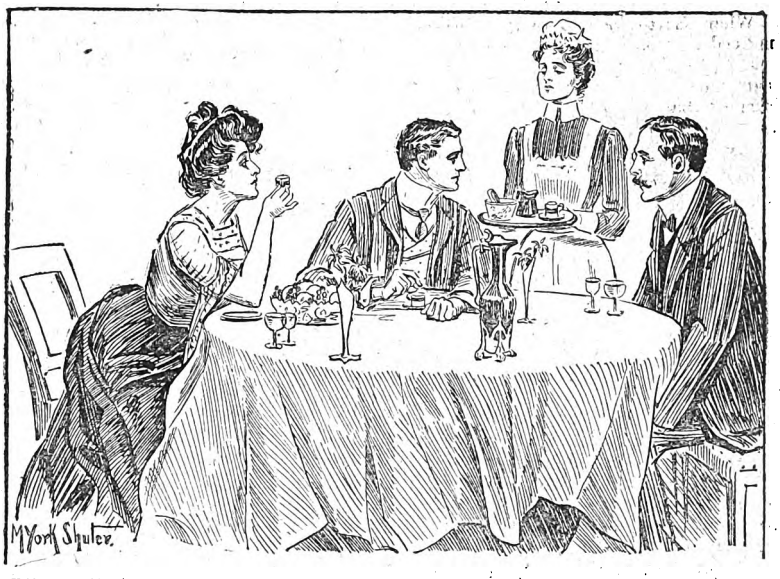
"The scarlet necktie, and—and all the rest of it," said Jack.

"Meaning my atrocious behaviour generally," said Jim.

"He'll never do it again, Hetty," said Jack.

Hetty gazed from one to the other in utter bewilderment.

"The fact is," continued Jack, "I wanted to make an experiment. Do you remember that declaration of yours, Hetty, that you couldn't fall in love with a man unless he had perfect taste and perfect manners?"



"When coffee arrived Hetty was not surprised to find that he ignored the sugar tongs.

"I remember," said Hetty, blushing self-consciously.

"Well, I wanted to put your theory to the test, and when I happened to run across Jim that day and invited him to dinner, it occurred to me that my opportunity had come. I had an idea that if ever you fell in love at all it would be with a man like Jim, and so I persuaded him to become a party to my little plot."

"I didn't know you then, you see, Hetty," put in Jim hastily, "or I would never have been fool enough to give my promise. Besides, I wasn't so vain as to suppose you could possibly care for me under any circumstances, so I didn't mind making myself out a bit worse than I am."

"Of course," continued Jack, "I, for my part, felt convinced your theory was moonshine, Hetty, or I would never have invited Jim here to risk the experiment. Once he'd seen you, though, I had jolly hard work to keep him from throwing that necktie into the fire, but as you know I succeeded in refraining him."

"I got to loathe the beastly thing," said Jim. "The more I got to know you, the more I got to loathe it, and everything it represented. But Jack was relentless. He bound me to my promise."

"I believe he'd have broken it, all the same, if I hadn't pointed out to him, that your love, Hetty, wouldn't be worth much if it didn't rise superior to his little eccentricities."

Hetty made no reply.

"You're not vexed?" asked Jim, dismayed by her persistent silence.

At this Hetty smiled a little whimsically.

"I suppose I ought to be angry with both of you for deceiving me so shamefully," she said at last.

"Well, of course," retorted Jack, quite unabashed, "it's annoying to give anybody the chance of saying 'I told you so.' But, under the circumstances, you can't blame me for saying it. You see, you fell in love with him in spite of the tie and the manners. I was right, after all."

"Yes," said Hetty, looking at Jim in a way that made his heart beat very fast. "Yes, you were right, but, all the same, I'm glad he doesn't care for scarlet neckties!"

Still, once every year, on the anniversary of their wedding-day, Jim wears a tie of the brightest scarlet hue.

Grete Hahn.

Digitized by Google

THE CERTAINTY THAT FAILED.

A Tale of a Mean Trick at Doncaster Races.

Reginald Cashel, late of His Majesty's 10th Hussars, was in a quandary. The money market was tight, not a Jew nor a Gentile would advance another penny on his signature—they had learnt by experience that the Captain's notes were worth no more than the paper on which they were written.

Luck had been dead against him. He had laid a favourite at Goodwood on the confident assurance, of someone in the know, that the horse was not meant to stay the course.

"And he won by a head," exclaimed the Captain, furious at the recollection, "by a head!"

"My dear boy, what can you expect?" said his cousin. "Jockeys are only human after all. They win races they ought not to win, and lose those they should have left unlost."

This reflection did not comfort Cashel. To use his own words, he was absolutely broke. There was not the ghost of a good thing on his racing horizon, and his duns would wait no longer.

In despair he went to Lady Betty Fordyce, the cousin aforesaid, a young and adorable widow.

"I'm done for, Betty," he said dolefully. "I think I shall go to Africa and dig for diamonds."

"There are none left there, Reggie, they're all at the Hague. You'd better wait till after Doncaster, at any rate."

"What is there to wait for?"

"Lord Wingham and the Onyx Cup. He's running a couple in the race, you know. If you could find out which horse was meant and who's riding, you might pull through yet."

"It's a bright idea, but I don't see how I'm going to work it. I hardly know the man, not well enough at all events to ask him for a racing tip."

"Don't trouble about that, I'll ask him——"

"You, Betty." Cashel paused. "Poor Wingham!" he said slowly. "Your admirers, my dear cousin, are as many as their looks are various."

"There's nothing the matter with Lord Arthur, thank you."

"Manners and morals unimpeachable, eh? Don't trouble to expound his virtues, I know the type."

"I am prejudiced in favour of manners, I confess. I'm sorry you don't like Wingham."

"I don't like anyone you flirt with. I want all your gifts and graces to myself."

"Be serious, Reggie. Think of Doncaster and your debts."

"There's little chance of forgetting either. When will you work the oracle, Betty?"

"Now, in a few minutes. I expect Wingham almost directly."

Lord Arthur Wingham suffered from a burning desire to distinguish himself in Lady Betty's eyes, a desire which made him take strange and sudden resolutions.

"We were just talking about you and the races," said Lady Betty as he entered. "I was telling Reggie I felt certain you were going to bring off something good at Doncaster. He wants to learn all about it."

"My cousin is disposed to plunge, you know," interposed Cashel. "I suggested she'd better find out which of your two she was to back, before she puts her money on."

Lord Arthur coloured with pleasure.

"It's awfully good of you to care, Lady Betty," he stammered. "And I shall be delighted to let you both into my secret. Only"—he drew himself up with a delightful air of importance, "it is a secret. Not a word must get about."

"Of course not. You can trust me, and Reggie never gives anything away."

A remark more true than Lady Betty meant.

"I'm running 'Viking' and 'Hotspur,'" said Wingham eagerly. "We tried them both this morning. We tried them at the weights with Harris and Rogers up. 'Viking' won by a head, but it was a very near thing."

"'Viking' is a sluggard. He wants riding every yard," said Cashel. "Harris will have his work cut out."

Lord Wingham flushed a deeper red.

"Harris isn't riding 'Viking' for this race," he said slowly.

"Why, I thought you'd a retainer on him?"

"So I have—but I shan't let him ride."

"Who on earth are you going to put up?"

"Viking's" owner fluttered nervously. He clasped his chair tightly, and glanced appealingly at Betty.

"I'm going to ride myself," he said, "and—I shall ride to win."

Betty's eyebrows formed an acute angle. Cashel was heard to give a strangled sort of a cough.

In an agony of self-consciousness Wingham rose.

"I know you think I'm an idiot to dream of such a thing," he said. "But listen to me, and then you'll understand why I'm going to do it. You see, everyone regards me as a duffer. They're always chipping me at the mess, asking what's the good of horses to a man who can't handle 'em. I don't mind for myself, I know I'm not clever. But I don't like you to think that of me. I want you to be proud, to feel that I'm not quite unworthy of your—your friendship. That's why I'm going to ride, that's why I'm going to win. You'll be there, Lady Betty?"

"Of course," said Betty, pink in her cheeks, "and I'll wear your colours."

"I won't disgrace them, really. You don't think I've much chance, Cashel?" He turned to Reginald.

"Frankly, I don't. It's very plucky of you, and a pretty compliment to pay my cousin. But——"

The Captain shrugged his shoulders and smiled in a most superior style.

Lord Arthur winced, and Betty somehow felt annoyed. Reggie need not have crushed the poor boy so unmercifully, it was positively unfeeling.

"I hope I shall prove you in the wrong," said Wingham. "Don't lay against me too heavily, because I'm going to win," and with a laugh his lordship departed.

"What do you think of it, Reggie?" asked his cousin.

"Magnificent, my dear, for me. I shall make a scoop, and no mistake. 'Viking's' at five to two now and they think Harris is riding. Even then I wouldn't stand him, but now Betty, I'm going to make my fortune. I shall lay against Wingham down to my last farthing, and shall clear £20,000 if I make a penny."

"I would not be quite so sure. Wingham does not ride badly."

"Ride? My dear child, what are you thinking of? Even among amateurs he's nervous and flustered as a cat, he came an awful cropper at the regimental steeplechase. I leave you to imagine what he'll be like with Loates and Woods near him at the start and Cannon alongside at the finish—if he ever gets to the finish. It's absurd!"

"I can't see it's so ridiculous as you say. Anyhow"—Lady Betty spoke incisively—"I shall back 'Viking' and his rider."

Digitized by Google

"I didn't know you had much money to throw away, Betty," he sneered. "Hadn't you better hedge?"

"That's not my way."

"Well, you'll get badly left. Good-bye."

From a financial point of view the morning had been a great success, and yet Cashel was conscious of a feeling of dissatisfaction. Lady Betty had shown more interest in Lord Wingham than he cared about. She usually treated men—always excepting Reggie—with a delightful indifference. Cashel was fond of his cousin, in a lazy sort of way, and had a notion that some day he would marry her and settle down. It annoyed him to think Betty might not agree.

For the next few days he was busy laying heavily but cautiously against "Viking." He felt convinced that Wingham's defeat was a dead certainty, and he made his book accordingly.

He grew less confident as the race drew near, however. Wingham was looking very fit, and Betty's continual assertions that he had a chance took an effect even on Cashel's scepticism.

Suppose he were wrong and "Viking" won after all? It was a possibility to shudder at. "Viking's" defeat was the last, the only hope of paying his debts. What if he had miscalculated? Suppose by some hideous mischance Wingham brought his horse first past the winning post. It would mean ruin. He would have to go under, to drop out of the old set, and pass a miserable existence hiding from his creditors. The night before the race he was a prey to terrible misgivings.

Pacing up and down his room, he recalled instances of men—duffers as a rule—who under the spur of excitement had done great things. Wingham might be such an one. And if it were so, if the youth plucked up sufficient nerve to ride "Viking" as he should be ridden—Cashel grew pale and caught his lip between his teeth. It was a risk, an awful risk.

If he were only sure that Wingham would fail, how different life would look! With twenty thousand he could start afresh. He'd economise, and, yes, would marry Betty. If only he were sure, if only. He stopped short and glanced half fearfully round the room. Why not make sure? The thing was easily done. On the course to-morrow, just before the race, he had only to offer Wingham a nip from his flask, whisky and water, with a dash of something else. No one would ever know. It would do no harm, a blow to Betty's vanity, a fall to his Lordship's pride. Trifles when weighed against a man's ruin.

And yet he did not easily persuade himself. His life had not been white, but it had held no spot so black as the thing he contemplated doing. It was a mean thing, a treacherous thing—but he must do it. Long he sat pondering, and when at last he rose his face was set.

Next morning he was up early. All night long he had ridden, in fancy, a mad race, straining to gain a point that as he neared, fell farther and farther away from him. He looked pale and haggard and felt so wretchedly ill that he had recourse to a strong pick-me-up. He could not do what must be done without. From his dressing-case he took a phial, measured a portion of the contents—it was powerful and had to be used with care—and drank the dose.

Gradually he felt better, and sitting down waited till his heart beat steadily and his hand ceased to tremble. Then he took up his pocket flask, ready filled—all but—with whisky and water. He was dressed and it was time to start. There was but one thing left to do. Furtively he glanced towards the table, towards a little bottle containing an opiate he had purchased in readiness the night before. He still fingered his flask and hesitated long.

The chiming of the clock roused him, he must hurry, he would be late. With a quick movement he snatched up the bottle and emptied the contents into the flask.

No chance for Lord Wingham now, Reginald Cashel had made sure at last!

* * * * *

The bell had just been rung to clear the course for the Onyx Cup at Doncaster. A hush fell over the ring, but a moment later a shout, half of surprise, half of mirth, rent the air, for opposite "Viking" stood, as rider, the significant title "owner."

Wingham, deathly pale, and generally speaking, all to pieces, shuddered at the cries of ten to one, a hundred to eight, fifteen to one "Viking," that surged round him.

Betty flashed a look from him to Cashel.

"Pull yourself together, Arthur," she said quickly. "Reggie, say something, do something, he's ready to faint."

Cashel glanced at his Lordship with a critical eye. He looked bad enough certainly, and the odds were against his getting any better. Still—it was safer to run no risks, at the last moment he might recover his nerve.

"Cheer up, Wingham," he said lightly. "Here, take my flask and drink success to Lady Betty's colours."

His Lordship took the flask, and drank off the whisky.

"It's done me good, old chap," he said, "thanks awfully," and with a creditable attempt to smile, he went to get weighed in. Cashel and Lady Betty adjourned to the top of the stand.

"Will he ever get through?" asked Lady Betty anxiously.

"I think not. In my opinion he'll collapse at the first post. It will be bad for you, Betty, eh?"

"Horrible. I've dropped a lot of money, Reggie. Besides"—she paused. "I feel so sorry for him. It's a plucky thing to do. He can't help being nervous."

Reggie agreed, and murmured a few words of consolation if not hope. He felt so lighthearted, so confident that he was ready to feel sorry for Betty or Wingham or anybody else. Who would not feel confident with twenty thousand pounds almost in one's grasp?

"Here they are," cried Betty, as the horses came trooping up ready to form in line for the start. "Oh, Reggie, look at Arthur. Look!"

Cashel turned quickly to face the biggest surprise in his life.

Flushed certainly and laughing, and gesticulating rather wildly, but sitting his horse well, and waving his whip triumphantly to Betty came Wingham, every trace of nervousness gone, and looking as if the race were in his pocket.

What could it mean; had he by chance made a mistake? Cashel felt wildly in his racing coat. No, it was all right, the flask was just on empty, Wingham had drunk it nearly all.

It was too soon, perhaps, for the drug to take effect. Another minute and Wingham would grow dazed, he would falter, sway——

"They're off!" cried Betty in a fever of excitement.

Cashel bent forward with eager, straining eyes. First he saw "Viking" jump away in front, then he realised that his Lordship was riding as if for dear life, making every post a winning post. His heart almost ceased to beat, the course grew blurred before him. Then he had a momentary relief as he caught the murmurs of the ring. "Wingham must be mad, it isn't a five furlong scurry, he'll ride his horse to a standstill before he's half way down the course."

But then, as they came into the straight, and he caught sight of Wingham fifty yards ahead of his field, hope died within him; and when, whipping and spurring and shouting Wingham still kept his lead while "Viking"—no sluggard now, but going great guns—with his sides covered with foam, answered his rider's every call, Reginald Cashel realised his great coup had failed. He had soiled his honour to no purpose, degraded himself to no end. Wingham had won the race!

"It was your toast that did it, old chap," his Lordship exclaimed as he returned in triumph to the stand.

Cashel turned faint with a horrible suspicion. He hurried from the course and took the first train back to town.

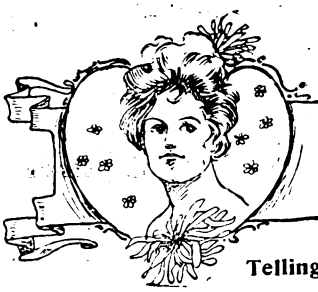
* * * * *

It was even as Wingham said, Cashel had won him the race. In the flurry of the morning the Captain had snatched up the wrong bottle, emptying the pick-me-up instead of the narcotic into the flask, and the powerful stimulant had so wildly exhilarated his Lordship's nerves that he had ridden "Viking" for all he was worth.

In the solitude of his room, the Captain's heart grew heavy within him, for he had planned to make his fortune, had thought to marry Betty. And by his own act he had lost both.

John K.

Digitized by Google



AN EXTRAORDINARY COINCIDENCE.

Telling of a Slighted Invitation and Two Engagements.

IT was only yesterday since he had seen her, and he was fully anticipating seeing her to-morrow, when a double knock of the peremptory postman order sounded, and the servant entered with an orange coloured envelope in her hand.

"A telegram for you, sir; the boy is waiting."

Dick Treherne tore open the message, and having hastily read it, tossed it, a crumpled ball, into the grate.

"No answer," he said curtly. For it ran thus, "Unavoidably prevented to-morrow. Will explain later.—"MABEL BRANCEPETH."

Treherne had half expected something of this sort. Yesterday, when he had talked softly to her of the long afternoon he hoped to spend in her company, she had said somewhat dubiously,

"After all, Dick, I don't know whether I ought to have promised to go to the circus with you. You see Mr. Goldman sent round this morning to say he had got a box at the Hippodrome and he would take us up to London, and would we all come. It would be much nicer than a country show, wouldn't it? Much safer, I mean. Of course I should like to go with you awfully, but you know what a travelling circus is and how nervous I am in a crowd."

Dick had felt distressed at her speech then, for he had taken the best seats he could afford, and even stretched a point at that, but he was madly in love with her, and tried to laugh away her fears, promising to take splendid care of her, and genuinely believing she meant them seriously. But this message of hers at the last moment put a different complexion on affairs.

The fact of the matter was that Mabel had got a better invitation, and was behaving as she had once or twice behaved before under somewhat similar circumstances.

Dick had looked forward to the morrow, meaning to plead his cause then, and hoping that Mabel would consent to be the queen of his small kingdom; but he had at last awakened from this cherished dream, and now finally realised that Mabel would choose to marry for money rather than for love, that the devotion he offered would count little with her when compared with old Mr. Goldman's banking account.

Dick began to feel how vain his hopes had been, and with his eyes opened saw now the shallowness and frivolity of the character which could throw him over so heartlessly. The awakening was less painful than he had imagined it would be.

"That little cousin of hers, Julie Perrington, is worth a dozen of her, I'll be bound," he commented to himself. "Those blue eyes of hers look true and candid enough. Strange that even while I admired Mabel so much I always liked Julie best.

"I wish I had asked her to go with me. She would not have gone back on her word, I'm quite sure, even if she had had a better offer. But there,! What a fool I am! No doubt she has a lover of her own. 'Fair, kind, and true,' as Shakespeare has it, does not go begging."

Mabel's telegram had upset and annoyed Treherne, and when he went to bed that night it was half with the intention of giving up the whole show. There was not much fun in going to a thing of that kind by oneself, he thought. But in the morning he awoke in a different frame of mind altogether.

He had dreamt all night long, and, strangely enough, Mabel had not been the subject of his sleeping thoughts. With the vividness of reality his fancy had seen Julie—fair, slight Julie, with the trusting eyes, at the mercy of a motley crowd. Hustled here and bustled there, surrounded by no lover's protecting arm, she reached her hands to Treherne, and wistfully implored his aid.

The ardour with which he sprang to the assistance of Beauty in distress effectually aroused him from his slumbers. He sprang out of bed with his mind made up. His dream had made such an impression on him that, sober-minded individual that he was, he found himself leaving the house actually possessed by the romantic notion that before the day was out he was to play the part of knight-errant to Julie Perrington. He was quite determined now to make use of his seat at the circus, even if a vacant one yawned at his side.

He started in good time, and as soon as he was fairly out upon the country road found himself in the midst of a good-humoured, hastening crowd.

Presently, when he entered the field where the circus had been set up, he was brought to a standstill. His broad shoulders stood him in good stead, and in a little while he was able to move on; but people seemed to be pressing him on every side, and a slender form was wedged up against him.

It was Julie Perrington! She recognised Treherne at once, and his hand moved to his hat.

"Miss Perrington," he cried in delight, "let me take care of you."

She seemed to be on the verge of tears.

"Oh, Mr. Treherne," she cried, "I am quite alone! I had no idea it would be like this!"

"But how is this?" he cried, in astonishment. "Surely Mr. Goldman included you in his party?"

"He didn't mention me specially," she said, flushing; "but aunt thought I was meant to be included, only Mabel said I had nothing smart enough to wear—except for a country show." Julie grew scarlet at the remembrance of the sneer, and added, "and that gave me the idea of coming in this way, for I have never seen a circus since I was a tiny child, and I did so want to."

Treherne's resentment was kindled against Mabel doubly for her unkindness towards her cousin and her selfishness.

"Miss Perrington," he said, "if you will allow me to constitute myself your escort, I think I can conduct you not only to a place of safety, but to a coign of vantage where we shall have a very good view."

Julie was all smiles now.

"Oh, how delightful!" she cried. "But, oh, how can I come! It will be robbing someone of their place, won't it?"

"I offered the seat to your cousin at first," acknowledged Treherne, "but she has thrown me over for the Goldman party."

"Perhaps she made some mistake about the day," said Julie. And Treherne thought what a generous little soul it was.

"There was no mistake," he answered smiling.

"Well, Miss Perrington, is my rejected seat worth your acceptance?"

She smiled too.

"I'm afraid I'm not proud at all," she confessed. "I am very sorry for your disappointment, for I know you must be disappointed, but I shall be so pleased to accept that seat, and I think you are very kind to offer me your escort."

They reached their places finally, and had a long wait before the performance began. But what of that? It did not seem long to Treherne, and he hoped not to Julie. He was finding out new beauties in her.

She was a fascinating little girl, and he had never had an opportunity like this before of realising her charm, nor of seeing how truly pretty she was.

Mabel was a dashing brunette, showy alike in dress and appearance, and had completely overshadowed her tender, refined little cousin, who occupied a dependent position in the Brancepeth household, and Treherne was convinced in his own mind she was worth her weight in gold to the establishment.

Digitized by Google

When a team of piebald ponies came into the arena and showed off their graceful accomplishments, Julie's eyes sparkled, and her cheeks flushed with childish enjoyment. She leant forward in her excitement, displaying the graceful contour of her figure.

Treherne began to contrast her looks as favourably as her manners with those of Mabel, altogether he quite lost his heart to her. He had never spent any length of time in her society before, and her sweet, retiring ways had only made a vague impression on him during the few occasions he had seen her in company with Mabel, when the latter had always taken good care to monopolise the conversation.

No doubt many a heart is caught in the rebound, but maybe none the less surely held for that.

When the circus was all over, Dick heaved a sigh of regret, echoed by Julie. There still remained the task of getting home, and Dick was determined to escort Julie to her very door.

"Do you know," she said, as they walked along slowly side by side, "I never recognised you in the crowd until you turned round, and all the time I was trying hard to get to you because I thought, "Here is a good broad pair of shoulders, if I get behind them I shall be safe."

Treherne laughed.

"You are making me compliments," he said.

"Oh," said Julie simply. "I should feel safe with you anywhere."

"I steered you safely through the crowd," said Treherne with gravity, "but if you want to prove your words you will trust me to steer you through life."

"Oh, Mr. Treherne, I don't understand!" said Julie.

"Give me hope," said Treherne, "that I may teach you to understand. I don't expect you to love me all at once, though a single day spent with you has been sufficient to give my heart into your keeping. Believe me," he added earnestly, "if I took the liberty of offering you a rejected escort I am not pleading with you to accept a rejected lover, but a very earnest one on his own account."

Her eyes met his bravely. "I have always loved you," she said, simply, "but I never hoped for such happiness."

Treherne parted with her at the house. He would not come in as she had begged him not to announce their engagement till the morrow.

The others had not yet returned, so she ran up to her own room to indulge in a delightful reverie.

Presently there came a knock at the door, and, without waiting for an answer, Mabel entered.

"I'm tired out," she said abruptly. "Julie, I wish you'd come and help me to bed."

Julie rose, too happy to be tired even after her long day.

"Yes, dear," she said gently, "you look worn out."

Mabel threw herself into a chair and raised her arms above her head. "At any rate," she said, "Mr. Goldman has proposed to me, and, needless to add, I have accepted him. I wish he were not quite so old, though, but I shall be the wife of a millionaire, and that's something. And now, let's hear about you, Julie. How did you get on? Did you see well?"

"I saw everything splendidly," said Julie. "I met Mr. Treherne, and he took care of me the whole time."

Mabel stared. "Oh," she said, "I suppose you know he asked me, but I don't care to go in that style, and I wired at the last I couldn't come. He was as cross as a bear with a sore head, I expect. You must have had a lively time!"

"He was not cross at all—to me," said Julie.

"I suppose he's fallen in love with you," sneered Mabel.

"At any rate, he asked me to marry him," said Julie, "and I have promised to be his wife."

Mabel began to laugh, but her voice sounded harsh and constrained as she affected to say carelessly, "So we are both engaged on the same day! What an extraordinary coincidence!"

Ellice Beere.

Your Editor Chats.

I have much pleasure in announcing that next week I will publish the complete list of prize winners in the recent "Buried Stations" Competition. I am very sorry that competitors have had to possess their souls in patience for so long, but the task of checking has been an unexpectedly difficult one.

This paragraph is written to remind you that next week our eleventh Tartan Cover number will appear. The cover shows the design of the cloth of the Clan Macquarrie. Although this Scottish family is not a very large one, their ancestors were gallant men, and I am sure that everyone will agree that their tartan is one of the prettiest of all. I can also promise you that next week's number will be brimful of fine reading matter, quite up to the standard of, if not surpassing, the quality of any issue that has yet appeared, which, as you know, is saying a great deal.

My girl friends, have you a brother? My lady readers, have you a son? Have any of you got a male relation of any age or temperament? Do you want to please him? There is one absolutely infallible way to do so, and that is—buy him a copy of The Boys' Leader. This will make him your grateful servant for ever and ever, for it is the finest, purest, in all ways the best journal for healthy British lads. There is not a word in it that could be deemed "vulgar" by the most scrupulous person, and it has a special mission to perform. That is, it intends to put down that vile product of modern day sensation-mongers—the penny dreadful, that makes crime a virtue, sin a necessity. The Boys' Leader is the paper a boy can take home.

You will find on page 340 another "Love Problem." It is entitled, "Should a Husband Discuss His Business Affairs with His Wife?" There are, of course, two sides to this question, and the main clue to the answer is, "Does the wife wish to hear about them?" However, in certain cases, and probably in most cases, it is advisable for a husband to take his loving wife into his confidence, although it is by no means unlikely that sometimes a well-meaning man would refrain from burdening his wife with the care of financial matters, even when she might be of the utmost use to him. I will leave you to read the entertaining story, and to find out for yourself the moral it contains. This is the ninth article of the series, each of which, as I understand from the many congratulatory messages I have received, have been devoured with great eagerness.

Once more, and for almost the last time this season, I must appeal to you to help us in the great work we have taken in hand to alleviate as much as possible the misery of the poor children of London and of the big provincial cities. Great numbers of hapless boys and girls, poverty-stricken through no fault of their own, brought up amongst squalid surroundings wherein the sun seldom penetrates, have been made joyful for one day through the charity of our readers. Ninepence gives a beautiful day's holiday to one child. Please send that sum, or double or treble or quadruple that sum to the Hon. Sec., Fresh Air Fund, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Each donation will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly. "It is more blessed to give than to receive."

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

TWO LOVERS.

A Sad Story of An Unfortunate Love.

ETHEL HARPER looked disdainfully at the card which was laid upon the table beside her. She hesitated a long time before she spoke; then, with an impatient, "Tell him I will be down in a few minutes," caught up the bit of pasteboard, and tearing it into fragments, tossed it into the open fire.

In the drawing-room below a man paced the floor more like a wild beast in a cage than a caller waiting in a magnificent apartment for the lady of the house.

He was very pale; his hands worked nervously. He drew his breath hard, like a man in pain.

Ethel Harper came in and found him so, looking at him for a moment before he saw her, with a frown on her face which was not good to see. It destroyed the harmony of the perfect features.

It was a siren face still, but it wore its fatal, not its fascinating expression.

Its natural look came back as her guest turned towards her. She extended her hand with a smile that transformed her to an angel.

"Good evening," she said, gently. "I had half a mind to excuse myself to-night, for I——"

"Is it true, then?"

"True?"

"That you are going to the regimental ball this evening?"

"Yes."

"And with Colonel Carstairs?"

"Why not?"

"Why not? And you ask me that?"

He braced himself against the mantel as he confronted her. His black eyes, brilliant with a strange light, roved restlessly over the graceful figure in its exquisite costume. He brushed his hand across them, as if the sight bewildered him.

"And I—I—it is so, then? I wouldn't believe it when they told me. I am set aside for this man; I am——"

"They told you?" she repeated, drawing back from him. "I do not understand."

"Oh, you understand well enough," he retorted with quick bitterness; "it's the talk of the club and everywhere else. I suppose Colonel Carstairs hears it to. 'Dick Hawthorne has been thrown over since he lost his fortune, and the colonel is in favour now.' That's what they say, if you do not understand. Pleasant, isn't it?" he asked, as she frowned again. "I liked it. Oh, I assure you I was highly delighted! Why shouldn't I be?"

"Dick," she said, softly, coming closer to him, and laying her hand on his arm, "it is gossip, nothing else. Colonel Carstairs is my father's friend, and——"

"Oh, no doubt!" the young man sneered in reply. "Since when, I wonder? Since your father employed him as his lawyer? Harper and Company have experienced reverses, if mere gossip can be believed. It would be an awful pity, Ethel, if your father should lose his money as I've lost mine!"

She winced at the words. Then others, besides herself, knew of her father's desperate situation!

"I didn't come here to talk of such matters," he went on. "I've been working hard to get things straight again—for you. Ethel, if you will give me what you more than half-promised long ago—yourself, Ethel, when I have——"

He stopped suddenly in his impetuous words as she put out her hand.

"What do you mean by that?" he asked, almost roughly.

"I wish, Dick, I could make you understand me," she said.

"I do understand you," he replied eagerly. "I am not unreasonable—you know I am not, Ethel. I'm working like a man, trusting you, believing you will—— But to see you with other men, to hear you talked of, to feel that you are drifting away from me—I can't understand it, I tell you! I'm half mad with it all. I won't ask you for any promise now, Ethel, only to wear this ring for my sake. That is so little to ask of you, but it will mean so much to me!"

He had seized her hand. She drew it away haughtily.

"You must expect nothing from me. I never gave you reason, and now——"

"Never—never what?" he stammered. "Reason! What in Heaven's name was it then?"

"It isn't worth while to talk about it now," she resumed. "I told you I was engaged for the evening. I will see you some other time—to-morrow, if you care to come."

She tried to look him in the face as she spoke. It was impossible, and, turning towards the mirror, she busied herself with readjusting the locks of golden hair clinging about the smooth, low brow. But her face blanched as she met his eyes in the glass. "Half mad," he had said. He looked like a maniac to her terrified sight.

With one swift movement he caught her by the throat, crushing the delicate lace and rosebuds in an iron hand. She tried to scream. She threw up her arms in an agony.

"If I could kill you!" he muttered, "I'd be sure of you!"

Another instant and he released his hold. He wrung his hands together. "My God! That you could hurt a woman, Dick Hawthorne!" he exclaimed wildly to himself, and without another look at her he rushed from the room, the front door shutting heavily behind him.

Ethel Harper rallied quickly. She was thankful she had not alarmed the house. "If this is only the end of it," she thought as she walked upstairs. She locked her door as she entered her room. It was necessary to repair damages before she rang for her maid to finish her toilet.

She could not explain the torn lace and the ruined rosebuds, nor the marks on the delicate flesh under them. Yet, knowing how far she was responsible for the violence of the man whom she had driven to desperation, she felt grateful that she had made so easy an escape.

Colonel Carstairs called for her an hour later. He was at the head of the regiment whose ball that night was the most brilliant of the season. No one was so much admired and envied as the lovely Miss Harper, already looked upon as the winner of the finest matrimonial prize in Society—the elegant, cultured, wealthy Colonel Carstairs.

It was almost morning before the carriage returned to the Harper's mansion. As the Colonel stepped from it he was rudely jostled by an intoxicated man standing on the pavement.

"Look out there, fellow!" he said, imperiously, catching him by the shoulder.

Miss Harper gave a quick cry as she caught sight of his face, and Colonel Carstairs glanced at him a second time.

Digitized by Google

"Upon my word, it's Hawthorne!" he exclaimed. "Is it possible?"

But the young man, muttering a few unintelligible words, reeled on and out of sight.

Miss Harper trembled violently as the Colonel assisted her up the steps.

"I am sorry you were so frightened," he said tenderly, bending over the sofa on which she had thrown herself. "I had no idea Hawthorne drank—he's always been such a steady fellow."

She gave a little hysterical laugh as she motioned him to a seat beside her.

"I am nervous to-night, you see. I've danced too much. I've been so worn out lately with anxiety about father, and I—I——"

Her voice broke up into short, quick sobs. She buried her face in her hands as she felt her companion's arm around her, and her head was drawn down upon his breast.

"It will be all right," he said, his deep voice tremulous with a strong man's tenderness. "It shall be all right for you, anyway, Ethel, my darling, if you will let me care for you—as my wife, Ethel."

He went away soon after, with her whispered promise and her shy kisses to transform for him the world upon which the new day was breaking.

As she rose from the sofa she touched something with her foot. It was a plain gold ring, with the one word "Fidelis," engraved upon it.

She had seen it before. It was the wedding ring of Richard Hawthorne's dead mother. She shuddered as she looked over her shoulder at her reflection in the mirror.

The roses were crushed again, but from the loving embrace of the man who had just left her, not the murderous grasp of the one whom she had sent from her to his own destruction.

She grew faint with a vague, horrible fear as she thought of him.

Three days later Colonel Carstairs determined upon a trip to South Africa, in order to give personal supervision to Mr. Harper's mining interests. The financial situation of the great house of Harper and Company was rapidly growing hopeless.

"I am the only one who has held you and worshipped you—so and so?" he had said to Ethel, with the instinctive jealousy of a lover, crushing her against his broad breast, and kissing her on lips and eyes and shining hair.

"The only one. And if you were not?" she whispered, with a slight laugh.

His arm tightened about her.

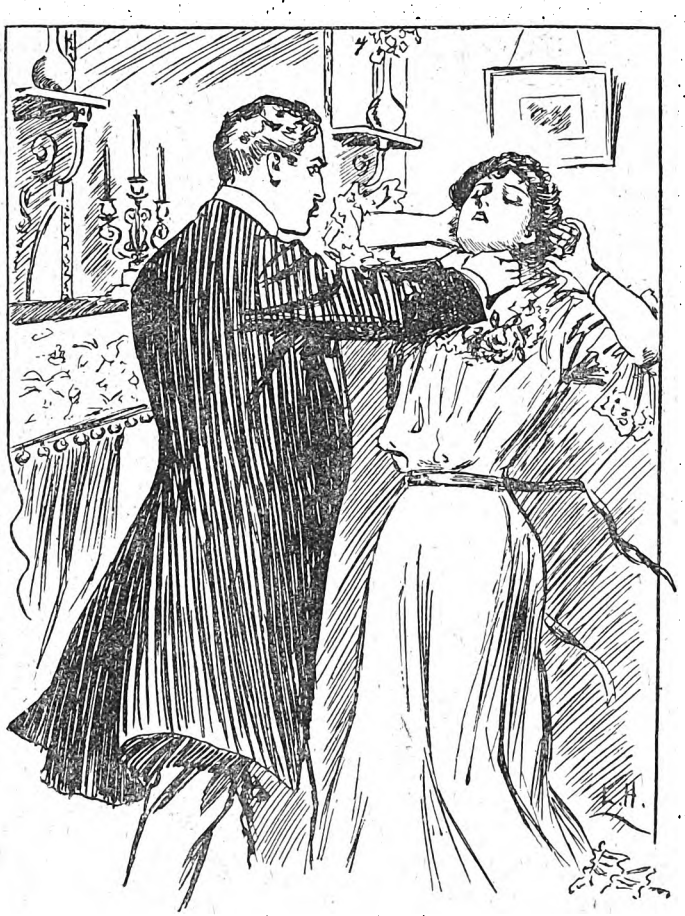
"If I were not, that would be hard to bear, but not so hard as falsehood," he answered, looking closer into the divine eyes.

"I swear it," she said, solemnly. "Now you will never doubt me?"

"Never, never! I never have. I should as soon think of doubting my love for you!"

And so he left her, trusting her.

The house seemed stifling after he had gone. She walked up and down her room trying to reconcile herself to the separation. She had had many "affairs" in the last five years. She had cared a great deal for a good many, or thought she did, which satisfied them quite as well, until—well, that frightful experience with Richard Hawthorne was only a much intensified form of similar ones.



He caught her by the throat. She threw up her arms in agony.

Her affection for Colonel Carstairs was something of which she had never believed the human heart capable.

"Was it in this way they cared for me?" she thought, with the strangest pang that had ever moved her. "Was it so that Dick cared?"

Her eyes filled with slow, miserable tears, the expression of a cowardly fear that she might some time suffer as she had made others. Her sleep that night was broken by a sudden start and shriek, as she roused from a dream in which a deadly hand was again clutching at her throat, but it was her lover's this time, and beside him stood more than one whose names even she had forgotten.

* * * *

The midnight express was "making time," a grim satire on the eternity into which men are sometimes plunged as the result of such an undertaking. Colonel Carstairs was the only wide-awake passenger on board. His body was flying through space, but his spirit was at rest with the only woman he had ever loved with his great, strong heart—his ideal of all loveliness and purity.

There was a long, shrill whistle, a quiver through the train, a horrible, deafening crash, and Colonel Carstairs was one of the many flung headlong among the débris of a railway wreck.

Fortunately, though terribly shaken, he was unhurt, and worked hard for the relief of those around him. He dragged from under the shattered timbers a young man whose face was covered with blood, surely dead, he thought, as he looked at him. Some of the clothing was torn from the upper part of the body. He felt for the man's heart, and his hand struck against a locket which the force of a blow had driven a little way into the flesh.

There was a faint moan from the wounded man's lips as he removed it, and taking him in his arms, he carried him to one of the beds improvised from the scattered cushions of the train.

Digitized by Google

It was two hours before other cars came, bringing help for the victims. Colonel Carstairs worked through the time bravely.

"I will take care of you," he said, pausing at last by the side of the man whom he had first helped. Even then he did not recognise him.

"I know you," the man replied weakly, "you are the man—Ethel Harper is going to marry!"

"Richard Hawthorne!" the Colonel exclaimed in astonishment. Lifting him in his arms again, he carried him into the train, and, when they reached the city, to a hotel, where he secured for him the best attention possible.'

"I must push on further," he said in leaving him. "I shall be back in two weeks at least, and see how they have taken care of you."

He was twenty miles away before he thought of the locket. He drew it out tenderly. The hinge was broken and the lid fell off. The exquisite, smiling face of Ethel Harper confronted him, but it was stained with blood.

He uttered a quick exclamation as he turned it over and over. He tormented himself with conjectures. Heavens! What did it mean?"

At the time specified he returned to the city and the hotel.

"You see I'm all right again," were the first words Hawthorne said to him. "I'm going away to-morrow. Where's Ethel?"

"Ethel?"

Colonel Carstairs looked more closely at him, understanding for the first time what had so puzzled him—the strange look in the splendid black eyes. In such a temperament there is but a step from reason to insanity, and Richard Hawthorne had taken it before he left London.

"Hawthorne," the Colonel said, slowly, sitting down beside him, "you must tell me something. This locket——"

Its owner snatched it eagerly from his hand.

"It's Ethel, you know," he said, his voice trembling with delight at its recovery; "she gave it to me on my birthday." His mood changed suddenly. "She kissed me, too, when she gave it to me—my God! she kissed me! It is not so very long ago—not six months—and now she says it's not worth while to talk about it. She never loved me, she says, though she swore she did six months ago. I thought I had lost it," and with a quiet smile returning to his lips he handled the locket fondly.

The Colonel, rising, crossed the room once or twice, then reseated himself.

"Do you remember the night we met you on——"

"Intoxicated?" Hawthorne interrupted with a short laugh. "Oh, yes, I remember perfectly, though I don't remember much that's happened since. I had never touched a drop before—I'd kept my promise to my mother, indeed I had—but I was wild that night; she made me so. I went to see her before you did. She was dressed for the ball—all in white, like a ghost, you know—and I asked her—I"—he put his hand to his head confusedly—"I asked her to wear my mother's ring. I didn't make her promise anything, but I was afraid of you and others.

"I tried to kill her that night. I don't know just what I did; it was something horrible. It set me on fire here"—and he struck his head savagely—"and I have not been right since. I don't know what is the matter with me. I thought I would go to the Cape."

He put his hands over his eyes with a pathetic sort of helplessness.

Colonel Carstairs turned from him with a low groan.

"There's blood here," Hawthorne exclaimed, catching up the locket again. "That is strange. I didn't kill her—I know I didn't. Oh, I see now," he added, growing quiet again. "It was broken in the accident. You are her father's lawyer. Is he to be a poor man after all?"

"Yes; I can save nothing for him."

"Is it so bad as that?"

"As bad as that."

"Is Ethel going to marry you? She threw me off when I lost my money."

"I shall never marry any woman," his companion answered in a slow, steady tone.

"And Ethel will be alone and poor. Perhaps she will listen to me then. You may keep the locket," he added, pushing it across the table towards him. "I know how her face looks, and I shall see it again."

The Colonel picked up the trinket, then threw it down again.

He had not heard the last sentence, rousing himself from the reverie into which he had fallen to say, "I will see you to-morrow, Hawthorne," and, once in the street, he walked for hours, battling with a pain harder to conquer than any foe he had ever faced.

He went next day to the hotel as he had promised, but Hawthorne's room was vacant. The broken locket in a little box was left in care of the clerk with a note. "I can't wait to see you again. Perhaps Ethel will need me before I can get there."

There was no name, nor need of one.

* * * * * * *

Ethel Harper was growing pale with long anxiety. "If he would only write or come," was her unceasing thought as the slow days dragged on.

The Colonel had been gone two months. His daily notes had ceased suddenly. There had been an awful accident in South Africa, but the papers made no mention of his name. What could it mean? How could she live longer in such intolerable suspense?

"It is frightful to love like this!" she thought fiercely, as she realised how strong a hold he held upon her life, as she thought with a cold shudder of the possibilities of his death, or his discovery that she was less true than he believed her. And her father was breaking down under the long struggle he had been making.

Failure met him at every turn. He waited with impatience only a little less than his daughter for tidings from Colonel's Carstairs.

It had been a dark and stormy day. Ethel Harper stood at the window watching the lamps, early lit, as they flared in the gusts of wind which howled through the street.

Her heart ached with the sharpest pain she had ever known. She had hoped and prayed for a letter by the last delivery, but the postman had gone by on the other side. She thought, with a sick heart, of the long hours before he would make his rounds again. She pressed her burning cheeks against the glass. Her eyes were hot. They hurt her, but no tears came.

She caught her breath as a quick footfall came along the pavement and up the steps. There was a ring at the bell. She was downstairs herself by the time the servant opened the front door, but she started back into the room with a low cry of disappointment as Richard Hawthorne stepped into the hall—Richard Hawthorne, surely, or, at least, the wreck of him—a pale, frenzied-looking man, with blazing eyes and hollow cheeks, scarlet lips that moved but made no sound, clothes soiled and dusty with travel.

"I've come, Ethel," he said, tremulously, after a long, wild look at her. "I've seen Colonel Carstairs somewhere, I don't know just where"—he put his hand to his head again—"and he has told me that your father would be poor, that he couldn't save anything for him, and——"

"Dick Hawthorne," his terrified listener interrupted, "I believe you are insane. How dare you talk to Colonel Carstairs? How dare you come to me?"

"Insane!" the man laughed, slyly; "oh, no! There are plenty of crazy people about. I see them all the time; but I'm all right. Insane? No, indeed! I was afraid I should be once, when you turned from me, Ethel, but you needn't be afraid of me now."

She shrank from him, leaning against the wall, her hand pressed close against her heart.

"To think it was all a mistake," he went on—"that you are not going to marry him after all! He told me so. He——"

"Oh, Dick!" She fell on her knees before him, her hands

Digitized by Google

"Take him away," she said to the servant. "Quick, take him away."

clenched. "For Heaven's sake, Dick! He never said that! Tell me that he never said it!"

He raised her gently, the fire dying out of his eyes as he drew her to him; but she broke from him fiercely.

"What does it all mean?" she gasped. "What are you talking about? Why do you come here to torment me, Dick Hawthorne? I told you I was done with you long ago. I told you——"

She shrank and quivered under the look with which he glared upon her.

"But it is different now," he said, with the same fixed stare. "Your father has lost his money. Don't you know? I will take care of you, Ethel. I came back here to take care of you."

"The folly of bandying words with this madman!" she thought, as she struggled to compose herself. "Excuse me, Dick, please, for one moment," she said to him, with the old fascination.

Slipping into the hall she called one of the servants.

"You must get this man out of the house," she whispered quickly—"by force, if need be. He is raving mad! Wait! There is the bell again!"

She watched eagerly as the door opened and Colonel Carstairs, entering the house, passed into the drawing-room.

"Hawthorne!" she heard him say. "I was afraid I should find you here."

She felt sick and faint as she followed him into the room.

"At last—at last!" she cried, springing into his arms, with a great burst of tears. "I have been frightened to death," she sobbed, convulsively; and, raising her face, she pointed to Richard Hawthorne. "Take him away!" she said to the servant—"quick! take him away!"

The man stepped towards him.

Colonel Carstairs disengaged the clinging hands and stood aloof from her like a figure cut in stone.

"Do not lay your finger on him!" he commanded.

"It is Miss Harper's order," the servant replied, though with perfect respect.

The Colonel bowed slightly.

"Miss Harper will allow me to countermand her order—if I can give a better one for mine."

The servant withdrew instantly.

"Hawthorne, my poor, poor boy!"

The tone was one of infinite compassion as the Colonel, approaching him, laid his hand upon the younger man's arm, and with the other brushed away the disordered hair which had fallen over his eyes.

He looked up with a vacant expression. Evidently he had failed to comprehend the meaning of what had just taken place.

"Ethel," the Colonel resumed, turning towards her, "we were together in that awful railway accident. Hawthorne was hurt. I helped him, and I found upon his breast—this! He had worn it night and day since you gave it to him, Ethel."

He laid the locket down before her, broken, blood-stained, and her own face smiled up at her from its ruin.

"I did not know he was coming, too," Hawthorne explained eagerly. "I left it for him. I knew he was fond of you. I was sorry for him, and I gave him that!"

She turned despairingly to the Colonel, her arms outstretched, tears raining over her face.

"Have you nothing to say to me?" she cried, in agony. "Not one word?"

"Nothing."

"You believe this man?"

"Believe him, Ethel!"

"It is a lie!" she shrieked, striking her hands together—"it is an infamous, dastardly lie! How dare you face me with your falsehood?" she demanded, turning again towards Hawthorne; "to come here——"

He caught her hands in both his.

"It is true, my darling—oh, you know it is all true; everything is true, only you have forgotten! Never mind, Ethel; it will be all right by-and-bye! You are coming with me!"

She wrenched her hands away and stepped back from him.

"With you?" she repeated, with infinite contempt—"with you?"

He drew his breath hard. His eyes blazed again. He shook off the hand which the Colonel placed upon his shoulder.

"Not go with me, Ethel?" he muttered through his teeth—"not go with me? Then I'll go alone to perdition."

He drew a pistol from his pocket. There was a flash, a report, and the body of the young man rolled lifeless at the feet of the woman who had destroyed him.

"Mercy! Mercy!" she shrieked wildly, wringing her hands together. "Oh, my love! and you will not help me? You will not believe me? You will not——"

"Hush!" the Colonel said, solemnly, pointing to the prostrate figure, as she fell fainting at his feet. "Your own life has answered you, Ethel Harper! It is too late!"

S. S. Thorpe.

. . THE . .

BOYS' LEADER

Pearson's New Paper.

The first number is . .

NOW ON SALE. ONE PENNY.

Stories by . .

JULES VERNE, GEORGE MANVILLE FENN, THEODORE ROOSEVELT (President of the U.S.)

1,000 Free Gifts Weekly for the mere asking.

Get it Without Delay!

ONE PENNY. SEPTEMBER 8th.

Digitized by Google

LOVE PROBLEM No. 9.

A Profitable Investment.

Should a Husband Discuss His Business Affairs with His Wife?

ALL YOUNG COUPLES SHOULD READ THIS STORY.

"ADA, what is your solicitor's address?"

"My solicitor?" replied Ada Russell, looking up with a surprised air. "Why, he's at Walton House, in Cornhill."

"Your money that he holds is in India Three per Cents., isn't it?"

"Yes, Dick."

"Well, I am thinking of reinvesting it in a more profitable direction; providing, of course, that I have your consent."

"Of course, dear. It is yours as much as mine, and you do what you think best. Where should you invest it?"

"I do not suppose you would be any the wiser if I told you. But still, as it is your money, you ought to be told. I shall invest it in the Blue Creek Diamond Mine."

"Oh, Dick, do you think it is safe?"

"Now, whatever does this little woman think she knows about diamond mines? Don't you worry yourself about business affairs, dear, they are out of a woman's sphere."

They had been married just two months, and you would have to travel far to find a more devoted couple. They occupied a little six-roomed house somewhere in Middlesex, to the north of London. Quite an old-world garden surrounded the house, converting it into an absolute Englishman's castle.

Mr. Russell's pet aversion was the business woman. He took particular care that there were no girls in his department in the City. Woman's sphere, he would argue, is home; man's in the wide world as well as home.

If by any chance a typine or lady clerk came to him with a message or a question he would always courteously listen, but would call up an office boy and give him the answer in front of the girl, thus intending to imply that he did not think a lady clerk was capable of taking a message properly.

I only just mention this instance to show how far his dislike to the business woman carried him. Outside, though, he was all that could be desired, and a truer gentleman never walked the earth. But let a lady friend ask him some business question and he was frozen in a moment.

"Dick," went on Mrs. Russell, "there's one thing in connection with my money that you may not know of. And that is, that Mr. Redford, my solicitor, according to the terms of father's will, must always conduct any business for me; as for instance, an investment."

"H'm!" muttered her husband. "Is that so? That is rather annoying; but, still, I have no doubt he will do as well as I can. I will go and see him this morning, and get him to arrange the investment."

Accordingly, Dick carried out his plan by lunching with Mr. Redford and arranging for the withdrawal of the two thousand pounds from the India Three per Cents.

"I cannot say I much care for this Blue Creek affair," said the solicitor. "But of course if Mrs. Russell is agreeable there is nothing more to be said."

"Mrs. Russell is as anxious as I am to do better with her money; it is only human, isn't it?" he asked, with a laugh.

"Quite so, but I do not think I should have invested in a West African diamond mine. But still, I have no doubt you know more than I do about such matters."

"Well, you see, it is like this, Mr. Redford. I know a man who is connected with the property out there, and he has wired to me of an exceedingly rich find. I can purchase the shares at par now, and they will probably double themselves in a fortnight."

"As you please, Mr. Russell; I only hope you are not too sanguine."

The money was advanced almost immediately, and that same day saw Mrs. Russell possessor of two thousand pounds' worth of shares in the Blue Creek Diamond Syndicate Limited.

It was some three days after this that Mr. and Mrs. Russell were seated by the fire after dinner.

"By the way, Dick, did you use that money as you said you would?"

"Money?" replied her husband in a mystified tone such as he always adopted when a woman spoke to him on any matter which he imagined might be connected with business. "Money, what money? Your dressmaker had a cheque last week if that is what you mean."

"No, Dick. I mean the money you were going to get from Mr. Redford to buy diamond shares with."

"Oh, yes, that is all finished with. Your solicitor is empowered to sign for you, is he not?"

"Yes, Dick. But I think you might have said something to me about it."

"Whatever for, dear? Now what would you know about any such matters?"

"But I like to be told a little about things which concern us both."

"Now, my dear girl, you know my opinion on such matters, and that I dislike you to appear business-like, and try to enter into a field which man alone is fitted to occupy."

"Dick, how bumptious that sounds. I should like to shake you, you consequential old thing."

That is how similar arguments that they had always ended—Ada in her husband's arms. But, nevertheless, she wished in her heart of hearts that Dick would confide in her a little as to how his business went on, and all that sort of thing. He was a dear, lovable boy, and that fad of his about women and business affairs, she thought, was his only great fault.

Occasionally he would come home looking worried; and then, with her heart overflowing with sympathy, she would say:

"What is the matter, Dick, dear?"

A fleeting smile would cross his face, but it would be gone in a second and his countenance grave and worried again, as he replied:

"Oh, business, dear. Nothing that you would understand."

This would always have the effect of arresting his wife's sympathetic inclinations, and, had he but known, robbing himself of a great deal of helpful comfort which would have been his had he chosen. But his prejudices were too strong for him, unfortunately.

Digitized by Google

His prophecy concerning the Blue Creek Diamond Syndicate was verified that same week by the advancement in value of the shares from twenty shillings to twenty-eight shillings, with every prospect of them going higher.

His delight almost led him to tell his wife of the successful speculation; but then, he reflected, it would be rather weak and quite needless to talk business with women.

One can imagine this estimable gentleman (for he was estimable in practically every other direction) saying to himself:

"Poor things, they could not understand such affairs, even if they had it in black and white before their eyes."

Perhaps Mr. Russell is more to be pitied than scorned at. True it is that he appreciated the opposite sex in many ways; but where a woman occupied a post once occupied by a man, or did work that had once been the work of a man, then there were no bounds to his scoffing.

Strange to say, he was one of the most loyal subjects that our late Queen possessed; he never sneered at the head of our Empire being a woman. Like most prejudiced people, he was inconsistent. He never read Charlotte Brontë, Sarah Grand, or George Eliot, simply because they were women who, in his opinion, had usurped the position of men.

Thus it was that Mrs. Russell learnt the good fortune that had attended her husband's investment of her money from quite another source.

Her informant was Mr. Redford, who occasionally dropped in for a cup of tea. He had been her father's greatest friend, and in consequence was privileged. Yet—shame that I should have to set it down—people of the genus Grundy pointed it out to one another, and said it was hardly correct. And they call this a free country, wherein our womenfolk are bound by silken chains to most ridiculous laws laid down by conventionality. And all because of "what people will say!"

Ugh! the very phrase sets one's teeth on edge. And, after all, these esteemed "people" who "will say" are probably the first to break the said laws should the occasion arise. Honi soit qui mal y pense.

Both the Russells and Mr. Redford were aware of this, but were only amused at it, and would quote Beaconsfield's famous saying: "They say! What do they say? Let them say!"

"Your two thousand pounds will be largely increased, Mrs. Russell. It was a very fortunate speculation indeed."

"Why, what?" cried Mrs. Russell, "I have not heard anything about it."

"Do you mean to say that your husband has not told you of the shares rising so high?"

"No, he has not said anything about it. Oh, do tell me," she cried, all agog with excitement.

"Well, your husband is mighty reticent," grumbled Mr. Redford. "At any rate, your £2,000 is worth £3,000 now."

"Oh, how lovely, Mr. Redford!" And, rising from her seat, the impetuous Ada performed a light dance in her glee. She was not such a slave to the goddess as this might imply, but most people would feel glad at hearing similar news.

When the solicitor had gone, and the excitement worn off somewhat, it occurred to Ada that Dick might have told her of all this himself. It would certainly have added to the pleasure of it.

"Dick, dear," she said that evening. "You did not say anything about how well the investment had come off."

"No, I know; but how did you hear?" he said; and then in a horrified tone he asked: "You surely have not been reading the market quotations in the newspapers?"

"Oh, nothing so awful!" she laughingly cried, in a mock imitation of her husband's manner. "Mr. Redford told me."

"Oh!" He gave a sigh of relief; she was not trying to be businesslike, after all.

"No, I did not tell you, Ada," he went on. "But I will tell you this, that they will rise to about thirty-five shillings apiece to-morrow."

"Really, Dick! Isn't it wonderful? What luck, to be sure."

Then followed a repetition of their courtship days, which, unlike a number of couples, they had not dropped after marriage.

The following evening the Russells were out to dinner at the house of a well-known financier. Afterwards, in the drawing-room, a lady performed upon the piano with much vigour and the precision of an instruction book, which gave everyone a chance to converse.

Ada Russell was idly turning over some photos, when she suddenly heard the words "Blue Creek." In an instant she was on the alert trying to catch what the speakers were saying. For they were two of the biggest financiers in the City.

"Astonishing the way Blue Creeks have gone up."

"Yes, they will go up more to-morrow, I believe, but then they'll stop."

"I think so too, and am inclined to think they will go down a very heavy drop."

"How about those Can Paes of yours?"

But Ada had heard enough, and she hurried away to find her husband, but was unable to get alone with him.

"Dick dear!" she said, as they drove home. "Those Blue Creeks are——"

But he interrupted her with a gesture. The very way in which she named the shares sounded so professional that he was up in arms at once.

"My dear Ada, I do not want to discuss stocks and shares with you. I leave that for my male friends."

"But, Dick, they will——"

Again he interrupted her.

"Ada, please do not. You know my objections."

"Oh, very well, Dick!" and she relapsed into silence.

"How absurd it is of him!" she thought; "but he will learn differently some day." But neither knew how near the lesson was that was to teach him differently.

As anticipated, Blue Creeks rose to 37s. 6d., and shares were still being held tightly.

Mr. Russell studied the market carefully, and resolved to hold on. He had some inward misgivings though, and at times almost decided to sell and reap the huge profit he had already made.

But there seemed a chance of gaining still more; and, with the gambler's true instinct, he waited on fortune.

"Been busy to-day, dear?" questioned his wife, as they sat at dinner.

"Yes, very busy. Those shares of yours are keeping me well employed. They are worth nearly double what I paid for them at first," he replied, for once condescending to talk on the forbidden subject in a moment of triumph.

So elated was his wife at getting such a reply to her question, that she went on further.

"Don't you think you had better sell them now you have made so much, Dick?"

Immediately he closed up, and regretted his previous confidence. He had forgotten himself for a moment.

"My dear Ada, while I can I will look after business affairs in connection with us, and you will look after home affairs. I shall not dictate to you as regards your ruling of the domestic department, and I shall expect a similar state of affairs to appertain to my business."

"Oh, Dick, you are a silly old boy. Keep your ridiculous business affairs to yourself if you must. But it would be much more like husband and wife if you confided in me a little more."

Shortly after this there was silence for some time, and the next remark to be heard issued from Ada's lips.

"Dick, you do want a shave!"

From which the thoughtful reader will deduce much.

The following day was Saturday. This day is, in many places of business, quite a farce. Nobody works, or thinks of it, and persons in high places very often do not come up at all. More particularly so is this in Government offices and on the Stock Exchange.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Russell had elected to remain at home on this Saturday, and, all unconscious of the fate in store for him, sat placidly smoking a pipe in the garden.

Suddenly a telegraph-boy came through from the house. Mr. Russell took the telegram in a nonchalant way, because he very often received wires whilst away from the office.

"Blue Creeks down to one and a quarter; still dropping," he read.

"Good Heavens!" he gasped. "What a fool I was! Why did I not sell?"

Distractedly he rushed into the house, and rapidly made himself presentable. Then, jumping on his bicycle, he rode madly to Mr. Redford's.

Now, most men would have gone to their wives and told the news. But Dick never dreamt of consulting his wife.

"A woman! Pooh, preposterous!" he would have said.

It was just five minutes after one o'clock that he arrived at the solicitor's office, only to find everyone gone. He rang the housekeeper's bell with sufficient force to almost snap the wires.

Presently the old woman appeared, curtseying as she opened the door.

"Mr. Redford, sir. He's been gone this half hour. Gone down to the sea somewhere. I don't quite know where, I'm sure, sir. I think he said Blackpool. He always says there's no such place as Blackpool, not that I think much of it myself; give me——".

Dick cut short her ruminations. His last hope was gone. He could have cried aloud in his vexation. Why had he not taken his wife's advice?

"Jupiter!" he groaned. "What will she say when she hears of it? I suppose they are below par by now; even she advised me to sell."

Slowly he rode home bitterly reviling his luck all the time. If he had sold yesterday he would have raked in £3,750—a clear profit of £1,750—now he did not care even to surmise what they were worth.

In the meantime, Ada was wondering where her husband was until her eyes alighted on the telegram.

Hastily she picked it up, and read it through. Then, instead of a blanched face or shocked expression, a strange smile played about her countenance.

"Poor boy!" she murmured softly.

The "poor boy" was at that moment wheeling his bicycle through the garden, and wondering how he should begin his story.

"Hullo, Dick! Been for a ride?" was his wife's greeting.

"Yes," replied her husband in a doleful tone, and with a suicidal expression.

"Why, Dick, dear. Whatever is the matter?"

"Matter, matter enough!" he replied. "Your two thousand pounds are lost, I am afraid."

"My two thousand pounds?" she cried. "How?"

"Well, Ada, Blue Creeks fell to one and a quarter this morning, and are still falling. I cannot find Redford anywhere; they think he has gone to Blackpool. I do not know how much your shares are worth now—precious little I am afraid," replied Dick, speaking professionally to his wife, so agitated was he.

"Redford ought not to have gone away with the market in the state it is!" he added in a miserable tone.

He sat down and leant his head on his hands, whilst he gazed dejectedly at the ground. Suddenly a pair of soft arms were round his neck, and Ada whispered:

"Dick, old boy, I have been a business woman for once. I heard that Blue Creeks were a bit rocky, and yesterday I got all the financial papers and read them. Then I told Mr. Redford to sell. He sold when they were worth thirty-six shillings each."

She was by his side now, and was looking into his eyes in such a compassionate manner.

"It's all right now, Dick, old boy, so cheer up."

He caught her very close to him, and kissed her passionately. There we will leave them, but not before I tell you that since then there has been a great change in affairs, and no longer does Mr. Russell worry out matters by himself, but has come to believe in the business capacity of woman.

E. Newton Bungey.

Winning a Bride.

A Touching Little Tale.

The girl was looking out of the window, humming softly, with a fine air of indifference. The man was leaning his back against the mantelpiece, gloomily observing the points of his boots.

They were good boots, but hardly worth the amount of serious observation he was giving them. To any person of moderate understanding the situation was obvious. To the two actors in it it was becoming embarrassing. The man moved first.

"You are sure your mind is made up, Marjorie?"

The girl stopped humming abruptly and turned round.

"What is the use of beginning again?" she said, with an impatient movement. "You know one cannot serve two masters. I am going to give my life to my art."

"But, Marjorie, you know what it means to me. I mean you know I could never change or forget."

"Why not?" she returned quickly. "That is just what I wanted to speak to you about. You see"—and her proud head was raised a trifle higher—"you only want a wife who can see that you get a good dinner every day and sew the buttons on your shirts. You have known us all for years. Why do you expect me, the unpractical one of the family, to snatch at the offer of this post? You would have shown more sense in asking Madge or Lilian, and I dare say one of them might have had you."

For a moment there was a dangerous gleam in his eyes, but it changed to a tender look of amusement as the girl flung herself viciously into a chair with the air of a sulky child.

"I suppose it would have been more sensible," he agreed, "only I don't love either Madge or Lilian. If you will only have me," he continued, a twinkle in his eye and abject humility in his voice. "I will do my best to overcome my disgraceful appetite and dine off a sentimental song if you deem it best. I will also look out for some patent shirt fastener which will save you the trouble of sewing on buttons."

Marjorie looked up quickly.

"You needn't try to be funny, Rex!" she said severely. "You know quite well I should have to become a domesticated woman if I married, and I won't. I am going to devote my life to music, and if I were to sacrifice that and marry you I should stop loving you in a fortnight and hate you in a month. There, that's all."

Rex looked up quickly

Digitized by Google

"You would stop loving me in a fortnight?" he asked. "Then I may infer you have begun already?"

"You may infer nothing, sir!" she retorted sharply, but her face was crimson.

"By Jove, that's the nearest I've ever got!" thought Rex. "I believe she does half like me, but must make her cave in before she'll respect me."

There was a moment's pause, then he said gently:

"I beg your pardon, Marjorie, I believe you may be right, after all, though it is hard to think of giving you up." And he sighed softly, but resignedly. "If you are not too angry with me, will you tell me which you think it would be best for me to try to like, Lilian or Madge?"

"I am so glad, Rex, you are sensible at last! Really, I have thought it out carefully, and, though Lilian is awfully sweet and—and everything, I think Madge is the one best suited to you. You see, she cooks splendidly, and knows exactly how everything ought to be done in a house and would be perfectly satisfied if you kissed her once a month or so, and occasionally said the dinner was excellent. She really would, she is so easily pleased. While I—— Well, you know what I am."

"Yes, I know what you are," he replied quietly. "You are very young."

She misunderstood him, as he had intended she should, and assented eagerly.

"Yes, I am young—only nineteen—and you are nearly thirty. Madge is nearest you in age, and I believe you could make her love you if you tried."

"Shall I try? Do you want me to?"

"Yes, of course I want you to. It is for your own sake. She would make you a better wife than I because I don't want even to be loved. I am satisfied with my life as it is."

"All right, Marjorie. In a month I shall have made up my mind, and I will tell you. Good-bye."

"Good-bye," she murmured, vaguely afraid of what she had done.

She tried to reason out the cause of her depression, but it seemed to have no cause, and with a lagging step she made her way to the sunny den which she shared with her sisters.

Madge was sitting there alone, sewing and singing gaily. She looked up with a smile, as Marjorie entered, and an unusual merriment danced in her eyes.

"Guess who's been here?" exclaimed Madge.

"Who?"

"Rex. And he's got a box for The Loves of Henrietta to-morrow, and he's asked mother and me to go."

"I'm so glad," said Marjorie, but with singular want of enthusiasm.

And Madge stole a furtive look at her, and the corners of her mouth quivered.

A month had passed. Once more Marjorie stood at the same window, softly humming. She was waiting for Rex, and her face was very pale. It was the same face still, but there was a difference—the difference which marks every girl's face when she becomes a woman.

She had learnt her lesson and borne her punishment in silence.

To-day she had nerved herself for a supreme effort that she might do no wrong to the sister who had stepped into the place she had voluntarily resigned.

She had thought love not worth the sacrifice of art, and if art without love had turned to dust and ashes in her hand who was to blame but herself?

She was waiting for Rex—Rex, who had fallen such a helpless victim to Madge that he had had scarcely a look or a word to spare for her the whole month. It was this that had first taught her what she had lost and that had afterwards nerved her to play her part—for a week's experience had taught her that it was only a part—of careless indifference and entire absorption in her art.

When it seemed too hard for her she reminded herself sternly of her own words, "I am satisfied with my life as it is."

"They shall never see I am not satisfied," she said, and struggled on.

To-day there was a set, stern look on her face, for this was to be the supreme ordeal, and at present there was no one to see her. But as she leant her head listlessly against the window there came from the hall the sound of a familiar whistle, and instantly her expression changed. A smiling, expectant face greeted Rex as he entered, and she scrutinised him with playful anxiety.

"The funeral and wedding marches are side by side on the piano," she began, with an affected attempt at seriousness, "but I was waiting to choose between them till I have seen your face."

"What does my face tell you?" he asked.

She looked at him critically.

"That the momentous question is to be asked no later than this evening," she replied. "Good luck attend you."

"Wrong. Try again."

"Is it possible it is to be postponed till to-morrow morning?" And she held out her hand with a playful gesture of sympathy.

"Wrong again. I see I must tell you."

He had seized the hand she had offered, and was looking her straight in the face.

"What do you say to the question having been asked already?"

The last month had wrought many changes in Marjorie. She had, for one thing, learnt to keep her face under control, and only the slightest trembling of the eyelid showed that she was taken by surprise.

"My dear brother to be," she said, regaining possession of her hand, "I consider I have been grossly ill-treated in having this fact sprung upon me so suddenly. I had heard of a delightful little book called 'The Right Word in the Right Place'—a help to those people born devoid of tact. I was going to purchase it in the assurance that I should find a paragraph entitled, "What to say to a future brother-in-law,' or words to that effect, and now you pounce upon me like this and crush me. 'I feel unfit for conversation. You had better go." And she turned majestically away.

"I will. Only you must first allow me to make one remark. You did not ask what Madge said to me." He paused impressively. "She has refused me."

It was his trump card, and he was growing desperate. He took advantage of Marjorie's back being still turned towards him, and, creeping softly behind her, took one glance at her face before she knew he had moved. It was enough.

"Marjorie," he cried, "hasn't the play gone far enough? I am tired of acting, and I want you. Marjorie—I can't tell you how much I want you!" There was passionate intreaty in his voice.

"What did you mean," she asked slowly, "by saying you were 'tired of acting'? I don't understand."

"No; I know," he answered guiltily. "I've got to tell you. Madge and I have been playing at being lovers during the last month. I have even asked her to marry me, and she has refused. It was the natural climax to the play, she said, and she told me to do it, because nothing else would put you off your guard. I had to know whether you loved me or not," he ended desperately.

"It was very cruel," she whispered at last.

"Ah, Marjorie, don't!" he intreated. "I thought of that, but, honestly, would you ever have known you loved me if we had gone on in the same old way?"

There was a moment's silence.

"I should never have known I loved you," she answered softly.

Charles Herrow.

To Story Writers.

We shall be pleased to consider complete novelettes of about 20,000 words in length, and to pay cash down for those accepted. Manuscripts must be type-written (or very legibly hand-written), and should be sent to the Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Postage for return of MSS., if unsuitable, should be inclosed

Digitized by Google

Silence was Golden.

Mother: "I'm surprised at you! Couldn't you tell he was going to kiss you?" Daughter: "Yes, ma, but there was no one for me to tell, except him, and he knew it already."

Jealous Little Wench.

Emily: "I've got an invite to a charity ball, but I haven't the least idea what I am to go in. What would you wear, Fanny, if you had my complexion?" Fanny: "A thick veil."

Not Always.

Albert: "All the world loves a lover, you know." Mildred: "You wouldn't say that if you had heard papa's remarks when he found, yesterday morning, that you had taken his hat by mistake."

Another Sad, Sad Story.

"I must confess to you," he said, in a burst of confidence, "I'm an odd man. I'd like to be different if ——" "This is so sudden!" she cried, throwing herself upon his neck. For she, too, was odd, and she had longed to be even.

He Didn't Mean It.

Never use swell words. It may not always be agreeable. "How do you like my boots, love?" exclaimed a youthful bride. "Oh, they're immense," replied the partner of her joys, and she had the first matrimonial fainting fit as the result.

Auntie Was Sarcastic.

"I saw him kiss you just before he was leaving," said the sour-visaged aunt, and she said it in a regular dull-thud tone. "Yes, auntie." "Well, I can realise that it would be the last thing he would think of," and she sailed out as though she had scored every possible point.

He was Mystified.

"Goodness, we'll miss the opera," she said impatiently. "We've been waiting a good many minutes for that mother of mine." "Hours, I should say," he replied, somewhat acrimoniously. "Ours?" cried she, rapturously. "Oh, George, you do surprise me." Then she fell on his neck.

A Practical Youth.

"Do you appreciate poetry?" asked the serious girl. "Yes, indeed," answered Mr. Softy. "There's one piece of poetry that has done me a world of good. Old as I am, there are times when I couldn't tell how to calculate without saying 'Thirty days hath September, April, June, and November.'"

A Roar—But Not of the Ocean.

It was the morning after their arrival at a seaside resort. "I have often heard of the roar of the ocean," she said dreamily, "but I never knew it sounded like that." "That's not the roar of the ocean," answered her more experienced husband; "that's the roar of a departing visitor who has just been presented with his bill."

From Different Points of View.

He (sentimentally): "I wish I were a star." She: "I wish I were one, too!" He: "May I dare to guess why?" She: "Because it is known that every star is millions of miles away from the next one."

Was He Accepted?

He (at the club reception): "Are you a member of this club?" She: "No; only married people belong." He: "Then suppose we organise a trust for the purpose of making each other eligible."

Very Probably.

Hewitt: "Girls like to make a fellow think they have known a good many fellows, and have had a lot of attention from them." Jewett: "Right you are. I suppose that when Adam first kissed Eve, she said, 'You men are all alike.'"

A Good Result.

Mr. Milksop: "I do trust, Maud, you will forgive me, but I'm going to carry off your sister Vera. At your party last night she consented to marry me." Maud: "Forgive you, indeed! Why, of course I will. That's what the party was for."

Bad Taste.

Puffer: "My dear, I wish you would select a box of cigars for me while shopping to-day." Mrs. Puffer: "Why, I thought you gave up smoking a week ago?" Puffer: "So I did, and if you select the cigars it will help me to resist temptation."

The Banns Are Up.

"I've thought of a capital nom de plume," said Henry, who sometimes writes for the newspapers. "What is it?" asked Henrietta. "'Will U. Marrimee.'" "Why, of course I will, you goose!" she answered. "Is that what you have been trying to say so long?"

His Love was Dying.

Lottie: "I'm afraid Fred doesn't care for me as much as he did." Edith: "Nonsense! What makes you think so?" Lottie: "I got a letter from him to-day, and there were at least three places where he might have put in a 'dear' or a 'darling' and didn't."

Well Instructed.

Her head rested on his shoulder, and her little hand lay confidingly in his. "Tell me, Alfred," said the happy maiden, "how you ever came to pick me out as the girl you wanted to marry." "Well, Dora," replied the ecstatic young man in a gush of confidence, "it was mother that put me up to it."

His Excitement was Damped.

Mrs. de Fashion (before the full-length portrait of a girl): "Oh, if I only knew the painter of this!" Artist (stepping forward joyfully): "Permit me, madam, to introduce myself as the painter." Mrs. de Fashion: "What extraordinary good luck! Now you will tell me—won't you—the address of the dressmaker who made this girl's frock?"

Only a Little Encouragement.

"Has my daughter, sir," demanded the stern father, "ever given you reason to think she would listen to a proposal of marriage from you?" "Well," said the young man, twirling his hat in his hand in an embarrassed manner, "except that she calls me 'darling,' and always kisses me when I bid her good-night, I can't say that she has."

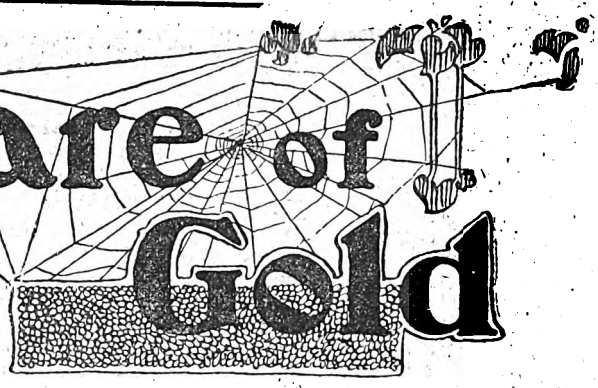
Good at Teaching.

"Can't I teach you to love me, Miss Genevieve?" pleadingly asked the young man. "I fear not, Mr. Spoonamore," she answered. "Then won't you please teach me how to teach you to love me?" he insisted eagerly. This appealed to the essentially masculine element more or less latent in every woman, and she promised to take it under consideration.

Digitized by Google

GRAND SERIAL STORY.

The Snare of Gold



A Tale of Love, Ambition, and Crime.

• • By • •

HENRY T. JOHNSON.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS IN THIS SPLENDID STORY ARE:

GEORGE GELDART, a former prosperous City merchant, supposed to be dead, and now known as "Old Mystery."

ERIC GELDART, his elder son, who conspired to kill his father, thereby coming into his property. He is elected as an M.P.

RONALD GELDART, the younger son, who has been disinherited because he has been falsely accused of robbing his father.

CLARE ARMITAGE, the adopted sister of the two brothers, and who is betrothed to Eric.

BOANERGES BLAGDON, the traitorous partner of old Geldart, whom he has cheated in business, and who plots with Eric to murder him.

SAMPSON SCRIMSHAW, company promoter, who befriends "Old Mystery."

MR. STANYER, an Australian financier, who gives "Old Mystery" the post of English agent for his business.

MADELEINE LORRAINE, daughter of Lord Lyntoh, who loves and is beloved by Eric Geldart.

PHYLLIS DAVENTRY, typewriter to Scrimshaw, who takes a fancy to "Old Mystery." She is rescued from Hooligans by Ronald Geldart.

JACK WIDDICOMBE, cousin to the brothers Geldart. His story is told below:

TWELFTH CHAPTER.

Ronald Falls on his Feet.

"SOME years ago, I had happened to hear of a poor little chap, who got left rather severely; no father, no mother, no home to speak of. I set the little chap going, rigged him out, got him a berth in a firm of brokers I dealt with. Well, he was as smart as paint, went on by leaps and bounds, spread his wings and soared; type of man who pops up every now and then in the city of London, astounding everybody; everything he touches turns to gold, everybody's frantic to deal with him.

"Sometimes that type of man, after going up like a rocket, comes down like the proverbial stick; but this man's still soaring. We met by chance one night at a club; he rushed at me. How was I doing, where had I been, why had he never been able to find me, where was I living?

"When he learnt that I was not absolutely on my bottom dollar, because I hadn't that bottom dollar left, and that it was extremely problematical where I was going to sleep that night or breakfast in the morning, well, the chap was perfectly delighted."

"Delighted?" exclaimed Ronald.

"Yes; don't you see it was his turn to score. He drove me home to his place, insisted on my putting up there for the night, and in the morning he produced a slip of paper with a lot of figures, all yellow, they were so old. But that slip, Ronnie, contained an account of every fiver, every sovereign, I may say every shilling I had let that chap have, when he was a youngster, to set him on his legs.

"Since then this fellow had trafficked in hundreds of thousands, yes, in millions; I've heard people say of him that he lived on figures, ate them, drank them, dreamt them, breathed them, that his whole life was one huge calculation, that he'd ceased to be human and had become an arithmetical machine, but he's kept that little account by him all this time, and he hadn't forgotten, at all events, one old friend."

"Bravo!" said Ronald; "clever men are not always necessarily bad ones!"

"No, but there was never a clever man who succeeded who hadn't hard things said about him, but this chap was as good as gold, better than gold."

"Serve you right," said Ronald.

"Of course," cousin Jack went on, "I pooh-poohed the whole idea of the thing being a matter of account; his father had been a pal of mine, and after all, what I'd done was only a mere bagatelle, but he wouldn't look at it in that light. I'd put him on his legs, he insisted on putting me on mine; and he did.

"He pitchforked me into the management of one of his concerns, then another; sent me out to the States over one matter of business; to the Cape about another. I've been to Russia; I've been dodging about to St. Petersburg, Berlin, Vienna, Paris; nearly every capital of Europe on his business, and I've made a bit of brass, Ronnie, aye! your poor old cousin Jack, although your amiable brother Eric used to say that I should never make a shilling.

"Now I'm bossing the business arrangements of the Meteor, and incidentally, my dear old chap, what can I do for you?"

"You're very kind," said Ronald, "and frankly, I shall be grateful if you can help me to help myself."

"Of course I will. And so you've been sending us copy? Well, I'm not going to hold out false hopes; now don't be downhearted; something I'll do for you, that goes without saying, but in the way of contributions we've booked the best men to be got, and though we've had tons of applications from outside, we've only struck one man worth his salt; mind you, he's a flyer—an unknown man, too—named Harvey Bligh."

Ronald Geldart let fall his knife and fork and sat upright.

"What's up? Bolted something?" asked cousin Jack. "Here, have a glass of wine."

"Harvey Bligh, did you say?"

"Why, yes, Carnforth's raving about him; a man with an entirely new style—all grip and mustard; we're writing him to-day for an appointment."

"To what address?"

"Somewhere in your neighbourhood, Bloomsbury Square

Digitized by Google

—dashed if the number doesn't sound like yours! Do you know anything about the chap?"

"Why, cousin Jack," said Ronald, taking a deep breath and stretching his hand across the table, "I am the very chap; my nom de plume is Harvey Bligh."

This time it was cousin Jack who sat breathless, and when he had recovered respiration he said, gripping Ronald's hand heartily:

"I knew it, I knew it all along. When your dear dead dad used to hold forth about Eric's prospects, I said to him many a time, 'Ronnie's the colt to carry my money,' and so you are. The other chap's got push and cheek and they'll carry a man a long way, but you've got better—you've got grit and talent. Come along and see the boss!"

Ronald went. Mr. Carnforth was not only in but visible, and Mr. Carnforth, too, had lunched and was well disposed towards the world in general.

Yes, Mr. Bligh's stories were just the thing they wanted; up-to-date, with characters that lived and breathed, incidents that happened every day and plots interwoven with the current questions of the hour.

And Ronald left that office with a cheque for his story appearing next day in the first number of the Meteor, and with a commission to write a serial on similar lines. He was in the seventh heaven of delight.

"We are going to do big things," were Carnforth's last words; "we are as taut and clipper-built a boat as ever put to sea. The smartest men and women of the day in every walk of life have signed on with us. We mean to be the voice and mentor of the world; in high finance, high politics, and high Bohemia we mean to reign; we have the best of the old, and we mean to get the best of the new; we know we have found a diamond in Mr. Harvey Bligh."

For cousin Jack had promised to respect his cousin Ronald's resolution to preserve the incognito he had chosen, and to know him henceforth only by his nom de plume.

So Ronald left the offices with a lighter heart than he had known for many months. It was a double-barrelled joy, for he was quite as pleased to learn of cousin Jack's good luck as of his own, and, returning to Mrs. Skimper's, he announced his arrival with so exuberant and rollicking a rat-tat-tat-TAT! that Mrs. Skimper, in the act of ladling the soup, gave a start which ruined the chances of a second appearance of that tablecloth, and caused Arethusa, ascending from the regions below, to break her second plate that day, much to her sorrow.

When Mrs. Skimper and her paying guests discovered that it was only Mr. Harvey Bligh on his return the good lady's expression changed from alarm to severity; and Mr. Springle audibly whispered to Mr. Grimmage that some folks had brass of one kind if not of another.

But this remark went wide, its object being oblivious even of the very existence of Messrs. Springle and Grimmage.

"I'm sorry I'm late, Mrs. Skimper," he said genially, "but I've been detained on business."

'You're too late for soup, Mr. Bligh," said that lady as coldly as possible. But her iciness melted before the youngster's bright, beaming expression, and she added, more good humouredly: "But you are in time for fish."

"Oh, thanks," said Ronald, "but give me very little; I lunched rather well."

"Whereabouts?" asked Springle. "At the Hotel Cecil?" with a sniggering glance at Mr. Grimmage.

"Why, how did you know?" asked Ronald. "Were you there? Anyway, you've guessed it." Then to Miss Amaranth:

"I saw that new symphony 'Réve Extatique' in a shop window and I bought it for you, if you'll accept it."

And, somehow, Mrs. Skimper in her heart of hearts felt that Mr. Harvey Bligh's account was as good as settled. And she was glad.

THIRTEENTH CHAPTER.

The Wrong Must Be Righted.

THE more or less select suburb of Brixwell was agitated to its core. The excitement created by the sudden dissolution, sweeping like a gale over the United Kingdom, on reaching Brixwell, swelled into a hurricane. Party spirit was running high, other spirits in certain clubs and public houses were running freely, for a bombshell had burst upon the community.

For some considerable time the borough had been assiduously "nursed" by that eminent financier, philanthropist and sportsman, Mr. Sampson Scrimshaw, who had been generally regarded as the accepted candidate in the interests of that numerically small but tremendously active party the "Pro-Cons," and to that end Mr. Scrimshaw had manifested the deepest interest in Brixwell and all that therein was.

He had laid foundation stones, opened bazaars, taken the chair at lectures and smoking concerts, patronised cricket clubs, football clubs, ping-pong clubs, goose clubs, and kindred institutions, and lost no opportunity of impressing upon Brixwell that it was, in his deliberate and candid opinion, a model community, and that the furtherance of its interests formed the principal object of Mr. Scrimshaw's existence.

And now, Brixwell suddenly discovered that the man it needed sojourned within its very gates.

It had been some time finding it out, indeed it had on former occasions pooh-poohed Blagdon and his pretensions as impossible and presumptuous; but a change had come over the spirit of its dream from the very moment when that brilliant and promising young politician, Eric Geldart, M.P., came down to Brixwell and met the councillors of the Progressive Conservative Association in quiet conclave.

It was then that the fiat went forth. "Blagdon for Brixwell!" was to be the battle-cry of the "Pro-Con." party, and Scrimshaw and all his works were renounced, he himself being openly scoffed at by the powers that were in Brixwell as an interloper.

It was at the same meeting arranged that a deputation should wait upon Boanerges Blagdon, Esq., and inform him that it was the unanimous desire of that association that he should become their Parliamentary representative.

Of course all these things were undreamt of at the Laurestinas, Mr. Blagdon's residence, notwithstanding that a hasty spring clean was on that identical day instituted.

Boanerges Blagdon assured that deputation on its arrival that he had never been so utterly surprised in his life, that nothing was further from his mind than to intrude himself upon the attention of any of his fellow-citizens, more especially when they happened to be such tried and valued friends as Podger, Wriggles, Smith, and others he beheld before him.

Still he took some pains to impress upon them that if they really required him his services were at their disposal, and when that deputation had departed, Blagdon, the personification of the respectable and Brixwell's potential M.P. to be, danced a very ungraceful imitation of the sailor's hornpipe, greatly to the alarm of the wife of his bosom, who, entering at the moment, was seized with an appalling suspicion that he had all of a sudden given way to drink.

Late that night Boanerges Blagdon, to cool his heated brow, took a walk along the pleasant tree-lined road in the outskirts of Brixwell wherein his house was situate, his mind full of the triumph awaiting him in the near future.

He would win the election, that was almost certain, for the late member, a valetudinarian, had been on the verge of resigning just before the dissolution, and no one else had been put forward by his party, who had indeed made overtures towards an amalgamation with the "Pro-Cons."

Yes! ere a month was over, ere he was a month older, and while he was still in the prime of life, he would be standing at the Speaker's chair shaking hands with the first commoner in Britain, and taking his seat amid the cordial cheers of his party.

That would be only the beginning of his glory, that would be the standpoint from which he would start Life's race afresh, developing powers and resources which would astound

Digitized by Google

those who having known him for years, yet had really never known him.

How different it all might have been if—but no, he would not think of that, would not contemplate what might have been, but what was—he heaved a sigh of thankfulness—could never be, and he wiped a cold bead of perspiration from his forehead that the chill night air had touched with a sudden icy finger.

But, strive as he might, the haunting thought would recur. What if George Geldart had discovered that false entry in the books a few days earlier? What if Geldart had lived? Why, then he, Blagdon the potential M.P., might have been toiling in chains at Portland, for Geldart was a stern man, and, though by nature trustful, once deceived a stern and unrelenting one. And Boanerges Blagdon was a coward.

But George Geldart was dead and buried, the secret buried in the grave with him, save for Eric Geldart, whom it affected equally with Blagdon, Eric who would not split for the sole sufficient reason that he dared not.

Dead men tell no tales—he turned within the gateway of his house—and, Oh, God, there in the flickering light of the lamp overhanging it, he gazed across that gate upon——

George Geldart's face and form! Yes, there was no mistaking it, it was no creature of a disordered brain, George Geldart stood before him in his habit as he lived, raised one warning, extended arm, one accusing finger.

"What do you want with me? Who are you? For God's sake leave me!" he gasped, trembling in every limb, holding to the cross-bar of his gate and sinking nearly to his knees. And in the silence of the night the thing answered him—in a whisper:

"I will leave you when the wrong is righted. As for this foolery—beware, remember the higher the pedestal the greater the shame when all the world shall know."

"I'll right—the wrong. Mercy—I'll—I'll——" His chattering teeth clenched rigidly together, his tongue was terror-tied, he could speak no more, with dilated eyes he looked up—IT was gone!

FOURTEENTH CHAPTER.

A Voice from the Dead.

BUT it must have been a dream, a hallucination, the product of over-strained nerves and over-worked brain. That was what Boanerges Blagdon kept saying to himself for the next few days. He said nothing of it to anybody else, not even to Eric Geldart, his partner, though he surprised the latter once or twice by strange, sudden speeches.

"Eric, I sometimes think I can't go through with this. My heart's queer, I know, and—I say, Eric, I suppose there's no chance of anything coming to light about—you know."

"Of course not. What on earth's the matter with you? Look here, you'd better get away to Brighton for a day or two, you want toning up, man, your liver's wrong, you'll be all right in a day or two."

"I wish I had your nerve. I—I don't think you'd turn a hair if—if——"

"If what?" the other exclaimed angrily and impatiently.

"If," Boanerges lowered his voice to a whisper—"if the old man stood before you."

"What do you mean?" snarled the younger man, showing his clenched teeth. "Look here, if you're going to play the fool, you'd better chuck it before the campaign commences."

"No, no, I don't want to play the fool, I'll go right through with it if it hails."

"Well, then, don't talk like an idiot, or act like one. As to what you will keep harping on, why can't you let it all alone? Let the dead past bury its dead. Look here, Boanerges, what's done is done and can't be undone, neither

(Continued overleaf.)

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS
THE FAMOUS HOUSEHOLD REMEDIES.

THE PILLS

have gained their wonderful reputation by sheer force of merit, because every person who uses them recommends them to others. They have positively no equal for thoroughly cleansing the system and putting the liver and kidneys in functional order, without pain or griping. They are the best known remedy for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dizziness, and the common condition of ill-health, known as "run-down" or "out of sorts." Females of every age find Holloway's Pills an invaluable remedy and aid.

THE OINTMENT

is known throughout the world as positively the best and quickest remedy for Bad Legs, Old Wounds and Sores, and Skin Eruptions of every kind, and should be used in conjunction with the Pills. It is also the speediest remedy for Rheumatism, Lumbago, Pains and Stiffness in the Limbs and Joints, Backache, &c. For pains and Soreness at the Chest, and for Throat and Lung Complaints arising from Cold or Weakness, Holloway's Ointment affords most welcome relief in a very short time.

A COMPLETE DISPENSARY IN THEMSELVES.

AND OINTMENT

Digitized by Google

you nor I would if we could undo it. Now, henceforth, once for all, on that matter, silence."

"Yes, yes!" said Blagdon, "we'll talk of something else. I say, Eric, I am certain I saw Ronald yesterday as I was driving down the Strand, he hasn't left the country after all."

"Let him do as he pleases," said Eric, swinging his key-chain, and then "he—he can't harm us."

But he spoke the words a trifle uneasily, and somehow he would rather have heard that his brother was at the other end of the earth or, better still, at the bottom of the sea.

"He was looking rather seedy and rather down in the mouth," said Blagdon, "and he'd taken off his moustache, but I'm certain it was he."

"Perhaps; one or two people tell me much the same. Well, Boanerges, you know the proverb, 'the way of the transgressor is hard.'"

Then they went out to lunch, for Boanerges' first meeting in the Brixwell Town Hall was fixed for that night, when he was to be proposed and seconded and confidence was to be voted in him by his supporters, all of which had been arranged by the Council of the Pro-Cons. under the guiding hand of Eric Geldart, and, as Eric said, it was above all things necessary that he should keep his pecker up.

Whether thanks were due to Eric Geldart or not, certainly Boanerges Blagdon appeared before his supporters that night in the very pink of condition for a parliamentary candidate. His rotundity of face and form were accentuated with the portentousness of one possibly destined to control the destinies of Empire.

The Brixwell Town Hall was crammed, of course political opponents insinuated rather it was "packed," but the supporters of Blagdon were palpably in an overwhelming majority though there were not wanting a few dissentients who raised calls for Scrimshaw and made pertinent inquiries as to who had "burked" him and why he had been "muzzled."

These calls the Progressive-Conservatives as a body received with indignant counter-cries of "Order! Order!" and at the back of the hall was congregated a more or less goodly leaven of the opposition candidate's supporters, predisposed to turbulence and shockingly irreverent.

Eric Geldart, M.P., self-sufficient and all important, occupied the chair, acknowledging, with just sufficient, but not too much geniality, the ovation accorded him as one of the earliest newly elect.

The most prominent men in Brixwell, or, to quote Blagdon himself, "the cream of the intellect, culture, patriotism, and substantiality," were present on the platform and in the front seats. There was also a sprinkling of politicians and professional platform speakers, men accustomed to address audiences of all kinds and denominations from a Hyde Park mass meeting to an Irish hillside gathering.

Eric Geldart introduced the candidate to the supporters, claiming for him a fair and patient hearing, and then amid an artillery of cheers and a musket fire of handclaps, Boanerges Blagdon deliberately and stolidly rose, advanced to the chairman's table, filled himself a glass of water, took out and unhitched his gold hunter, took a note of the time, laid the watch on the chairman's table, and, clasping his hands in the small of his back, his right leg erect, and his left foot a trifle advanced, he said:

"Mr. Chairman, free and independent electors of this important and enlightened borough." This was the beginning, and he said a lot more.

He said of course that it was and had been for any years the most cherished wish of his heart to devote himself, if deemed worthy, to the parliamentary representation of that particular borough above all other constituencies in the United Kingdom. They all do that, and it invariably gets a cheer.

He said he meant to fight this election with fairness and courtesy. This also is certain to have a round of applause. He then went on to hold up to the execration of his audience the personalities, the actions, and the utterances of his opponents.

He next proceeded to intimate the glorious era of prosperity and progress, in fact a miniature millennium which would for Brixwell follow his own election, and to warn his hearers against the slough of social, political, religious, and moral Despond into which the election of his opponent would most inevitably plunge them.

Attempts were made from the back of the hall to interrupt him as when one gentleman inquired, "How about the council secret syndicate?" "What did yer buy Slammer's Rents for?" "What did yer get compensation?" "What price land-grabbing on Grey Duck Green?"

These interruptions, however, were sternly discountenanced by the chairman, the originators being in many instances persuaded out of their contumacy, and also out of the building, by a bevy of short-haired, square-jawed, broad-shouldered gentlemen in the vicinity of the back doors and incidentally referred to by the promoters of the meeting as "the boys."

Mr. Blagdon, beaming profusely and complacently, having resumed his seat, amid an uproar of cheers, and with what were erroneously described by the reporters as "musical honours," the chairman stated that if any gentleman had questions to put, Mr. Blagdon would, now that he had finished his speech, be most happy to answer them fairly, squarely, and candidly.

There was, however, some hesitancy on the part of questioners in coming forward, most of the putters of inconvenient questions having been incontinently put out previously, the most awkward questioners, moreover, having been charged with disorderly behaviour.

One individual arose in the body of the hall, holding several sheets of foolscap, and announced his fell intention of putting a number of interrogatories, each of which apparently comprised a couple of sheets, but the Chairman promptly ruled him out of order, intimating that if he wanted to make his own speeches he had better hold his own meeting.

A few desultory questions were fired in a half-hearted manner from here and there, inquiries as to the candidate's views on compulsory vegetarianism, the taxing of cats, free telephones, and so on, and the Chairman, having hammered for order, was about to call upon their esteemed friend, Mr. Mugwaddle, to propose a vote of confidence in Boanerges Blagdon, Esq., as the Progressive-Conservative candidate for the borough of Brixwell, when, from a dimly-lighted corner, close to the doorway at the back of the hall, there came clear and distinct—a voice—at the sound of which Eric Geldart looked up with amazement in his eyes.

"Mr. Chairman, Sir, I desire to put one question to the candidate and yourself."

"Too late," said Eric, nervously clutching his chairman's hammer.

But from the opposing element came a clamour. "No! No! The question! The question! You've challenged questions! Stick to your guns!"

And even the candidate's supporters chorussed tolerantly: "Let him put the question."

"Very well, then," answered Eric, half-angrily, half in the tone of one seized with a strange foreboding; while Blagdon, for his part, his hand shading his eyes, peered through the distance into that dimly-lighted corner at the end of the crowded building, that mist looming over the horizon of the sea of faces.

Then in the hush following Eric Geldart's words, there came right across the hall in clear, incisive, strident tones, these words:

"I want you to tell this meeting, where would Boanerges Blagdon be and where would you be—if George Geldart—had—not—died!"

There was a silence, a murmur, for as he listened to the words the Chairman's face turned livid white, his eyes dilated, and his breath came and went in deep gasps. Half rising from his seat he cried hoarsely:

"What does it mean? Who is it dares to ask that question?

Digitized by Google

Where is he? Let him stand forth. Where is the man? Who is the man?" And he turned, fierce of face and tone towards his partner and his colleague, Boanerges Blagdon.

The murmur of the audience rose and swelled into almost a clamour of sensation. For Boanerges, who had been sitting gazing rigidly towards the distant door, with eyes dilating wide and wider yet, and cheeks turning from red to crimson, from crimson to purple, and with the big blue-black veins standing out like knotted cords upon his shiny, big, bald forehead, groaned stertorously, extending one trembling hand:

"It was there—there—I saw—it—I saw it again—it's gone—vanished!" Then dropping his arms, falling heavily back in his chair, he rolled over and crashed down chair and all on to the platform boards amid the panic of his affrighted supporters.

FIFTEENTH CHAPTER.

A Rescue on the River.

The collapse of Boanerges Blagdon and his meeting caused consternation in the Pro.-Con. camp, and corresponding jubilation in the ranks of the other party.

The newspapers on the following morning vibrated with the accounts of this "Dramatic Incident at a Political Meeting." "Sensational Scene on an Election Platform," and all kinds of reports and rumours filled the air.

Blagdon had been threatened by a mysterious stranger with prosecution; he had been accused of murder by someone in the audience, who had mysteriously disappeared. The Brixwell Clarion, representing the Yellow Press of that suburb, gave pages to it.

Whatever the origin or true inwardness of the incident, one thing was certain: Boanerges Blagdon, despite the indignation of his council and his supporters, and regardless even of the scorn of his partner, the member for Claverton, as resolutely as he was able to do anything in his then condition, finally and irrevocably expressed his determination of retiring from the contest.

Mrs. Blagdon, good worthy soul, to whom her Boanerges was far more than political power, fame, or anything else, supported him, but the Brixwell Pro.-Cons. asked each other blankly, what was to be done?

It was at this critical juncture that Mr. Sampson Scrimshaw returned to the scene.

His first move was to remind Eric Geldart of the little financial matter outstanding between them in respect of "differences," impressing upon him that money was very tight in the City and that he himself was being harassed by innumerable calls.

The effect of this was to bring Eric Geldart to Crosby Square in a hurry, with the result that within twenty-four hours Sampson Scrimshaw, Esq., had been nominated as candidate for the Parliamentary representation of Brixwell, and the Pro.-Con. Council were working for him with all its might and main. For Eric Geldart put it to his partner:

"As you won't, or can't, shake off your mortal funk we may as well square the bucket-shop man this way as any other. It would be rather awkward for him to cut up rough just now. Lynton's in rather a tight place for money, and I want to see if Scrimshaw can't do something for him."

"Then how do you stand in? You don't do much for nothing, Eric."

Geldart laughed.

"I play my game.'

Which was quite true, and he played to win, hampered by no scruples. But in Sampson Scrimshaw he met a man as cool and calculating as himself, and one who never showed his hand until he made the trick.

Each meant to make a catspaw of the other—who prevailed will be set down hereafter; suffice it at this stage to say that

(Continued overleaf.)

Born in 1798. Dancing in 1903.

At a ball the other day, so it is stated on excellent authority, a Greek Officer named Colonel Mavroyeni, who was born in 1798, and has therefore lived in three centuries, led his granddaughter in the first dance. He is still in the enjoyment of excellent health and his digestion is apparently as strong as that of a young man, which indeed goes without saying, for the agility of limb and buoyancy of spirit indicated by this remarkable feat are blessings rarely enjoyed by those past middle life and never by the man who can't digest his food. The incident is remarkable only for its rarity. But why should it be rare?

To be lithe of limb and light of heart; at seventy to possess the faculties of mind and body unimpaired, that is life indeed. Yet rarely as it is experienced, it is within the reach of all except deformed and crippled persons. Attention to the laws of health, moderation and care in the selection of diet, and a timely use of the root and herb tonic, Mother Seigel's Syrup, whenever the stomach, liver and kidneys show signs of over work or disorder—that is the secret of perennial youthfulness. When digestion fails, life ebbs. Mother Seigel's Syrup helps digestion, it makes food nourish and upbuild your body, that is the reason of its world-wide popularity and success in curing indigestion, biliousness, constipation, anæmia, and all the host of weakening and distressing ailments that arise from faulty action of the stomach, liver or kidneys.

A striking instance of the power of Mother Seigel's Syrup to cure, when ordinary medicines have miserably failed, is afforded by the case of Mr. Benjamin Stoker. For eight years he was ill, and for half that time unable to work. He suffered from gall-stones and acute indigestion. The Doctor said it was cancer of the stomach, but time proved he was wrong. Violent pains at the pit of the stomach made his life almost unbearable. He says: "The pain never left me and if I tried to eat anything I was sure to be sick. I suffered fearfully from headaches and dizziness. I spent pounds on medical advice, and the uselessness of it all made me feel so hopeless and low-spirited that I did not care whether I lived or died. The Doctor told my wife to be prepared for the worst. He could do no more for me.

"This was my condition when my wife determined to try Seigel's Syrup. I had not much faith in it but to please her began taking it. Well the result was little short of a miracle. Before I had finished one bottle I felt easier; and as I continued taking it the pain and sickness left me and I began to recover my lost health. Slowly I regained strength and after four bottles was able to go back to work. I am now as well as ever in my life, can eat anything, and do a hard day's work, all owing to Seigel's Syrup." If confirmation of a statement at once so explicit and convincing is needed, it may be had from Mr. Edward Tulip, a Lay Preacher in Claravale Colliery, Ryton-on-Tyne, who has known Mr. Stoker intimately for over sixteen years and vouches for the accuracy of his statements.

Attractive Girls.

Attractive girls are not all made on one pattern. Oh, no, their charms are as varied as their faces, and the particular grace or charm that captivates one man, leaves his brother untouched. But most men will admit that the languid, dejected, sallow-faced girl, whose every movement and action betokens indigestion, constipation, or anæmia, is less attractive than her more favoured and healthful sister, who having discovered the secret that bright eyes, clear skin, and a perfect complexion are attributes of sound health and thorough digestion, has preserved all her charms inviolate by a prudent and timely use of that best of all female medicines, Mother Seigel's Syrup. So it is, that the "Seigel" girl is always admired for her beauty, vivacity, and buoyant healthfulness.

Digitized by Google

Sampson Scrimshaw, Esq., was duly returned M.P. for Brixwell in the Pro.-Con. interest, and that one of his sponsors on his introduction to the Speaker was the honourable member for Little Claverton.

It was just at this time that the Meteor burst upon the public and took the town by storm. Its success was instantaneous and phenomenal; there was scarcely a dull line in it from title to imprint.

The self-elected high priests and priestesses of the lighter literature, the would-be celebrities with their own puff-paragraphs and home-made snap-shots of their environment, were welcomely conspicuous by their absence from its pages.

The drama received its meed of competent recognition without the enshrining of the actor, the author, or the "amiable and genial" gentleman on the mat with an oasis of diamond in a Sahara of white shirt front.

Sport was dealt with in its columns by sportsmen, horses were written about by men who rode them, its Society small talk created plenty more small talk in boudoir-land and the clubs, and the incessant repetition of the question, "Who could have told them?" "How did they find it out?"

Indeed, so pertinent, without being impertinent, were some of its whispers from clubs, drawing-rooms, even from palace corridors, that in theatre foyers, the opera crush-room, beneath the trees of Rotten Row, at Hurlingham, Sandown, Gatwick, in the Ascot inclosure and on Goodwood's lawn, people hushed their voices and thought twice before speaking, lest a Meteor man—or woman, might be within hearing or addressing them.

But to the general reader who bought the Meteor neither for its advice to investors, nor for those racing tips so deadly sure that the Meteor's selected was the despair of the ring, and went to odds on at once, perhaps the most delightful features of the production were the quaint and dainty verses and the strong and extraordinary stories signed "Harvey Bligh."

Nothing quite like them had been known. Bizarre, varied this week in bantering vein, a feather of a story, the next a lurid, hot, and fierce encounter of the brain of writer and reader, such a story as one laid down wondering many things, thinking many things, perhaps for the first time, feeling that the tale was stranger than ever because, strange to say, it was so true.

Or again, a sudden white light on some dark corner of the life lived around us at our doors, at our feet, ignored by a social system with one all and only object, aim, and end; its own amusement, but some dread day to come to be ignored no longer.

People began to ask each other, who was Harvey Bligh? Had you ever met him? What manner of man was he? He could not be so very young to know so much, nor yet so very old to wield a pen so dainty and light-hearted, and editors and publishers began to ask the self-same question.

By-and-bye at the Meteor Office Harvey Bligh, Esq., found letters, even telegrams, awaiting him, not a few from far-off lands, from Australia herself a promising nursery of fiction weavers, and notably from Boston and New York, ever swifter and keener to recognise and raise good men and new.

So that ere long his name was a familiar one to the readers of the best of the magazines and periodicals; his work had caught the public fancy, which means in every walk of life a fortune, and commissions rained upon him thick and fast.

So also social recognition, and had he been that way inclined, the young poet-author's days, and much of his nights, might have been devoted to dinner-parties, At Homes, and clubs, and Society would once more have killed its latest lion.

But Harvey Bligh, to Society's surprise, shrank and withdrew himself from that celebrity for which others would have given their ears.

He still made Mrs. Skimper's establishment his home, but, greatly to that lady's regret and to the despair of Arethusa, although remaining a paying, he ceased to be a resident guest, save occasionally, betaking himself instead with his work now to a cottage on the Northumbrian cliffs, now to some bungalow on the Devon coast, now and then for a spell inhaling the heather-fragrant air of Hindhead, and now and then drifting by easy stages from one to the other of the hotels and inns beside the Thames, 'twixt Wallingford and Hampton Court.

It was thus that the successful new writer was enabled to not only devote himself to his work, but to conceal the identity of Harvey Bligh with Ronald Geldart, the unjustly banned. Naturally now and then he would on the river or some seaside pier happen with some associate of earlier days, not a few of whom either not having heard or utterly discrediting the stigma of suspicion resting on his name, met him with cordial greetings.

None of these suspected that they were face to face with the man whose work had so suddenly and decisively made its mark.

And Ronald had the satisfaction and amusement of at times hearing his work, its merits and demerits, discussed at the table d'hôte of the pleasure steamer, in the train, and sometimes being naively asked his opinion regarding himself, or, rather, regarding his other self.

It was during one of these pleasant spells that the young writer, idly sculling along a pleasant timber-shaded reach that might have been the lake of some Castle of Indolence, so languorously the drowsy bees and shimmering gay dragon-flies buzzed and hummed round the cups of fox-gloves and water-lilies, when all of a sudden he raised his eyes to watch a supple, willowy form that passed him wielding a punt-pole with the grace of a water nymph.

The graceful form of the English river girl, surely of all girls the sweetest, breeziest, and most adorable, with her dainty piqué skirt, her serviceable blouse, her natty sailor hat, its ribbon matching her sailor knot tie in the colours of her or his club, or perhaps his college.

Such a picture, charming as it is, happily along the Thames is to be met with so frequently, that Harvey Bligh would doubtless, when a few strokes past that punt, have resumed the weaving of a serial story plot then in his mind, but that, almost unconsciously, he raised his eyes to the oval, sun-tinged face beneath that dainty sailor hat.

Just at that moment a pair of grave, grey eyes met and riveted his glance. Her eyes, the eyes that for so long had haunted his nights and days, the eyes that he had first beheld fixed, terror dilated, on the frantic carriage horses, stampeding, so it had seemed, to their own and her destruction, the eyes that he had last beheld awaking from his coma of exhaustion following her rescue, fixed on his face with tender gratitude.

And as he now with indrawn breath met their glance there gleamed in them the light—yes! his heart beat to note it—the glad light of recognition, and the summer noon-day breeze carried to his ears the whisper of a little involuntary half-sigh, half-cry.

Instinctively he doffed his boating cap. The weigh was on her trim, gay-cushioned craft, the impetuous, officious tide and his own strong, sweeping strokes had borne him well away from her.

Once again they had met, just for a moment, once again were drifting apart, perhaps for ever. For the envious river bearing him so swiftly from her was winding round, and ere he had time to think or to decide should he speak to her, wait for her to drift back to him or turn his boat and scull up stream in her wake, breaking and scattering to the winds all conventionality, all the etiquette and the unwritten laws of Society, the river's bend had blotted from that summer idyll picture her nymph-like form. She was gone, it was too late—perhaps it was all for the best.

He sculled on, grinding his teeth with vexation. Then of a sudden he ceased, startled by a cry, a cry from around that bend up-stream.

(Another long instalment of this story will appear next week.)

Digitized by Google

MYSTERIES OF THE EAR.

For an understanding of the prevention and cure of deafness, everyone should read the last issue of the REVIEW OF EAR, NOSE & THROAT DISEASES. 10,000 copies of this Medical Journal have been set aside for Free Distribution by post. To obtain a Free Copy address The Editor, 10 Marble Arch, London, W.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½%

repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

ELECTRO-SILVER TEAPOT.

18/-

Our Specialitie. Queene Anne design worth 35/; heavily plated with real Silver, Ebony Handle and Knob, price 16/6 cash or 18/- easy terms 2/- deposit, 2/- on receipt, and 2/6 monthly.

Catalogue Free.

MASTERS, Ltd., 157 High Street, RYE.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED).

Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil, invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1/4; 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard-Bishop, Devon.

DO YOU WANT A GOOD CYCLE?

Write for my Lists. I deal only in the Best Coventry made Cycles, and by contracting for thousands annually, I BUY CHEAPLY and SELL CHEAPLY.

Premiers, Rovers Coventry Challenge, Triumphs, Swifts, Humbers, Centaurs, Raglans, Singers, etc. The QUALITY is there. Get my prices, save money and ensure satisfaction.

A High-Grade COVENTRY CYCLE for £6-0-0.

Two Years' Guarantee. Easy Payments without publicity. Cycle sent on receipt of first payment. EDWARD O'BRIEN, The World's Largest Cycle Dealer, COVENTRY.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors,

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

HOME NOTES

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

"The paper a boy can take home."

THE

BOYS' LEADER

Will Appear Tuesday, September 8.

24 PAGES ("PEARSON'S WEEKLY" SIZE).

ONE THOUSAND FREE GIFTS EVERY WEEK.

FREE FOR THE MERE ASKING.

A Complete ½d. Comic Paper will be given away every week with the BOYS' LEADER.

ONE PENNY WEEKLY.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Troubles of a Cousin.

"I HAVE been staying in the country," writes "ALBERT," "where I have met a very pretty girl cousin, lately grown up. Naturally, I have rather sought her society. However, every time I have tried to get a walk or quiet chat with her about half a dozen of the younger members of the family have appeared on the scene and quite monopolised the young lady's attention. The result is that I have not even exchanged a private word with her. Is this not hard, and how can I remedy it?"

* * * * *

As you are cousins, I suppose you would not be going too far in asking the girl if she will not take a walk with you alone. It is not as though you were strangers. If she really wants to do so she will very soon dispose of her troublesome brothers and sisters. To chat privately with one's cousin is quite an accepted diversion with most girls, and I don't think there is much harm in it.

❦❦❦

The Seaside Flirt Again.

"I AM another victim of the seaside flirt," writes "F. J. I.," "and would like your opinion, even if you cannot advise me on the matter. I stayed recently at a boarding-house on the Kent coast, where I met a very charming girl. I had scarcely been there a day or two when we began to strike up something more than a mere acquaintanceship. We took walks together, sat next to each other, and in time grew very much like lovers. I really began to feel that I liked the girl very much, and when we parted we had arranged to correspond, and to see each other on our return to town.

"A week or so elapsed, and I wrote to her at her London address, asking permission to call. To my surprise, I received in reply a curt note, saying that the girl thought we had better not continue the relationship, and hoping that I would regard this note as final. I was much hurt at this treatment. Will you please advise me, or give me your opinion on her conduct, as I think it has been very wrong."

* * * * *

I think the girl has acted in a very regrettable way. No doubt, like only too many others, she has allowed herself to go beyond discretion while at the seaside, and as a result has led a young man to go further than he otherwise would. Frequently, as has often been pointed out, one's ideas do relax a little at the seaside, but that is no reason why one should deliberately play with other people's affections.

"F. J. I." had better write to her expressing his view of her conduct in polite and even friendly language. If he does it delicately, the way may be still left open for a revival of the seaside friendship. "F. J. I." should also try in future to avoid falling too deeply into the meshes of the seaside flirt. What may be a romance on the seashore by moonlight often proves a very transparent deception in the cold light of working-day.

Calling in the Country.

"WHEN paying an afternoon call in the country," writes "MAX," "should I attire myself in any particular garb? For instance, would it be bad form to go in a flannel or cycling suit?"

* * * * *

Etiquette slackens a good deal in the country. A man is not supposed to have dressed himself for the occasion on paying a call, but to be wearing just his ordinary clothes. At smart country houses it is quite often that one sees men in riding costume or flannels. The man who has carefully dressed himself for the occasion may very often find himself conspicuous, as one of the charms of the country is freedom from town manners and costumes.

❦❦❦

The Nervous Admirer.

"I AM considered a very pretty girl," writes "ADA," "and have a good many admirers. For many months I have been meeting a gentleman in the streets, and he has looked at me in a very meaning way whenever we have met. The other day I saw him with a lady friend of mine, and on meeting her afterwards she said, 'Mr. Brown is simply dying to be introduced to you. Would you mind?' I said I should be very pleased to meet Mr. Brown, and we got to know each other.

"My point is this. We have now been acquainted for over a month, and he has seen me very often. During that time however, he has not breathed one word which I might take as proving him to be in love. We have just chatted as ordinary friends, and he has not even squeezed my hand. What is your opinion? Do you think he wanted to know me because he felt he could love me, or was it mere curiosity?"

* * * * *

You must give him at least another month, "ADA," before coming to any conclusion. Perhaps the man is too shy to make a clean breast of his feelings, and perhaps you have not given him enough encouragement to make a start. He may be simply boiling over with admiration for you, and yet too nervous to reveal the fact. If he is really in love with you he will take an opportunity of showing it sooner or later. I have known affairs of the kind you mention in which the man has met the girl for over a year, yet has never dared to speak of his love.

❦❦❦

The Other Fellow's Girl.

MORE seaside troubles, this time of a more complicated order. "BERTIE" was staying at a friend's house at the seaside, where was also a young man and his fiancé. "BERTIE" knew the young man fairly well, and had no idea whatever of flirting with the girl. However, before he had been there long this young lady started making violent love to him. She sought him out alone, always tried to sit next to him, said sweet nothings, and generally suggested that she preferred his society to that of her fiancée. Meanwhile the young man seemed scarcely to notice his sweetheart's breach of faith, and treated "BERTIE" in the most friendly fashion. How should "BERTIE" act? He felt that he was himself beginning to fall in love with his friend's girl.

* * * * *

"BERTIE" had better cut the affair short at once. He is playing with fire. I know that kind of girl. No doubt she has taken a passing fancy to "BERTIE," and, with the usual seaside influence has allowed herself to show it, whereas otherwise she would have kept it to herself. I do not suppose she really cares more for "BERTIE" than for her fiance, but perhaps it has struck her as a good joke to play one off against the other—a favourite habit with girls.

Let "BERTIE" get out of all communication with the girl at once, before any serious result happens.

Cynthia

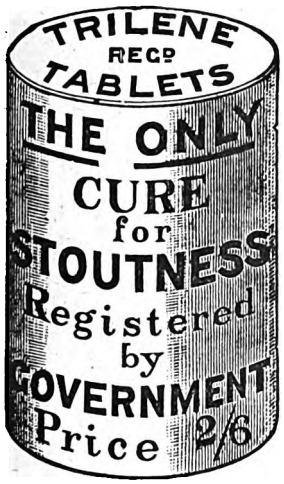
Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

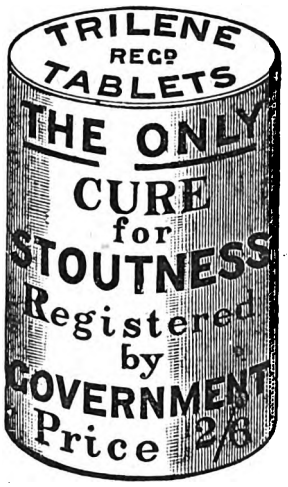
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.
Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."
"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWARD, of Listorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18lb. during the cure.

Mr. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st 8lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

Mrs. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagillt, Wales, writes Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mrs. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9½st. and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have don world of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 28. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Miss JANE CARTER of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest value. I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

Mr. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

BILIOUSNESS

Headache and Loss of Appetite completely Cured.

"ABOUT TEN YEARS AGO I FIRST BEGAN TO SUFFER from attacks of Biliousness, which, in spite of treatment, seemed to grow worse and worse," said Mrs. Elizabeth Vowles, Chew Lane, Chew, Stoke, near Bristol, to a "Bristol Times and Mirror" Reporter. "I first had a bad headache, then pains in the chest and stomach, and felt ill all over. I could not sleep well; as to my appetite, I had none. Of course I was bound to eat, but whatever I took upset me. I at last got in such a state that I could take nothing solid without continually vomiting, and then suffering agonies of pain in the chest. I could not even take cold water, so I tried a little brandy, but it did me no good and made me sick. Of course I consulted a doctor, and he gave me a bottle of medicine, and this certainly did me some good, but the next lot I had seemed to have no effect, and I became as bad as ever. I could do no housework, and when I got up in the morning the biliousness was dreadful, my head seeming as if it would burst. For ten long years I suffered thus, but relief was yet to come. One day my son was reading a paper, when he noticed an advertisement of Chas. Forde's Bile Beans for Biliousness, and this seemed to strike him, for he called my attention to it and advised me to get a sample. I took these and then noticed an improvement in my condition. My appetite seemed to be returning, and, what was more, the food which I took my stomach retained. I continued the course, carefully following the directions, and after taking four boxes I was surprised to find myself well. Being able to digest my food, I gained strength, the sickness and headaches abated, and I was able to get about my work with ease and comfort. My health now compares quite favourably with that I experienced in the past, and I attribute this solely to Bile Beans, which I can and do conscientiously recommend to all who suffer as I have done."

"My son advised me to try Bile Beans."

BILE BEANS are the product of modern scientific research. They are not a mere purgative like the old-fashioned so-called remedies of 40 or 50 years ago. They act directly on the liver and digestive organs, strengthening and stimulating those organs to perform their natural duties. They produce a gentle action on the bowels, curing or preventing constipation, cleansing the stomach and ridding the system of all impurities. Do not be misled by claims of half a hundred pills in box, where probably four to six constitute a dose, and the doses cannot be discontinued. ONE BILE BEAN IS ONE DOSE. They can be discontinued after the cure is effected; they are purely vegetable; they contain no harmful drugs, and they are the SAFEST FAMILY MEDICINE.

Bile Beans FOR Biliousness

Bile Beans for Biliousness promptly and permanently cure Headache, Constipation, Piles, Liver Troubles, Bad Breath, Indigestion, Flatulence, Dizziness, Loss of Appetite, Buzzing in the Head, Pimples, Debility, Loss of Energy, Anæmia, and all Female Ailments. Of all Medicine Vendors, 1/1½ and 2/9 per box.

SAMPLE BOX FREE.

The Proprietors of Bile Beans will forward a Sample Box Free, and a Book on Liver and Digestive Ailments, if you send your name and address, along with accompanying Coupon and 1d. stamp to cover return postage, to the BILE BEAN CO., GREEK STREET, LEEDS.

FREE SAMPLE COUPON. Short Stories. 12/9/03.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

THE DAINTY HOME STORY PAPER.

TARTAN COVER
No. 11.—MACQUARRIE.

No. 768.] Week ending September 19th, 1903. [Price One Penny.

Digitized by Google

THE IDEAL SHAPE AND SIZE AT LAST.

A New Model No. 3a F.P.K. taking Pictures 5½ by 3¼.

KODAK

THE MOST PERFECT FOLDING POCKET KODAK YET PLACED ON THE MARKET.

"Kodak Limited have now brought out a roll-film camera of the pocket folding type, which exactly fulfils our idea, the picture size being 3¼ by 5½, an exceedingly convenient and suitable shape for landscape, seaside, and other subjects; whilst for single figures, shipping, tree studies, and the like, the long, narrow, upright shape is very graceful and decorative. The Camera, which is called No. 3a F.P.K., is of the very highest quality and finish, and of it we shall speak more fully anon."—Amateur Photographer, August 20 h.

Folding Pocket Kodak No. 3a for Pictures 5½ by 3¼ inches, with Rectilinear Lens working at F/8 and F.P.K. automatic shutter	£4 10 0
Do., with Bausch & Lomb automatic shutter	£5 2 6

OF ALL DEALERS, OR OF

KODAK LTD. 41-43 Clerkenwell Rd., London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, LIVERPOOL; and 72-74 Buchanan Street, GLASGOW.

Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, W., 171-173 Regent Street, W.; and 40 Strand, London, W.C.

Kaputine is not a single dangerous drug, such as has been condemned by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The medical paper "Health," recommends

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache,

Toothache & Neuralgia.

Cures in Ten Minutes.

Safely, surely and without bad after effects.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1; Samples 1d. each

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free. Kindly mention this paper.

PUNCTURE

A Holiday Spoilt Is Pleasure Lost.

Thousands of Cyclists ride in fear of Punctures. WHY FEAR! when the National Puncture Preventer will prevent all Punctures without any Reduction of Speed.

Hundreds of Testimonials! Phenomenal Success!

Thousands in daily use. The only on the Market which guarantees to prevent all punctures or refund the money. Average weight, 1oz.

PREVENTER

Price 2/- single; 3/6 PER PAIR

When ordering state size of wheels.

Sole Patentees and Inventors:

THE NATIONAL CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.,

27 & 28 King William Street, London, E.C.

Our £5 5s. Cycles have a world-wide reputation. Send for List.

PUNCTURE PUNCTURE PUNCTURE

An admirable Food of the

EPPS'S

Finest quality and flavour.

COCOA

Nutritious and Economical.

PINK'S

MARMALADE

IS PURE.

TRY IT.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ross Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

TRY

With very little trouble you can earn a

SOLID SILVER WATCH,

and we also tell Agents how to make a regular income of 50/- per week. We want every man, woman, boy, or girl who reads this advertisement to send for 24 of our latest Silver Aluminium Novelties.

SEND NO MONEY. WE TRUST YOU.

You can sell them at once at 2d. each, and, when sold, send us the 4/-, and any present you select from our list of useful articles will be sent you. We are giving away many thousands of pounds worth of Useful Presents to advertise our business. Write now, it costs nothing to try.

GOLD & CO., No. 37 THE WATCH HOUSE, Delamere Crescent, London, W.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 768.] Week Ending September 19th, 1903. [One Penny.

A MODERN MARTYR.

The Story of a Jealous Man's Revenge.

One evening from out a side and almost secret entrance of a palatial mansion, situated in the aristocratic part of St. Petersburg, came a figure.

This figure, low and somewhat thick-set, hurried through deserted byways, to the business portion of the city. Here the lights disclosed in the pedestrian a man, in appearance of about seventy-five years of age.

Despite his sturdy, compact form, the hair that fell upon his collar was white, and with the black, bushy eyebrows that overhung the darkly-smoked glasses protecting the eyes, gave a somewhat extraordinary expression to the dark countenance.

His gait grew less swift and even laggard; but as he strolled along the thoroughfares those keen eyes behind the spectacles swept a constant, searching regard upon every face he met, as one fearing detection.

At length he paused upon the corner of a narrow street and swept another of those piercing glances about him; then, apparently satisfied, darted down the passageway, which was scarcely more than an alley, and eventually disappeared.

Just then another figure was seen, evidently following the white-haired man. In stature he was deformed, and of less height than a child of twelve years old, though the head, even for a figure of fine proportions, was immense.

He stood motionless, that bushy, gigantic head thrust slightly forward, about him something to suggest the ferocious, half-baffled expectancy of a bloodhound lost to its trail. Then he proceeded down the alley-way, walking slowly in the shadow of the houses, his sharp, fierce eyes piercing the gloom like fiery meteors.

Not a human object met his sight. The hour was now growing late, the way was deserted, the frowning fronts of the residences owned by tradesmen presented uncompromising darkness, not a light being visible.

A muttered oath broke from the lips of the disappointed pursuer, and, after standing irresolute for a few minutes, he started for the more populous portion of the city, where, jumping into a closed carriage waiting, bearing upon its panels the escutcheon of a noble family, he was driven to a castle in the outskirts of the capital.

Here, alighting and ringing the bell, he was admitted by an obsequious porter, and, without waiting for directions or invitation, made his way to a certain door through which, after a brief, imperative knock, he entered to the apartment within.

This chamber, of great size and elegance, was occupied by two ladies of aristocratic bearing—evidently mother and daughter.

As the hunchback entered, the elder lady rose and advanced to meet him, with suppressed eagerness in her look and manner. He made an impatient gesture towards their companion. The mother turned.

"Olga," she said, "your uncle has some business with me; leave us alone for the present."

The girl rose and withdrew, after first formally bowing to the visitor, to whom the Princess Artoff now again turned.

"Well?" she said, with suppressed excitement.

A malicious smile came across the man's lips.

"My dear sister-in-law," he said, "I regret that I have no pleasant intelligence to impart."

A smothered exclamation of disappointment escaped the lady.

In the light of the hundred tapers certain features in her companion that the darkness had concealed, now became visible; but at midnight or noonday he could be nothing but a monstrosity.

His cloak thrown aside showed his distorted but thick-set figure to be richly dressed. But inhuman and revolting as was his form, his countenance, developed to its normal condition, strange to say, was to a certain degree handsome, though it bore a bitter expression.

No one in St. Petersburg was more noted for dissipation and every kind of excess, than the dwarfed Prince d'Artoff, the last heir of his race. But though physically dwarfed, his spirit, intellect, passions, had developed to an abnormal degree, and all pandered to the evil he seemed to revel in.

Crossing the room he flung himself upon a divan—his sister-in-law seated herself in a chair before him.

"Yes," he continued, "I have again been unsuccessful. Not trusting to our lackeys, I, as usual, followed the figure, and as usual it disappeared almost before my very eyes. What became of it I am not prepared to say. But I swear I will solve the mystery!"

"But are you sure that you are not mistaken in the identity?" said the woman eagerly.

"As sure as I am that that haughty, unbending girl shall yield to my power," returned the other, through his shut teeth. "I followed the person from a back entrance of Ivan Drasky's residence to the lonely and humble locality it nightly seeks.

"I cannot be mistaken in that bull-like form, that shuffling gait. They are his—it is Ivan Drasky in disguise. And why this concealment, if there is not some mystery in his life?"

"True. But for years he has been a wealthy and respected citizen of St. Petersburg, though somewhat noted for parsimony in his dealings."

"He is a mean, sordid cur, with money for a goal, despite

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

all. And there is a dark page in his life that I will turn before the season dies," muttered the prince.

A look of anxiety and impatience was in his companion's countenance. She had risen and was pacing the tiled floor of the luxurious room.

"There is little time to lose," she said, in a suppressed voice. "If there is anything in this man's history that will give you control of him, you must know it soon, or we must abandon ourselves to failure—you to losing a wife, I a fortune.

"The marriage of Ilma Drasky to my nephew, Count Karl Petroff, will undoubtedly take place in a few weeks. By the will of that madman—my brother and his father—not a kopeck of his immense fortune reverts to me unless Karl attains his fortieth birthday unmarried, in which case I can claim half. There are yet four years before I shall be safe.

"My child is comparatively poor—Karl immensely rich, aside from his inheritance. I always thought Olga safe since her cousin has lived to this age in celibacy. But, despite all his pride and coldness, he has succumbed at last. If we could place a barrier between him and this daughter of Drasky, all would be well. Men like him never love but once.

"He is a distinguished statesman, wedded, until he knew Ilma, to the good of his country. But though the girl, rich as her father is, is far beneath him in social status, he will marry her so long as she and her father bear the respectable reputation they now possess; but cast some shadow upon them, make it a disgrace to give his proud old name into her keeping, and I will have my fortune, and you will rob him of the girl you love."

A look of passion and malevolence swept the dwarf's countenance. He sprang up, stamping his foot savagely. In his fury he looked like an ogre.

"I do love her!" he cried, "despite her haughty refusal of my hand, her scorn, her loathing, that she makes no effort to conceal—through it all my love has lived! But I swear, though she may never be mine, neither shall she marry the man of her choice. There must be some way to thwart them.

"Old Drasky has long aroused my suspicions. For what purpose is he disguised? What business takes him to this humble, almost disreputable, neighbourhood every night?

"I dare never go near enough to him to see the exact house in which he disappears, for his eyes are so keen. But I have repeatedly sent servants to investigate the business of the inhabitants, and find that the street is composed of tradespeople, poor, ignorant, and above suspicion. Yet I swear there is a mystery connected with old Ivan."

Princess Artoff paused in her rapid walk and stood before him.

"Artoff," she said sharply, "it may be that he is a Nihilist."

"I myself have thought of that possibility," returned the other moodily. "But there is not man enough in him to take the risk—not soul enough to share sentiment—not generosity enough to sympathise with any object or principle unconnected with his self-interest. No—he is not a Nihilist. Would to Heaven he were—if we could prove it against him! Petroff at the head of the Government, and faithful statesman that I admit he is, would never dare—however much his heart might plead for her—connect himself with a daughter of a Nihilist."

"Then what is he?" cried the woman in despair.

"As yet I am not prepared to answer. Give me time. Such impatience will ruin all."

* * * * *

A few days later, in her father's mansion stood Ilma Drasky. Ivan, her parent, though bearing an unblemished reputation, was, nevertheless, well known to be miserly in his dealings with everyone but himself and daughter, silent and unsociable.

It was, therefore, a source of universal wonder that he could be the father of a girl whose reputation throughout the city bore indisputable evidence of her beauty, both of mind and person.

Highly educated and accomplished, amiable in disposition, and generous of soul, this daughter of the house of Drasky was the perfection of womanhood. In stature, unlike Ivan, she was tall and unexceptionally graceful

Her complexion, soft, creamy, was colourless save for the scarlet lips, around which was a peculiarly pensive curve, as though her nature were slightly predisposed to melancholy.

Her features were straight and clear-cut as a cameo's; her eyes, large, black, lustreless, but soul-filled, and the heavy silken hair growing low down upon the forehead was of the same rich hue.

She was standing at a window, looking down into the street, when a pair of arms were wound tightly around her waist, and, turning suddenly, she came face to face with her lover.

One glance into that proud, stern, countenance, now abandoned to the rapture of his passion, was sufficient to show the intensity of love that had at last swept the proud nature of the statesman.

A look of delight illumined the great, shadowy orbs of the girl as she fondly greeted him.

"I scarcely expected to be with you before evening," said the count, his arms still tight about her. "But there being a recess, I stole a few minutes from the palace to come to my beloved." Then, while a swarthy flush stained his countenance, and his embrace grew closer about her: "In a little while, Ilma, you will be always with me—morning, noon, night. Oh! how infinitely blessed will be that time!"

A faint flush had stolen into the girl's lovely face, but she reached up her arms and laid them about his throat.

"I can scarcely believe my great happiness," she murmured. "You, so great and noble, and distinguished—how is it you seek me, so lowly, when the proudest ladies of the land could be yours for the asking?"

"Flatterer!" he said gaily; but almost instantly his manner became characterised by a tender gravity, and, putting her gently from him, regarded her with fond admiration.

"Shall I tell you, love, why I sought you? It was because the first time I ever saw you my senses yielded to your matchless beauty—because after I grew to know you better I beheld in you everything high and noble to captivate the soul—because, when St. Petersburg, already ringing with the fame of your loveliness, grew wild with enthusiasm over your bravery in snatching with your own hands the shell from under the imperial carriage waiting for the Tsar, and never relinquishing the deadly burden until all danger for the Emperor was over, I said to my soul: 'That is the wife for me, and mine she shall be if only I can win her.' For, my darling, the Petroffs of St. Petersburg have always been warriors and statesmen.

"The women of their love have ever had but one rival to fear, and that is—Russia. Therefore, in selecting wives the utmost discrimination was necessary, so that no ill-assorted union would shackle their duty and retard their labour for their country. For this reason so many of my race have lived and died unmarried.

"But the wives that have been among us were brave, self-sacrificing women, without a shadow to taint the glory of their memory. And you—I say it honestly—are worthy of your predecessors. For I believe you are too noble and patriotic to be jealous of that which in the heart of every true statesman must be first, even beyond wife and children—his country!"

As she listened her countenance had kindled with his enthusiasm—the lofty spirit in her that was made for martyrs irradiated her eyes.

"Jealous of Russia!" she said, softly. "Never! I am her true daughter; and my husband"—another soft flush that made him draw her again into his arms—"shall be given to her service in time of peace as well as of war."

At this juncture, after some discreet difficulty in opening the door, Drasky entered, and respectfully greeted his intended son-in-law.

In complexion he was dark almost to swarthiness, though his hair was of light brown. But his eyes, keen, piercing, restless—true insight into his sharp and avaricious temperament—were black as sloes.

With all his greed, if any man ever adored his child, that man was Ivan, as his glance now resting on the queenly woman testified; and it was an adoration as completely reciprocated by its object.

Digitized by Google

But, despite the alterations in his appearance, any person who had keenly observed that disguised figure pursued by the dwarfed Prince a few nights previously could not fail to recognise its proportions and gait in the man now standing before his daughter and her lover.

At this moment a commotion in the street attracted their attention. Looking out, a miserable spectacle met their view.

In the middle of the street, like pack-horses, came a wretched crowd, composed of men, women, and children, the pathos of human suffering and soul despair in their heavy, dark faces.

There were old men and women treading with trembling steps the rough flagstones of this city which had known their youth and rejected their age. There were sturdy fathers, leading by the hand little ones whose tired eyes roamed in sad wonder upon their surroundings. There were heart-broken mothers cradling in their arms the infants too young to know misfortune, yet none the less homeless and friendless.

There was youth, robbed of its lightness, and branded with the stigma of disgrace, while after all came the merciless mob, howling, gibing, stoning, and up to that luxurious chamber floated fierce cries of the people casting reproaches on them.

Ilma shrank away from the window with a low cry, and covered her face with her hands.

Count Petroff's countenance softened in the sternness that had seized it at sight of that wretched herd outside, as he witnessed her emotion, and he gently took down her hands.

"What is it, Ilma?" he asked slowly, looking at her searchingly.

She made a gesture towards the street, but withdrew still further from the window.

"Poor, miserable unfortunates!" she murmured, in an unsteady voice. "I cannot but pity them, erring though I know them to be."

"A dog were more deserving of your pity, sweet one," he said, tenderly, though in his voice there was a stern sincerity. He was the lover no longer, but the statesman. "The wife of a Petroff must have no sympathy with the Jews. The people are driving that race from the city—not the rulers; but it is right and just.

"The Jew, in the eyes of a Russian, is a rank rebel, an oppressor, a devourer of every right and liberty, an absorber of every privilege, but as ungrateful as a carrion-bird, and deserves to be driven from every Christian community. However secret his identity, his mere existence contaminates and breeds pestilence!"

She had somewhat recovered her composure, though in her heart there was a dull pain that suffering always occasioned.

That horrible procession had now passed, though the din and roar of the shouting populace, softened by space, still floated up to them like the distant thunders of surging billows.

By chance at this moment her glance fell upon her father. His face was colourless, his eyes, wild, horrified, were fixed upon her in a look that lingered with her for days.

She made as if she would spring towards him, but he made a forbidding, almost warning gesture, and glancing once at Petroff, turned and went out of the room.

Pained and mystified, Ilma stood silent, marvelling as to the cause of that agonised look in her father's eyes. Was it possible that he had recognised a friend among those Jewish refugees?

Soon, with many a tender word and fond caress, Petroff left her to return to state duties, and she was alone, with the memory of Ivan's strange expression to share her solitude.

That evening she attended a state ball, escorted by her lover. As he was assisting her from the carriage in the gleam of the thousand lamps, some power seemed to draw her attention to the carriage standing in front of her own.

Petroff and Ilma looked out of the window and saw the howling, frantic mob passing by. The girl was moved to compassion for them. "They are not worthy of your pity" said the Count.

Digitized by Google

Looking towards it, she met the gaze of a pair of eyes, burning with fierce hate, passion, and desire, and caught the glimpse of a burly, mis-shapen form, whose hideous shape even the many priceless furs in which it was wrapped could not entirely conceal.

The girl shuddered and shrank closer to her lover's side. Ever watchful and abiding as was his love, Petroff noted the involuntary gesture of his beloved, and looked down at her in tender questioning.

"It is that horrible Prince Artoff," she explained slowly. "The expression in his eyes affects me strangely. And I meet him so often that it would seem as though he followed me."

Petroff's face flushed with displeasure.

"The coward!" he muttered, tightening his clasp on the small hand resting upon his arm. "If I thought so, I would wring the degraded life out of him. I always feel like shooting him when I think of his presumption in offering himself to you, my queen and idol!"

* * * * *

As Ivan Drasky, disguised for his nightly trip, was admitting himself with a secret key to the house to which under such circumstances he always repaired, a heavy hand fell upon his shoulder. Trembling all over, he turned and confronted the burly figure of his captor, beside whom stood a short, humped form he knew too well. It was this latter who spoke.

"Ivan Drasky," said those sneering, malicious tones, "your cause is lost—I have pierced to your well-guarded secret."

The quaking man made a miserable attempt at recovering his composure.

"What mean you, your Highness?" he queried, in accents he vainly essayed to steady.

Even in the dusk of the gloomy street the malicious gleam of the dwarf's fiery eyes was visible. He stretched up towards Ivan and uttered a few low, mysterious words.

From the miserable man broke a shriek of fear and horror, and he would have dropped to the flagstones had not his captor forcibly sustained him.

"It's false! It's a lie to ruin me!" he again shrieked, now struggling desperately with the detaining grasp.

A jeering, malicious laugh broke from the dwarf.

"Take me into the back rooms of this house, friend Ivan, and I will prove the truth of my assertions," he sneered.

"Never!" groaned the trembling, unhappy man, endeavouring to seize the key for the purpose of concealing it.

"Admit me," thundered his foe, "or I will sound the alarm, raise a mob, and when the truth of you is known, you will be seized by it and treated as a mad cur!"

Almost panic-stricken, the old man unlocked the door and led the way to a suite of rooms whose furniture and contents but corroborated the fatal secret now in the possession of his enemy.

"Now do you deny it?" sneered Artoff triumphantly.

Resistance, denial, were worthless. The detected man flung himself upon the floor at the feet of the dwarf, crying aloud for mercy.

"Spare me!" he moaned. "Take my houses, my gold, my everything I possess, but keep my secret for my child's sake."

The dwarf's face had grown more evil and more triumphant.

"You can buy my silence with but one price—give me your daughter."

Again that wild shriek broke from the wretched father.

"Oh, for Heaven's sake! My child, my beautiful Rachel. I cannot—you know she is betrothed to Count Petroff."

"I will hear her answer from her own lips," sneered the dwarf. "And for that purpose will go to her at once."

Ivan caught desperately at his foe, who, however, eluded him and went his way.

He immediately sought Drasky's residence. By dint of bribing the servants, Artoff succeeded in gaining admittance to Ilma.

How lovely she looked in the gleam of the burning tapers. Around her elegant figure fell the rich folds of her crimson velvet gown; her throat and arms bare, and like columns of rarest marble, were adorned with strings of rubies and amber; in her small ears were jewels of the same. Her head carried high, like one used to wearing a crown, was destitute of ornament save for the heavy braids of purple-black hair coiled low on the neck.

As the dwarf stood regarding this dazzling vision his face grew more evil, in his eyes deepened that look of vast desire and vindictive triumph.

"This is an unexpected visit, Prince," she observed, haughtily, "and, I might even add, undesired on my part. Have you business with me?"

"I have, madam," returned the guest. "Important business, if you will grant me an interview."

He wheeled up his chair before her and climbed into it.

"Probably you can surmise the business that brings me again into your presence," he began. "I once offered you my hand in marriage, which you refused. Since then circumstances have transpired that may induce you to change your mind. Therefore I have sought you to-night to repeat my offer."

She partially sprang to her feet in her angry excitement; then, controlling herself, sank back upon the divan. But her countenance, grand, proud as an outraged queen's, testified to her indignation at his persistency.

"I told you then that I had but one answer to give to your suit," she replied slowly but haughtily. "And I tell you now no time or change of circumstances can alter that answer."

"You again refuse my offer?"

His evil countenance had grown fierce and threatening.

"I do, once and for ever."

For a minute Artoff's rage was too great to allow him speech. His eyes, like a basilisk's, dwelt upon the splendid beauty he coveted as though he would wipe it out for ever.

"Listen to me, madam," he at last hissed through his clinched teeth. "You shall marry me or I will cover your name with infamy. Take your choice between being my wife or the gibe, the ridicule, the horror of the people. Your destiny is in my hands—not only yours, but your father's, and a more wretched one woman never had, if you tempt me to do my worst."

This time she sprang to her feet in uncontrollable passion—her eyes flashed fire.

At this moment Count Petroff was shown into the apartment. At one glance he took in the scene—with one spring he reached the side of the woman he adored, and his eyes, gleaming with a lion's wrath, fixed upon the miserable object before them.

"Ah, Count," said Artoff, with insufferable insolence, "you are come in time. I was about to enlighten your betrothed upon one or two little matters upon which she is either really ignorant or has wilfully deceived you. Are you aware, my lord, that she to whom you are betrothed comes of that despicable race—that long ere this, had the world but pierced to the hideous secret her hound of a father has so well concealed, she would have been driven with lash and stone to join the herd of her infamous people? Are you aware, sir count, that you are the betrothed of the daughter of a Hebrew?"

For a moment there was an intense hush, the girl standing dazed and bewildered. But in the next her lover leapt towards the dwarf as one wild beast springs upon another.

"Traducer!" he cried, in fierce passion, catching the hunchback by the throat, "take back those words, or I will wring the wretched, craven life out of you!"

"Truth can never traduce," returned the other doggedly. "And if you doubt the truth of my accusation, look at the face of that Hebrew—you may be convinced.

All eyes turned towards Ivan, who had just staggered into the room. One glance at the wild, ashen countenance was sufficient to establish the miserable truth.

For an instant the magnificent strength of Petroff failed under the frightful blow. He reeled back against the wall.

Then he recovered himself with an effort. With a look of murder in his maddened eyes, he turned to Artoff, pointing to the door; and, not daring to disobey the dwarf slunk out

Digitized by Google

He sprang forward and caught the hunchback by the throat.

Not until then did Ilma, standing like a statue of despair, move or speak. Now she turned to Ivan, who, with his head buried in his hands, crouched in a chair.

"Father," she cried, "is this thing true?"

Ivan lifted his head—a look of rage had swept into his countenance.

"It is," he shrieked.

Ilma sank down upon a divan and lifted her blanched, agonised face to her lover. Between the two—but now so supremely blest in their love—had come a yawning precipice that no time or circumstance could bridge. No more in all the world could they be aught to one another.

"It was for your sake, Rachel, that I did it," continued the father, and the girl shuddered as that name of miserable significance fell upon her ear. "Your mother died at your birth, and from that hour the love I bore her has been lavished upon her child.

"Ah, Rachel"—he seemed to experience a morbid pleasure in calling her by that name—"forgive your father, when you think that it is for your sake I have sinned and deceived, turning apostate to the faith of my forefathers. I could not bear that you, equal in beauty and intellect to the proudest in the land, should grow to womanhood, banned from your birth.

"I foresaw this persecution of the chosen of Israel—I looked ahead and saw this day when the Hebrew martyrs are stoned through the streets, and driven from the land of their birth. How could I endure that you should suffer this doom? I had wealth, you growing in beauty and intelligence, and I swore to save you from the fate of your people.

"I accordingly removed from Hungary, where we were then living, and with only the disguise of a light wig which I have always worn, and the assumed name of Drasky, began a new life in St. Petersburg. You both know how successful it has been. I saw you lifted from out the shadow of your birth into the beautiful sunlight in which I had hoped ever to keep you.

"For years, disguised by wigs, spectacles, and paint, I carried on the business of a pawnshop in one of the poor localities of this city, thus adding to the wealth which I was treasuring for you. But when the hatred and rank prejudice became so strong against the Hebrews, I was compelled to close my establishment.

"Fortunately I, under the name of Isaacs, owned the house and was thus enabled to lock up the premises with the stock concealed within. This I intended by degrees to remove to our house, and for the purpose of making preparations went there every night. Through some means that fiendish dwarf pierced to my secret, and all is lost!"

He ended with a groan and again buried his face in his trembling hands.

Again old Ivan lifted his head, his eyes piteous, shrinking, sought his child.

"Do you hate me—do you treasure wrath?" he queried piteously. "Ah! Rachel, child of my dead Rebecca, my whole life has been devoted to you—turn not against me."

She rose, crossed with a steady step to her father, and put her arm around his neck, in a gentle, infinite protection.

"While life last we will cling together," she said, her head reared with the grandeur of immolation. "In all the world we have but one another; on the face of the earth we are wanderers and Pariahs. We will go together.

The Count, standing alone, bent his head upon the marble mantel, and the bitter, scalding tears of a proud man's intolerable anguish dropped one by one upon the cold stone.

And now up from the street came a sound that caused him to lift his head—that sent in his heavy, despairing eyes a look of wild fear and horror. Nearer and nearer it came, that hoarse, dull roar of an angry populace, until it resolved itself into furious shrieks and yells and curses. Petroff leapt towards the father and daughter.

"It is the mob!" he cried. "That dwarfish fiend has sounded the alarm. Oh, for God's sake! Could not even this have been spared us? Fly!—Conceal yourselves! You might expect more mercy from a pack of wolves. Hide somewhere while I deal with them, and as soon as I can I will seek and take care of you."

"Get up," Petroff cried fiercely to Ivan. "Will you give your daughter to the mob? My carriage is at the side entrance—try to reach it and drive straight to the castle."

Ivan sat like one paralyzed. Brave and pale, his daughter stood above him, like a prophetess of old, her eyes steady and shining with a great courage, her head held high.

"It is too late," she said to her lover. "The rabble are already in the house. To defend us will be to ruin you—only God can befriend us. Leave the house."

But he never moved. And now at last the shouts of the people, the tramp of their feet in the beautiful chambers they were ravishing and destroying, the loud shattering of marble, the heavy crash of broken furniture, roused Ivan, and he sprang to his feet with a shriek of terror.

But at this moment into the chamber came that hooting, mad throng. Even the presence of the most powerful statesman of the day could not restrain them. They swept in between Petroff and the Jews, despite the maddened, desperate resistance of the former.

A wild, maddened cry broke from the Count, and he flung himself among the throng; but he was powerless.

With all his fame, fortune, power, what could he do for her—this poor, unhappy daughter of a usurer? Absolutely nothing! Where he stood a hoarse, choking sob broke in his throat, and he fell face downward upon the floor in unconsciousness.

A week later, a shipload of refugees sailed for America; Ivan and his daughter were amongst them.

Ilma, brave girl, unflinchingly faced the new life into which she was entering.

Annie J. Duffell.

Digitized by Google

A Romantic Marriage.

Telling of a Highland Love Affair.

ON the shores of one of Scotland's most beautiful lochs a fisher-lad and a girl stood together. It was an ideal spot for a love idyll; the rippling waters, surrounded by the grand mountain scenery, made the most perfect setting for a romance.

The lovers were as perfect in their way as the scenery. The man was as handsome as a young Apollo, browned by the sun and full of manly vigour which redeemed his beauty from effeminacy.

The girl was tall, graceful as a young sapling, with a wild-rose bloom on her lovely little face, and eyes the exact colour of the wild hyacinth, fringed with long dark lashes that matched her curling hair.

The man was talking eagerly, while the girl was listening silently, but presently he broke off abruptly, kissed his companion, and went away along the shore. The girl stood lost in a reverie from which she was aroused presently by a fresh girlish voice.

"Meg!" it called.

The girl looked round quickly and glanced from the face behind her to the figure of the fisherman still visible in the distance.

"Dolly!" she exclaimed, "Dolly—you saw——"

Dolly was a slim overgrown child of fifteen, in a short cotton frock, and with her bright hair flowing over her shoulders.

"Yes, Meg," she answered simply.

"What did you see—exactly?"

"I saw young Sinclair kiss you," said Dolly straightforwardly. Dolly was always straightforward. It was her great charm to some people, her most irritating quality to others.

Meg sat down on a rock and pulled her cousin down beside her.

"It's all right, child," she said lightly, "I'm going to marry Angus Sinclair."

"Oh, I wouldn't, Meg," she said in her awkward school-girl diction, but her tone was eloquent.

"Why not? Aunt Mary won't mind. She'd be glad to get rid of me anyhow, and so would May."

Dolly was silent. She knew that her mother and sister disliked the high-spirited, beautiful, poor relation whom circumstances had brought under their roof, and only a distinct promise to her dying husband that she would afford a home to his brother's orphan daughter prevented Mrs. Conyngham from turning the girl out.

"Mother won't like it, though," Dolly jerked out after a pause.

"Yes she will. It'll give her a good excuse to wash her hands of me. Besides, I'm of age and can do as I like."

"Sinclair isn't a gentleman."

"I know. And a man of his class would be quite impossible elsewhere. But these Highlanders, with their mingled courtesy and independence, are Nature's gentlemen. Angus speaks correctly, and the Highland accent is rather pretty, I think. Then he's fairly well-to-do. His father owns several cottages besides the one Aunt Mary has taken for the summer.

"This is a lovely spot, Dolly. I shouldn't mind living here, and one doesn't want riches in such a retired place. 'The world forgetting, by the world forgot.' Angus loves me, and he is the handsomest man I have ever seen; now, isn't he? Think of Miles Oakley beside him."

Dolly looked quickly at her cousin.

"Miles is a gentleman."

"And ugly and stupid. Angus is handsome, clever, and he adores me. I once thought Miles—but never mind that. I shall marry Angus. It will be a romantic marriage, but I believe it will be a hundred times happier than the conventional one that May is sure to make."

"I don't believe you'll be happy," said Dolly.

"I'm sure I shall. It will be a case of 'all for love and the world well lost.' Aunt Mary and May will never speak to me again, but you won't desert me, Dolly, will you? You are such a staunch little soul."

"I won't, Meg. You can always count on me." Dolly's large brown eyes shone with unshed tears, for she was devoted to her cousin with that devotion a young girl often feels for an older woman. "But I'm so afraid you won't be happy, Meg. I'm afraid you're making a big mistake."

Meg smiled and kissed the soft cheek near her own.

"You darling, you needn't be afraid. But, dear Dolly, you won't say anything to Aunt Mary, will you? There's nothing arranged yet, and I don't want the storm to break before its time."

Dolly promised secrecy, and kept her promise faithfully until Meg's disappearance on the morning on which the party were to return to London rendered silence unnecessary.

* * * * *

"Miss Dorothy, a lady wishes to see you."

Dolly turned round.

"Did she ask for me particularly, Saunders? Didn't she give any name?"

"She asked particularly for Miss Dolly, and said she wouldn't send in her name, but her business was important."

Dolly glanced impatiently at the clock. She was expecting a very special visitor, and he was almost due now.

"It isn't a bit convenient, Saunders," she said, "but you may show her up. If—if Mr. Oakley comes while she is here put him into the library and let me know."

Five years had passed since Meg's romantic marriage, and Dorothy had grown into a very sweet and dainty little woman. She was not tall, nor was she, strictly speaking, pretty, though her deep brown eyes, fair curling hair, and brilliant colouring made her very attractive, but her chief charm was her expression of candour, innocence, and sincerity.

She had tried to keep up a correspondence with Meg, in spite of her mother's displeasure, but she had only had one letter from her cousin, and in that Meg said she did not wish to hear from any of her relatives. But Dolly had never forgotten her pretty cousin, and now as the door opened to admit a tall, graceful woman in mourning, Dolly uttered a scream and flew into her arms.

"Oh, Meg, my darling, how glad I am to see you."

"Is Aunt Mary at home?" asked Meg nervously, returning Dolly's embrace with interest.

"No. She won't be back for a long time yet. Sit down, darling—I'll ring for tea and we'll have a long talk."

"And May—where is she?"

"Oh, May's married. She married a very rich man just six months ago—the conventional marriage you always said she would make. But she seems most happy. And you, dear? Are you very happy?"

Digitized by Google

Meg had sunk down on a low chair by the fire, and was looking round the once familiar room.

"How pretty it all is!" she said, drawing a deep breath. "How lovely the flowers are! How delightful it is to see a pretty drawing-room after that odious little cottage. Ah Dolly, you were right, my marriage was a great mistake."

"Was it, dear? I'm so sorry."

There was a short silence while tea was brought in. Then Dolly brought her cousin over a cup of tea and some dainty little cakes.

"Thank you, dear. Oh, Dolly, I have suffered for my folly. Angus thought I had money. I told him my real position quite at first—that I was a poor relation and acted as your governess, but he thought it was all my romantic nonsense, for he could not believe a lady, as he knew me to be, could be penniless. When he found there was no money and realised that my relatives had cast me off, and he had a useless lady-wife on his hands, he was furious.

"I got your letter, my staunch little Dolly, but I had to tell you not to write again because Angus insisted that all my correspondence should pass through his hands.

"It was an awful life. I had to fetch water from the well, to cook, light fires, do all the work, and Angus' mother and sisters sneered at me for a useless fine lady who was just a burden and expense to the family. Then the food was so coarse. In winter we lived on salt herring and potatoes almost entirely. Then—the baby came."

Meg paused and tears came into her eyes.

"Oh, Dolly, she was such a comfort—a wee, wee thing, fair as a lily and beautiful as an angel. I called her Dolly after you. But she was delicate and wanted great care. I had no nurse for her, no servant at all. Angus was indignant when I wanted one, yet he was quite well enough off to keep at least one servant. He said what was good enough for his mother was good enough for me, and she had never wanted a servant."

"Was he unkind to you?" whispered Dolly.

"He didn't mean to be. It was just what you said, a big mistake. He had fancied himself in love with me as I had fancied myself in love with him, but he had hoped for money with me, and resented the disappointment.

"Then, too, we had nothing in common, and he was jealous of my superiority over his people. He didn't like my trying to keep to my own refined habits, and bring the baby up to be like myself.

"He was a good man in his own way, but small-minded and tyrannical. The child died in infancy, and just a year ago Angus was drowned while fishing. I took what little there was and came to London."

"Have you been a year in London without coming to me?" cried Dorothy.

"I wouldn't come till I was doing fairly well. I have a boarding-house in Bloomsbury, together with a friend who is also a widow, and we are getting on very well indeed. So I thought this afternoon I might come and see you."

"I'm so glad, and, Meg, I shall come and see you."

"Good, true little friend. Do you remember Miles Oakley and how you always stuck up for him?

"Ah me! I have sometimes—wished—but never mind that now. Good-bye, darling, I must go, but I'll come again, for you're just the same as ever, just as sweet and loving, just as true. You were always true."

A hurried embrace and she was gone.

"Always true," repeated Dolly as the door closed behind her cousin. "Ah, Meg, if you only knew what it costs me to be true now!"

She sank down on a low chair before the fire, so lost in thought that she did not hear the door open after a time, and started violently as she felt a kiss on her cheek.

"Miles!" she cried, jumping up.

Miles Oakley was thirty-three, decidedly plain, and with no resemblance to a Greek god or a young Apollo, but a gentleman to his finger tips.

"Well, little sweetheart," he began, trying to take Dolly in his arms, but she gently repulsed him.

"Don't, Miles. I have something to tell you. Five years ago you used to come here very much, and mother thought you wanted May and so did May herself. But I knew better. You wanted Meg."

"Wise little woman, I did." They were both standing; Dolly looking pale and resolute, Miles gazing at her thoroughly puzzled.

"The night before May was married," Dolly went on, "she asked me to help her turn out her desk and burn old letters, looking them over first. I came upon one addressed to Miss M. Conyngham, but beginning 'My darling Meg.' It was from you asking Meg to marry you. May told me it was brought to her by mistake, and out of spite she kept it."

"That's what became of that letter, then! I've often wondered."

"But don't you see what this means?" asked Dorothy. "Meg was piqued by your silence and rushed into this disastrous marriage. But she is now a widow, free, and lovelier than ever. I have just seen her, Miles, and I can give you her address. Go to her. Never mind me. Make her happy and be happy yourself."

"You noble girl, you true woman," said Miles, deeply moved. He took both her hands in his, and drew her towards him. "But you are utterly wrong, my darling. Listen! I did admire Meg very much, and I did write that letter. No answer came, but, not being a fellow in a novel, I wasn't going to take it for granted that silence meant a refusal.

"I saw Meg, found she hadn't had my letter, and repeated my proposal. She refused me. She was very candid; said she was a passionate lover of the beautiful and of the romantic, and that I was too commonplace and too ugly for her. I did think of trying again, but you went off to Scotland immediately, and then I heard of her romantic marriage. And then I fell in love with you, dear."

"But she is free now," faltered Dolly, "and more beautiful than ever."

"And if she were a thousand times more beautiful than ever, what is that to me?" cried Miles with sudden fire. "Free, is she? But I am not, and would not be for worlds. Dorothy, my own, my darling, believe me," drawing her to his breast, all unresisting, "believe me, sweet one, 'there are no birds in last year's nests,' and all the love in my heart belongs to Dorothy and to Dorothy alone."

Vera Serkoff.

To Story Writers.

We shall be pleased to consider complete novelettes of about 20,000 words in length, and to pay cash down for those accepted. Manuscripts must be type-written (or very legibly hand-written), and should be sent to The Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Postage for return of MSS., if unsuitable, should be inclosed.

Digitized by Google

IVA'S FIRST DAY DREAM.

A Story of What Might Have Been.

ALONG the steep, tree-clad bank of a winding west country stream a young man climbed one bright, blazing June afternoon.

Entirely bewildered as to his whereabouts, now he stopped to peer up the unexplored heights, now to look back upon the silvery thread below, always starting afresh, puzzled as ever as to his right route.

Soon, by good fortune, he stumbled on a guide.

Halting by a tangled underwood, where shadows and sunshine played hide-and-seek in the summer breeze, he saw beyond the moving branches what, from a distance, he had mistaken for a bit of grey crag, but what in truth was a decaying wall of some old monastic cell, and leaning lightly against it a young, girlish form, a book neglected at her feet, hands lazily clasped, and dark eyes dreamily gazing into the distance.

The south wind, stealing round an ivied corner, ruffled the dark feathers in her hat and stirred the short, curling chestnut hair below; but whatever whispers it bore upon its wings, it carried no tales of the stranger close at hand, no suspicion of an admiring watcher intruding upon that happy solitude.

"I beg your pardon, but may I ask if I'm on the right way to Mr. Hurst's, of Perristone?" A vivid blush rose on the young face that turned towards the inquirer with the answer:

"You are right if you wish to walk round by the bridge."

"But I think I was told to take a nearer way," said the newcomer, pushing forward through a miniature forest of bracken and oak saplings, and disclosing, under the broad-brimmed hat he raised, his sunburnt features. "I was to find Mr. Hurst's boat, ferry myself over if it was on this side, or shout for it if it was opposite. I have kept watch for the boat all along, but failed to find it. Can you kindly direct me to it?"

A glance, half-shy, half-amused, came with the response to this:

"I am afraid the boat is nowhere near. Some of them from the house are fishing from it, I believe."

"By Jove! And the bridge——"

"Will take you four miles round. The river winds so."

Now the day was delicious for doing nothing, and doing that at one's leisure; but the very idea of a four-mile trudge under a three-o'clock sun was exhausting.

The young man hesitated, casting longing eyes at a mossy seat near by in a cool, shady angle.

His young guide had much ado to keep from laughing, and a pair of fascinating dimples began to hover about her cheeks.

"Is there no other way to get over?" said he, distinctly disinclined to go.

"None at all," said she, with a shake of the head.

"Then I have no choice. Thank you very much for directing me."

And, adding something to his farewell about being forced to get on to Perristone, the stranger turned to begin his long walk.

Hereat compunction overtook the young lady, and her detaining hand brought him to a standstill.

"Is it Mr. Hurst you are wanting to see?"

"Well, partly—yes."

"Then he is not at home. I saw him drive towards Ross half an hour back."

"Indeed! Thank you; but I must still go on. I shall find Mrs. Hurst within."

"Oh, no! Mrs. Hurst was to have come back from Gloucester yesterday, but instead she only returns this evening."

This seemed a stop final; but the gentleman appeared to be still undecided, or perhaps he enjoyed prolonging the conversation.

"I believe there are two Mr. Hursts, of Perristone. I am speaking of—of the squire."

"And so"—with a very pretty smile—"am I."

"And I bring a note to him from my hostess, Mrs. Furnival, of Coombside, who is his sister."

"Aunt Helen! Oh, then, give it to me, please, for I am his daughter."

At this off went the young man's hat again; the note was handed forth, and a prolonged study of the bright, young face enjoyed while its owner, taking the underlined "Immediate" for leave, opened and read this missive to her father:

"DEAR HUGH,—Please entertain the bearer of this for a few hours, and keep him to dinner. He is Captain Ryland, son of my old school fellow you fell so desperately in love with thirty years ago! I am planning a little surprise for him, and want him out of the way. Will explain when I come this evening with another friend. Love to Charlotte, who came back, of course, last night.—Your affectionate sister,

"HELEN FURNIVAL."

"Give Iva five-and-twenty kisses for me! The child hasn't been to see me for a week."

Iva finished the letter, and then, with a most charming mixture of girlish dignity and childish simplicity, turned to Captain Ryland, doing the hospitable honours of the moment for her absent parents.

"They will be so glad to see you this evening," said she; "and if you don't mind coming with me, we will soon find the boys—my brothers, I mean—and the boat, and I'll ferry you across. Papa will be sorry he was out."

And then a droll smile began to lurk again about her lips and Captain Ryland came to the conclusion that the squire's daughter was the most delightful substitute for her elders, and blessed the chance that sent his steps straying up this path.

Perhaps thrown off his guard by this unceremonious introduction, he expressed his satisfaction a little too warmly, or Iva's ingenuousness took fright at compliments, but her shyness came back with a rush, and instead of loitering down the uneven way, she sprang on alone, never so much as looking to see if he were following, and gained the greensward by the river before her companion's less accustomed feet had half made the descent.

Digitized by Google

The moment he reached her—"Now," said she, with the young imperiousness that was vastly amusing, "stay here, if you please, and rest. I can run for Tom and Harold. I shall go much more quickly alone."

Captain Ryland begged for leave to join the search so humbly that it was graciously accorded, and therewith set in an innocent afternoon romance; for in the languid heat along the valley that search proved a most desultory affair.

"There's no particular need to hurry if Mr. Hurst won't be at home for a couple of hours," suggested the young man; and Iva agreeing, with the recollection that her brothers, coming up-stream, must pass this point, they stayed their ramble by a little hill rivulet that rippled down to its stronger sister, margined with whispering reeds and blue forget-me-nots, and on a huge lichen-tinted stone, among springing ferns and sprays of wild white rose, sat and waited most contentedly.

More than contentedly. For Wallis Ryland, at pains to undo his first blunder, put out the strength of his ten years' seniority to please; and Iva, with all the frankness of seventeen, was so ready to be propitiated that they were quickly on the best of terms, she gliding, willing as a child, into the present hour's enjoyment, he entangled every moment more, in the fresh charms of his young listener.

With the swallows circling overhead under the clear sky, no sound near save the rustling of many leaves and the rippling of gleaming waters, the most sensible of mortals would have found it hard to be prosaic.

Our couple had no extraordinary claims on sense, and soon they wandered far out of prosaic bounds.

To be sure, their words were commonplace enough—he telling of a chance encounter that brought about this visit to his mother's old friend; she talking of her home, her father, her brothers, their many pets, of which it was easy to perceive she was the chief. There was something not commonplace to him, and new to her, in the lower tone in which the young soldier declared that chance encounter a stroke of rare good fortune to him, and when she turned a pair of loving eyes towards the gables of her home, just visible on the opposite bank, asked,

"Would she never care to leave that home—never?"

Then into a very wonderland followed Iva, while her companion told—and told well—of far-off countries where for eight years he had seen service, and had run the gauntlet of risks that had sent scores of men about him to their graves.

Desdemona like, she hung sighing upon stories such as she had never heard before, and saw in this fair-haired guest of her aunt's the nearest embodiment of a real hero she had ever known.

"But you were safe!" she cried, with a rising colour and a long, quivering breath at the climax of some danger whereout he had come scathless, thanks to his steed's swiftness. "And oh! I am so glad that——"

"That ——?" echoed the young man, leaning a little nearer.

"That our Harold is not to be a soldier!" finished Iva, so stopping warmer words that a different answer would assuredly have betrayed Captain Ryland into uttering.

Thus quickly the minutes went by. The shadows lengthened, the golden light gathered about the tree tops; and not one thought did these young people give to time till a church bell, sounding over the hillside, startled Iva.

"Six o'clock!" she exclaimed, opening wide her eyes, as if just waking, "and the boys not back! Perhaps they went the other way, after all, and have left the boat for me. Oh, if I have kept you here for nothing, I am so sorry!"

"But I am not—I never shall be!" was the reply, in a low tone, that stirred a curious answering thrill. "And must we hurry now? Here, stay!" as a long branch of roses caught her dress. "Let me just gather some of these before we go."

A bunch of roses, a half-hour's homeward stroll side by side in silence which was more eloquent than speech; three minutes' row across the narrow stream—they would have made it hours if they could—and the brief drama drew to its final act.

The boat was moored under the willow. As the occupants stepped out one forgot to let loose the hand that lay in his.

For a few seconds they lingered so, she gazing over the peaceful meadows to the dim Welsh hills, that all to-night seemed dressed in some new beauty, he looking down on her—beauty enough for him.

Suddenly "Iva!" shouted a boyish voice, and Harold came racing down the steep lane, with a flood of questionings and explainings anent fishing and wading that lasted the whole way up to the manor.

There the home party, earlier returned, awaited them, Aunt Helen in their midst, and someone strange, whom she brought forward with many smiles, and, "Now you'll forgive me for going off to Swanley Junction alone, Captain Ryland! I wanted to make sure of her coming before I told you a word about it."

The next minute a fair young woman, with the calm air of proprietorship begotten of long engagement, was holding the gentleman's arm; and how happy he might be looking Iva never saw, for with a little cry, she had run to her mother, glad—ah, strange to say, glad almost to tears—to shelter once again by her safe side.

* * * * * * *

But that was years ago. Iva is now a gracious young wife, loving and dearly loved, the garden of her life filled with such blossoms as womanhood prizes above all others.

But now and again across her thoughts, like first notes of a melody never completed, flits a memory of warm June hours, of the first throb of an unknown pleasure, of a nameless pain—of a glimpse into a possibility never fulfilled—of the farewell she bade her childhood in a midsummer day's dream.

Mabel Villiers.

"THE PAPER THAT A BOY CAN TAKE HOME."

The Second Number of . .
. . THE . .

BOYS' LEADER

Pearson's New Paper.

NOW ON SALE. ONE PENNY.

It contains Grand Serial Stories by . .
HENRY T. JOHNSON,
SIDNEY DREW,
CLAUDE HEATHCOTE.
Brilliant Articles and Thrilling Stories.

1,000 FREE GIFTS WEEKLY.

"Funny Pips" is a separate paper Given Away each week with "The Boys' Leader."

Digitized by Google

The Cruise of the Clan Macquarrie.

A Tale of Scottish Fidelity.

CHARLIE, my young brother, had been fagging at his studies; I had just passed my final, and was proportionately elate. We had earned our summer holiday, we thought; and nothing loath was I when Charlie, with a map in his hand, pointed out a spot on the Caithness coast and exclaimed:

"Here we are! There we'll go! What say you, Frank?"

"Very good choice. Plenty of ozone, fishing and boating; fashion at a discount. Where is the time-table?"

A primitive fishing-village—call it Clanhead—was quickly fixed upon; and after the usual delights of railway travelling we found ourselves in a place richly endowed by nature, but without an inn.

A Highland cottage, however, proved a comfortable enough shelter; and after a night's rest and a hearty fish breakfast we strolled off towards the sea.

In the one straggling street of Clanhead were yellow-haired children, who stood in wide-eyed, innocent wonder, and stared at us. Perhaps they were overcome by the sight of our hideous brown sand-shoes; or it might have been that they were bewitched by Charlie's handsome face.

Charlie is the Adonis of our family; and I—well, I am an ugly young man, with a marvellously wide mouth, eyesight so near that I cannot pick up a sixpence without the help of my glasses, and an expression, to say the least of it, scared.

Such as we were, we stood the lads' and lasses' scrutiny unabashed, plodding on till we perceived a middle-aged man leaning on a gate in, I imagined, an attitude of repose.

He turned, however, and moved towards us.

"Will ye no' be takin' a sail the mornin', gentlemen?"

"Just what we want!" cried Charlie.

"Aweel, tak' ye the first turn to the reet an' it'll bring ye to the head o' the cliff. Some way bock ye'll see the openin' to a ravine. Gang awa' through the gap an' ye'll soon be where the sea washes the cliff-foot. Be ye canny, for the tide's high the noo, an' the shallowest water there may droun' ye. In five minutes I'll be comin' roond wi' my boat an' my mate at your service."

The boatman touched his cap and moved off; we made for the ravine, passed down it, and came suddenly upon the most magnificent expanse of rolling water that our eyes had ever feasted upon.

Shortly from, I suppose, some sheltering nook under the cliff, came along our little craft, the Clan Macquarrie, with her mainsail spread and her master at the helm, while Donald, his mate, kept watch at the bow.

With a "Yo ho! Steady! Yo ho!" she was "brought to" and in we scrambled, neck or nothing.

We were scarcely seated before, emerging from the ravine, toiling on with the help of a crutch over loose earth and boulders, came a girl, with a sweet but very sad face; evidently she was suffering in mind and body.

"Ech, Hinny, Hinny!" said our boatman, with a softened intonation, "ye should na act sae, my dear. When gentlemen hire the Clan Macquarrie they dinna expect to tak' her master's family aboord. Gang awa' hame again, Mamie."

"Oh, by all means take your girl aboard, Mr. ——"

"Ben is my name, sir, and I thank ye for your kindness. Come, then, bairn; and, look ye, dinna trust to your crutch when ye step aboord. Should the boat luff, it may slip frae under ye. Let me lay it doon at the stern, and gie me your hond. Now, steady, and in ye are!"

Ben guided the boat off, then turned to the girl again.

"Eh, my bairnie, not sae mickle as a speck o' headgear, and they bits o' fallal clothing flying aboot ye! Ye'll catch your death! Ye maun hae my jacket on. Mebbe, sir, ye'll be sae kind as to haud the tiller whiles I dress her oop? There, now, Mamie, are ye no' warmly buskit?"

Off we were before the wind, our swelling mainsail hiding the man at the bow.

The grand sea and sky threw Charlie and myself into ecstasies. Ben, used to such scenes, was quiet and, I thought, sad, while the lassie looked decidedly sleepy.

"Eh, my doo," said Ben, "ye were oop wi' the birds; I marked ye windin' your way to the cliffs by the first glint o' the sun. Ye's liken to a wraith, my dearie. Ye's aye wandering. Aweel, lay doon your head a while on my shoulder, and be ye takin' a wee bit sleep the noo."

With his disengaged arm Ben supported the frail little body, and soon his charge was dozing as restfully as any weary child.

As she slept I espied a wedding-ring on her finger; and even in repose her face told a tale of mental and bodily suffering. Some heavy calamity, I thought, must have fallen upon her.

Her childlike confidence in Ben, and his tenderness towards her, were pathetic; and, altogether, my sympathy was won.

Presently I ventured to ask if she were not an invalid; and Ben returned:

"Oo, yes, sir; and she is my only bairn. Pretty doo. She married ower early, and a week after Tam, her husband, sailed north wi' his crew for the fishin'. Three months hae passed sin' the wofu' day, but nae word can we get o' boat or men."

"Then you think the vessel——"

"Went doon, sir, is what ye mean. There is nae doot aboot it; for, miles awa' along coast, a piece of her sail was washed ashore. But my lamb knows na that; an' sae, instead o' puttin' on widow's weeds, she aye says we'se boun' to find him; an' she watches the sea, an' questions every fisherman she meets, till it's just pitifu' to hear her."

"She is nearly distraught," thought I. Then I gave Ben a warning note regarding the imperative need of trying to divert her mind from her trouble. Also I proffered a word of advice about her lameness, which, it appeared, arose from some recent injury done to the muscles; and which, I gathered, had been treated in anything but a scientific manner.

Ben was delighted to find that I was a doctor, and most grateful for my interest in him. Indeed, he was so earnest in pouring out his thanks when I volunteered to take Mamie's case in hand while I was at Clanhead, that the man at the bow (as he afterwards owned) became an absorbed and sympathetic listener; for Mamie and he had been playmates, and he felt rather down-hearted, Ben told me, when Tam carried her off.

Deep in our subject, and entirely free from apprehension, we scudded pleasantly along. One moment our thoughts were of healing; the next—crash! crash!! crash!!! over our heads, under our feet, everywhere!

A swift glance at the mainsail, wrench at the tiller, and a tremendous shout from Ben:

Digitized by Google

"Bow, there, bow! are ye sleepin', mon?"

The warning was too late. A large vessel was down upon us; our mainsail was pierced by her bowsprit; our timbers were shivering under her bows. I heard shouting on the deck above us; I saw a man leap from the vessel's side; I saw Mamie wake up in an agony of terror, and throw her arms round her father's neck; I heard Ben say, "Nae, dina cumber me, but strike ye oot an' trust."

I knew we were all in the water, for I saw Ben supporting his child as he swam vigorously towards the man who had leapt over. I saw Charlie going down (neither he nor I was a swimmer), I clutched at him fruitlessly; then came the confused cries of "Keep your heads up!" "Here's a life-belt!" "Catch this rope!" and so on.

But soon the voices sounded far away and undistinguishable, I knew that salt water was in my nostrils and mouth; there was singing in my ears, roaring in my head; I felt a mad impulse to rise; I did rise; again, for a moment only, I heard eager voices near me, and caught a glimpse of the efforts that were being made to save us; in an agony I made an effort to keep up; it was futile; then, hiss! hiss! swish! through my very brain; after that, darkness, dense darkness! a clear consciousness that the hand of Death was on me; a cry from my inmost soul to Heaven, and—a strange deep calm.

* * * * *

The sun was going down in a flood of crimson glory. I lay upon a well-swabbed deck all alone. Where had I been? Where was I going? What had happened? I pinched myself and felt the pain; so I was still in the flesh. I tried my voice—"Hi! halloa! somebody!"

No one came. I sat up and took a speculative survey. The vessel was taut and trim, and she smelt of timber, but she was not of British build.

As I cogitated—rather weakly, I must own—a footstep sounded on the deck, and along came a good-natured looking seaman, fair and blue-eyed; he made his way to me and gazed smilingly down.

"What ship is this?" queried I.

A shake of the head.

"Are you a German?"

Two shakes of the head.

"Speak, man, in some tongue or other, will you?"

The word "speak" he understood, and obeyed with energy. But no word of any language could I pick out from his strange jabber.

Feeling, no doubt, that my understanding wanted arousing, he went away and shortly returned with six other men; some strong, fair and blue-eyed like himself, the rest shorter, darker, but powerfully built, and all chattering the most unintelligible jargon.

As they bent their energies to make me acquainted with something or other, I tried hard to discover their nationalities, for certainly they were not all of one nation, when—happy thought!—came flitting through my brain the words:

> "And then the blue-eyed Norseman told
> A saga of the days of old."

"You are from Norway!" bawled I. "And you," the darker men, "you are Swedes. Am I right?"

"Ha! Norroway! Norge! Norge! Ha! Ha! Norrike! Ha! Ha!"

The words were taken up like a refrain with boisterous satisfaction. Had I only raised my eyes to the vessel's flag, I might have seen at first that she was called the Jarl Hakon. But just then my wits were scattered. They began, however, to disentangle themselves, and thoughts of Charlie, Ben, and the rest, crowded upon me. Where were they? Where was the lame girl? and where the Clan Macquarrie?

It was useless to question, so I rose up and with rather unsteady gait walked across the deck and found my way to the captain's cabin.

On one side lay Ben, with pain in every line of his face; in the captain's berth, looking absolutely dead, was Mamie; stretched out on a rug lay my brother. He, however, managed to moan out "Hooray!" when he saw me.

I went to the girl's side and felt her pulse. Then, "Where's the captain?" said I to Ben's careless mate, Donald, who was standing by, the picture of helpless distress.

"Here," came a ready answer from a mellow voice behind me.

I turned. There stood a portly, grey-headed man, with a trustworthy face. He spoke English; this was worth something just then.

"Have you a wife—a lady on board, sir, who will carry out my instructions respecting this patient?"

"Are you, then, a physician?"

"I am a member of the College of Surgeons, and am anxious to do my best in this emergency."

"I am heartily glad, sir. A lady—no; there is not one on board. But there is a man who would lay down his life for this child. He is burly, but docile; let him be her nurse."

"Oh, her father? But he is in a sorry plight himself. I fear I shall find some broken bones when I have time to look at him."

"No, not her father—her husband."

I glanced at Ben.

"I knaw," said he; "there's a reet bright siller linin' to oor cloud, thank Heaven."

"Bring him in," quoth I.

He came; a young fellow having a splendid physique and six feet two of height, the very man who had leapt from the side of the Jarl Hakon to our rescue.

I stretched out my arm in front of the berth as a warning or barrier. But Tam had tact and caution. He stood mutely looking down on his ghostly young wife; then, in response to a touch on his arm, he bent his head to take my orders.

While Mamie remained unconscious he was to keep his post quietly, using the prescribed remedies; the moment she showed signs of consciousness he was to vanish.

I turned to Ben, who I found had a broken arm.

"Splints!" said I to Charlie, who was on his feet by this time. "Go to the captain for thin wood, and tools to shape it, also linen for bandages—a sheet will do. Now, Ben, you are a Briton, I know; will you trust me to set that bone?"

"Trust ye? Ay, sir; I ne'er wince at sich like! I'd be poorly off if it were na set."

That business was got through; and Ben had scarcely uttered a moan from first to last, but cold perspiration stood on his forehead, and I was just dispatching Donald for a strong cup of tea to revive him when—a sudden knock on my arm.

I turned sharply. "Beg pardon, sir," whispered Tam, as his great bulk rolled and stumbled into a dark corner beyond me.

But Mamie's eyes were wide open; the whiteness had gone from her face; her breath came thick and fast; she even tried to to raise herself on her elbow.

"Father! father! Ye'se foun' my Tam!"

Quaking with fear lest the remedy should be worse than the disease, I motioned Tam out from his hiding-place.

I saw the girl's face flush violently; I saw her throw up her arms to clasp her husband's neck; I saw the young giant turn white and weak with emotion; then away darted I, never halting till I reached the stern. Tyro as I was, I would rather have set half a dozen more bones than have stood out that meeting.

The captain was there, and very soon we got into conversation. Here is the substance of what he told me.

The Jarl Hakon was doing a pine trade between Bergen and Aberdeen. On her last homeward voyage she had picked up Tam and another seaman who were beating hopelessly about in a small boat, half-dead with thirst and exhaustion.

Tam was now working his way back to Scotland.

* * * * *

Mamie walked without her crutch before I left Clanhead, and Ben's bone was doing well. My holiday had been a most successful one.

Stanley Hammond.

Digitized by Google

THE "BRIDGE" OF RUIN.

Being the

CONFESSIONS OF A GIRL GAMBLER.

Dramatis Personæ.

OLIVE BERESFORD, the writer of these confessions. She is a young lady who is lured into gambling by her friend, Annabel Vernon, whom she detects cheating. Miss Beresford arranges a secret code of signals with a Mr. Taskot, in order to beat Annabel Vernon at her own game.

HARRY VERNON, of Vernon Towers, who with his wife plans to catch Olive in a trap. He manages to secure photographs of the incriminating gestures passed between Mr. Taskot and the relater of these episodes.

ANNABEL VERNON, wife of the last-named. An old school friend of Miss Beresford. Her husband having obtained the proofs of Olive's alleged cheating, she holds the photos over her victim as a threat, declaring that, unless Miss Beresford does as she is ordered, she will be denounced as a card-sharper. She makes the unfortunate girl a tool to win money from her guests.

MR. TASKOT, who poses as a gentleman of means, but who is really a despicable bounder. He endeavours to force Miss Beresford to marry him.

MR. MAURICE RAY, a gentleman who rescues the narrator from a mad dog, and who since takes a kindly interest in the welfare of the young girl, treating her with great respect, and showing her much consideration.

MR. DEAN FISHER, a "Bridge" expert, and one of the guests of the Vernons at Vernon Towers when Olive Beresford was fleeced.

MRS. GRAINGER, a rich widow and an ardent gambler, another of the guests at the Towers.

MR. HAROLD BAINBRIG, a wealthy bachelor, who with his sister,

MISS EDITH BAINBRIG, loses heavily at "Bridge" whilst playing with the Vernons and the unwilling Olive Beresford.

EPISODE SIXTEEN.

Phantom Stakes.

I BELIEVE there had been some idea of including the Vernons in the little house-party to be entertained by Mrs. Grainger, who appeared to spend nearly all her time in visiting or being visited.

If her friends lived some distance off, she made her stay a prolonged one, and even if they only lived a few miles from her residence, she preferred to stay the night, if possible, so that she might not have to forego one tittle of whatever enjoyment was to the fore.

She had been some days at Vernon Towers before my arrival, but, in consequence of what had happened, she did not consider herself bound to return the hospitality she had received, and neither Harry nor Annabel Vernon was ever likely to overcome the disgust which their behaviour to me had inspired in her.

Neither would she countenance Mr. Dean Fisher any more, and it was thus doubly vexing for me to have an otherwise promisingly pleasant little evening spoiled by the advent of Mr. Taskot, whose presence was a continual reminder of misfortune.

He evidently regarded the matter from quite another point of view, for his face positively beamed at sight of me, though I would fain have avoided the warm handshake with which he emphasised his satisfaction.

"H'm! This is going to be quite jolly, don't you know," he said, casting at me a languishing glance, which sent the hot colour rushing over my cheeks. "I never dreamt that I should have the pleasure of meeting you here."

"You knew that I was coming home to-day," interposed Mrs. Grainger, who did not look over pleased at Mr. Taskot's pointed attention to me. "That in itself ought to have made you feel sure of plenty of amusement."

"My dear lady," was the quick protest, given with a most graceful bow to our hostess, "there can be no two opinions about that. But I had an impression that our mutual friends, the Vernons, were rather antagonistically inclined towards Miss Beresford, and I was glad to see that she had been rescued and brought into safer quarters."

"Indeed! What made you think things would not do well with her at the Towers?"

"Well, Vernon, and afterwards Fisher, had the cheek to say Miss Beresford knew a fine sight more about cards than she pretended to know, and that her verdancy at bridge was all a sham. Of course I fired up at once. In fact, we had words about it, and I declined to stay longer in a house where the host and hostess broke all the rules of hospitality by maligning their guests."

If Mr. Taskot imagined that I would accept the situation as he put it, and acknowledge that his hasty departure from Vernon Towers was due to his chivalrous defence of me, he was mistaken. I knew exactly why he went, but of course I dared not challenge the truth of his statement.

Mr. Ray knew everything that had transpired. But Mr. Taskot was the only other person, except the Vernons and Mr. Fisher, who knew about the compromising snapshots, and I dared not risk enlightening anybody else.

So Mr. Taskot's impertinence was allowed to pass muster for the time being, and Mrs. Grainger, thoroughly good-humoured again, entered into a quick narration of the events which preceded the general exodus from Vernon Towers.

"Monstrous!" exclaimed Mr. Taskot, having listened most intently. "As if it were likely that Miss Beresford would condescend to enter Harry Vernon's den in the middle of the night!"

"Why will you talk about all this unpleasantness?" was my impatient question. "It has been dreadful enough without dwelling upon it now."

Mrs. Grainger did not look very pleased at this check to her volubility, especially as it emanated from the very person whose cause she was championing. But Mr. Bainbrig quietly indorsed my protest, and suggested that as soon as Mr. Taskot was ready, we would begin our game.

The latter immediately sat down, opposite to me, with the evident intention of constituting himself my partner. But this was an arrangement I wanted to avoid, and I suggested that we should cut for partners, which was accordingly done. Unfortunately, the cuts were against my inclination, and I had no choice but to play with Mr. Taskot.

Digitized by Google

I was nervous and ill-at-ease, so probably played very badly. Anyhow, we lost two rubbers, and, becoming frightened of the consequences, I protested that I would play no more.

"I have lost more already than I shall ever be able to pay," I said, "so please do not ask me to continue playing now."

"Look here, Miss Beresford," smiled Mr. Bainbrig. "I'm really enjoying myself immensely. But not because I am winning money, for I do not intend to take any of my winnings. There is plenty of fun in the game, without juggling one's income away over it."

Greatly to my relief, both Mr. Grainger and Mr. Taskot agreed to play for phantom stakes, and there was now no more earnest player than myself. We continued one rubber after another until we were all fain to own ourselves tired, and I was actually going to bed before it struck me that we had devoted ourselves with such abandon to the game that we had given ourselves time to talk of nothing else.

My luck had fluctuated considerably, and after we had decided upon phantom stakes only, I was a rapid winner, until, when we came to add up the results, it transpired that I was over three hundred pounds to the good.

"Over three hundred pounds!" I murmured to myself. "Why, it is a small fortune! How foolish I was to protest so soon. I should not have needed to hesitate at taking the money, for both the losers have heaps of it."

To tell the truth, I was by this time so smitten with the gambling mania, that I was prepared to risk anything, and I resolved that if the others were tired of phantom stakes, I would not insist upon them myself.

EPISODE SEVENTEEN.
A Dangerous Champion.

MRS. GRAINGER'S establishment was kept on a liberal scale of expenditure, and the garden was a dream of loveliness. When I rose on the first morning after my arrival, both blackbirds and thrushes were holding high revel, and I eagerly made my way to a rustic arbour wherein I could enjoy sweet scents and sounds without incurring undue fatigue.

Late hours seemed to be inseparable from the enjoyment of the game by which I was now thoroughly fascinated. But late hours were rather new to me, and, coupled with the anxiety of mind I had suffered, they were making great inroads upon the freshness of my looks. They were also making inroads upon the freshness of my nature, for even out here the glamour of gambling had me in its grip, and it seemed quite a natural, although unwelcome sequel to my thoughts when Mr. Taskot's voice broke upon them.

"I thought I should find you here," he said, sitting down on the rustic seat beside me with much more familiarity in his manner than I approved of. "It's queer what a knack you and I have of running against each other in the open. It's a kind of telepathy, you know."

"There's no telepathy on my part, I assure you," was my sharp rejoinder. "And you are hardly justified in disturbing me whenever I try to be alone."

"Do you mind if I have a smoke?"

The question was asked with as much confidence as if Mr. Taskot had joined me at my express desire, and I was nettled into being very stiff indeed with the man who was so impervious to snubs as he was.

"If you smoke here," I said, "I shall go to another part of the garden."

"Thank you, Miss Beresford, for having the courage to speak your mind. I will debar myself from smoking at present, because it is imperative for us two to have a long talk together."

"I do not see the necessity of that."

"You will presently, when that little secret of ours has been turned over, and limited to its proper diet."

"Its proper diet is silence."

"Yes, after I know what sort of a hotch-potch was made of yesterday's ingredients. You observed my sudden departure, after an interview with Mr. Dean Fisher?"

"Yes."

"Well, thereby hangs a tale. I was told that an ingenious little system of espionage had been adopted, and I was mulcted of several hundred pounds under a threat of having certain compromising snap-shots exhibited as proofs of cheating by me—and by you."

"You paid several hundred pounds?"

"Yes, and received in exchange a complete set of films, depicting every trick you and I resorted to while playing our little game of diamond cut diamond. Would you like to see them?"

I nearly fainted at this unexpected revelation, for I never imagined such a calamity as that which was here indicated.

When I burnt the photographs which I abstracted from Harry Vernon's den, I thought I had finished that painful episode of my life for ever. Yet here it had cropped up again, and, looking at Mr. Taskot's face, with its affectedly poised monocle, and its curious mixture of cunning and vapidity, I felt sure that he meant to be as merciless towards me in his way as the Vernons had been in theirs.

"Would you like to see them?" he repeated.

"What good can it do me to see them?" I moaned. "I have suffered enough already from the sight of them!"

"Oh! Then there is a duplicate set! That beast of a Vernon deceived me and got my money on the pretence of yielding all the proofs up to me! By Jove but I'll be even with him for this. But I say what has become of the other set or sets? Do you know?"

It was on the point of my tongue to say that I had burnt them. But it suddenly struck me that if Mr. Taskot was going to hold his set over me, threateningly, I might just as well appear to be in an equally strong position.

"You heard the story of the trumped-up charge of theft which was brought against me, and afterwards retracted?" I asked.

"Yes. Had that anything to do with the photographs?"

"Everything. I really did go to Harry Vernon's den, in the middle of the night. I knew where the things were kept, and I abstracted them——"

"So, Miss Beresford, you are, on your own admission, a thief after all!"

Shall I ever forget the distress inspired by these dreadful words, which were hissed at me by Mrs. Grainger. Unnoticed by either of us, she had crept silently up to the arbour, probably with no worse idea in her mind than to surprise what she suspected to be a lover's tête-à-tête. Seeing us in close converse, she had stopped to listen a moment before showing herself, and an evil Fate would have it that the one sentence she heard was that in which I apparently showed the justice of the accusations brought against me by the Vernons!

"No! No!" I gasped. "You are making a horrible mistake! I——"

"I made a horrible mistake yesterday in believing your protestations of innocence, and in ignoring the warnings of my friends. I shall go back to the Towers and apologise to both Mr. and Mrs. Vernon—as soon as you have relieved my house of your wicked presence."

"Look here, Mrs. Grainger," protested Mr. Taskot, "you are jumping at preposterous conclusions It was quite an innocent little matter that we were talking about."

Digitized by Google

"Exactly! It must be a very innocent matter that makes a young lady visit somebody else's room, in the middle of the night, and abstract things that do not belong to her!"

"But she had more right to them than the Vernons. It was they who had stolen a march on Miss Beresford first—and on me. And she was only——"

"Pardon me," was the angry interruption, "if I refuse to listen to such nonsense. I suppose Miss Beresford has fascinated you to a remarkably foolish extent, or you would never countenance her barefaced iniquities."

"Countenance them? I identify myself with them."

"Then your case is indeed hopeless, and I advise you to devote yourself in future to championing the cause of a person whose behaviour will have to alter if she is to continue escaping with no further punishment than expulsion from the houses she disgraces with her presence."

There was not much breeding about Mrs. Grainger, or she could not have expressed her opinions with such brutal frankness before the humiliated girl whom this terrible blow had almost stricken dumb and motionless. Mr. Taskot had his own reasons for wanting to keep me in his power, but I will certainly give him credit for resenting the treatment to which I was being subjected by my present hostess.

"Thank you for the suggestion, Mrs. Grainger," he said, looking almost dignified as he drew himself up to his full height. "I shall be only too happy to be of service to Miss Beresford at any time, and I repeat that, in spite of the manner in which you have misconstrued the remark she made to me, there is no reason why you should not give her your entire respect."

"And I decline to accept your standard of morality, Mr. Taskot."

"After that," was the grim retort, "there is no alternative for either of us but to clear out of this at once. Only, Mrs. Grainger, let me tell you one thing—you will very likely be made to pay for your folly, if you believe a word the Vernons say against anybody, and if——"

But Mrs. Grainger, with scant ceremony, cut short anything more Mr. Taskot intended to say, by turning her back upon us both, and marching into the house, leaving me choked with grief at the strange fate which pursued me so relentlessly.

For some little time I was absolutely incapable of judging what was best to be done, and my fatal inability to argue sufficiently in my own favour at the critical moment left me without hope of being able to remove Mrs. Grainger's ill opinion of me.

"I say," said Mr. Taskot, after he had given me what he believed to be leisure enough to recover my self-possession, "it's no good your trying to stop here any longer, you know."

"I should be very sorry to stop a minute longer than I can help now," I returned indignantly. "I am not sorry to leave anyone who could so readily believe ill of me."

"No, but the mischief of it is, Mrs. Grainger will tell everybody her version of the story, and you will have no means of disproving it, unless you don't mind my explaining all about those little snapshots."

Of course I could not think of such a thing, even if Mr. Taskot really meant what he said, which I doubt, and I was nearly distracted at the disgrace which had overtaken me. But I no longer felt helpless, and I soon explained my immediate intentions to the man who seemed to be so strangely mixed up with all my misfortunes.

I felt just the same here as I did the day before at Vernon Towers—I could not eat another bite under the roof of a person who believed me to be a criminal, and I hastened to pack my belongings, ready to depart as soon as Mr. Taskot could procure a vehicle to take me to the nearest station.

But I was warned by yesterday's events, and insisted upon Mrs. Grainger either examining my luggage or owning that she could not accuse me of my attempt to add any of her property to my own.

The position was dreadful, though necessary in my own future interests, and when at last I drove away, escorted by Mr. Taskot, who was also leaving the neighbourhood, it seemed as if my cup of humiliation could hold not another drop.

For the first mile of our drive we were both silent. Then Mr. Taskot startled me out of despairing apathy by remarking: "I'm awfully sorry things have turned out so awkwardly, Miss Beresford. But it seems as if Destiny intended you and me to run in harness together."

"In harness together? Whatever do you mean?" was my astonished rejoinder.

"Oh, it's not difficult to guess what I mean. I think you and I are cut out for one another. So don't you think we'd better marry?"

"No, no! I couldn't dream of such a thing!"

"Excuse me, Miss Beresford, but you will find it to your interest to marry me. With my co-operation, you can recover your hold on Society. Without it——"

"My hold on Society is too slight for me to want to recover it. I shall go back home, and live as I have previously done, among people who will never come into contact with those who have made my life a misery these last few days."

"On the contrary, you will become my wife! Otherwise there will be so many awkward disclosures that you will be irretrievably disgraced everywhere. I shall haunt the neighbourhood you live in, until you consent to marry me. And if you think of proving obdurate, nothing that has taken place at Vernon Towers or at Mrs. Grainger's house will remain secret. Perhaps you would not like your old friends and acquaintances to know the estimation in which you are held here. But marrying me is your only alternative."

"Oh, you coward! I gasped. "You dare to threaten a defenceless girl!"

"My threat, as you call it, involves nothing worse than marrying a man whom lots of other girls would jump at. And don't you forget that I have more evidence against you than either the Vernons or Mrs. Grainger."

Hitherto, I had been shocked and frightened. Now I was so angry that my fear left me, and I felt only contempt for the creature who could be cruel enough to try and terrorise me into subjection just when I most needed consideration.

"Mr. Taskot," I said scathingly. "If there were not another man on earth, and if, as you say, there were no alternative between marrying you and being disgraced for life, I would still refuse you. Now, sir, you may do your worst. You cannot humiliate me more than I have been humiliated already, and if people in England refuse to believe in my innocence of real fraud, I will change my name and go to live in another country. Now you have my answer."

Digitized by Google

"You shall rue this!" were the next words that were levelled at me. "I have been told something about the quixotic individual who made the Vernons and Fisher eat their words yesterday. Perhaps that individual is in love with you. And perhaps you return his passion. Hence your refusal of me. Very well, this Mr. Maurice Ray shall be disillusioned, and we'll see what he thinks of the snapshots which prove guilty collusion between you and me. I know him by reputation, and I know that he cannot afford to marry a woman whose character will bar him from mixing with the people upon whom his livelihood depends, so you may put him out of your calculations."

This last shot told. How could I hope to retain the respect of any honourable man, if such frightful odds were to be raised against me? No wonder my face paled! And no wonder Mr. Taskot, thinking he had scored a point, began to look triumphant again.

"Look here, darling!" he exclaimed, hardly troubling to lower his voice so that the driver of the open fly could not hear us. "I have sworn to win you, and no man would ever make you a more devoted husband than I would."

"I shall never marry you!" was my steady answer. "And nothing you can ever say will make me alter my mind."

An evil gleam shot into Mr. Taskot's face, and his monocle hung unheeded on its cord, leaving the full malevolence of both eyes staring into mine.

"I can say nothing to improve my case," he hissed. "Then I will do something that shall."

And, before I could guess what the man intended to do, he had gathered me in his arms, and was showering kisses upon my face, which his superior strength kept upturned to his, in spite of my frantic struggles to free myself.

"There!" he muttered, when at last I had wrenched myself out of his grasp. "Tell me now if you think the other man will ever look at you again?"

I was already almost choked with anger. But despair was added to my distress when I noticed that the vehicle was at a standstill, and that Maurice Ray, his face full of contempt, had been an astounded spectator of the scene which must have stamped me as a person whose conduct was beneath respect.

(Another long instalment next week.)

TOMMY: "Papa, is the lieutenant a tailor?" Father: "No, my boy. Whatever made you think so?" Tommy: "I saw him yesterday measuring Fanny's waist."

MABEL: "Why do you always buy two kinds of note paper?" Maud: "Well, you see, when I write to Tom I used red paper—that means love; and when I write to Jack I use blue paper—which means faithful and true."

PRETTY CASHIER: "You might give me a holiday to recruit my health. My beauty is beginning to fade." Manager: "Why do you think so?" Pretty cashier: "The men are beginning to count their change."

ALGERNON: "But are you sure, Madeline, that there are not times when you regret our engagement?" Madeline: "Haven't I had proposals from many men—handsome, honourable, cultivated, delightful men—and yet" (tenderly) "didn't I choose you, dear?"

LILLLE WILLIE: "Are you going to marry my sister Maude, Mr. De Jones?" Mr. De Jones (Maude's admirer): "Why, Willie, that's a funny question to ask me. What do you want to know for?" Little Willie: "'Cause I heard her tell mamma she would give five shillings to know, and I want the money, do you see?"

"I HAVE it on good authority that you let young Smithkins kiss you last evening," said a young man to his fiancée, and he frowned darkly as he spoke. The maiden did not deny the accusation. She pouted as she replied: "You don't love me! So there!" "Not love you!" replied the young man, "why, I adore you, and you know it." "No, you don't! True love is unselfish, and you seem to be selfish enough to want all my kisses for yourself."

Your Editor Chats.

ALL loyal Britishers, and most especially the sons and daughters of the bonnie land north of the Tweed, look forward, I know, with great delight to the appearance of the Tartan Cover numbers of this paper. This week depicts the gay apparel of the Clan Macquarrie, and I honestly believe that a prettier design is practically unattainable. The mingling of the various shades of colour is exquisite, and the whole tone superb. For the benefit of those who would like to make—as many are doing—a complete set of our Tartan numbers, I will state here when the previous ten appeared. The Menzies, the first of the series, came out on August 2nd, the Macpherson on August 16th, the Macleod on September 13th, the Rob Roy on October 4th, the Macmillan on October 25th, the Macdonald of Sleat, on November 29th, all of last year; and the Erskine, the Clergy, the Bruce, and the Macfie on January 3rd, February 7th, April 25th, and July 4th of this year respectively. All can still be obtained.

I HAVE a very pleasant surprise in store for you. At present it's a secret, and though I know you love to be confided in, I am afraid you will have to wait till next week before I divulge everything. Then I will tell you more about a most entertaining series of stories relating the exciting experiences of a young girl, that will soon be commencing, written by the heroine herself. I can only say that, knowing your excellent taste as I do, you will enjoy this new feature immensely, and I think it will be one of the greatest successes we have had for a long time.

BUSINESS took me the other day into the East End of London, amongst the sordid surroundings of slum life. Presently I came across a youngster, looking delightfully brown and happy, and I could not help noticing what a contrast he made to his companions. Curiosity compelled me to speak to the lad and ask him why he looked so healthy. He answered, and his face lit up with a glad remembrance, "I went into the country all day yesterday, sir; down near Epping Forest, with the FRESH AIR FUND." Thousands and thousands of London's waifs and strays, who seldom in the great turmoil of the metropolis catch a glimpse of the sun, have been cheered for one day in their miserable existence by the help of those charitable people who subscribe to PEARSON'S FRESH AIR FUND. To them it is a red-letter day. Won't you help a fellow-creature? Ninepence is all that is required to procure a whole day's freedom for one hapless child. The fine weather is almost gone; you have had and enjoyed your holidays. Lest you forget, send at once a small donation to the Hon. Sec., F.A.F., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

AN important announcement regarding the "Buried Station" competition will be found on page 375.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

"Old Ratch."

The Story of a Man's Misfortune and a Woman's Love.

CAPTAIN GERALD BRAIDTHWAITH, late of His Majesty's Seventieth Lancers, sat alone in his lodgings. Careless and light-hearted, as averse to reflection as any mortal could well be, the time had come when he was obliged to look facts squarely in the face.

His handsome features wore an expression of unusual seriousness, for his prospects certainly furnished no subject for elation.

Assets—he ran over them lightly—a handsome person, expensive tastes, good connections, and that was all. Then the liabilities—innumerable debts, damaged credit, the memory of some few years of a gay, wild life, the ordinary harvest of a plentifully sown crop of wild oats.

He had quarrelled with his elder brother, Lord Radigar, on account of a love-affair with a pretty and portionless cousin; his modest patrimony had long since been dissipated.

Radigar had intended that Gerald should marry an heiress, and had even selected a portly, consequential damsel, the heiress of a Glasgow distiller, who had appeared not insensible to the younger brother's attractions.

Miss McCuaig was still to be had, but Doris Wynyatt effectually barred that prospect—poor little Doris, who turned so bright a face to the world, and whose cheery courage deprived the buffetings of fortune of half their sting.

Doris had been confided to the care of Lady Barbara Streathfield, a spinster of ancient lineage and limited income—a high-nosed, thin-lipped, keen-eyed old lady, whom her nephew Gerald cordially feared and hated. The Gorgon he always called her, regarding her not altogether unjustly as having acted as Radigar's chief adviser against Doris and himself.

Then Captain Braidthwaith heaved a deep sigh, which was almost a groan, as he realised the fact that the only choice which lay before him was between beggary and enlisting as a private soldier, and for Doris nothing remained but Lady Bab's tender mercies, until "the long, dull anguish of patience" had vanquished youth and beauty.

It was very hard. They were both so young, they loved each other so dearly, and life was so strong within them.

Just as he had reached this point in his meditations, a thundering knock resounded through the house, and glancing carelessly from the window, Gerald saw that a smart brougham had drawn up before the door. The whole equipage was perfect in its appointments, and bore an air of unostentatious luxury and fashion.

"And please, Captain Braidthwaith!" cried the lodging-house slavey, "a gentleman in 'is carriage wishes to speak with you."

"Then show him up," responded Gerald, listlessly.

"But 'e is a hinvalid gentleman, and 'e says with 'is compliments, would you be kind enough to step down to 'is carriage."

"Cool enough!" muttered the young man, as he stretched himself lazily, but anything was preferable to his own depressing reflections, and he sauntered leisurely down the stairs.

An obsequious footman threw open the carriage-door.

It was a warm Spring day, but the occupant of the brougham was so covered with costly furs that at first Captain Braidthwaith believed it to be empty. Then he perceived an elderly gentleman leaning languidly back on the cushions.

His overcoat was buttoned closely to his throat, a comforter was wrapped round the lower part of the face, his cap was pulled down very low, a green silk patch covered one eye—in fact there was nothing of the face visible.

"Captain Braidthwaith, I presume?" said a voice so deep and sonorous as to appear manifestly discordant with the infirmities of its owner.

Gerald bowed in silence.

With many courteous apologies for the liberty he had taken, the gentleman explained his errand.

He was a Mr. Vandeleur, he stated, a West Indian, who had come to England for medical advice. Though he had retired from active commercial life, his business interests were still extensive, and he required a secretary. Having heard of Captain Braidthwaith, he imagined that they might mutually accommodate each other.

Gerald hesitated. The offer appeared like a new vision of hope. For the sake of Doris, dared he reject any opportunity? On the other hand, he knew absolutely nothing of business, and he held a very modest opinion of his own abilities.

However, Mr. Vandeleur overruled all his scruples.

The remuneration offered was exceedingly liberal, while the duties appeared to be almost nominal.

He was to present himself each day at Mr. Vandeleur's residence in a fashionable part of the town. A few hours would suffice to write the few letters and execute the few commissions that would be required of him; the remainder of his time was at his own disposal.

Captain Braidthwaith entered upon his new duties with a light heart. Two weeks passed before he found an opportunity of discussing his prospects with his betrothed, but at last a day arrived when Miss Wynyatt contrived to meet him.

"And the Gorgon actually allowed you to escape for an hour?"

"The Gorgon is not so bad as she is painted," laughed Doris. "She has a soft spot in her heart. One day I may be able to teach you to like her."

The lovers, elated by the new vista which hope was opening before them, strolled through Regent's Park together.

They looked into each other's eyes, exchanged tender confidences, while the wine of life ran tingling through their veins, and youth, and hope, and love coloured all existence with roseate hues.

"It's strange Mr. Vandeleur is willing to pay liberally for duties so light," remarked Doris, who was very quick-witted and observant.

Digitized by Google

"Duties!" laughed Gerald hilariously. "My only duties consist in paying accounts and buying lottery tickets. For a stranger, Mr. Vandeleur has the most extraordinary number of bills to settle. He must be a veritable Crœsus, and always pays in new, crisp Bank of England notes. More money has passed through my hands in the last fortnight than I ever had in my life before. He is not quite so confiding as he would like to appear, though. I wondered that he trusted me so entirely until I perceived that as I went on my errands his daughter shadowed me from first to last. She always looks intent upon something else, but I am persuaded that her whole business consists in watching me."

"He has a daughter, then?"

"Yes; a pale ghost of a girl. She is deaf and dumb, but appears to be wonderfully intelligent."

"Have they any friends?"

"Yes, but of a lower class than you would expect to find a man of Vandeleur's culture and refinement associating with. It is one of his whims that I should act as host at his entertainments to relieve him of the trouble; and, though the company may not be very select, it must be admitted that the entertainments are on a scale of unusual magnificence."

"Does he appear greatly attached to his daughter?"

"He idolises her. Twice since I have been with him he has bought her diamond ornaments, and he is now negotiating with Messrs. Goldstein, Chaine and Co., for a necklace worthy of an empress. There she is."

A very handsome open carriage rolled in, in which was seated a lady, clothed from head to foot in black velvet.

She was excessively fair. Her faded blue eyes and colourless flaxen hair afforded no relief to the peculiar pallor of her complexion. Her expression was one of the most languid and listless indifference.

"What a white witch of a woman! She never even looked at you."

"No. I am only her father's humble secretary," laughed Gerald.

"There is something mysterious about it that I don't like. Be careful, Gerald," intreated Doris.

Gerald, however, was of a sanguine temperament.

"I feel as though this were the beginning of fortune," he replied.

The next morning, at Mr. Vandeleur's desire, Captain Braidthwaith completed the purchase of the diamond necklace The young man received Bank of England notes to pay the large price demanded by the jewellers.

"It's a good round sum to give, but the stones are cheap at the price. I never grudge money for a first-class article," remarked Mr. Vandeleur loftily.

Gerald sighed as he reflected how charming it must be to dwell where money was actually of no moment.

"Miss Vandeleur will accompany you. When she has satisfied herself by actual inspection of the diamonds, you can pay for them. She has an excellent taste."

Miss Vandeleur appeared very cool and composed. She examined the jewels critically, and in her emphatic sign language professed herself dissatisfied with one of the stones, in which she insisted that she had detected some slight flaw.

Two members of the firm who were present eagerly explained that her impression was quite erroneous.

Grasping the case containing the gems, she advanced toward the light, and then wrote rapidly on her slate—

"I believe I am satisfied after all, Captain Braidthwaith, if you will kindly settle."

The interview had taken place in a private room, behind the brilliantly-lighted shop. Gerald promptly counted down the notes.

"You will find that correct, I believe," he said.

Without taking up the money, Mr. Chaine regarded the young man steadily. A firm grasp was laid upon his shoulder.

"Not so fast, this is once too often, Old Ratch," said a quiet voice, and turning in utter astonishment, Gerald encountered the keen scrutiny of Warren, the most renowned of London detectives.

"What do you mean, sir?" questioned Braidthwaith fiercely. "I do not understand your action."

"Captain Braidthwaith, I arrest you in the King's name!"

"I mean that the game is played out; you are caught at last. I arrest you in the King's name, Captain Braidthwaith."

"Good Heavens! This is all a mistake," insisted Goldstein, the senior partner. "Captain Braidthwaith is brother to Lord Radigar, of Redfern."

"I don't care if he's brother to the Archbishop of Canterbury," protested Warren, doggedly. "I can prove that Captain Braidthwaith and Old Ratch, the cleverest counterfeiter in England, are identical. The Bank of England has offered five hundred pounds for his capture, and I mean to have it. Many a turn and shuffle and rebuff has he given me; eighteen months have I been on his track, but he always slipped through my fingers just as I grasped him. Very clever he has been—that I'll allow."

"If this is any practical joke, you will answer for it!" cried Gerald.

"If you can find a joke in Old Bailey and a trial for felony and forged Bank of England notes, you are about the first that ever did," smiled the detective.

"I appeal to Miss Vandeleur!" exclaimed Mr. Goldstein excitedly.

"And of course you have secured the diamonds?" demanded Mr. Chaine abruptly.

But Miss Vandeleur and the diamonds had both disappeared.

* * * * *

The trial of Captain Braidthwaith was one of the sensations of the day. It furnished an exciting topic of conversation for the clubs. Society revelled in all the details of the affair, and Doris Wynyatt wept until she was blinded and heart sick.

"Gerald, the best and noblest of men," sobbed Doris.

"Gerald was a fool, but he never could be a rogue," insisted Lady Barbara, holding her Roman nose very high in the air.

"It's some terrible mistake, but we have no clue to the mystery," admitted Lord Radigar dejectedly.

Digitized by Google

Doris sobbed violently. Lady Barbara surreptitiously wiped the moisture from her keen eyes, and then in atonement for her momentary softness turned fiercely upon her favourite nephew.

"What is the use of being a man if you sit down and do nothing, Radigar? It is your bounden duty as head of the family to clear your brother. Gerald appearing at Old Bailey as a common felon, known as Old Ratch! I wonder you permit it, Radigar?"

Gerald had often accused his brother of miserliness, but to save the family reputation he was willing to spend money like water. Lady Barbara made her nephew's cause so entirely her own that she quarrelled with half her acquaintances, and so systematically persecuted the remainder that it was only by avoidance they could escape the infliction.

The most able counsel in London were engaged for the defence, but from the first the case was admitted to be a hopeless one. Warren was not the man to be easily deceived, and the evidence against the prisoner was most clear.

He admitted having passed the counterfeit notes, he had certainly acted as host at the gorgeous mansion in Curzon Street; latterly he had spent money liberally, though when he had left the Army he was known to have been in difficulties.

He had evidently traded upon his social advantages in order to continue a career of crime. Then he was a criminal of such marked ability that the recital of his clever stratagems actually extorted an unwilling admiration.

As one witness after another was heard, Gerald's brain reeled. He almost doubted his own identity. Could he, Gerald Braidthwaith, really be the clever rogue described.

With a dreary, puzzled look in his handsome eyes he looked around upon the surging sea of curious faces, but when he caught sight of one eager, girlish countenance, which had grown thin and haggard in the agony of intolerable suspense, everything swam before him in the mist that dimmed his eyes.

Later, there came a more terrible moment still, when Gerald Braidthwaith stood, very calm and grave, to receive his sentence, which was the heaviest the law could inflict.

When it was pronounced a woman's voice rang out in a faint, agonised cry, and a young girl, with a face like death, was hastily carried out by her friends.

"That poor child's death will lie at your door, Radigar, and your brother's as well, yet there you sit like a statue. Don't allow yourself to be a Cain, Radigar," insisted Lady Bab vehemently.

Just at that moment Doris entered the room. She held a newspaper, and there was a new expression of hope and courage in her white face.

"I have formed a plan by which Gerald may yet be saved. It may be a desperate one, but the case is desperate. I must be allowed to act according to my own judgment."

"If you can clear Gerald, I will settle ten thousand pounds on you!" cried Radigar.

"Listen to this advertisement:

"'WANTED.—Wanted a young lady of good social position as companion to a deaf and dumb lady. Duties light and remuneration liberal. Unexceptional references required. Address in person, No. 36 Berkeley Square.'

"I firmly believe those are the people who have ruined Gerald. At least let me try."

That same day a young lady presented herself at an aristocratic mansion in Berkeley Square. She was ushered into a tastefully decorated drawing-room, where a lady and a gentleman, apparently an invalid, were sitting together.

The lady was tall, with dark hair arranged in crisp, picturesque curls and a vivid dash of colour on each cheek, but as she encountered the keen scrutiny of the pale blue eyes, Doris Wynyatt's heart throbbed so violently that it seemed to stifle her.

The gentleman wore a deep green shade over his eyes. He apologised for not rising. He had only lately arrived from South America, and as his health was in a most precarious condition, the dampness of the English climate affected him most unfavourably.

His daughter and only child, being much isolated by her affliction, required a companion, in whom, he gracefully added, they hoped she might also find a friend.

Doris explained that Lady Barbara was willing to give her satisfactory references. She was at once engaged, and requested to come that very day; so before night Doris found herself domiciled beneath Mr. Treherne's roof.

A week passed, and no clue reached Miss Wynyatt. The most decorous dullness reigned in Berkeley Square. The chief duty required of Doris was to read aloud long sermons, upon which Mr. Treherne delivered the most edifying comments.

The girl was devoured by a fever of impatience. If these people should suspect her design her life would not be worth anything. If she failed, what would be Gerald's fate.

She dared not allow herself to think of anything except the present, but, composed and vigilant, watched with the closest attention.

Mr. Treherne questioned her adroitly, and in return confided to her many particulars concerning his friends and business connections, his religious opinions, and his daughter's virtues and misfortunes.

Then Mr. Treherne insisted that his daughter should engage in an extensive shopping expedition. He privately informed Doris that he wished to arouse in his poor Ada some of the tastes natural to her age, sex and station.

She would require a complete outfit. Her affliction rendered Ada ignorant of the value of money. Would Miss Wynyatt kindly carry the purse, in which he placed a large sum in new, crisp Bank of England notes.

It was the custom in their country to pay for everything at once. Would Miss Wynyatt be particular that everything selected was of the very best?

However, Miss Treherne in her choice displayed a luxurious taste rather strange in so unsophisticated a being. She selected silks, velvets, brocades and satins of the richest.

"Send the things out to the carriage and I will wait there while you settle the account," Miss Treherne wrote upon her slate.

Doris promptly requested an interview with the proprietor of the establishment, to whom she was well known.

"Can you tell me if these notes are genuine?" she inquired.

Mr. Payne examined them carefully.

"If not, they are very clever imitations, but I can ascertain for you beyond a doubt."

Part of the goods were sent out to Miss Treherne's carriage, with an apology for detaining her a few moments until the remainder were packed.

When a little later a policeman entered the carriage and arrested her, that lady speedily recovered her lost senses, and gave voluble explanations which were of no avail.

Soon after, the veritable Old Ratch, alias Vandeleur, alias Treherne, alias half a dozen other cognomens, was safely lodged in Newgate.

* * * * *

"I'll give you the ten thousand pounds as I promised. You and Gerald shall be married the day after he is set free, and I am proud to call so brave and noble a woman my sister," cried Lord Radigar impulsively.

"That is just what I always told you. If you had followed my counsel, Radigar, we might have all been spared this misery," insisted Lady Barbara.

A. G. Horton.

Splendid Holiday Reading.

PEARSON'S SIXPENNY SERIES of Famous Novels.

NEW VOLUME. JUST READY.

THE LITTLE RED CAPTAIN.

An Early Adventure of CAPTAIN KETTLE.

By C. J. Cutcliffe Hyne.

At all Railway Bookstalls, Booksellers, or post free for 8d. from C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Not Declined With Thanks.

JACK: "I am afraid that if I ask you to be my wife you will treat my proposal as a joke." Molly: "But all jokes are not rejected, Jack."

In a Railway Carriage.

CHAPERON (meaningly, leaning towards young lady sitting next a young man): "Hadn't you better come this side, love? We are coming to a tunnel." Her charge (whispering): "Oh, no, aunt; one more tunnel, and I am engaged."

Not to His Liking.

"UNLESS you give me aid," said a beggar to a benevolent lady, "I am afraid I shall have to resort to something which I greatly dislike to do." The lady handed him a shilling, and compassionately asked: "What is it, poor man, that I have saved you from?" "Work," was the mournful answer.

She Let the Cat Out.

YOUNG LADY: "I should like to embroider a nice pair of slippers as a birthday present for my aunt." Shopman: "We happen to be quite out of new patterns just now. Wouldn't something else do as well?" Young lady: "Perhaps a cigar-case."

Wouldn't Stay So Long.

SHE: "Papa says that when coming to see me you must not come in a 'bus any more." He: "Really! Does he expect me to walk all this distance?" She: "Of course not. He says all he asks is that you will come in a carriage, hired by the hour."

She Knew the Feeling.

HARRY: "She has jilted me, and I know I shall die. The disappointment will kill me!" Aunt Hannah: "I know how disappointments affect one, Harry. But you will get over it. I felt just as you do now when I set that yellow hen on thirteen eggs and only just got one poor chick out of the lot."

Civilised Barbarity.

MRS. DE FASHION: "What perfectly horrible creatures the Chinese are! I am told that in China the men actually buy their wives." Mrs. De Style: "Yes, isn't it horrible? By the way, when is your daughter to marry Mr. Bullion?" Mrs. De Fashion: "As soon as he recovers from his last attack of gout."

Circumstances Alter Cases.

HE: "Miss Smyth—Clara, I love you. Will you be my wife?" She: "Really, Mr. Brown, this is so sudden. I must have time to——" He (interrupting): "As you please. This solitaire diamond ring will keep until——" She (interrupting him): "As I was saying when you interrupted me, I must have time to at least try on the ring before giving you the answer you wish."

Very Kind Man.

"You say the popular Miss Smith can play the piano. I never heard her." "That's just the point. She can, but she doesn't."

Then He Dodged a Plate.

MRS. SKIMPEN: "I think Mr. Jones must have liked the beefsteak pie. He had two helpings of it." The Tactless Boarder: "Possibly he did it for a wager."

Not Digestible.

"THEM chops were good, mum," said the tramp. "but I allus likes to finish a meal with sweets. Yer ain't got any cakes, have yer?" "I have cakes of soap." "Thank yer, mum. But I never touch 'em."

Tit for Tat.

"EXCUSE my coming to dinner in a business suit, old fellow. My way, you know." "That's all right. You won't mind my giving you a small table all by yourself in the pantry, will you? It's a fancy of mine to do it, old chap."

It Takes a Long Time.

MR. BINGO: "We may as well talk over this question of getting the house painted." Mrs. Bingo: "But, my dear, it doesn't need to be painted for at least a year yet." Mr. Bingo: "True. But you have got to decide what colour you want."

There's a Future Before Him.

"MAY I wake the baby, mamma?" asked five-year-old Johnny. "Why, what do you want to wake her for?" asked the mother. "I want to see if she can cry loud enough to drown the noise of my new drum," replied the small investigator.

But the Doctor Didn't Strike.

MR. MUCHBLEST: "Yes, doctor, I have a frightful cold. But what did you say was your special method of treatment?" Physician: "We strike at the cause or origin of the trouble." Mr. Muchblest: "That's odd. However, you'll find the baby in the other room."

That Was the Reason.

"I THOUGHT you believed in training girls for household rather than business affairs?" "So I do." "And yet your daughter is learning typewriting." "Yes, but that's an exceptional case. The poor girl hasn't enough aggressive independence to be a cook."

Then Silence Reigned Supreme.

SHE: "You know, Reggie, that girls are being called by the names of flowers now, and my sister suggested that I should be called Thistle." Reggie: "Oh, yes, I see. Because you are so sharp." She: "Oh, no. She said it was because a donkey loved me."

He Had—Once.

"TELL me honestly," said the novel reader to the novel writer, "did you ever see a woman who stood and tapped the floor impatiently with her toe for several moments, as you describe?" "Yes," was the thoughtful reply, "I did once." "Who was she?" "She was a clog-dancer."

Occupation for the Unemployed.

"CAN'T you give me employment, ma'am?" said the tramp. "I haven't had anything to do for a month." "Poor fellow. What can you do?" "Well, ma'am, I'm a good watcher. If I could sit out here on yer front porch, an' watch the front gate so's no one could steal it, you'd find I was very content."

Unbecoming When Angry.

"SIR," she said, stamping her foot, "I must beg you to cease all talk of love. I am becoming angry!" "Pardon me," he corrected, with great suavity. "Getting angry. You are not becoming angry." After that, somehow, she kept her temper.

Digitized by Google

LOVING AN IDEAL;

or, The Ministering Angel of Paradise Row.

"AND how has Paradise Row been getting on while I have been away, Mr. Constable?" asked the grave-faced "district visiting woman," as Miss Kate Green was generally named.

"You look all the better for your holiday, miss!" said the good-natured policeman sympathetically. He tried to evade the question deliberately addressed to him. "You had fine weather, and it's wonderful how a change of air 'livens you up, don't it? Sha'n't be sorry when my turn comes!"

"I expect not!" cried Miss Green, with a look of commiseration. "Your duty is rather trying. But you haven't told me about the people in Paradise Row!"

The constable saw that she meant to have a report, so he spoke plainly.

"What gets over me, miss, is why they give such lovely names to such dreadful streets!" he cried, in disgust. "It isn't only down here where you can see that sort of thing; you can find it in London and in lots of towns! Now, Paradise Row ought to be called—well, it ain't polite to mention the other name and I've forgot what my little boy said as was the Greek name for it! It was Aydees, or something; it means the same only it's more polite to say that than the English word. Well, miss, it's been worse than ever, I'm sorry to say! I think it's the hot weather and partly the new couple!"

"The new couple!" echoed Miss Green, wonderingly. "Are there some people in the downstairs at No. 12?"

"Yes, miss, and they're a bright lot! Only a man and woman, but he's always making trouble with his wife and anybody else that comes in his way!"

"I'm sorry to hear that!" observed the visiting woman, reflectively. "I must see what I can do! Good afternoon!"

The policeman returned the compliment and watched the grave-faced woman down the street.

"It's wonderful what she can do with those brutes!" he muttered, involuntarily feeling his right arm with his left hand, as he recollected an injury received during a drunken affray in the disreputable locality. "But I think that fellow won't be softened! He's a terror!"

Catching a back view of her as she walked lightly along, no one would have guessed that the figure was that of the woman whom boy had heard spoken of as the district visiting woman. The term conjures up the image of a middle-aged person, slow and sedate of movement—and, well, to cut matters short, the figure of Miss Green was altogether different from that on which the mind would fix. It was the dainty form of a comparatively young woman, perhaps not even thirty, and it did not seem to fit the character. When she turned, the observer saw a face that possessed a grave charm of beauty; there was no doubt that it had been beautiful, but trouble or illness, or both, had changed it somewhat. It was impossible not to be struck by the charm of it, even in its gravest aspect, but when lighted by an expression of sympathy or a smile of encouragement, its power of attraction was very great. This little lady—so some people termed her, for she was of medium height and looked shorter than she was—had obtained a wonderful hold on the worst population of the important southern seaport, and this influence was due to her personality.

No one knew the past history of Miss Green, with the exception of the clergyman in whose parish she worked; everyone believed that she had seen a lot of trouble, but they actually knew nothing. She worked among the poor, helping or trying to help them in various ways, but she never intruded religious ideas. She endeavoured to improve their lot and to inculcate general goodness by example. Her salary amounted to fifteen shillings per week; it was not a large sum, but it sufficed for her wants.

When Kate Green returned to her own little bed-sitting-room, she saw a note lying on the table. Perhaps, if the sun and open air of the country had not bronzed the usually pale face, an observer would have noticed a slight flush. She opened the letter and read it; the letter was signed "Robert Harding" and, after expressing the hope that she had benefited by the change, informed the recipient that an old woman in a certain street was very ill and had asked that Miss Green would call on her. "It is rather too bad to call for your services so soon," concluded the writer, "but your inherent kindness is responsible for these demands upon you. It will be well for you to spare yourself a little; you were very near to a breakdown when you went away!"

"I must go to see her," mused Miss Green. "But I must select a time when Dr. Harding will not be there! I must not encourage—oh, dear! I wish he would get a better practice elsewhere and leave me to live out my life alone. I feel what is coming, and that will force me to tell him the past! I gave my heart to one man; they tell me that he was not worthy of it, but for me it is different! I cling to the man as I thought he was! It may be, as they have told me, that I loved a phantom, that the man who captured my heart did not possess the qualities with which I clothed him, that I was loving an ideal and not a real man! Ah! Do I not know that? Did not the discovery nearly kill me? Yet I still cling to that ideal, and regret that it was but imaginary! I feel that I gave my love once, and I mourn the loss of the ideal as a bride mourns the loss of her beloved! I have no room in my heart for another, and I would spare Dr. Harding."

Kate Green slowly tore the letter into tiny pieces. She was somewhat perplexed to know how to divide her time for the rest of the day; she wished to see this sick woman, but she also desired to pay a lengthy visit to Paradise Row, the inhabitants of which she had taken under her special care. She believed that she had done some good there, but a great deal of falling-back may occur in a fortnight and the example of this new couple was not beneficial.

Digitized by Google

Kate smiled as she remembered the remark of one woman in the Row: "You're like an angel, miss, the rows stop and they all seem to be better, somehow, when you git here!" she had said, and after that incident Dr. Harding and the curate had foolishly nicknamed her "the Angel of Paradise Row" till she had stopped them. But the nickname had spread, and it was used frequently, although not in her presence.

"I will go now!" she determined. "He will be visiting his patients elsewhere, and then I can go into the Row later."

She paid her visit to the old woman, who was greatly pleased to see her again. "It is so nice to have someone to come in and read a bit and make things more comfortable-like," she said gratefully. So Kate Green wended her way homeward with a sentiment of satisfaction; it was an ill-paid office, doubtless, and her work was rough at times, but when she saw the effect of her ministrations in such cases as that of old Mrs. Blount, she felt that she had other remuneration than the mere pittance of fifteen shillings a week!

"I like to think that, if I had married my lost ideal, this is the work which he would have wished me to do—devote myself so far as possible to the improvement of those about me!" she murmured.

Her eyes grew moist, obscuring her vision; and, as she still hurried along, it was not wonderful that she nearly blundered into a pedestrian coming round a corner. "Miss Green!" she heard a voice cry in a surprised tone, and she knew that her little scheme of evading Dr. Harding had been only partially successful.

"Oh, I beg your pardon, Doctor!" she cried in some confusion. "I am afraid that I was not taking proper notice of where I was going!"

They exchanged greetings and Dr. Harding asked if she had been to see Mrs. Blount. He looked disappointed when he found that she had already paid the desired visit.

"I am going home for a cup of tea, and after that I must look up my friends in the Row!" she said simply. "I must not let any more time pass without going there! I have been away two weeks and I shall lose some of my influence."

The man let go his hold of her, and the stick fell to the ground with a crash. "Kate!" he gasped, "you here?"

"I do not think so," he cried involuntarily. "It would be impossible for you to lose your beneficent power over——" He stopped abruptly; he had spoken eagerly, but an expression that crossed her face caused him to think that he had uttered his sentiment with too much warmth.

"If you are going to Mrs. Blount, you will find her pretty well," observed the visiting woman, extending her hand, in farewell.

Robert Harding pretended not to see the outstretched hand.

"I am not going," he said somewhat lamely. "I—I am going your way, and I will accompany you if I may."

Kate Green could not refuse, although she was perturbed. The streets were quiet and they walked for some distance in silence.

"I do not like the idea of your going to the Row quite alone just now, Miss Green!" suddenly observed the young medical man uneasily. "I hear ugly rumours from that unsavoury quarter, and you must really be careful! A case of diphtheria was taken from there two days ago, and I believe there are worse dangers than disease to be encountered."

"I am not afraid, doctor," was the tranquil rejoinder.

"But you must be cautious," he urged. "You owe it to those who—to your friends, I mean. And then," he added, as an idea occurred to him, "if you were incapacitated in any way, your usefulness would be nullified or at least greatly decreased."

He felt quite glad that this idea had flashed across his mind; it was such a splendid argument and it covered his own anxiety on her account.

"I am always careful," she told him, and with that he had to be content. Neither spoke till they reached the door of the house in which she lived. She waited for him to raise his hat in leave-taking, but he hesitated, then boldly looked her in the face and asked:

"May I come in and speak to you?"

So the critical moment was at hand! Well, it was best that the ordeal should be faced. She bowed and led the way into the landlady's small parlour, the use of which was granted her for the reception of an occasional visitor. She stood on one side of the little round table and he faced her on the other. He won her admiration by his manly frankness

Digitized by Google

"Miss Green, will you give me the right to accompany you on your visits to the Row? I have loved you from the first moment I saw you, when I took up this practice three months ago. As my wife, your sphere of usefulness would not be lessened, at least. Forgive my abruptness, but I cannot find many words. My heart is too full!"

She gazed at him with compassion and with a little thrill at her heart which surprised her. She was sorry for him; and she was glad that she had heard his confession. Yes, glad! How paradoxical, she thought!

She never exactly knew what she told him, but she conjectured that she bared some of the past. Her first clear recollection was of a vehement protest from him.

"It is not fair," he cried with fierce pleading. "You are deceiving yourself by revering a mere vision, and you are not just either to yourself or to others—to me! You are sacrificing yourself to a shadow! You are denying happiness to yourself and to the man, whoever he be, who would find his sweetest occupation in watching over you! It is wrong, it is even selfish!—to waste on a vision the power of love which is implanted within you by your Maker! No, no! I will not take your answer now! I will ask you again one day!"

The strong man quivered in his agony. The woman remained standing, outwardly like a statue, but inwardly agitated by strange and violent emotion. He caught her hand, raised it to his lips, and hurried from the apartment, his last glance at her showing him the same motionless, grave-visaged woman, as rigid as if carved from a block of marble.

An hour later, when the visiting woman arrived at the entrance of the blind alley known as Paradise Row, the appearance of her eyes indicated weeping. Otherwise, she was as unruffled as usual.

It was curious to watch her progress from house to house; she did not enter them on this call, but spoke to the women at the door, making earnest inquiries concerning the children, or whether this or that trouble had been overcome. She knew something about them all, and she gained a few words of genuine thanks from most of these disreputable denizens of the Row for her solicitude and thoughtfulness. She passed along fearlessly to a place where the police did not care to venture singly. Even the rascally men, loafing against this or that doorpost, gazed with awe and admiration at her, although not one of them would have hesitated to attack and rob any other woman either there or in the more open thoroughfares of the town.

The power which she possessed over these people was shown when she stood before the closed door of No. 12 and was about to knock.

A man reclining lazily against the opposite wall suddenly straightened himself and hastened towards her with a warning on his lips.

"I wouldn't go there, ma'am," he said earnestly, and it was noticed that his agitation was so pronounced that he actually took his pipe out of his mouth in order to speak plainly—a most uncommon occurrence! "You see, the new party ain't 'xactly as perlite as he ought ter be! He's very wi'lent sometimes, and he knocks her about!"

Her was doubtless meant to signify the violent party's better half. Miss Green, remembering that the speaker himself had more than once been guilty of playfully attacking his wife, felt that the new tenants of No. 12 were very rough. Just a little tremor affected her, but after a moment's hesitation, she smiled and replied firmly:

"It's very good of you to tell me. Still, I must not permit my feelings to stand in the way of my duty."

The man grumbled something about "If you git hurt, don't say as I didn't tell yer," and retired. Kate Green, her heart beating a little more quickly, knocked at the door.

It was one of those small houses where the door opens direct into the front room. Kate, listening for a response, fancied she heard a sound from the back room; accepting this as a rough invitation to enter—by no means an uncommon experience—she turned the handle and went in, closing the door behind her.

The apartment was empty. The door leading to the back room was open, but that, too, was empty. The stairs leading to the upper rooms were masked by a door in the back room and from this direction Kate heard sounds that filled her with dismay.

Some kind of a struggle was taking place. The man was probably beating his wife! Kate was about to return to the front door to call for help, when a cry of pain from a woman caused her to pull open the door masking the stairs and quickly mount the steep steps. In the upper back room, which was devoid of furniture save a rickety cane-bottomed chair, she saw a woman on her knees, her back to Kate, struggling in the grasp of a man who held both her wrists with one hand while his right arm was above his head, swung back ready to deal the woman a terrible blow with a heavy stick.

His face was partly hidden by a heavy moustache and beard, which, like his hair, was unkempt; his eyes were bloodshot, his features distorted with passion. It was a spectacle to make any woman quail, but Kate Green, with a half-murmured prayer, sprang forward and gripped his uplifted arm.

"Hold!" she said firmly. "What are you doing?"

"I'll show you what I'm doing," cried the man hoarsely. "Who are you to come interfering? I'll serve you as I was going to serve her, then you'll know what I'm going to do!"

He threw the woman to the floor, seized Kate by the wrist and, with a quick turn that caused her to cry with pain, forced her to her knees. Death seemed very near to Kate Green at that moment; she saw the terrible weapon that would stretch her lifeless when it descended; she was powerless to arrest it! Ah, if Robert Harding had had the right to accompany her!

Then two things happened simultaneously—two things which Kate Green accepted as an answer to that half-murmured prayer for help. The man's eyes fell on a little golden cross which Kate wore; it was attached to a strong ribbon round her neck. And in the same instant Kate saw a scar on the man's right brow and she cried aloud, in an agonised tone: "Frank! Frank!"

As though confronted by the vision of an avenging angel, the man slowly released his grasp and stepped back, allowing the stick to fall to the ground with a crash. The face, inflamed with rage and drink, turned pale; the fierce light in his eyes gave place to an expression of mingled fear and shame. He stepped backwards, his hands half-raised as if to keep her away, till his back touched the wall.

"Kate!" he gasped. "Kate! You! Here! No, no, it is not Kate; it is her shadow, come to punish me! Mercy, mercy!"

This man, who a moment before would have shed blood without thought, fell on his knees and implored clemency. Kate had risen to her feet. The positions were reversed!

He cowered before her; she gazed at him, half-comprehending, half dazed. To such a low pass as this had come the man to whom she had given her love when barely a woman! His forgery and flight had affected her career by a kind of reflex action; people had thought that it was to take her about and give her presents that he had overstepped his income and had done wrong, so she had had to leave the old place and struggle to begin life afresh! What a struggle it had been!

She had forgiven him, but had clung to the ideal, and the sight of this wreck of a man forced home the lesson which she had begun to learn that afternoon. Was it fair? Had she any right to cling to it and to mourn for what had never existed? Was it in accordance with the will of the Great Ruler? Her train of thought was interrupted by the man who cried in agonising tones:

"I wronged you, Kate! Say you forgive me! Say you forgive me and I will try to make amends! I swear I will! It is all clear to me now; I never saw how vile I had been till this minute. Let me stay in the world a little longer and I will make amends!"

A sob rose to Kate's throat. The woman had scrambled to her feet and had hurried down the narrow stairs to the street, to seek refuge, careless of the danger of her rescuer.

Digitized by Google

Kate choked back the lump in her throat and spoke gently, forgivingly.

"I forgive you, Frank, for the sake of what you once were! I will not say 'what I thought you were' because I like to think that I was not mistaken in the beginning! Get up and keep your word! It is not I who have power to let you live or to cut short your life, for I am mortal flesh and blood, as you are! Come, let me clasp your hand for a seal of the promise just made!"

She held out her hand, he stood erect and held his behind him.

"No!" he cried. "I am not worthy! This hand has done wrong; even now the police may be on my track. I——"

The door at the foot of the stairs was flung violently back and the voices of men were heard. The man looked about him like a hunted animal.

"They are after me!" he cried in a raucous whisper. "They'll drag me to prison! Where can I go?"

Kate stood in front of him, her back to him and her face to the door, as if to protect him. In her agitation she scarcely knew what she was doing. Dr. Robert Harding entered, followed by two constables.

"Kate!" cried Harding gladly. "Thank Heaven you are safe!"

Then he remained motionless, as did the policemen, not understanding the strange scene. The rescued woman had shouted that he was murdering the district visitor, and Robert Harding, hastening to the Row, in order to be near Kate, had heard these awful words and had ran thither, meeting two constables who were going to the same house to arrest the man for highway robbery with violence. And now they saw the district visitor ready to protect him!

An exclamation from the three men and a crash behind her caused Kate to turn. The man had fallen to the ground in a fit.

They carried him to the next room where a wretched bed afforded a slightly more comfortable resting-place. Harding attended to him, assisted by Kate, while the policeman looked on stolidly. After five or six minutes the constables left, intending to keep guard outside till Dr. Harding should summon them. This he did half an hour later; during the interval as they watched the motionless figure on the bed, Kate told him the history of her visit.

"You need not trouble about your prisoner," said Dr. Harding gravely. "He has escaped and has gone to obtain a free pardon from a Merciful Judge."

And Kate Green, with one hand in those of Dr. Harding, wept for the man who had caused her so much suffering. But the bitterness was tempered by the feeling that a new and brighter life was opening before her!

G. Merriam.

"You've been losing flesh lately, haven't you?" "Yes, I've been shaving myself."

"Who was that lady you spoke to?" "That's the lady that lets my mother go out Thursday and Sunday evenings."

"Poetry doesn't pay nowadays," remarked the long-haired lodger. "Neither do poets," replied the landlady coldly.

Cashier: "But why do you object to bringing in a friend to identify you?" The Man: "Well, you see, the cheque is for only £12, and he'd be sure to want to borrow ten of it."

Mrs. Cobwigger: "I bought a necktie here yesterday, and the one you sent home wasn't anything like it." Haberdasher: "The one we sent, madam, was picked out by your husband a month ago, in case you ever bought one for him."

Cholly: "Well, old fellow, I asked Miss Amy last night to marry me, and she declined." Goslin: "Did she deliberate, as though hesitating to pain you?" Cholly: "No; she produced her negative by the instantaneous process."

BURIED STATIONS COMPETITION.

Up to the time of going to press it has unfortunately been impossible to finish checking all the attempts. A list, however, has been prepared of all the words admissible so far as the checking has gone. This list is not necessarily a complete one, as further words may be added as other attempts are gone through. The names of the winners will appear next week.

1.—Over, Hilgay, Heather, Cam, Seven Sisters, Sandwich; 2.—Endon, Daybrook, Hockley; 3.—Hay, Preston, Pant, Awre, Hay, Ayr, Five Ways; 4.—Tain, Knock, Llong, Dore, Eye, Shaw, Hyde; 5.—Halfway, Horse and Jockey, Hay, Fulwell, Ayr, Fishponds, Hythe, Ayr; 6.—Lye, Ash, Dover, Waterfall, Sandy, Banks, Ayr; 7.—Eye, Browndown, Ore, Capel, City, Ince, Manors, Willbrook; 8.—Mallow, Rosemount, Ashbury, Sandy, Cornwood, Nigg; 9.—Hay, Wressle, Wreay, Starcross, Over, Eridge, Round Oak, Honor Oak, Victoria; 10.—Errol, Shotts, Donamon, Awre, Morningside, Par, Earley, Ewell, Awre; 11.—Four Crosses, Four Stones, Willington, Umberleigh, Claxby; 12.—Condover, Manuel, Langho, Tain, Botanic Gardens, Peartree; 13.—Float, Newry, Verwood, Carrick, Lymm, Ore; 14.—Hay, Over, Cliffe, Seaside, Awre, Looe, Awre, Angerton; 15.—Church, Doune, Valley, Awre, Three Counties, Privett, Row, Bridge; 16.—Ayr, Rookery, County School, Boyle, Towyn, Birr; 17.—Horseleap, Highgate, Torre, Crosshill, Sandal, Hawes; 18.—Verwood, Twenty, Ore, Crewe, Brigg, Lye, Swansea; 19.—Hayle, City, Southgate, Llong, Bare Lane, Awre, Flint; 20.—Box, Tain, Dover, Twenty, Rye, Ferns, Seedley; 21.—Haigh, Talk, New Buildings, Soho, Oyne, Pwllheli; 22.—Post Office, Methil, Morriston, Travellers' Rest, Wemyss Castle; 23.—Rye, Cole, Lower Ince, Diss, Heywood, Notton; 24.—Moira, Guyhirne, Ashey, Hurn, Birr, Grotton; 25.—British Museum, Tain, Coalport, Worcester, Abbey, Olton, Belleek, Ware; 26.—Quorn, Cam, Kilwinning, Mount Vernon, Fleet; 27.—Stoats Nest, Plains, Recess, Gordon, Hoyland, Holme; 28.—Roade, Lye, Greystones, Shap, Lye, Triangle, Haigh, Brightside, Thurso, Row, Moss; 29.—Hope, Freshwater, Lye, Newhouse, Ayr, Leigh, Wells, Ore; 30.—Leigh, Ningwood, Awre, Great Coates, Reddish, Paignton, Crosby; 31.—Ore, Quin, Bluestone, Ayr, Brill, Praze; 32.—Awre, Saddleworth, Looe, Penns, Theale, Ingham, Boston, Bow; 33.—Torre, Grange Con, Radcliffe, Lye, Manors, Ore, Finedon; 34.—Biggar, Legacy, Hanley, Hadleigh, Dinmore, Ore, Ore, Llong; 35.—Tain, Point Pleasant, Sway, Diss, Row, Ewell, Lydd, Rye; 36.—Aby, Bourne End, Hay, Hayle, Torre, Worstead, Wardhouse, Croft, Birr, Knowle; 37.—March, Gailes, Broughton, Wreay, Diss, Over; 38.—Forden, Hatch, Arley, Grafton, Ash, Liss, Harold Wood, Lymm, Tain, Haigh, Leigh; 39.—Duns, Awre, Lenton, March, Twenty, Risca, Consall, Par; 40.—Clara, Haworth, Idle, St. Mary's, Schoolhill, Ford, Ore, Diss; 41.—Giant's Causeway, Leigh, Bray, Worle, Dover, Dess, Ore, Godstone, Stow, Awre; 42.—Trew, Awre, Roby, Hyde, Peartree, Tivoli, Islay, City; 43.—Eaton, Currie, Street, Kentish Town, Ayr, Littlemore; 44.—Ingrow, Nailsea, Merton, Hook; 45.—Port, Newbridge, Reston, Lenton, Haigh, 46.—Enzie, Amotherby, Hatch, Woodend, Paignton, Eye, Ince, Row, Llong; 47.—Worthing, Selling, Cattal, Tintern, Sale, Willington, Rye, Awre; 48.—Rhyl, Ayton, Ryde, Theale, Rayne, London Bridge, Denton, Lyne; 49.—Llong, Roade, Leeds, Patrick's Well, Eston; 50.—Swine, Minster, Ore, Rye, Ennis, Wreay; 51.—Awre, Llong, Crewe, Tal-y-Cafn, Sale, Rigg, Penns, Cole, Lye, Gailes; 52.—Oyne, King Edward, Skares, Hose, Victoria, Ewell, Liss; 53.—Reading, Poole, Awre, Twenty, Lea, Looe; 54.—Brynn, Penicuik, Leigh, Awre, Little Mill, Boyle, Potton, York, Awre; 55.—Trinity, Church, Ludlow, Hatch, Arley, Peel; 56.—Wreay, Diss, Cove, Lymm, Oldcastle, Stokesley, Frome, Oyne, Schull; 57.—Crick, Lea, Seaside, Leven, Wick, Leigh, Bold; 58.—Battle, Trooper's Lane, Twenty, Ford, Leigh, Leven; 59.—Hay, Rushall, Awre, Oyne, Bow; 60.—Nigg, Ardleigh, Manuel, Ayr, Leigh, Leeds, Trew, Leigh, Pill; 61.—Awre, Bay Horse, Hose, Wreay, Ewell, Leigh, Ince, Errol, Rye; 62.—Ayr, Cove, Bushey, Roath, Smallthorne, Leigh, Peartree, Over; 63.—Haigh, Old Leake, Deal, Waterfall, Errol; 64.—Wryde, Ore, Downhill, Pill, Llong, Over, Eye; 65.—Standon, Bridge, Lye, Leigh, Rushall, Rayne, Looe, Port; 66.—Wreay, North Road, London, Biggar, City, Roade; 67.—Par, Looe, Twickenham, Ferry, Toward, Richmond, Eskbank; 68.—Biggar, Rye, Tain, Theale, Kinsale, Ewell, Knowle, Awre; 69.—Valley, Rayne, Torre, Settle, Wetherby, Cam, Slough, Bridge, Dover; 70.—Stoke, Lye, Ardleigh, Peel, Roughan, Reddish, Lynn, Coal, Notton; 71.—Fareet, Wreay, Earley, Knowle, Ennis, Lydd, Tresmeer, Leigh, Awre; 72.—Ayr, Wreay, Fawley, Holme, Ayr, Thurso, Ongar, Tain, Rye, Rye.

Digitized by Google

GRAND SERIAL STORY.

The Snare of Gold

A Tale of Love, Ambition, and Crime.

• • BY • •

HENRY T. JOHNSON.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS IN THIS SPLENDID STORY ARE:

GEORGE GELDART, a former prosperous City merchant, supposed to be dead, and now known as "Old Mystery."

ERIC GELDART, his elder son, who conspired to kill his father, thereby coming into his property. He is elected as an M.P.

RONALD GELDART, the younger son, who has been disinherited because he has been falsely accused of robbing his father.

CLARE ARMITAGE, the adopted sister of the two brothers, and who is betrothed to Eric.

BOANERGES BLAGDON, the traitorous partner of old Geldart, whom he has cheated in business, and who plots with Eric to murder him.

SAMPSON SCRIMSHAW, company promoter, who befriends "Old Mystery."

MR. STANYER, an Australian financier, who gives "Old Mystery" the post of English agent for his business.

MADELEINE LORRAINE, daughter of Lord Lynton, who is beloved by Eric Geldart.

PHYLLIS DAVENTRY, typewriter to Scrimshaw, who takes a fancy to "Old Mystery." She is rescued from Hooligans by Ronald Geldart.

JACK WIDDICOMBE, cousin to the brothers Geldart, and who is engaged on "The Meteor."

FIFTEENTH CHAPTER.

A Rescue on the River.

AGAIN that cry came nearer, nearer.

For Ronald was round the bend, and, still pulling, for dear life, glancing over his shoulder he saw that punt drifting down towards him, broadside on, with no river nymph this time to guide it!

Fiercely, frantically, he plied swift, strenuous strokes. For dear life? Yes! he was pulling now for her dear life. One—two—three moments, three swift, herculean strokes—he was past the drifting punt, there ahead of him was her face like another lily on the bosom of the stream.

"Hold up for just one moment!" he shouted. "I shall save you!"

Ere he had finished speaking his boat was alongside her. He scrambled into the stern, leaning overside he seized her with one strong hand, then steadying the boat, resolved to save her at all hazards, whether he lifted her out or went in with and swam out with her.

"Keep steady!" he cried. "You're quite safe. I'm holding you!"

But he had no easy task, for he soon learned what had happened.

A clinging, winding wisp of weeds had twined around her, and supporting her with one arm, leaning over the gunwale with his pocket-knife, which he had opened with his teeth, he had to cut away the slimy, tenacious, cord-like bands; but it was done at last.

Using all his strength of limb and all his skill in watercraft, he had dragged her into his boat, placed her drenched and exhausted on the storm cushions, once again had saved her life.

So it was fated they should meet and that their meeting should be fraught with what would insure remembrance. She seemed to realise that fully as voluntarily as he, with such sweet docility she placed herself in his hands and obeyed his guidance. It was Kismet; she had neither the power, and she could not conceal from herself the pleasing truth—she had not the inclination to rebel, even to resist.

He sculled her back down stream to the little cosy, not too fashionable river-bank hotel where he was staying, a quaint old, red-brick building standing in pleasant grounds and gardens, covered with trellis work that wanton roses, red and yellow, clambered over, and gave her in the charge of a motherly hostess.

An hour later Madeleine, clad in comfortable attire, which, if it did not exactly fulfil lovely woman's many requirements in the matter of fit and style, was by no means unbecoming, and to his eyes she would look sweet in anything, seated opposite him at a tea-table beside the open window looking on to the flower-spangled lawn, and beyond it the limpid, bough-reflected river, the river that Ronald, who had always loved it, now adored since it had given its fairest nymph into his arms.

Ronald, too solicitous for her to think of aught beside, had sent a waterside man in quest of Miss Lorraine's punt, and a little later that worthy individual appeared at the open window, hat in hand, to inform the lady with many tugs at his forelock, that he had brought the punt back safe and sound without a scratch, pole cushions, luncheon-basket, and all.

"Oh! and my book—my book!" said Madeleine.

"Yes, marm, there were a book, which I brought it along," and he handed through the open window a daintily-bound volume, and his fidelity being substantially recognised by Madeleine's companion, he tugged that forelock in his direction.

"I'm so glad it's saved," said Madeleine to Ronald, "it's the best book I've read."

"Really!" he remarked, "may I ask the title?" and she answered:

"It's 'Flotsam and Jetsam,' a collection of complete stories and lyrics by the new man."

"The new man?"

"Yes, quite my favourite author, I'm rather enraptured with him."

"Happy man!" said Ronald ecstatically, and she went on, with a radiant smile lighting her lovely face,:

"You've surely heard of him—his name is Harvey Bligh."

Digitized by Google

SIXTEENTH CHAPTER.
Gold for Gilt and Gilt for Gold.

LORD LYNTON was hard up. That is, in his sense of the word, for one can be hard up in a variety of styles.

Fitz-Crœsus, born in the purple, with a silver spoon in his mouth and cradled in rose leaves, finds himself shockingly pinched when his extravagances have reduced his income to within five figures; whereas Jenkinson, of the Cosmopolitan Bank and Camberwell, dreams that on five hundred a year he could banish care from the vocabulary.

And, by the same token, Fitz-Crœsus, with a list of debts totting up to, say, fifty thousand pounds, never lets a thought of them disturb his nightly dreams, while poor little Jenkinson will lie awake listening to the church clock telling the slowly crawling hours, thinking with horror of that twenty pound bill to be met upon the morrow.

But agricultural depression, the death duties, and other matters, had reduced Lord Lynton's fortunes materially, though he was some distance removed from penury. It was beginning to be whispered of him that there was a good deal of his paper about, which is a bad thing to be said of a man or a theatre.

Therefore, in his extremity, Lord Lynton had approached Mr. Scrimshaw.

Now, different men had different ways of approaching Scrimshaw. Lord Lynton's way was that of a cavalier—patronising, indeed, condescending.

No doubt he thought it didn't matter, but, as a matter of fact, Scrimshaw had a way of dealing with people according to their way of approaching him, for this Napoleon of finance, like his prototype of Austerlitz, had his vanities.

Lord Lynton, on Geldart's introduction, had first repaired to the Cosmopolitan Trust and Exchange Limited as a speculator.

He would have repudiated the term "a gambler," for it was his habit at the meetings of the Mutual Improvement Societies, the Mechanics Institute, and kindred institutions at Little Claverton and elsewhere, to wax fiercely eloquent against the besetting vice, whether it took the form of cards, or dice, or race betting.

But purchasing stock, dear me, that was an investment, the investment underlying and stimulating the commercial and industrial energy of the country, and buying that stock to sell again at a profit, that was fair trading, and trading was the backbone of the Empire; and running an account with a dealer in "differences," paying or receiving, according as the balance stood on a given date, this, of course, his lordship would have argued, was a mere development of ordinary business.

Thinking that with his experience and his sources of information he could make money out of the Cosmopolitan at this game, he played—and lost, played high—lost heavily, then played rashly, with the result that notwithstanding his contention that his transactions were business dealings, utterly distinct from gambling or anything so vicious, his experiences very much resembled those of a punter out of his depth, and his feelings were frequently allied to those of the man who, rising in the grey dawn from his chair, staggers wearily across the card-littered floor—"Hard Hit!"

So that later Lord Lynton resorted to Mr. Scrimshaw in another capacity, still cavalier, condescending, patronising, intimating that he must have a little money, a few thousands, to tide him over till his rents fell in. Of course he could get it from friends, but he didn't care to be under an obligation to anybody.

"So you see, Mr. Scrimshaw," he added, accentuating the "Mister" by way of emphasizing that he was addressing an inferior, "I came along to you. You know the detail work which I've never had to trouble myself with in these matters, and you may as well have your so much per cent. as anybody else, and I understand from Geldart that you combine this sort of thing with your business."

"Oh, yes, my lord," laughed Scrimshaw; "all's fish that comes to my net." And he whispered to himself, "and when the bait is gold they come in shoals."

"I don't know that I particularly care to be compared with a fish," said the Viscount, "and I don't know what on earth you're muttering. What I want to make clear is I want some money, between thirty and forty thousand, and I must have it soon, in fact I must have a few thousands at once. You and my lawyer fellows can fix up the details; they have most of my deeds in their keeping."

"A few thousands at once." Mr. Scrimshaw was thoughtful. "What's the immediate security?"

"I tell you it's no good talking business to me; my lawyer fellows do all that."

"Well, will your lordship make an appointment for me to meet them?"

"Oh, that can be done, I suppose, but, don't you see, my good man, I want a few thousands at once."

"Oh, I quite understand that," said Scrimshaw; "indeed, I meet so many people who want exactly the same."

"But Geldart told me you could arrange all these things," said Lord Lynton testily.

"Oh, yes," said Scrimshaw blandly, "on terms." And he named his terms. They were steep; even his lordship, with his contempt for business detail, thought them far too steep.

Mr. Scrimshaw put his cheque book back in the drawer, and Lord Lynton bethought himself that the hills immediately ahead were even steeper, with the result that he requested Mr. Scrimshaw not to be in such a confounded hurry, and in result he appended his signature to certain red stamped blue slips and other memoranda.

"And, by-the-bye, my lord," said Scrimshaw, "an idea has just occurred to me—but, I'm afraid your lordship's a far too busy man to entertain it."

The stony glare in Viscount Lynton's face relaxed, and Scrimshaw went on. "Though there's money in it."

"I am, as you say, Mr. Scrimshaw, tolerably well occupied, but of course one is always ready to consider a remunerative matter."

"Simply this," said Scrimshaw, briskly, watching his visitor. "I am concerned in a small company that's been recently floated for the exploitation of a new bicycle tyre; it's the Pneumatic Intacto."

"Really!" exclaimed the Viscount, with a face of granite, "I am not exactly at that period of life when one is keenly interested in—er—bicycles."

"Jusso," said Scrimshaw; "but I thought you might be interested in the sale of 'em."

"Nor in the sale of them, sir," said Lynton, then struck by an afterthought, "although, of course, as you say, Mr. Scrimshaw, one may be interested in the sale of an article that of itself doesn't interest one in the least; so much depends on the scale of the sale."

"Exactly," said Scrimshaw, "a lot depends upon the scale. The man who kills another man goes to the drop, the man who sets two millions at each other's throats obtains a coronet, sometimes a crown; the man who swindles another scamp, intent on getting someone else's money easily with the three card trick or some other paltry fraud, goes straight to clink, and the man who works a mammoth swindle on the Bourse rolls through the West End in his chariot wrapped in his furs, smoking half sovereign cigars—you're right—it's scale!"

"But how does all this affect the subject?"

"Not at all, my lord. I was merely moralising—a great liberty on my part, especially in the presence of a peer. But I was going to say that this Pneumatic Intacto is a sound affair, and it would be to your lordship's advantage to be upon the Board."

"And perhaps to the advantage of the Board," said Lord Lynton, to which Scrimshaw replied,

"You wouldn't be invited if it weren't."

Lord Lynton rose.

"I think I'll wish you good morning, sir, if you have no other subject to discuss, except an investment I'm not particularly inclined to consider."

"Very well, my lord."

The Viscount moved to the door, then, with a puzzled air, turned, and coming back, said:

Digitized by Google

"Look here, Scrimshaw, you're too shrewd a man to bring up a matter like this without there's something behind it. You know very well I've no money to buy the qualification shares, even if I took the slightest interest in your Pneumatic Intacto, or whatever you call it, which I don't. What's the game?"

"Simply this," said Scrimshaw, "the qualification will cost you nothing. Promise to come on our Board and to take up and pay for two hundred and fifty ordinary shares of one pound each at par and I will place a cheque—no, no, not a cheque, bank notes for five hundred pounds—at your lordship's credit at your bankers', or trouble your lordship to do so."

"But what do I know about bicycle tyres?"

"What do you know of gutta percha? What do you know of celluloid? What did you know of the Ping Pong Accessories Syndicate, or the Nubibus Gold and Silver Mines?"

"Scrimshaw, no unpleasant memories, pray! Is this a sound affair?"

"My dear Lord Lynton, the Pneumatic Intacto Company is as unpuncturable as the tyre which, according to its memorandum of association, it is incorporated to trade in."

"Five hundred pounds! It isn't a lot."

"No, but strike while the iron's hot; buy Pneumatic Intactos with the lot of it; they'll be at a premium within a week of issue, within a fortnight they'll be at a quarter; but don't sell then, there'll be a slump, but don't sell, wait for the rebound which is bound to come; the one pound shares will be at fifty shillings within three months after allotment."

"By Jove, Scrimshaw, you're a wonderful man. I'll think about it."

"You mean, my lord, you'll join our Board. Come, say the word; I have the draft prospectus here shall I add to the list of our directors the Viscount Lynton? Just as you like, my lord; you see you're in good company."

Lord Lynton, glancing at the proof prospectus, screwed up his lips a moment, for a moment blinked his eyes, then said:

"Well, yes, it seems to me a most praiseworthy enterprise, calculated to foster an important home industry, and I think I am fulfilling a public duty imposed upon me by my position in lending my name and my co-operation in the furtherance of its interest."

Then he left Crosby Square with Mr. Scrimshaw's open cheque for five thousand pounds. Mr. Scrimshaw let his lordship out of the private door of his offices, then quietly closing this, went upstairs and knocked at the door on the second floor.

"Come in," said Old Mystery's voice.

He entered, and there was Old Mystery seated at his writing table with huge masses of papers all around him, covered with figures—figures of all kinds, figures of thousands, hundreds of thousands, millions, tens of millions, fractions, vulgar and decimal, denoting infinitesimal divisions of the unit, calculations, the very sight of which made the brain recoil and reel.

"Aha, Old Twopenny, still at it?"

"Yes, yes," said Old Mystery, "still pegging away."

"Still the System? How's it getting on?"

"Oh, it's developing wonderfully. I'm almost nearing the end of it, and then, Scrimshaw, we will paralyse the world. The bourses, the markets of Europe shall awaken one morning to find themselves fettered hand and foot, bound round and round in our meshes and helpless at our mercy."

The financier smiled a little sceptically.

"I have known lots of men with systems," he said, "systems for backing horses, for backing this or that jockey's mount, for winning at cards. I've known some men go Tommy Dodd for sovereigns on a system, but in the end the system as a rule breaks down, and it very often breaks the man who built it. I should think that the Casino at Monte Carlo would feel a draught if people left off devising systems."

"Ah, yes, yes!" Old Mystery replied impatiently, "because they are speculating on Chance, or rather outraging the laws of Chance, coercing Chance to become a renegade and apostate from her own dogmas.

"But, my dear fellow, we are not dealing with cards, and wheels, and things inanimate, we are not dealing with little horses or with big ones either, big ones that have got to obey the whip, the rein and the spur of the man who's got to obey the owner, who very often has got to obey a backer or a bookie.

"The strings we pull are the cables which make a network over the city's heart, and, as we touch those strings, so we awaken chords responsive in the markets of the world, and with these little strings we'll play our little game," and, as the old man spoke, his eyes ablaze with the fervour of his aim and end, to Scrimshaw, it seemed he might have posed for a miser wallowing in shimmering heaps of gold, a fanatic going to the stake for his creed, exalted and transfigured with the passion that possessed his soul.

"All right, Old Mystery," he laughed. "We'll do it right enough, though, upon my soul, I don't know how it's going to benefit us."

"What, not benefit us? To have more gold at our command than Midas or Crœsus ever dreamt of, to have our grip on the exchequers and chancelleries of every civilised power! Why, man, our word will hold the armies of the world in check, or let them loose as we will.

"No Tsar, no Pope of Rome, no patriarch will ever yet have wielded such a rod and sceptre as we two shall wield.

"Scrimshaw, old Bacon was a fool; it isn't knowledge that makes for power; the man of science, the philosopher, ever so often lives in penury, and often goes down to his grave inside a pauper's shell; it's money that makes for power, gold—gold—gold that men and women worship, that Jupiter himself rained down upon the tower that yielded Danae. We'll circle round them and we'll shepherd them, the great and small into our toils, and then we'll hold them fast, inmeshed and captured by the Snare of Gold!"

"Ha! ha! ha!" Scrimshaw, leaning against the wall, his hands in his pockets, chuckled as he watched and listened to Old Mystery. Then he said, pitching on the table a bundle of blue slips and folded sheets of foolscap, "Enter these in your register and keep them in your safe when you've just looked them through."

"Lynton! Lynton!" said Old Mystery; then it was his turn to chuckle.

"And, by the bye, old man Mystery, when you take this revised proof round to the printers see that they note the addition to the Board."

"Oh, yes, the Viscount Lynton!" said the old man, reading the red ink delineation. "He's not much good on the Board."

"No, but his title is."

"True, true, it's not the head you want, but the coronet he wears on it, and he isn't lending you that for nothing."

"No, Mystery, Lynton does nothing for nothing. You see, if you want the gilt of his coronet you must put down gold for gold; that's the art of financial angling, you fish for gilt with gold, and then for gold with gilt."

"It's like mackerel fishing with a line," said Old Mystery "where they cut a strip from one of the fresh caught fish to bait the hooks to catch others. Gold for gilt, and gilt for gold. Tut, tut, tut! The Snare of Gold!"

SEVENTEENTH CHAPTER.

"I Will Drag you Down with Me!"

MADELEINE LORRAINE recked little of the troubled waters of speculation in which her father was floundering out of his depth.

Lord Lynton had never quite forgiven his daughter for not being a son, and, although he would have indignantly resented the insinuation that he was wanting in paternal care or affection, he could never quite live down the disappointing reflection that, though by the terms of the patent creating it, the peerage would devolve on his decease on Madeleine in her own right, the family name, of which he was considerably.

Digitized by Google

prouder than of his coronet, would, so far as his branch of the family was concerned, die with him.

My lord belonged to the old school that considered intelligence in regard to matters beyond hats and frocks, babies and housekeeping, unwomanly. Then, again, Madeleine had been staying a deal away from home, and very little correspondence had transpired between them.

Eric Geldart, dropping in to lunch at Lorraine House, was charmed and surprised to find Madeleine at the head of the table, returned from a summer spell up river.

"With whom were you staying?" and she answered:

"With Lady Harwardine, at her place at Taplow."

"Weren't you rather bored?"

"Oh, no!" with a sudden light in her face she seemed to him more winsome still. "One is never bored on the river."

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Weren't you very lonely?"

"Oh, dear no!" she replied demurely. "Of course, there was auntie!" And he wondered why on earth she suddenly dropped those wonderful lashes and why the apple blossom tint deepened in her cheeks.

Anyway he was thankful for her return to town, even for the fag end of the season, though he reflected with dismay he would soon be losing her again, and for the thousandth time the question sprang to his brain, "Why not claim her for ever?"

He had never met any woman who stirred his pulse as she did. True, her father was not a rich man, and was getting into difficulties that made it possible that ere long he might become a poor one, but if he had not wealth he had influence.

Besides which, Eric, ever cool and cautious, took to heart the consoling fact that the family estates were entailed, and Madeleine herself was well secured under her parents' marriage settlement and the late Viscountess' will. And then she would be some day a peeress in her own right, and Eric, besides dearly loving a lord, still more dearly loved this future fair my lady.

After luncheon she left them to their wine and politics, and, though she guessed it not, to the discussion of the Viscount's financial entanglements.

"I don't altogether care for that fellow Scrimshaw," said Lord Lynton. "I don't care for the men who are so very, very shrewd; they're sometimes dangerous."

"My dear Lynton," said Eric, "in business or in politics one's likes and dislikes have to be kept severely in the background."

"I suppose so, but I can't help thinking it was a mistake your council selecting him as candidate for Brixwell after Blagdon's retirement."

"I had no choice." Then Eric checked himself. "You see it was like this: You must have monied men in your party; plenty of men with very little money are active parliamentarians; they may influence, they may even lead, but they don't make a party. A political party without money is a boiler without a furnace."

"And then, I suppose, considering the startling circumstances under which Blagdon retired, you were rather in a corner, and there was a difficulty in finding quite the right sort of man at once? By the bye, what a startling affair that was!"

Eric, shifting uneasily in his seat, kept silence, and Lord Lynton went on—

"Well, anyway, if only those Eldorado Exploration shares go up, as I'm led to believe they will, I shall pay the man off, and wash my hands of him."

If only—only if! What a world of worlds the little words contain!

Later Eric Geldart found Madeleine in the conservatory, a lily amid the palms. She was seated in a wicker rocking chair close to a plashing fountain; the perfect oval of her face, and

(Continued overleaf.)

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS

THE FAMOUS HOUSEHOLD REMEDIES.

THE PILLS

have gained their wonderful reputation by sheer force of merit, because every person who uses them recommends them to others. They have positively no equal for thoroughly cleansing the system and putting the liver and kidneys in functional order, without pain or griping. They are the best known remedy for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dizziness, and the common condition of ill-health, known as "run-down" or "out of sorts." Females of every age find Holloway's Pills an invaluable remedy and aid.

THE OINTMENT

is known throughout the world as positively the best and quickest remedy for Bad Legs, Old Wounds and Sores, and Skin Eruptions of every kind, and should be used in conjunction with the Pills. It is also the speediest remedy for Rheumatism, Lumbago, Pains and Stiffness in the Limbs and Joints, Backache, &c. For pains and Soreness at the Chest, and for Throat and Lung Complaints arising from Cold or Weakness, Holloway's Ointment affords most welcome relief in a very short time.

A COMPLETE DISPENSARY IN THEMSELVES.

AND OINTMENT

Digitized by Google

her wavy wealth of hair framed in a background of cool and shady green. He seated himself beside her, and, having asked permission to continue his cigar,

"I can't understand," he said, "your not being dull and weary up there at Taplow."

"What nonsense!" she laughed. "What, with my governess cart, my punt, my skiff, my fishing-rods and my books?"

"Oh, yes, your books! What are you reading now?"

She showed him the cover.

"Flotsam and Jetsam."

"Oh, another book by that new fellow, Bligh. You seem quite gone on his work."

"You are not an admirer of his?"

"I'm not a great admirer of anything or anybody, with," he went on, fixing ardent eyes upon her, "one glorious exception. I have so much admiration for you, Madeleine, I have none left for others."

"Don't, please," she said, trembling like the aspen leaf close to her, for he had seized her hand.

"I can't help it, Madeleine. There are times when I feel I must clasp you to me, and cry aloud, "I love you—I love you, Madeleine!" But rising, she slid from him.

"Mr. Geldart," she said, "no more of this, please."

"But, Madeleine, you do care for me, you will care for me?"

"No, no—I'm sorry—I can't."

"But you must—you shall!"

"No, no; besides, there is another girl to whom you are pledged. I have heard of it all; the girl your late father adopted, a Miss Armitage."

"No! No!" he exclaimed angrily, almost fiercely. "Who has told you that? It is quite false, I swear——"

"Mr. Geldart, you were priding yourself just now on your self-restraint. Ah, here comes my father!"

"Yes," he said, recovering himself, "and we are discussing books. Now, for instance, this fellow, it makes one quite tired to be asked, 'What do you think of Bligh? How do you compare him with so and so?' I begin to hate him."

"Have you read him much?"

"No, no, I've no time to dabble with fiction."

"Then how can you judge?"

"Oh, if I haven't read him I've glanced at him in the reviews. I'll show you something of his I dipped into, I think it's published in that collection. Allow me?"

He took the book from her hand, turned over the pages, read her the passage that had struck him.

"Now, that's very fair," he said, "but it's by no means miraculous." Then carelessly he glanced at the title page. A name was written on the fly leaf in a hand that somehow seemed familiar. "Harvey Bligh!" and it was dated that current year, that current summer month. "Is this his writing?" he said, almost demanded, and Madeleine, blushing, said:

"Yes."

A deeper rose blush mounted to her cheeks, and Eric Geldart's jealous heart began to understand why and how she had passed such a joyous river holiday.

"Then you have met this fellow, Harvey Bligh?"

"I have met Mr. Harvey Bligh," she said, drawing herself up, resentful of his insolence.

"The usual style of literary chap, I suppose?" he went on. "Lean of limb, lank of feature, long of hair, and limp of bearing."

"The very opposite—with broader shoulders even than yours; a face full of sunshine when not grave and thoughtful; an athlete every inch. Why, twice he saved my life!"

Then Eric, who had been merely impatient of the man whom he had never seen, but whom in his heart of hearts once for all he guessed had robbed him of his heart's desire—the love of Madeleine Lorraine, hated him with all his soul and all his strength. So that an hour or so later he left Lorraine House, chafing with impotent anger.

What did it matter that he had achieved success, that there were hundreds of women, fair to look upon and well dowered, who would gladly have flung themselves into his arms to share in a career of promise, social and political, so abundant. She was his heart's desire, and he felt that he was wooing her in vain.

When their guest had gone, Lord Lynton, fixing a scrutinising look upon his daughter, said:

"Were you and Geldart indulging in a tiff just now?"

"Hardly that," she smiled; "only Mr. Geldart is a trifle self-opinionated and obstinate, and so perhaps am I, so that we occasionally cross foils, but never without the buttons!" and she laughed.

"Strong men generally are self-opinionated; that goes with strength of mind," said the Viscount, "and Eric Geldart is a very strong man."

"The strongest men are not always the pleasantest," answered Madeleine.

"What is pleasant is not always best for us," said Lord Lynton, and he went on gravely: "Geldart has a brilliant future, he is fairly well-to-do, is a partner in a flourishing concern that runs on wheels as it were by itself, and his late father left him a very comfortable income."

"Yes," answered Madeleine, "at the cost of disinheriting his brother, I was told."

"The brother was a bad lot and deserved all he got, and to lose all he didn't get!" said the Viscount; "but it isn't wealth I'm thinking of, though that is necessary to happiness."

"Father!"

"Oh, yes, poverty of purse means poverty of heart. But that man has a political future before him. Some day he'll be a Cabinet Minister. It's on the cards he may be offered an Under-Secretaryship in the lifetime of the present parliament. He has made his mark in the House and in the country."

"People seem rather undecided about him, nobody quite seems to know with which side he and his little band will ultimately throw in their fortunes."

"That's Geldart's generalship, and that's the importance of his force," said the Viscount. "Madeleine, I know he's tremendously interested in you and I should be sorry to see you discourage him."

"Oh, but father, I—I——"

"What do you mean?" asked the Viscount testily and suspiciously, noting the tell-tale crimson in her cheeks. "You haven't formed any prior attachment—you appreciate your position too thoroughly to indulge in either flirtation or sentimentalities, I trust.'

"I mean, father," said Madeleine, with some confusion, "that I am not merely negative to Mr. Geldart. I admire him certainly for his cleverness, and I am interested in his career.

"He is so bold, and in a way so brilliant, and I think he's wonderful to listen to at public meetings and in the House and to read about in the papers, but, personally, there is a nameless something about him that jars on my nerves, and there are times when he is absolutely repellant to me."

"Nonsense, nonsense!" said Lord Lynton impatiently; "he's a splendid fellow! Why, already the Opposition have, through his influence, been made to see the blunder they made in passing me over for the Lord-Lieutenancy without even a solatium, and I've heard a whisper from present Ministerial circles that if anything happens to Lord Brentwood—and his physicians are in daily attendance on him—they will at once recognise my claims. And understand, Madeleine, it is my special wish that you should be particularly polite to Mr. Geldart—my particular wish, remember!"

He left her, and Madeleine returned to her wicker-chair in the conservatory to dive again into the fascinating pages of Harvey Bligh, and, reading him, to dream that once again she was listening to him in the shade of the willows where foxgloves clustered by the river brim and his mellow voice mingled with the drowsy hum of bees the whisper of the summer breeze amid the quivering rushes and the murmur of the weir.

* * * * *

"Eric!"

A hansom drew to the kerb and stopped, and Clare

Digitized by Google

"Penny Illustrated Paper says: "In 'ANTIPON' the world is made richer by a marvellous discovery."

"The Sheffield Independent" says: "'ANTIPON' is a preparation which bids fair to revolutionise medical science."

"Antipon" From All Chemists &

THE GREAT PERMANENT CURE FOR CORPULENCE

REG. TRADE MARK

The Marvellously Successful Permanent Cure for Corpulence.

THOSE who carefully read the leading organs of opinion must have been struck by the remarkable concensus of appreciation in favour of "ANTIPON," the newly-discovered specific for the Permanent Cure of Corpulency. It has been universally welcomed. Many eminent medical men, specially requested to report upon the efficacy and quality of the ingredients of "ANTIPON," have been unanimous in their praise, and have pronounced it of the utmost value and entirely harmless to the most delicate person. In "ANTIPON" the world possesses at last a radical and lasting cure for obesity, which is not only a disease in itself, but one that causes others. "ANTIPON" has a special action possessed by no other remedy in anything like the same degree. Whilst rapidly absorbing and eliminating the excessive fat, both internal and subcutaneous, it acts as a marvellous tonic, increasing strength, renewing vitality, bracing up the nervous system, and giving back the energy of youth, together with elegance of figure and grace of movement.

Stoutness of Years' Standing in Either Sex

can be positively and permanently cured by a comparatively short course of "ANTIPON." Within a day and a night of taking the first dose there is a proved reduction varying from 8oz. to 3lbs., succeeded by a steady daily diminution of weight until all superfluous fat is destroyed and normal proportions are regained. The cure is then complete and lasting, and the doses may be discontinued without fear of the fat redeveloping. No drastic rules as to food and drink are required. The appetite, greatly improved by the tonic properties of "ANTIPON," must be fully satisfied, so that healthy muscular tissue may take the place of the flabby muscle from which the fatty infiltrations have been driven. "ANTIPON" has a marked tonic effect upon the digestive organs, perfecting the digestive process, and thus preventing the accumulation of waste undigested matter in the system. "ANTIPON" is an agreeable, liquid, non-mineral preparation of a wine-like appearance, and is taken without the slightest discomfort or inconvenience. Permanent elegance and sounder health are the priceless gifts conferred by a short and economical course of "ANTIPON."

"ANTIPON" can be had of Chemists, Stores, &c., price 2/6 and 4/6 per bottle, from stock or on order, or, should any difficulty arise, may be obtained (on sending cash remittance), post free, under private package, direct from the Sole Manufacturers—

THE "ANTIPON" COMPANY, 13 BUCKINGHAM STREET, STRAND, LONDON, W.C.

Telegraphic Address: "CORPULENCE, LONDON."

Digitized by Google

Armitage sprang on to the pavement.

"I've been wanting, oh! so badly, to see you—to have a long, long talk with you. Where have you been all this while and why have you avoided me?"

"Tut, tut, Clare; people can hear."

"What does it matter?"

"A deal to me, I assure you! You know I loathe effusiveness and detest a scene."

"Eric!" There were tears in her voice and her reproachful eyes were dim. "I think you are very cold and harsh to me, especially after all that has happened. Ah, me! how soon men can forget!"

"My dear girl!" he said impatiently, "if you have anything to say, by all means write to me; but, for Heaven's sake, don't improvise a dramatic scene in Piccadilly; besides, your hansom's waiting."

"Eric, I must speak with you, I will speak with you, where you choose. I have something to say that has been on my mind, that's been scorching in my mind. Take me somewhere where we can talk."

With an ill grace he gave way, paid and dismissed her cab, and together they turned into a fashionable tea-room and selected a table in an alcove where they could converse without being overheard.

"Now, Eric," she said, "let us once for all come to an understanding."

"By all means," he said nonchalantly; "you don't mind my cigarette?"

"You told me the last time that we met there was nothing between you and Lord Lynton's daughter, and you repeated a promise you had made a hundred times, that I should be your wife, I who helped you to be what you are, who risked so much for you, dared so much for you—Heaven help me!—sinned so much for you."

"My dear Clare, what's done is done."

"I know; and if you'd kept your bargain I should never have complained, however things befel. But you're not doing that—you're turning traitor, cutting me adrift. When I told you what I was hearing, that you were courting Lord Lynton's daughter, you told me it was false; but it was you who were lying, you were at her heels everywhere, you who once were my shadow now are hers."

"Well?" he asked.

"Well! Oh, Eric, think! she doesn't care for you, she wouldn't dare for you what I have dared for you; think before it's too late! Because I swear if you throw me over you sha'n't swim long; I'll tell the truth and the world that thinks so well of you shall know you for what you are!"

"And your proofs?"

"My proofs!" She paused, all the more furious than ever because she was compelled to pause, because she had no answer to that mocking taunt.

"Your ultimatum?" she cried passionately. "That promise you made me a hundred times—is it to be kept or broken?"

"My dear girl, I am a Member of Parliament, therefore you can quite understand I have made innumerable promises. To which particular one do you refer?"

"Eric Geldart, don't mock me!" she said; "for I warn you you are playing with fire. You have made me your tool and you are flinging me away. I have proved to you that I can be docile, useful, even priceless was your term, but I warn you I can also be dangerous. Taunt me with the ease with which you have fooled me and I swear to you that you shall find an enemy as deadly to you, your fortunes and your hopes as ever mortal man encountered."

He smiled scornfully. She was playing his game; it suited his plan best of all just then that they should quarrel, and that he should wrench himself free from all bonds between them.

"I must remind you," he said caustically, "it was you who sought, indeed, insisted upon this discussion. For my part my anxiety is to end it and avoid a repetition."

"You mean you want to be friends again, Eric?" she said hopefully, pleadingly, clutching at every straw of a chance of winning back his smile.

"As you please," he said; so coldly that her heart sank back again.

"You want to get rid of me," she said; "you are tired of me; besides, I know too much."

"Your first two premises I am prepared to grant; the third I unequivocally deny."

She looked him full in the face.

"I know, I know!" she said; "it's Madeleine Lorraine you want—the cold, marble blonde, who, if you win her, will never give you half the devotion I have showered upon you. You know it's true, you traitor! Yes, your brother, whom you wronged, named you Judas, and he was right!"

"And you?" he asked mockingly. "Remember that even had you the power as well as the will to substantiate your story and drag me down, you would have to sink with me."

"I wouldn't care for that, Eric; I may sink with you, but I'll drag you down."

He made a gesture of contemptuous impatience. Her breast heaved, her colour came and went, and with a giant effort of self-repression she went on:

"You think my threats are idle, you think that I, though able to help, am powerless to harm; very well then, from this hour I spare no pains, relax no efforts to find your brother Ronald, and tell him all the truth."

"You Jezebel! you dare not!" he hissed fiercely. But she had swept across towards the door, was already descending the velvet-covered staircase.

For some time he paced to and fro in deep thought. What if she kept her word? Why then—but at all hazards she must not keep her word, her quest must be frustrated and her angry tongue silenced. Even if—well, desperate cases need desperate remedies.

(Another long instalment next week.)

Pearson's

Fortune Teller.

By PROFESSOR P. R. S. FOLI.

Crown 8vo Cloth. Price 1s. Post Free 1s. 2d.

Some of the subjects in this interesting book are:

Augury by Birds—What Birds Foretell—Astrology—Gipsy Fortune-tellers—Antiquity of Card Reading—Charms—Christmas Customs—Facts about and instances of Clairvoyance—Crystal Gazing—The Crystal Globe—Three Kinds of Vision—Magnetic Precious Stones—Divination by a Wedding Ring, by Dominoes, by Palmistry, by Rods, Teacups, and the Wheel of Fortune—The Divining Rod—Odds and Ends of Omens—Advice and Hints for Beginners in Fortune-telling—Gipsies—Hallowe'en Charms—Lucky Stars—Mesmerism Supersedes Witchcraft—Lines on the Hand in Palmistry—Precious Stones and their Meanings—The Koh-i-noor—Psychometry—Rings and Bridecake—The Voice of Rings—Wedding Rings—Teacup Fortune-telling—When to Expect a Visitor—Picking up Horseshoes—Good and Bad Luck—Quaint Ceremonies—Snapdragon, etc., etc.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "Pearson's Fortune Teller," for which I inclose the sum of 1/2.

Name .....

Address .....

OR AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

Digitized by Google

The Symptoms of Catarrh.

The subject of catarrh is becoming of such universal interest, that the following questions have been selected as a guide for those who think they are afflicted:

Is the voice husky?
Is the nose stopped up?
Does the nose discharge?
Is the breath offensive?
Do crusts form in the nose?
Do you have sneezing spells?
Is the sense of smell leaving?
Is there fulness in the throat?
Do you have to clear the throat?
Do you expectorate frequently?
Do you sleep with the mouth open?
Are you nauseated in the morning?
Do you have aching pains in the limbs?
Is there pain in the front of the head?
Is there dropping of phlegm in the throat?

A further explanation of the causes of these symptoms, and a more complete description of the various forms of catarrh, can be found in the last issue of The Review of Ear, Nose and Throat Diseases. Those who are interested can obtain a free copy of this Medical Publication by addressing The Editor, Drouet Institute, 10 Marble Arch, London, W. The editor advises patients, however, when possible, to visit the Institute for a personal consultation with the medical staff. Consulting hours are, in the morning, 10 to 12, and in the afternoon, 2 to 4, week days only. A fee of five shillings is charged for personal consultations.

If you wish to EAT WELL
— TAKE —
BEECHAM'S PILLS.

You will EAT WELL,

because by their specific action on the digestive organs Beecham's Pills remove the sensation of fulness and oppression commonly experienced, give the appetite "edge," and restore the stomach to healthy and natural function.

Sold everywhere in Boxes price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 pills).

BALDNESS.

A French Specialist who has devoted his life to the study of Hair Diseases, having cured thousands of almost hopeless cases, will send a FREE TRIAL PACKET of a genuine inexpensive treatment to all who write enclosing 2 stamps. New Hair grows in 4 to 10 Days.
Mr. C. Rounds writes: "Your small sample has done me more good in a week than another much advertised remedy did in 6 months."
P. HENRI-FRANCIS, BRIXTON ROAD, LONDON.

HYPNOTISM

Learn at home. Startle your friends. Also strong personal magnetic influence. Wonderful nerve power. Scientific. Great advantage. Illustrated book sent free. Published by Psychic Research Co. (Dept. 437), Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, E.C. (Id. stamp).

TRIUMPH Cycles

£10 10 to £19 19
or by Deferred Payment System.
"The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce."
CATALOGUES GRATIS.
TRIUMPH CYCLE CO. Ltd., COVENTRY.
4 and 5, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.
80 Deansgate Arcade Manchester 4 King Edward St. Leeds

The Daily Express

HA'PENNY.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free
C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

"NO BETTER FOOD."
Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's
Pure Concentrated
Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Is it the Same Girl?

A FEW weeks ago "DISCONSOLATE LOVER" told me the story of his meeting years ago with a factory girl, for whom he since developed a tender feeling, but from the day of his meeting till now he has not seen her. "EDNA" now writes to me, on the chance that she is able to help the disconsolate one. Here is her story. Does it tally with that of "DISCONSOLATE LOVER"?

The meeting took place in the Lea Bridge Road, and the girl was working in Homerton. She was with a friend on a day's outing, and both the girls were dressed in pale blue blouses and fawn skirts. One is since married, the other single. "DISCONSOLATE LOVER" will at once recognise if this is the lady to whom he refers, and if so, no doubt will communicate with me.

Edna takes the opportunity to deny the suggestion that factory girls do not read newspapers. "One of the girls in question," she says, "was the daughter of a captain, R.N., the other's father held a good position in the G.P.O. Both were highly educated, and you may be surprised to know that very many girls who work in factories are in similar positions."

Business Girls and Future Husbands.

"My daughter wishes to go into business," writes "MATER," "but I am afraid if she did she might spoil her chances of meeting a suitable young man whom she might marry. Do you think this is likely to be the case?"

No, "MATER." If a girl has the qualities which attract "suitable" young men, she will find them as useful in business as at home. True, the general run of men nowadays do not regard the business woman with any favour, but that is often due to the ungracious attitude of the woman herself. If a girl has the right womanly qualities, they will be better appreciated in business than anywhere, and your daughter is quite likely to meet the right sort of man, as usually girls who have had a sound commercial training make excellent economical wives.

Cross Purposes.

"OURS is rather an uncommon affair," writes "PERPLEXED." "We are two old Eton boys of independent means. Whilst staying at Scarborough for a day or two we met a charming young lady. I just took a casual liking to her, but my friend fell hopelessly in love. The girl, on her part, will not listen to his overtures, but always seems to delight in my company. What can I do?"

As your friend is in love with the girl, and you yourself are not, you should show your friendship by withdrawing yourself from competition. The girl may have taken a fancy to you, but unless you feel that you return it in kind you had better not have anything to do with it, especially as your friend is already in love.

Early Morning Courtship Not Advisable.

"ANNIE" writes: "My sweetheart and I live in the same street, and he passes our door every morning on his way to his train. Now do you think I ought to walk with him to the station? I have often thought of doing so, but don't know whether it would be a kindness to him or not. Please offer your advice."

"ANNIE" is evidently a most well-meaning sweetheart. However, I don't, as a matter of principle, advise her to walk to the station in the morning. After all, the young man might be induced to lose his train out of desire to remain as long as possible with her, and even if he caught it, love making so early in the morning is not the best prelude to a day's business. I have known love letters which have utterly unfitted many an admirable young man for his day's work. What "ANNIE" might do would be to meet him as he returns at night. That is the time when a man most feels that he wants a little relaxation from business cares, not early in the morning. I am sure if you take my advice you will not regret it.

Actresses' Love Affairs.

"MASIE" writes: "We are two actresses on tour. We are both in love with the same young man. How are we to know which of us he loves best, as he treats us both in the same way? As he sends up flowers and chocolates often, we are sure he means something serious. By the way, is it proper for us to ask him to supper at our rooms after the theatre? We do not see any harm."

Depend on it, it is one of you two that he has taken a fancy to, but as a nice-minded fellow, he would not like to show preference to one while the other was present. As you are both in love with him, naturally you will neither of you wish to give way to the other. Better leave it to the young man to decide. As to asking him to your rooms, we know that amongst actresses ideas are rather different on the matter of propriety to those in general vogue. An actress has so much to do with the opposite sex that she is fairly capable of looking after herself. If the other girls in the theatre do not think it right of you to ask the man to supper, I should discontinue doing so. After all, propriety depends on custom, and even in touring companies there are unwritten laws on such matters which ought to be obeyed.

Life of a Stewardess.

TO BECOME a stewardess on a liner, "ELLA," you would not have to pass any examination. A good education, and plenty of tact and patience, besides, if possible, a knowledge of some foreign language, are the most useful qualities, and would stand you in the best stead on board, when passengers are apt to be very trying. Of course, a stewardess has to go through grades of service, beginning, generally, with the third-class passengers and passing to second and first. The stewardess has principally to attend to the ladies on board, make beds, wait on them with their morning tea or coffee, look after them when unwell, and take care of children.

Stewardesses are generally women of a good class, and often ladies' maids and nurses prove very fitted for the work. The work is perhaps the best of all kinds of domestic service, as a good stewardess is an invaluable servant to a company. As to details and pay, they had best be ascertained from the offices of a company. I believe pay is generally from £3 to £4 per month, and tips are, of course, generously given.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Number Two of this Splendid New Boy's Paper is Now on Sale,

1d.

Even though No. 1 was such a marvellous production, No. 2 is infinitely better! This is a bold statement to make—purchase a copy of the second issue and test its truthfulness. We know you will not be disappointed.

Chief among the many attractive features in "THE BOYS' LEADER" are:

THE CITY OF DARKNESS:

A story of Wonder and Peril, by SIDNEY DREW.

HOW I FLY MY WAR-KITES:

A splendid article by gallant Major Baden Powell, the officer who first adopted Kites to the purposes of Warfare.

GROCER, BARONET, & SPORTSMAN:

The real life story of Sir Thomas Lipton.

WINNING HIS SPURS:

A thrilling romance of the days of the Brave Black Prince by HENRY T. JOHNSON.

THE ADVENTURES OF SUNNY JIM AND DISMAL DAVID,

By the inimitable YORICK.

There are three other unique new serial stories, including one by M. JULES VERNE; a grand complete story, a bright chatty page by the Editor, and many novel, up-to-date articles of great use and interest.

GET A COPY OF NO. 2 OF "THE BOYS' LEADER" TO-DAY.

PEARSON'S NEW BOY'S PAPER. "THE PAPER A BOY CAN TAKE HOME."

DELICIOUS WHOLESOME
PURE

16 GOLD MEDALS
& HIGHEST AWARDS

JOHN HILL & SONS

SEND 3D

THE "TUDNO" CAKE.

Splendid for daily family use, of choicest quality and Genoa character,
8d. per lb.

"ROTHESAY" RICE.

A delightful plain cake, rich and fragrant. A ½lb. sample sent free on receipt of 3d. in stamps to cover postage.

The "TUDNO" Cake & Biscuit Factories, Ashton under-Lyne.

MATCH "MATCHLESS"

YOU COULDN'T

There's no METAL POLISH equals it.

GUARANTEED FREE FROM ACID.
PRODUCES QUICKLY A LASTING BRILLIANCY.

MANUFACTURERS:
THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH CO., LIVERPOOL.

73,368 PAIRS

REPRESENTS THE INCREASE IN THE SALE OF

"OCEANIC" BOOTS

DURING THE LAST SIX MONTHS.

Half-a-Guinea Everywhere

TRY THEM!

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 769.] Week ending September 26, 1903. [Price One Penny.

"HE MUST NOT BE TAKEN ALIVE!" CRIED THE GIRL, AS SHE HELD BACK THE WOULD-BE RESCUER OF THE DROWNING MAN.

(A Thrilling Incident from "A TRIAL OF STRENGTH." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

Kaputine is not a single dangerous drug, such as has been condemned by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The medical paper "Health," recommends

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache,

Toothache & Neuralgia.

Cures in Ten Minutes.

Safely, surely and without bad after effects.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1 ; Samples 1d. each

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free. Kindly mention this paper.

"Cause and Effect"

"When I started business, single handed, sixteen years ago, I realised that a satisfied customer was my best advertisement. To-day I head one of the Largest Business Enterprises in the World, employing nearly 3,000 people in my Offices, Warehouses, and Works in Sheffield. Every article which leaves my Warehouses is sent out on the distinct understanding that, if when received it is not perfectly satisfactory, it must be returned to me. I consider this arrangement a happy combination of Free Trade and Protection."

"I PROVIDE EVERYTHING."

If the goods are perfectly satisfactory you can pay for them as you prefer: Cash or by Easy Monthly Instalments, full particulars of which are enclosed with each Catalogue, together with Order Forms and details of important advantages offered to Cash Purchasers."

Each Departmental Catalogue sent Post Free on application.

MENTION NUMBER OF CATALOGUE REQUIRED.

1. Watches. All my well-known Watch Specialities fully illustrated and described. Our Watch Department is the Largest Watch-Sales Concern in the World.
2. Tools and Machinery. Thousands of illustrations. Every known Tool and Machine is supplied on Easy Terms of Payment.
3. Furniture. Every Furnishing requirement is illustrated. My System of Furnishing by Easy Instalments is fully explained.
4. Mantles & Costumes. A beautiful Album of the Fashions of the Season.
5. Gent's Tailoring. This Stylish Department is splendidly equipped, and is probably the Largest Clothing Business in Great Britain.
6. Boots and Shoes. Beautifully illustrated. A Splendid Choice of the Newest Ideas in Foot Wear. Contractors to His Majesty's Government.
7. Bookselling Department. Catalogue describes a vast assortment of Standard and Current Literature.
8. Sheffield Cutlery and Plate. The produce of my own Factories illustrated and fully described. Hotel and Shipping Orders a Speciality.
9. Glass, China, Lamps and Stoves. Dinner and Tea Services, Toilet and Bedroom Ware, Lamps, Stoves, etc.
10. Clocks. Every known style and make supplied on Easy Terms of Payment.
11. General Draperies, etc. Dress Goods, Blankets, Sheets, Furs, Ladies' Outfitting, Babies' and Children's Clothing, etc.
12. Gold Jewellery and Diamonds. Engagement and Wedding Rings, Bracelets, Brooches, and all kinds of Gold Ornaments, fully illustrated and described.
13. General Fancy Goods. Bags, Umbrellas, Albums, every kind of Leather Goods for Wedding Presents and Home Use.
14. Cameras and Optical Goods. Hundreds of Designs by the most reliable makers.
15. Bicycles and Domestic Machinery. Cycles of all kinds, Mail Carts, Perambulators, Washing and Wringing Machines, Sewing and Knitting Machines, Knife Cleaning Machines, etc.
16. Musical Department. Pianos, Organs, and every known Musical Instrument supplied on Easy Payment Terms.
17. Army and Navy. A Catalogue representing all kinds of Goods required by all grades of the Services.
18. Colonial Department. A comprehensive Illustrated Book which deals with the requirements of customers abroad, and quotes Special Cash Discount for Shipping Orders.

Agents Wanted in Spare Time. Liberal Commission. Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars.

J. G. Graves 69 Division Street, SHEFFIELD.

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London W.C

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 769.] Week Ending September 26th, 1903. [One Penny.

A Trial of Strength.

The Story of a Daughter's Devotion and Determination, and of a Lover's Dilemma Between Love and Duty.

"Whose portrait is that, Dorie?" asked Mr. Pearse, placing his hand affectionately on his daughter's shoulder.

She looked up hastily from the cabinet photograph which she had been so intently surveying; both her cheeks and eyes betrayed some confusion, but she answered simply and unhesitatingly:

"It is the portrait of Mr. Lionel Marlowe, father; he is a good friend of mine!"

Mr. Pearse's face became slightly more grave; it had worn a worried appearance when he had entered, but this expression had deepened in intensity on hearing his daughter's reply. He took a seat by her side on the small couch in Mrs. Hiller's somewhat diminutive drawing-room and held out his hand for the photo.

"Let me have a good look at this gentleman, Dorie!" he remarked earnestly. "I conclude, from a little tell-tale blush, that he is a very good friend!"

The colour on Dora Pearse's cheeks became deeper, but she gazed fearlessly in his eyes as she handed him the photo, with the two words "He is!" uttered emphatically.

There were many persons who did not understand the character of Dora Pearse, for it was a strange mixture of meekness and fearlessness. She could be gentle and yielding in the extreme, where love or compassion ruled her, but in other respects there was an almost masculine determination about her. Even as one admired the lovely face, with its well-moulded features and crowned by a wealth of nut-brown hair, one was forced to recognise that the lines of that countenance indicated great strength of purpose. "She is a woman who would go through more than the proverbial fire and water for those whom she loved, but also in the cause of justice and honour!" was the opinion inaudibly expressed by this same Mr. Lionel Marlowe; "and yet who can gauge the treasure of love and tenderness also denoted by that face?"

"I like the look of him, Dorie!" Mr. Pearse remarked slowly. In spite of the fact that it was not to his liking to speak out—so much was evident—yet he gave a truthful opinion. "It is a good face; he seems to be the kind of man whom you could trust, but in such an important matter, my dear, you must know more about him than a picture can tell you!"

"I am glad you like him, father!" cried Dorie, drawing a little closer to him and gazing steadfastly at him. "You have always told me that I am a good judge of human nature, and that I can deduce a person's character from the countenance. I am sure that I am not mistaken in Mr. Marlowe! Moreover, I have learnt to know and love him during my stay here! But," she added suddenly, "you have not told me if your business was successful."

"H'm! Partly!" responded Mr. Pearse hesitatingly. He shifted uneasily on the couch. "Are you sure that you are a good judge of character, Dorie?" he continued, turning the conversation to the former topic. "Now," he added, with a smile that was plainly forced, "you often tell me that I am a good, dear—what else is it? Well, for all you know, I might have committed some crime. Do you think that impossible?"

"Oh, father, don't talk in that way! I declare you make me feel creepy! As if that were at all probable! No—you are—but I won't repeat myself! I half believe you are doing it in order to hear me extol your virtues!"

This last suggestion amused her, and she laughed merrily. Mr. Pearse forced a more pronounced smile, but it died quickly away.

"I was trying to show you, Dorie, that it is not, after all, safe to judge by appearances. I have altered my notions lately; I feel that it is possible to believe in the goodness of a person who may yet have something against him! That is why I say that you must learn Mr. Marlowe's character more thoroughly before trusting him or bestowing your affection irrevocably upon him!"

"I cannot understand you to-day, father! You are not yourself, and I am sure that the horrid business is troubling you! Now, tell me the truth about your journey to Wigan!"

Mr. Pearse did not reply for some seconds, at the end of which time he said slowly:

"It will be better to tell you exactly how matters stand,

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

Dorie! That is, so far as I know myself! I shall have to leave England and go to the Antipodes, my dear! It is for that reason, in great part, that I am sorry to hear about Mr. Marlowe."

"Why is it, father dear?" she asked, putting her hand caressingly on his cheek. "Have you lost your money? Do not fear to say so; I am brave!"

"No, it is not that—at least, not yet! If I go to Australia I may lose nothing, but if I remain here, I may be a beggar! Perhaps——"

He stopped abruptly and a frightened expression passed swiftly across his face.

"Perhaps what, father?" asked Dorie anxiously.

"Oh, we won't think of anything else than the necessity of leaving this country! I must clear up certain matters, then I shall leave our house as it is and try to sell it, furniture and all, through an agent! Now, my dear, don't bother any more about it! The whole affair is too complicated for you to understand, and I am too worried to dwell on it at present! We must get back to Bramhurst at once; in fact, I am thinking of going back this evening and you can follow to-morrow. I must thank Mrs. Hiller for having had you here! Have you enjoyed the stay in London? Oh, well, I suppose so! This is proof of it!" he concluded, handing the photograph to her.

He rose to his feet to ring the bell, but a sudden thought flashed across his mind, and he turned to his daughter with a genuine smile.

"I haven't asked about the gentleman's means and position, or his 'prospects,' Dorie!" he remarked. "You know, my dear, that I am not a stickler for position, and I shall, if all goes well, be able to provide for you; but a man should have some occupation and be able to hold up his head! I don't want a fortune-hunter!"

"He is about seven years older than I am, father, and I am twenty-three; old enough, as a lady visitor remarked to Mrs. Hiller, to be married and settled. He is not a man of means, but he is rising in his profession, and is considered clever. He has already been sent abroad on several missions on account of his knowledge of languages and his abilities in other directions. He is engaged in a profession which has always had a fascination for me. I am somewhat romantic, you know!"

Mr. Pearse started. "Not——?" he began, but Dora interrupted him.

"Yes, a detective! He chose the profession out of love for it and his father has disinherited him in consequence, or he would be well off! He has told me of some of his work, and I long to be able to help him!"

The girl's eyes flashed with excitement and enthusiasm; her father turned very pale and moved towards the bell. A minute later Mrs. Hiller entered, and the conversation became general on the subject of the return of father and daughter to Bramhurst.

Ultimately it was decided that Dorie should not return till the following day, or the day after that; but Mr. Pearse declared that he himself was bound to go at once.

Dora Pearse was far less gay than usual after the departure of her father, and good-hearted Mrs. Hiller wisely considered that it was better to leave her to her own thoughts. It was not a pleasant outlook. She had given her heart to Lionel Marlowe, whose acquaintance she had made in a manner that appealed to her romantic nature; no formal engagement had been entered into, but she loved him, and the engagement was a mere formality, to be consummated after her father's return. And now she was torn between two troubles; if she married Lionel Marlowe, she must remain in England, while her father, whom she loved with a devotion rarely met with, must live alone at the other end of the world; and if Marlowe gave up his friends and his career here, in order to go with her and her father, that step would probably blight his prospects.

Then there was her father's unhappy position. They had lived comfortably during the last ten years in a modest country house at Bramhurst, Sussex; her father had told her that he had made a fair amount of money by a lucky speculation, but that he had determined to live quietly on the interest instead of endeavouring to increase it by continuing in business.

"I might live in grander style," he had said, "but I think that I am happier in this modest way and without the worries of commerce. Of course, I am somewhat interested in business, so to speak, as my money must be made to bear fruit in the way of dividends."

It had not always been so; in the earlier years of their married life Mr. and Mrs. Pearse had known hard times, and the great grief of her father was that Mrs. Pearse had succumbed to typhoid fever within three months of the lucky speculation.

All had gone well till within the last week. Dora had come to London for a month's holiday, while her father had gone on a fishing excursion, with the intention of rejoining her at the end of a fortnight; but business had first taken him back to Bramhurst and then to Wigan, with the result that has just been made known to us.

Dora's rather unpleasant reverie was broken by the arrival of Mr. Lionel Marlowe. For a time all Dora's sadness was dispelled, and it made Mrs. Hiller sigh for the hopefulness of youth, and live her own courtship over again as she watched the frank greetings exchanged by the lovers.

"I am pleased to see you, Mr. Marlowe!" said Mrs. Hiller candidly. "I hope you will be able to drive the blues away from our young friend!"

Marlowe turned an anxious look of inquiry towards Dora, who did not answer, but moved to the couch. Marlowe followed her, and they sat together at one end of the room, while Mrs. Hiller was busy with some lacework at the other.

"What is it, dear?" asked Marlowe earnestly, taking her hand and gazing with a lover's ardour upon her beautiful face, now slightly pale. "Let me know all about it, and perhaps I can chase the trouble to—to the other side of the globe!" he finished, unwittingly touching the very topic.

"That's just what is the matter!" cried Dora, smiling in spite of herself. And she told him.

Marlowe was grave. It was a severe blow to him to think of throwing up his career in the old country, but his mind reverted to an heroic moment, and his love for her conquered all else.

"If it really comes to that, I will go with you!" he declared decisively. "So that settles it, and we will not think of it any more, except to hope that your father's affairs will right themselves swiftly. Now let me explain a fresh task that has been given to me!"

"Yes, yes! What is it?" asked Dora eagerly.

"It is a curious case, in its way," said Marlowe. "It seems that about ten years or so ago, a man's life was insured for £10,000 by an outsider; that is, not by the man himself. The insured person was healthy, and the premium was ordinary. But it proved to be a bad bargain for the insurance company. The insured, to use the technical term, went to a certain seaside town not very well known to holiday-makers, contracted typhoid fever, and died. The insured lived rather a nomadic existence, being a man of independent means, staying at this place and that, so that the insurance company were more particular concerning proof of identity than would otherwise have been the case. However, the proofs were forthcoming, and the money was paid.

Digitized by Google

"Nothing more was thought of the case till a few days ago, when a man made a death-bed confession which was forwarded to the insurance company. This man stated that the whole thing was a fraud on the insurance company; he was the man who impersonated the insured, and he was employed by Palmer, the insurer, to do it. He went about the country with the avowed object of getting hold of a body—there are many unidentified dead bodies picked out of the rivers, or found in unwholesome localities. This body would be passed off as that of the insured, and certain papers would be inserted in the pockets to insure success. Of course, the live man would disappear, and Palmer would come forward and identify the body as that of the man whose life he had insured.

"Fortune appears to have favoured these rascals, for they got hold of a man whom they found unconscious on the roadway of a West of England town. It seems that Granger—that's the impersonator—knew something of medicine, and said that the man would not live long. He took the unfortunate man in hand, and exchanged the contents of his pockets for certain papers. He even had the audacity to exchange clothing; or rather, he got some new clothes for himself, then dressed the poor fellow in his (Granger's) own. All this time the wretched man was dying of typhoid fever."

"How terrible!" murmured Dora, her eyes moist with pity for the hapless man at the mercy of rascals. The next instant they were aflame with indignation. "And now there is an opportunity to bring them to justice and you are to do it?"

"Granger is dead," returned Marlowe. "I thought that the two villains had contributed to the death of the stranger by their treatment of him and by the delay, but Granger on his death-bed vowed that it was not so, and that the stranger could not have recovered. It was arranged that Granger should inform the police and see that the man was removed to the hospital, where he died. Palmer went off to London to avoid suspicion. The stranger was not unlike Granger in appearance and it was less suspicious to die of typhoid fever than to be pulled out of the water. That is why I said that fortune favoured them.

"When the stranger died, Palmer's address was found among his papers. Palmer was communicated with and identified his friend. The insurance company made inquiries, but the rascals had planned the thing well, and the money was paid. Granger, I find, did not know the amount of the insurance; he thought it was for £2,000, and he received £1,000—half the proceeds, as he thought."

"And have you any clue to Palmer?" asked Dora eagerly. "He ought to be severely punished!"

"Granger did not know his real name or much about him, and ten years have elapsed, remember. Granger described him, and the description was communicated to the police both there and in London. And just now I have been told that one of the policemen of Wigan says that he caught a glimpse of a man answering somewhat to the description only yesterday, but was unable to follow him for the obvious reason that the officer was leaving the railway station in a train and saw the man on the platform as the train ran out. Subsequent inquiries have produced other information, which I needn't repeat to you, and to-morrow morning I am going to Bramhurst, Sussex. What do you think of that, dear?" he cried with a laugh.

He had not noticed her countenance for the last two or three minutes, and he was struck, on raising his eyes, to observe the deathly pallor of her face. He did not know that she was repeating to herself: "Ten years ago! Wigan! Bramhurst!"

"What is the matter, Dora?" he cried in alarm. "Are you ill?"

Then the determined nature of the girl manifested itself; with an effort she recovered herself, laughed, and forced some colour into her cheeks by a strain of the breath.

"I think your story unnerved me for the moment!" she cried, with a semblance of gaiety. "What is the description of Palmer? I know most of the people in Bramhurst, you know, and I might help you!"

She waited with bated breath for his reply, and her heart sank as she recognised a rough description of — her father! In spite of her great effort, the blow almost stunned her for the moment; but the effects passed away quickly in the face of the great danger that threatened her parent. Perhaps he was not the guilty man, yet—— Merciful Heavens! how the details fitted in with certain facts! Her father's own words, too, about having committed crimes! She sat still for a moment; she had forgotten Lionel's presence. He reminded her of it by asking:

"Do you recognise him?"

"I am afraid I cannot help you!" she rejoined, shaking her head slowly.

He did not know that it was an evasion, so he merely smiled and said that he hoped to get to the bottom of the matter in double-quick time when he reached Bramhurst, for which place he would take an early train in the morning.

"You once said that you would be willing to do me any favour that I might ask, Lionel!" she said suddenly, laying her hand on his. "Do you mean it? I may claim that favour!"

"I will do it if it is possible!" he replied with a laugh. "I am only human, mind, so do not expect the supernatural!"

At this juncture, much to Dora's relief, Mrs. Hiller intervened.

"You don't look well to-night, Dora! You have been worried! I really think that you ought to lie down or go to bed, notwithstanding the early hour!"

"I agree, Mrs. Hiller!" observed Marlowe, rising. "I will take my departure and leave her in your care. If you go to Bramhurst to-morrow, my dear, I may see you there, and I should like to be introduced to your father!"

It was with difficulty that Dora repressed a shiver at this remark, but she contrived to escape observation by stooping to pick up her handkerchief.

Scarcely had Marlowe quitted the house than Dora astounded Mrs. Hiller with the statement that she must return to Bramhurst at once.

"But, my dear child," expostulated Mrs. Hiller as soon as she had recovered from her amazement, "you couldn't get there till nearly midnight! And——"

"Don't stop me, Mrs. Hiller!" pleaded Dora. "But help me by coming to the station with me!"

Finding all expostulation vain, Mrs. Hiller acceded to the request for help. And so it came about that Dora Pearse entered Bramhurst Lodge at midnight, twelve hours in advance of the detective-lover, who was to seek and arrest her father for a grave crime!

To her dismay, her father had not returned and she was left to conjecture that he had not carried out his original intention of going straight to Bramhurst at once. She did not go to bed; it was unlikely that he would appear before morning, but she could not rest, although she assured the startled housekeeper (whose repose she had interrupted) that she would retire within a few minutes.

The night dragged its weary length away, but Dora remained waiting, and racked by the anxiety that the arm of the law would reach her father before she could warn him. In the morning breakfast was brought to her, but she could not eat. It was near mid-day when she heard the sound of wheels; she started to her feet and looked out, half expecting to see Lionel's figure in the cart, but it was her father—at last!

Digitized by Google

When he entered the room and saw her, he shrank from her and for an instant he seemed inclined to flee. That movement confirmed her suspicions! She went to him with outstretched hands.

"Father!" she cried in tones of agonised appeal. "Is it true?"

The guilty man trembled; with a wild cry he fell on his knees before her and gazed at her beseechingly.

"Dora, Dora!" he wailed piteously. "Are you going to turn from me?"

It was a terrible picture, the father kneeling before the daughter and appealing for both forgiveness and help in that wild cry!

"I was poor! Your mother was ailing, and you were wanting better nourishment as well as she! Luck was against me! I was desperate and temptation came! But I have suffered for it, suffered bitterly! And now the police are after me, and it will be prison for me, and disgrace and poverty for you, unless we get away before my identity is discovered!"

Despite his guilt and degradation, the inborn love for her father conquered every other feeling in Dora's breast. She caught his hands and raised him to his feet. She was calm and determined.

"No, I will not turn from you, father! Hasten, for you have no time to spare. Get your things together and fly as quickly as you can, for the police are already in the village, searching for one whose description resembles yours!"

Hurriedly, and with scarce a word, the father and daughter made their preparations for flight, but they were too late. As they left the Lodge on foot and hastened down the road and walked swiftly along the main street, hurrying towards a lane that would take them to another village where escape would be easier, Marlowe's figure appeared higher up the uneven thoroughfare.

Dora uttered a little cry. Pearse instinctively divined its meaning, and dashed forward in order to get to the lane and disappear.

Marlowe saw the burly figure, but in his excitement failed to recognise Dora. In a moment Pearse had vanished down the lane, and Marlowe was running at full speed to the narrow turning, down which he also disappeared.

Summoning all her strength, Dora followed, calling to Lionel to stop. He did not hear her, but raced after his quarry.

Suddenly, as she ran along the lane, Dora heard a splash, and then there was a cry uttered by Lionel Marlowe. She reached the bend in the lane and saw her father struggling in the centre of a wide and very deep pool, while Marlowe stood aghast at the side.

"The fool will drown!" cried the young detective. But then his professional pride took the upper hand, and he exclaimed: "Not if I know it! He sha'n't escape me like that!"

He threw off his coat and waistcoat and was about to leap into the water to save and capture the would-be suicide, when he felt his arm grasped by a hand that closed over it like a vice. Turning with an angry exclamation, he saw the white, set face of Dora Pearse!

What followed was a matter of seconds, although it may take minutes to tell it.

"He is my father!" cried Dora. Her voice was calm, notwithstanding the storm that was raging within her. "He must not be taken alive! Will you let him go free for my sake? Shout to him that he may live and escape—for my sake! I claim the favour you promised me, Lionel!"

She had saved him from terrible injury, perhaps from death, when his bicycle had skidded on the wet road and had thrown him almost under the feet of the omnibus horses. It crossed his mind in a flash how that this apparently weak, slim girl had seized the heads of the horses and had turned them aside, saving him before he had properly realised the position! And now she claimed the reward, and asked him to act dishonourably to his chosen vocation!

The struggle was sharp, but brief.

"I cannot be false to the trust placed in me, not even for your sake, my love!" he cried in anguish. "Unhand me, Dora, and Heaven have pity on us all!"

He strove to free himself, but she held him tightly.

"You shall not save him to take him to prison!" she cried. "He is my father and you shall not save him!"

"He will drown!" he cried desperately. "Would you have him die? You do not realise that he is drowning!"

"Better death than the disgrace of the prison!" she replied, with terrible earnestness.

He had been one of the very few who had really comprehended the complex character of Dora Pearse, but even he was not prepared for this stoical conduct. It staggered him for an instant; he heard the appealing cry: "For my sake!" and then he threw her aside roughly and sprang into the water, while Dora Pearse fell on her knees and in her heart she hoped that he might be too late!

She watched him as he swam to the spot where she had last seen her father, and then the awful ordeal proved too much even for her, and she fainted.

It was nearly a month after that terrible scene before Dora Pearse returned to a full consciousness of her surroundings, for Heaven had been merciful to her, and an attack of brain fever had prevented her from knowing what was passing. When she recovered, the affair was forgotten except by those immediately concerned. The money unjustly obtained from the insurance company had been safely invested by Pearse and had been added to; therefore, when the amount of the premium was deducted from the £10,000, it was found that the balance was intact, and this was restored to the company. Of course the company had lost the interest on the money for a long period, but it was glad to have the capital returned.

It was not till Dora was on the high road to recovery that good Mrs. Hiller ventured to mention Marlowe's name.

"He wishes to see you, Dora!" she said simply. "Don't break his heart by refusing!"

So Dora assented and Marlowe came in. Each noted how much the other had aged in that one short month!

"Can you forgive me?" asked Lionel softly. "I, too, have suffered since then, but it was my duty!"

"It is I who should ask for forgiveness for tempting you!" she replied gently. "But he was my father!"

He took her hand and kissed it, and shortly afterwards he left her.

Two years have passed; Lionel Marlowe gave up his vocation, and his father withdrew his malediction, and has even gone so far as to say that if Lionel will marry Dora Pearse, why, "I suppose I must agree, for it will look foolish to disinherit him again!" From this it will be seen that Lionel still hopes to be united to his loved one, while Dora herself is coming to the conclusion that there will be a day when she can give him her hand to accompany the heart which passed into his keeping long ago!

G. Bramley.

To Story Writers.

We shall be pleased to consider complete novelettes of about 20,000 words in length, and to pay cash down for those accepted. Manuscripts must be type-written (or very legibly hand-written), and should be sent to The Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Postage for return of MSS., if unsuitable, should be inclosed.

Digitized by Google

. . TWO . . ENGAGEMENTS.

A Tale of Happy Coincidences.

NINA is sitting on the fresh young grass, among the apple-blossoms. The bright girl was not unlike an apple-blossom herself, in her pink-and-white dress of clear muslin.

Nina was not a beauty by any means; but nineteen healthful, happy years had given her the charms and graces of a pure contented maidenhood—gentle eyes, a smile like sunshine, oceans of light-brown hair, and a strong, quiet heart.

The young man whose length of supple limb lay stretched beside her, among the devastated clovers, was decidedly handsome, with his light curling hair, almost golden in its brightness, and dark eyebrows, arched over lovely, melancholy dark eyes.

His straw hat was on the grass beside him, and he was leaning rather uncomfortably on his elbow, with his luminous gaze fixed persistently on the absorbed, yet smiling face above him.

There had been quite a long silence between these two, who were here alone in this blossoming orchard, with the soft, fragrant petals showering down around them, and no other company but vagrant butterflies and hard-working bees to share their solitude.

When the young man spoke at last, it was in a very discontented voice:

"You know very well I want to speak to you, Nina. You know I sent the children away for no other purpose; I must speak to you. But you sit there counting your stitches, and looking so cool——"

"I don't count them," she answered good-humouredly, and letting her eyes rest on his an instant. "Dear me! what a frowning forehead! Well, then, why don't you speak? I shall be delighted to hear anything you may have——"

"I don't want you to be delighted," he interrupted shortly. "And do, for mercy sake, put that eternal needlework away! I would like your undivided attention for once."

The tatting was instantly disposed of in a convenient apron-pocket, and the nimble white hands clasped each other, at rest.

"Am I not good and obedient? Now for the wonderful story. If you really are coming to confession, Star, why, that is just splendid!"

"For the listener? See here, Nina, you have heard me speak of—of Laura Dalton, haven't you?"

"Never. You have never mentioned her name until this moment, Star, and you know it!"

"Of course I know it. Who said I didn't? Well, I'm going to mention her now. I met her at my aunt's when they lived in Ashington three winters ago. She is an orphan—a sort of ward of Aunt Maggie—and when I had known her two months we were engaged."

"Very rational on both sides. You were then nineteen. At what period of her infancy was Miss Dalton?"

"Well, sixteen, perhaps. She has been at school in Germany ever since, until a month ago. But the worst of it is, Nina," he added, stretching out his hand and laying it on hers, "we are engaged at this present moment."

If he had expected to meet any stormy demonstration of surprise, or grief, or anger, he found himself wonderfully mistaken. The tranquil blue eyes widen a little, and the colour deepens slightly in the rounded cheeks, but the sweet voice replied, in its usual clear tone:

"How strange of you, Star, not to speak of this before? And why should it be 'the worst of it' that you are still engaged?"

"Because I am very unhappy, and because I do not love poor Laura. She is such a foolish, frivolous creature—just a big, warm-hearted child, that is all. Tell me, Nina, dearest," strengthening his pressure on the passive fingers, "haven't you known all along—ever since that first night when we walked home through the beech woods from Aunt Maggie's—haven't you known that I loved you?"

"Yes," she said, in almost a whisper, "I have known it, Starwood."

"And you wondered that I could keep silence?"

"Yes," she said again, very softly. "But then you knew of my engagement."

"Your engagement? Nina please don't begin about that. A wretched arrangement between fathers and mothers. I've no patience to speak of it. You know very well you will never marry Doctor Leslie."

"Of course I will marry him," opening still wider the soft blue eyes. "I wonder at you, Star."

"You won't marry Doctor Leslie, and for a very good reason, Nina; you will marry me."

"Starwood!"

"For Heaven's sake, don't look at me like that; I have not proposed to kill anybody. It is only this, dearest—I cannot marry Laura Dalton when my whole heart belongs to you, and I know, too, that you care for me dearly—dearly."

"I care for you too much to let you act dishonourably," she answered steadily; but there were tears in her drooped eyes, and she unclasped her hands to take his own into their gentle embrace. "You should have spoken before. It is all so strange to me. And the girl—Starwood. Does she love you?"

"That's the trouble. She loves me to distraction. Her little letters break my heart. She is so happy in the thought of our marriage. It was arranged to take place next month. And she is coming to Aunt Maggie's the day after to-morrow. Nina, I think I will run away!"

"You could not be a coward, Star."

"Come with me, Nina," he said, a world of intreaty in his tone. "No, but I am in earnest. Why should we sacrifice ourselves to lives of misery. Doctor Leslie cannot feel for you as I do. It is almost a year since he has seen you even.'

Digitized by Google

"He does love me. Oh, Star, if you knew. I am all the world to him, and he has waited and worked. I could not be so wicked. He is coming back soon. He has finished his course in Paris, and—do you think we two could ever be happy together if we had made others wretched. It is sin to speak of it, even. No, dear, there is nothing for us but to do our duty. We have been so happy, as friends—we can be friends still."

"But you love me, Nina? Tell me truth, dearest; nothing will seem so hard to bear after that. Only say it."

He had drawn so near that his cheeks rested against her slender shoulder.

Nina did not answer, but her arm slipped timidly round his neck, and she rested her cheek against his curling golden hair. After the fashion of maidens, she answered her love in silence.

This exquisite moment was suddenly broken in upon by the sound of scampering feet and ringing voices, and the children came rushing pell-mell through the orchard-gate.

"Mr. Burley! Mr. Burley! we couldn't find your cigarettes. We looked on the porch-seat and on the window-sill and everywhere, and they were not there. And, Nina, mamma says you are to come in and make the cake, and mamma says we can stay with Mr. Burley!"

"Oh, thanks!" said Mr. Burley.

But, after all, they were Nina's brothers, and that thought reconciled him to bear for a while the noisy infliction of their company.

* * * * *

A shadow darkened the morning sunshine. Nina looked up from reckoning the weekly household accounts, and saw in the long open window the loveliest young woman she had ever beheld.

"Miss Marble, Nina?"

Nina's heart quaked, but she went forward with a welcoming smile.

"I am Laura—Laura Dalton. You have heard of me?"

"Oh, yes, yes!" said Nina, blushly slightly, but looking bravely into brilliant hazel eyes—lovely, wonderful eyes, so thickly fringed with fine black lashes. "I am so glad to see you! It is so kind of you to come!"

"Star promised to bring me, but I would not wait. You will think it dreadful of me to rush in without ringing the door-bell; but I saw you from the garden, and I knew you were Nina. Star has written me so much about you! I ought to be jealous, but I won't be. You're too sweet. Aunt Maggie has told me lots about you. It is so nice for her to have such pleasant neighbours. What a lovely place they have! I have been abroad three years."

"Mr. Burley told me," said Nina, helping to divest her visitor of a coquettish hat and her coat, and laying bare her magnificent coils of shining black hair.

"He has told you everything, I suppose? Dear Star! I find him changed—so dull and spiritless."

"He was not very well," Nina hastened to say, with a tell-tale flush on her face. "At least, when he first came to Mrs. Creigh's, he was recovering from typhoid fever, and he—I suppose——"

"That was nine months ago," was the prompt rejoinder. "He wrote me all about the typhoid fever, and that he had entirely recovered. But he seems strangely altered. I think it is not good for a man to have enough money to live on without work. It would be better if he had a profession. You have seen a good deal of Star, I suppose, since you've been acquainted?"

"Oh, yes! My brother Clarence and he are quite intimate."

"He did not tell me about Clarence. He told me about you," said the young lady. "I was so anxious to see you! Of course you know that he—that I—— You do know, Nina, don't you?"

"About your engagement?" asked Nina, smiling gravely. "Star will have a beautiful wife."

"I hope he may have a happy one"—with a little sigh. "He is such a lovely fellow. But, somehow, I don't think it is nice to be married so very soon. The second of next month—just think!—and I am only nineteen! No one knew of our engagement except Aunt Maggie, and now she is so anxious to have every one know, and to have us settled; and I like to be single, don't you? It seems dreadful just to leave school and then be married. I haven't had any good time."

"Why not postpone your wedding for a while?" asked Nina, smiling at the frankness of her beautiful visitor. "You are both so young!"

"Ah, but poor Star would object! He would be so terribly disappointed, you know. He has been looking forward to our marriage. But I was thinking, Nina, perhaps you could talk to him. He has such confidence in your judgment. You might tell him that you think I am too young. You understand him so well. You would know just what to say. You will think I am the strangest girl in the world to come here and talk like this; but, don't you see, I can't speak to Aunt Maggie, and I dare not to poor Star, and there is no one else. I will be married before I know it, Nina, if I don't make some effort."

Tears were dimming the lustrous dark eyes.

Nina, touched and astonished, drew a little chair close to her new friend's side, and took her hand in a kind clasp. At this, Laura burst into tears.

"You will think I am a silly!" she said, presently, with a little sob now and then between her words, "but your lovely, sweet face won me in a minute. I don't mean that you are handsome, but you are so lovely! And that dear little calico apron! I couldn't be afraid of you, Nina. Of course, I didn't mean to be so frank with you all at once; but I could never like you any better than I do now, and I can't help speaking my heart right out. I want you to reason with Star—not reason exactly—but show him—make him understand—well, tell him something——"

"Ah, but you must tell me something first, Laura. Isn't there someone else—someone who has taken Star's place in your heart? Is not that the trouble, Nina?"

"Oh, Nina, Nina!"

"I thought so. Tell me, Laura, how it happened. Tell me all about it. Then we can consult."

"You little darling! I have felt like a criminal; but if you could only see him, Nina! I met him in Paris when I was spending the holidays with a schoolmate. He was studying with her father, Professor Vieux. There were lots of students, but this one is a young Englishman—so talented and so handsome—and we fell in love with each other at first sight. It was terrible, Nina—so awfully sudden and unexpected; but, don't you know, he was quite wild about me, and I was just as bad about him. And he is engaged to a girl out here—he would not tell me her name; but he does not love her at all—at least, since he's known me, he doesn't. But then, you see, his words bind him, and he is so honourable! He is coming over in a few weeks, and I thought, if I need not be married so soon—don't you see?—that possibly something might happen——"

Miss Dalton was so busy dabbing her lovely wet eyes with her damp handkerchief that she was not aware of the sudden pallor that had overspread the listening face beside her. Now Nina interrupted her in a curious voice, very steady, but very eager, too.

"What is your lover's name, Laura, if it be a fair question?"

"His name? Do you think I ought to tell his name? I will tell you. His name is Doctor Leslie."

"Ah!"

A little cry, a gasp, escaped Nina's lips, but was checked back instantly.

"Do you know him?" Laura asked, with a wondering air.

"I know the girl he has promised to marry, and I have seen the letters he has written her, so full of tenderness. She never dreamed his love could waver. Laura, this is terrible!—the surprise!"

"I know it, dear," said Laura penitently; "but what can we do? I'm sure we don't compel ourselves to love. Love compels us. How strange you should be acquainted with Doctor Leslie's affianced! It seems just like a story. Is she nice? He would never say anything about her except 'poor child!'"

Digitized by Google

"Poor child!" echoed Nina, with a smile. "She would only be poor child if she should marry him. I could tell you about her, too, Laura, how she has struggled to keep faith with her faithless lover, while her heart had given itself to someone else. She has suffered, but at least she has been strong. Ah, Laura, what must we think of men?"

"What must we think of women?" said Laura simply. "I am sure I am ashamed of myself. If Star could know——Nina, oh, Nina, there he is!"—rushing suddenly to the long open window—"but I tell you it is he! They must have told him I was here, and he is coming. Oh, oh, oh! what shall I do! Oh, Nina, I am so glad!"

Nina, following her impetuous friend, saw not Starwood Burley, but Doctor Leslie advancing up the gravelled path in travelling coat and with a small bag in his hand.

As he reached the verandah, which was liberally vine covered, Miss Dalton sprang through the window and rushed to him with outspread arms. At sight of this beautiful apparition an unmistakable delight flashed over his fine, dark face.

"Laura!" he exclaimed, and dropped his baggage to fold her promptly to his bosom; then he hastily released her, and his joy gave place to consternation.

He actually staggered back as his betrothed advanced, with her hand held out in greeting.

"Nina!" He said no other word as she lifted her little quiet face to kiss him in friendly fashion.

Miss Dalton stood amazed.

"You know, Nina, too? I thought Mrs. Creigh had sent you here? I thought you were coming to find me," she falters. "Oh, Gilbert!—oh, Nina! Oh, Nina, are you the girl?"

Miss Dalton was deathly pale, and Doctor Leslie groaned and hid his white face in his hands.

Nina was trembling a little, and tears were on her lashes, but she smiled up at them both.

"I am the girl—the happy girl, dear Laura. How strange you should come at this very moment, Gilbert! I did not expect you until the twentieth. Laura had just been telling me she had met you abroad, and all the little romance. But come in. We must sit down and talk together."

* * * * *

"Robbie—Robbie, will you run up to the house, like a good fellow, and tell Nina I want to speak to her. I'm going to bring you that new fishing-rod to-morrow—honour bright. Tell her I am waiting here at the gate; and don't let all the world hear you, that's a little man!"

Down through the twilight came Nina, a minute later, in her gleaming white dress, to find Starwood Burley lurking in the shadow of the trees at the gate, and smoking cigarette after cigarette.

The house-windows were alight, and the stars were brightening momentarily in the vast silence overhead. Fireflies were throbbing in and out of the dusk, and now and then a bat wheeled by in dark circles.

The dew was falling, and the fragrance of the garden was blending with the scent of Starwood's tobacco, which he hastily consigned to oblivion when Nina appeared.

"Will you walk along the road a little way?" he asked abruptly, without greeting of any kind. "That is, if you will be permitted to walk with me now—if you are not afraid."

"I am not afraid of anyone," said Nina brightly; "not even of you, and your scowling face is just terrifying, Star."

She stepped down beside him, and they walked away slowly under the great branches of the elms and chestnuts, along the quiet country road.

"I suppose I must congratulate you on the arrival of your—of Doctor Leslie. Laura informed me that he had arrived this morning, while she was with you."

"Thanks, yes. He came quite unexpectedly. He wanted to give me a surprise, and it was a surprise."

"You are delighted, of course."

"I am very, very happy," she answered gently; "I never thought to be so happy."

And of her own free will she laid her hand within his arm, and leant confidingly on its support.

"I suppose I ought to rejoice in your happiness, dear," he rejoined forlornly; "but I'm such a selfish wretch, and I've been so very fond of you all this time, it seems horrible that I must give you up, and try to live out my miserable life with someone else. I wish to Heaven I had never seen you, Nina."

"I don't!" glancing up at him with smiling eyes. "You are ungrateful, Star. Only think of the pleasant walks and talks which we had together, all the good quiet times. I know I shall never forget them, and I shall never be sorry we met. I wonder, dear, if we should always be so happy—if you would always like me so much, supposing we could belong to each other?"

"Oh, don't, Nina! don't talk about it!" He looked down longingly at the little clinging hand on his coat-sleeve. "You make a coward of me. In all honour, I have no right to be here with you now; but Laura intimated that you wished to see me, and I came, Nina, but only to say 'Good-bye.' I can't bear this sort of thing. We must not meet any more. By-and-by, perhaps——"

"Star," said Nina, standing still before him suddenly in the darkened road, lonely now as a forest-path. "I am the happiest woman in the world to-night. Do you know why? Because you love me. Something so strange has happened." And then she poured forth a story that Starwood could scarcely credit, in his amazement and delight.

"It is like a dream!" he stammered. "The other two will be happy together, and I can have you! Am I really awake? Doctor Leslie is willing, and it is all arranged?"

"Doctor Leslie has gone over to see Laura, and talk with Mrs. Creigh—I sent him off across the fields as soon as Robbie told me you had come. And Laura thinks it would be nice to have the two marriages at once. What do you think, Star?"

Mr. Burley's answer, though silent, was decidedly in the affirmative.

Madeline Bridges.

GET two words out of "enough" meaning "not enough." Answer: One hug.

CUSTOMER: "Waiter, this bullock's heart is very badly cooked." Waiter: "Well, sir, the fact is, the cook's been crossed in love, and whenever he has anything to do with a heart it so upsets him that he doesn't know what he's a-doin' of!"

WISEMAN looks at his watch with concern. "I can't understand," he says to his wife, "what has happened to my watch? I think it must want cleaning." "No, papa," chimes in little Fanny; "I am quite sure it is clean, because baby and I have washed it in the basin."

FIRST SERVANT: "I'm going to leave." Second Servant: "What's the matter?" "My mistress don't keep a cat." "What has her not keeping a cat got to do with you?" "Lots. When there is any cream missing there is no cat to lay the blame on, and I do love cream so."

Digitized by Google

The Opportunity of Claude Harrington.

Telling of a Mean Trick and its Atonement.

Miss Durward stood on a rock which ran out into the sea, watching the waves which splashed against its slippery sides and which wetted her white canvas shoes with their spray. It was a blazing hot August day and scarcely a breath of wind ruffled her dark, curly hair, which was without any covering, in spite of the dangers of sunstroke. Her big frilled hat lay further away on the shore where she had been sitting. Her scarlet linen dress made her a conspicuous figure to anyone coming in that direction, and a tall man who came round the corner of the cliff which shut off her retreat from the rest of the world stopped for a moment to take in the picture. Then he made his way rapidly over the rocks to her side. So quietly did he come that it was not until he stood beside her and said: "Good morning, Miss Durward," that the girl realised his presence. She turned so suddenly that she almost lost her balance and nearly fell into the water at her feet.

"You!" she ejaculated in a tone of mingled astonishment and annoyance.

"Myself and no less; you seem surprised," he responded coolly.

"When did you come?" she asked, ignoring his remark.

"Last night by the mail train," he returned.

"And may I ask why? I thought you were in London and too busy to get away?"

"Well—I came because you are here."

"If that is the only reason you might have stayed away," retorted the girl crossly.

"As it happens, that is the sole and only reason; but I suppose you have not the only right and privilege of spending the summer in this retreat, have you, even though you may be allowed to be as rude as you like?"

"I am not rude, and if I were I have every excuse for it. I came here to be quiet and not to be worried, and it seems that is to be made impossible. However, I will leave you to yourself."

She turned round so sharply on the narrow ledge of slippery rock that she lost her balance, swayed for a moment, and then fell with a resounding splash into the deep water.

An expression of unalloyed joy overspread the countenance of the young man.

"And she can't swim," he muttered gleefully, then as he saw the dark head emerging from the sea, he pulled off his coat and jumped in after her.

The sudden shock of immersion in cold water had completely deprived Miss Durward of speech or hearing and she was quite at his mercy. For all her dignity she was really very small and slight, and her rescuer found no difficulty in swimming a little distance with his burden. Opposite to where she had been standing before her fall a large rock just showed its head out of the water which completely surrounded it. On this rock he placed the girl, and then, saying in a cheerful reassuring tone:

"Hold on tight, or you'll fall in again," he returned to his former resting-place, and sitting down, awaited events.

With an effort Miss Durward opened her eyes and looked about her in a dazed manner. Then the truth came to her with a flash, and rage got the upper hand. She carefully removed one hand from the slippery rock and brushed away the dark hair which fell into her eyes, and glared wrathfully at the impenitent and dripping young man who sat opposite to her, endeavouring to light a cigarette with a damp match.

She might almost as well have been in the middle of the Atlantic Ocean instead of only a few yards from the shore, so utterly impossible was it for her to reach land without getting far out of her depth, when she would again be ignominiously fished out by the man whom at that moment she hated with deadly and vicious hatred.

"I wonder you are not ashamed of yourself playing such childish tricks," she said angrily. "I insist upon your taking me off this rock at once—at once," she repeated with an attempt to be dignified which under the circumstances was a dismal failure.

"No," said Claude Harrington calmly. "Not yet. Not until I have said all I want to say, which you have never ye allowed me to do—now that I have a chance I am going to make the most of it—also you are going to make a promise before you get on shore again. In fact, on second thoughts, if you will make the promise first, I will land you and talk afterwards."

"I don't want to hear anything that you have to say and I will not listen to it."

"But, fortunately for me, for once in your life, you have no choice in the matter. Now are you going to promise?"

"How can I promise anything unless I know what it is."

"You will know if you have a little patience. You are to say 'Claude, I love you, and I will marry you one month from to-day.'"

"I shall do nothing of the sort!" she retorted angrily. "I hate you, and I will never speak to you again."

A wave larger than the rest rolled up and almost swept over her seat. She clutched the rock with both hands.

"Pity you didn't learn to swim, isn't it?" Mr. Harrington remarked. "After all the lessons you have had, too. However, as it happens, it is rather fortunate for me that you were not successful in your efforts."

The girl made no reply and he continued placidly:

"You see, you made a little mistake for once in your life.

Digitized by Google

You thought I was just like all the rest of your train—to be played with as long as it amused you and then dropped when you were tired of me and wanted a fresh amusement. Having kept me dangling at your heels all the season you thought you had settled the whole affair when you came to Devonshire just as I was beginning to get restive; but you overlooked the fact that two people can sometimes play at the same game. So I followed you, and here I am, and here I mean to remain, and Fate appears to be on my side," with a grin at the forlorn object facing him.

"You are a brute and I hate you—hate you," remarked Miss Durward viciously.

He smiled.

"Hate away," he said. "But you will find it more satisfactory to change it to the other thing as I told you if you want to get back in time for lunch. It is getting late."

"I will never, never say anything of the sort, if I have to stay here all day."

"Well, of course, if you prefer to remain there, you are quite welcome to do so. I don't in the least mind sitting here. I had breakfast very late, and fortunately my cigarette case is water-tight and well filled."

"I thought you were a gentleman, anyhow. I wonder you like to make such a fool of yourself with all these people about."

"There are no people about and I am not making a fool of myself in the least," returned Mr. Harrington cheerfully.

Uncomfortably conscious of the fact that it was she herself who was most likely to attract the attention of any passers-by, Miss Durward took refuge in dignified silence.

A long silence ensued during which her tormentor smoked two cigarettes while his victim sat motionless.

"Well," he said at last, as he flung away the end of the second. "This is getting monotonous. I suppose I had better come across and talk to you."

He slipped off into the water again and came over to her. Holding on to the rock with one hand he looked up into the grey eyes above him, in which in spite of her valiant efforts to keep up appearances there was a suspicious moisture; as they met his blue ones they suddenly dropped and a faint pink flush crept up to the roots of Miss Durward's dark, curly hair which was rapidly recovering from its bath.

"Say it," said Mr. Harrington softly. "And you shall get off at once."

Before she could answer their solitude was invaded by a party of people who came suddenly round the cliff. The girl uttered an exclamation of dismay, and said hurriedly:

"Oh, here are a whole lot of people—do, do, do, please, get me off this hateful thing before they see me—whatever will they think?"

"Say what I want you to then," he repeated obstinately.

She looked at the determined face—and yielded—anything to get away from her ignominious position.

"You are very, very unkind to take advantage of me like this," Miss Durward said slowly. "But since you are determined I suppose I must do it—to save myself from ridicule"—she hesitated, and then said with a rush, the crimson mounting again to her face, "I love you."

"And you will promise to marry me one month from to-day?"

"And I will promise to marry you one month from to-day—anything, only get me out of this, quick," she said with a return of her own dictatorial manner.

Harrington said no more but took her in his arms and conveyed her the short distance which separated them from the rocks on the shore. Without a word or a backward glance at him she fled along the beach and round the cliff.

He placed the girl on an isolated rock, and proceeded to propose to her.

Late in the afternoon, after a prolonged search he found her on the beach. She was clothed from head to foot in spotless white and presented a very different appearance from the forlorn maiden in the limp linen dress of the morning. She saw him coming and deliberately lowered her parasol, and turned her back, reading with great absorption. Mr. Harrington walked quietly round to the other side of the barrier she had raised and flung himself on the sand beside her. Miss Durward took no notice. Apparently young men had no place in her world at all at that moment. He endured it for a few moments and then as she continued to read, he quietly took the book out of her hand and threw it along the beach.

"Cecile," he said softly. "Are you very angry with me? I want you to say again what you did this morning."

"Isn't once enough to humiliate me?" she asked without raising her eyes.

"I had to do it, dear, because you would not give me a chance to say what you knew I wanted to; but I am sorry I teased you, and I want you to say you forgive me and tell me over again, only of your own free will this time, what you did this morning. You know you meant to say it all the time only you were so proud and wilful you would not give in? Isn't that right?" he asked eagerly.

Miss Durward's eyes wandered slowly round the horizon, away to the cliffs in the distance, down to the little waves at her feet, and finally with an effort to the face of the man beside her. Then her mouth curved and a smile broke all over her small mutinous face.

"But it was a mean trick all the same," she said.

B. M. Stuccy.

Digitized by Google

Powerful Thrilling Series.

THE "BRIDGE" OF RUIN.

Being the

CONFESSIONS OF A GIRL GAMBLER.

Dramatis Personæ.

OLIVE BERESFORD, the writer of these confessions. She is a young lady who is lured into gambling by her friend, Annabel Vernon, whom she detects cheating. Miss Beresford arranges a secret code of signals with a Mr. Taskot, in order to beat Annabel Vernon at her own game.

HARRY VERNON, of Vernon Towers, who with his wife plans to catch Olive in a trap. He manages to secure photographs of the incriminating gestures passed between Mr. Taskot and the relater of these episodes.

ANNABEL VERNON, wife of the last-named. An old school friend of Miss Beresford. Her husband having obtained the proofs of Olive's alleged cheating, she holds the photos over her victim as a threat, declaring that, unless Miss Beresford does as she is ordered, she will be denounced as a card-sharper. She makes the unfortunate girl a tool to win money from her guests.

MR. TASKOT, who poses as a gentleman of means, but who is really a despicable bounder. He endeavours to force Miss Beresford to marry him.

MR. MAURICE RAY, a gentleman who rescues the narrator from a mad dog, and who since takes a kindly interest in the welfare of the young girl, treating her with great respect, and showing her much consideration.

MR. DEAN FISHER, a "Bridge" expert, and one of the guests of the Vernons at Vernon Towers when Olive Beresford was fleeced.

MRS. GRAINGER, a rich widow and an ardent gambler, another of the guests at the Towers.

MR. HAROLD BAINBRIG, a wealthy bachelor, who with his sister,

MISS EDITH BAINBRIG, loses heavily at "Bridge" whilst playing with the Vernons and the unwilling Olive Beresford.

EPISODE EIGHTEEN.

Compromising Circumstances.

SOME girls faint on the slightest provocation. Others sometimes find it convenient to feign unconsciousness at awkward moments. I belong to neither category. But I was not proof against the latest misfortune which had overtaken me. I remember making a wild attempt to rise to my feet, but a deadly sickness overcame me, and I sank back in the carriage absolutely helpless, and oblivious of my surroundings.

When next I came to my senses I was in the waiting-room at the little station whence I intended travelling homewards, and the stationmaster's wife was holding a bottle of smelling-salts to my nose. The pungent odour proved violent enough to effect its intended purpose, and I opened my eyes to see a comely face looking into mine with great concern.

"There now, dearie, that's better! I'm glad you are coming round again. You gave your husband a dreadful scare."

At these words, spoken in good faith by my kindly nurse, I awoke to the full seriousness of my position, and exclaimed passionately: "My husband! How dare he try to make anyone think he is my husband? I never want to see the man again as long as I live!"

"Well, miss, I'm sorry I made a mistake. But the gentleman has really been very kind, and he is dreadfully anxious about you."

"He has brought me nothing but sorrow, and I hope he will never cross my path again."

The woman saw it was no use arguing with me in the frame of mind I was then in, so she turned the subject, and asked me if I would have a cup of tea.

"I'll have it ready in a moment," she added. "And I'm sure it will do you good."

"Thank you," I answered. "You are very kind, and I shall be glad of the tea, for I——"

I was about to add that I had eaten no breakfast, but wisely refrained, and asked instead:

"Can you tell me when the next train to Idlebury Junction leaves here?"

"Not for an hour yet, miss, so you have plenty of time to come to my house, and tidy yourself up a bit before you go."

Thankfully availing myself of the invitation thus given me, I followed my new friend into her pretty little home, which adjoined the station, and rested in an arm-chair while she hastily prepared some tea for me. She also added some nice bread-and-butter and a boiled egg, and I felt very much better afterwards. Then I straightened my hair and made myself otherwise presentable, all the time wondering what had become of Mr. Taskot, and feeling relieved because he had had the sense to go away without obtruding his unwelcome presence upon me again.

By-and-bye I was ready for departure, and after thanking Mrs. Gorton for her kind attentions, I bethought me to take my purse out of my chatelaine bag, and pay for the services which I had no right to accept from a stranger without payment. But what was my dismay to discover that the purse only contained a few coppers! I knew I had not much. But surely I could not be mistaken in thinking that I had had more than sufficient money to go home with! Trouble could not have deprived me so entirely of my wits as to make me forget how much money I had!

Mrs. Gorton noticed the look of dismay with which I discovered my practically penniless condition, for she immediately observed:

"I hope there's nothing wrong about your money, miss? If there is, all I can say is that nobody here has touched it."

"Oh, I don't imagine anything of the sort," was my hasty answer. "But I seem to be terribly out in my reckoning. And how am I to get home with no money to buy my railway ticket with?"

"Oh, that's all right, miss. The gentleman, Mr. Kastock, or some such name, gave me some money, 'to pay for my trouble,' he said. Not that I wouldn't have done the best for a fainting lady, in any case, but he just pressed it on me. He had to go away somewhere. But in case you came round before long, he left a first-class ticket ready for you, so there is nothing to stop you from taking the next train, even if Mr. Kaspot doesn't get back before then."

Digitized by Google

Now here was a dreadful dilemma! It was, of course, impossible for me to remain in a neighbourhood where I had been tricked out of the respect of everybody who knew me, especially as I was in a penniless condition. My only course was to get home as quickly as possible. But to do that, I should have to accept another favour from the man whose attentions had brought nothing but trouble to me so far, and the evident necessity of this step was so humiliating that I was desperately sorry for myself.

But of the choice of evils which I turned over in my mind this seemed the only one that would solve my present difficulties, so I forced myself to accept the ticket, and took my seat with a very sad heart when the train came in, my only crumb of comfort being the absence of Mr. Taskot.

Very bitter were my thoughts as I was being whirled towards Idlebury Junction, and it hardly seemed possible that but a few days had passed since I, a happy and light-hearted girl, had started on the visit which had proved so disastrously eventful.

"I must try and bury the memory of what has happened," I told myself. "So long as I remain in my own village I am not likely to meet any of the people who live near Vernon Towers. As for Mr. Ray—well, I must not think of him again."

Nevertheless, my thoughts were full of him. And when I changed trains at Idlebury Junction, I could not help regretting that Mr. Taskot's shameful behaviour to me would prevent Mr. Ray from ever again brightening my life with his aid and advice. I was not used to travelling alone, and I should have been glad of friendly help in seeing to the transference of my luggage from one train to the other. But I managed to dispose of it into the hands of a porter, and was settling down for the conclusion of my journey, when I received a disagreeable surprise.

Just as the train was starting, the carriage door was hastily opened, and another passenger jumped in. It was Mr. Taskot, and I knew in an instant that he was there of deliberate intention to persecute me! I rose from my seat, although the train was already in motion, and would have jumped out, if my fellow-passenger had not forcibly held the door fast.

"Miss Beresford," he exclaimed, "are you mad? To jump out now would kill you!"

"Better be killed," was my fierce rejoinder, "than to suffer your ill-omened proximity."

"I am sorry my presence is obnoxious to you, for it is really due to my desire to be of service."

"It is but an ill service that robs me of the esteem of respectable people."

"Look here now, Miss Beresford, I'm awfully in love with you, and when a fellow is in love, he'll do anything to win the woman he wants."

"A fellow might. But a gentleman wouldn't!"

"By Jove, that's good! I say, you do know how to rub it in! That's where you score over other girls. The rest are all so brainless—and so——"

"Excuse me, sir, but flattery from you is no compliment. Will you kindly confine yourself to matters of fact? And perhaps you will tell me why you are in this train? I thought I had seen the last of you."

"H'm! That's what it is not to be an artist, introduced under romantic circumstances! You wouldn't talk to Ray like that!"

"No, I wouldn't. Neither would he behave to me as you have done."

"Yet he turned his back on you when things looked a bit shady. And it was I who stuck to you, and who provided for your return home! And I got into the train a station before you got in, just so as to leave you to yourself until you had quite recovered your composure. I watched over you all the way here, too. Yet I cannot earn a word of thanks from you, no matter what I do."

"You can easily earn a great many words of thanks from me."

"Tell me how, and I'll do it like a shot."

"Give me all those photographs which Harry Vernon took. And write to Mr. Ray, owning that I was unable to prevent you kissing me in the carriage."

Mr. Taskot's eyeglass, which usually seemed to grow over his right optic, behaved just as it always did whenever he was astonished. It fell out of its place, and dangled for a few seconds on its chain, unheeded by its owner.

"Well, really," said the latter, "that's the coolest demand I ever heard!"

I had all this time remained standing. But as the train was now a long way from a station, I sat down again and looked my tormentor squarely in the face.

"Do you agree to my request?" I asked.

"By Jove, no!" was the answer. "At least, not unless you marry me!"

"That I will never do."

"Well, you are excited just now. We'll let the matter stand over till you have time to consider all the pros and cons."

"There are no pros."

"Pardon me—I can give you a strong one. By marrying me, you will make handsome provision for your own future, and will silence for ever any scandal that has arisen in respect of a—a—cardplaying. And of a—a—the fact that you and I have journeyed down here in the same train and at my expense."

Ah! now I knew why this man had forced himself into my company! He meant to make it so impossible for me to justify my conduct that I should be driven in sheer self-defence to accept him as my companion for life! The hopelessness of my position almost crushed me. But it did not crush me enough to make me yield my life and freedom to him, and I passionately reiterated my refusal to have anything more to do with him.

"Very well," he said, speaking so coolly that my heart misgave me, for the man seemed so horribly confident of ultimate victory. "Very well, Miss Beresford, I will not argue the matter any further just now. I will change into another carriage at the next stopping place. But mind you—I am not a man who ever relinquishes his purpose, and you may rest assured that you will hear from me again."

EPISODE NINETEEN.

"No Escape."

"I REALLY can't make out what's happened to you while you were away. You leave here to pay a country visit in the best of spirits, and you come back miserable and half dead. Worse still, you seem to be fretting all the time about something. Upon my word, Olive, your holiday hasn't done you much good!"

Mrs. Windsor, the friend with whom I had gone to live after my aunt's death, had more than once expressed herself as above, and I realised at last that if I would avoid inconvenient curiosity, I must throw off the depression which had possessed me during the fortnight that had elapsed since my return home.

So I answered with comparative cheerfulness:

"My dear Mrs. Windsor, I'm afraid you are worrying about me, and I'm sure there's not the slightest need. Vernon Towers disagreed with me, it is true. And I was disappointed to find that my old schoolmate and her husband were the reverse of nice. But I've nothing to fret about, and now that I have shaken off the effects of the chill I got while I was away I shall be jollier than ever."

Mrs. Windsor looked dubiously at me. But I appeared to be as good as my word, and was, outwardly at least, just as I had been before my memorable visit to Vernon Towers. Yet I lived in continual fear of being unpleasantly reminded of my card-playing adventures. And, worse still, I could not banish Maurice Ray from my mind. He was my ideal of all that was manly and noble, and I knew that the woman whom he might marry would be the woman whom I should envy all my life. For, little though I had seen of him, I had learnt to love him, and it was small wonder that my heart ached with grief at the conviction that he could never feel anything but contempt for me.

There was also another source of worry for me. I owed

Digitized by Google

Mr. Taskot the price of my railway ticket. But, until my next quarter's income was due I could not count upon receiving any money, and I was thankful that Mrs. Windsor would not expect anything from me until then. Meanwhile, it behoved me to practice rigid economy, and I trusted to be able to repay Mr. Taskot without having to come into personal touch with him again, by forwarding the money in an envelope addressed to a club of which I had been casually informed that he was a member.

"Olive, we have some friends coming to spend the evening with us, and we want you to be there too. We can wait for you, if you will get ready now, to drive back with us."

The speaker was Alice Cheshunt, the daughter of some people who had recently come to live within three miles of my home. We had met at the vicarage, and had speedily become very friendly. The Cheshunts were all exceedingly nice, and I gladly welcomed the opportunity of diverting my thoughts from the subjects which had engrossed them lately.

So it came to pass that I was soon bowling along the country lanes with Mrs. Cheshunt and Alice. They made very kindly inquiries about how I had enjoyed my recent little holiday. But though I was careful not to hint at anything unpleasant, I was not enthusiastic enough to encourage much questioning, and I was very glad when the bustle of preparing for the guests who were presently expected put the subject out of their minds.

It had been arranged that I was to stay all night, so there was no need for me to follow the example of several people who had perforce to leave while the pleasure of the evening was still in full swing. For it was a pleasant evening, up to a certain point, with good music and witty conversation galore.

"I'm dying to have a game of Bridge. Can't you arrange one?"

The speaker was Mrs. Smedley, a lady who lived only a short distance away, and who was quite famous in the neighbourhood for her successful progressive whist parties. Her proposal was hailed with delight by several guests, and as my shining eyes proclaimed my willingness to join the players, I was forthwith pressed into service.

Of course, after what I had already endured through gambling, I ought to have steered clear of the temptation now set before me. But as I did not blame the cards or the game for what had happened, and as I was no longer in the company of people who wanted to fleece me, I saw no harm in consenting to make a fourth for "phantom stakes."

"My dear," said Mrs. Cheshunt, about an hour later, after hearing that I was a very lucky player, "I had no idea you knew anything about Bridge."

"I only learnt very recently," was my guarded reply as I turned to sort the cards just dealt to me. "Of course, one can soon pick up a game that is attractive."

"Just so," said a voice at my elbow. "The cleverest player I ever met was a lady who had only handled cards a few times before she won hundreds of pounds."

My heart almost stood still at these words. For they were spoken by a person whose very presence was of sinister omen for me, and I knew that they contained a veiled threat. I was not aware that the Cheshunts knew Mr. Taskot. Yet here he was, and I could but remember what he had said when last I saw him—"Mind you, I am not a man who ever relinquishes his purpose, and you may rest assured that you will hear from me again."

What should I do? Should I try to avoid too much attention by treating this man with the same civility that I would bestow upon any other chance acquaintance? Or should I mark my sense of his shortcomings by declining to speak to him?

I decided that the former would be the wiser course, and, schooling myself to appear thoroughly at ease, I turned my head towards the person who stood behind my chair.

"Mr. Taskot!" I ejaculated coolly. "I thought I recognised your voice. But I did not know you were expected here."

"Would the knowledge have prevented you from coming?" he asked in a low tone.

"You flatter yourself too much," I murmured, "if you think I regulate my movements by yours."

"Play!" exclaimed my partner, and, feeling cowed in spite of myself by the evil look in Mr. Taskot's unmonocled eye, I resumed the interrupted game. But my luck had deserted me, and I soon had reason to be thankful that my losses were only nominal, not real.

Mr. Taskot, it transpired, had come, on an open invitation, to visit Mr. and Mrs. Smedley, and, finding that they had come here, had not hesitated to join them, for he had already met the Cheshunts at their house. A presumably wealthy bachelor, of fair reputation, is never at a discount in Society, and Mr. Taskot proved no exception to the general rule, for he was welcomed as cordially as if he had been expected.

"A revoke!" called one of my opponents. "We shall exact penalty."

"Certainly," I agreed. "And my partner must forgive me. I suppose I am tired, or I would not have revoked, so I think I would like to cease playing after this hand."

The others had evidently played as long as they wanted, for there was a general break-up of the game, and those who did not need to hurry home settled down for a final chat before leaving.

"It is very good of you to allow me the pleasure of joining you," said Mr. Taskot to Mrs. Cheshunt.

"Not at all," was the pleasant disclaimer. "We are only too pleased to see you. But how odd that you and Olive should have met before!"

"I see nothing odd in it, if you will allow me to say so. Miss Beresford and I recently visited the same country house together, and I have such happy recollections of the delightful hours spent in her company that I ought to be forgiven for any apparent presumption I have shown this evening."

At this speech, which was instantly interpreted just as the speaker intended it to be interpreted, I felt myself flush scarlet with anger, and I was about to utter a scathing rejoinder when I saw Mr. Taskot take a packet of papers out of his pocket and proceed to arrange them in sequence. I knew only too well what they were. They were the fatal photographs which would convict me of cheating at cards, and horror at the idea of their being shown to my friends sealed my lips.

"What do you say, Olive?" smiled my tormentor. "Shall I show these little snapshots, and give their history now? Or shall I wait until after the—a—the little ceremony we talked of?"

"Oh, not now!" I gasped. "Not now!"

"As you will, dearest! Of course, your word is henceforth always law to me."

I heard Mr. Taskot address me thus, with unwarrantable familiarity, but I was for the moment incapable of any feeling but relief at my narrow escape from exposure, and it was not until I began to be overwhelmed with congratulations that I comprehended what had happened.

The photographs were believed to be the innocent evidence of a pretty little romance, and my answer to Mr. Taskot had been taken as a tacit acknowledgment of an engagement between us!

Of a truth I was now hopelessly in the toils, for even marriage with the man I detested was preferable to permanent disgrace.

(To be concluded shortly.)

Digitized by Google

Rodney Ray's Revenge.

How a Woman's Refusal Wrecked a Man's Life.

THE scene was grand, the night was perfect. Scarcely a breeze stirred the air or dallied with the waves. The moon was full. The sky was cloudless. The temperature was such as left one no thought of there being either heat or cold in existence.

Far out to sea there was a long low line of smoke, that and a shadowy shape which one could call an ocean steamer—or a dream of one. Further still, down on the horizon's very edge there was a tiny speck of white that one might guess was a sail, or believe was the wing of some seabird, as one pleased.

Half a mile away, down the long level beach, there was a group of merry children enjoying as much of the early evening as was to belong to them, and with all the greater earnestness and zest because it was almost over, and there was to be a whole long night between them and the happy morrow. Under the blaze of the electric light they dug in the sand, they ran races, they rushed down to meet the incoming waves, and dashed back even faster. They did all the childish and pleasant things which free and happy hearts could prompt them to do—many things which we older ones (with nerves) blame and scold them for—many things which those of us who are blessed with good health secretly envy them the doing.

Further away there were music and dancing.

And the breath of the bounding sea stirred about the loitering man and woman, far from human companionship, other than their own, upon the lonely beach. The loveliness and mysteriousness of the night lay all about them and in their hearts. The distant steamer and almost invisible sail made the night more lonely; the voices of the children came faintly to them with the wash of the waves; everything seemed almost as unreal as the figures in a dream, and the throb of the music might have been from another and an unseen world. Indeed it might! Blended with the sea's voice, and the laugh of childhood, it was almost divine.

Rodney Ray thought that it was Paradise.

We will go up the beach. The man and the woman are walking there, you remember.

Rodney Ray has told his story. He has asked his question. He has known, and so has the woman—and for a long time, too—that it would be told some time.

I doubt if he went out with her to-night intending to tell her of his love. He has loved her long—he has loved her earnestly; let no one doubt that. But love must learn patience—it must wait.

Rodney Ray was scarcely a handsome man. He was a bit too stout to be graceful, and his face had more strength in it than beauty ever allows a man. His eyes were grey, and clear, and bright. His mouth spoke of will and determination. The poise of his head denoted pride. He was evidently an earnest man and a truthful one.

The woman was a vision of loveliness. Tall, dark, full of grace, faultless under the glare of the electric light, in the heated ballroom; perfect in form and complexion by honest daylight. By moonlight one would have felt justified in any flattering words. I believe that Rodney Ray had just called her an angel.

Suddenly he said, "Stella, darling, I love you dearly. Do you love me? Will you be my wife?"

Her answer was a terrible blow to him.

She looked him straight in the eyes and told him "No."

His head went down upon his breast. It was the only sign of his intense suffering. It was as though all life and hope and energy had suddenly been crushed out of him.

The woman tapped her dainty foot impatiently upon the sands. She stole a hurried, frightened glance at him—a glance he did not see. She loved power; she loved the power which she had over this man; but there was a doubt in her girlish heart as to whether she had been wise in attempting to use it.

She was not the first woman who had played with a man's heart and wrecked her own life by doing it.

"You've led me to this," he said brokenly, "and if you had no other answer than this for me, you had no right to do it."

He raised his head and looked at her. But she was looking at the sand now.

She made no answer.

"It was wicked."

She raised her head.

"It was cowardly to deliberately wreck a man's life as you have done, Miss Atherton."

Stella Atherton thought two things; first, that her lover didn't understand women, and second, that she was very, very angry.

We will agree that Rodney Ray did not understand women; we will agree that what he had said was quite enough to have angered Miss Atherton.

But, in this age, when a man does not understand a woman, she is a fortunate one who wins him.

For the rest, an angry woman will ride rough-shod over her own heart that she may hurt the one who has angered her. And she will but go the quicker and more bravely, the closer his words have been to the truth.

"Pardon me, Mr. Ray," she said icily; "but I could scarcely have guessed you intended marriage. Your profession, or calling, or business——"

"Don't!" he cried, sharply, turning away his head.

She paused.

He looked off to the ocean, and let the cool air touch his face. He wondered vaguely whether she had touched upon the truth in what she had started to say. He felt that he had frittered away too much of his life. Bohemian in all his tastes and habits, he wondered whether it were really that which had cost him the coveted happiness of his life. He could write—a little; he could paint—a little; he was a musician—in a sense

Digitized by Google

Poor, as the world goes, he had not come to look upon the use of his powers in the gaining of wealth as a duty to himself, to the world, and to the power who had endowed him with a grand intellect.

Had it cost him his future? He could not tell. It looked so.

He groaned aloud. He never thought of asking the woman to reconsider her answer, though she was almost praying he would.

"How stupid he was!" she said to herself, forgetting that it would have been no compliment to her to have guessed she was a coquette.

She grew angrier with him. She threw the fact of her fortune in his teeth.

"Perhaps you thought I had enough for both?" she said pointedly.

He looked at her and his face darkened, but he made no answer.

"You blamed me for leading you on," she said, with slow deliberation. "Perhaps you will admit that all is fair with a man who is a mere fortune-hunter."

He turned quickly and caught her by the arm. He meant no violence to her, and never knew that he had done her any.

But she carried the prints of his fingers on her delicate flesh—yes, and kissed them and cried over them—for many a day.

His eyes blazed down into hers.

"I would kill a man who said that to me. Your sex saves you. You know that I am not what you have called me. You know that, Stella Atherton."

He looked away again. The sea was only an unquiet and relentless monster to his eyes now.

Low-lying clouds betokened storm. The childish laughter was gone from the sands. The distant music was only a discordant clang.

The scene was what it had been. The man had changed.

There are those among modern theologians who believe that the soul itself will make its own heaven or hell. Perhaps they are right.

"You have been cruel and heartless," he said, the agony of thorough conviction of the truth of what he said trembling in his tones, "and the knowledge that it is so will help me to outlive it."

She merely bowed her head, as though in approval.

"But the time shall come when you shall regret this night. And when it comes you shall find it has no end. The sorrow you find then shall be yours in life and in death, and only your grave shall shut it away from you."

She bowed again.

He turned away and left her there alone. He walked away with long strides, while she stood and watched him, and the dimness of her vision was not from spray nor mist from the sea.

Regret! Yes, from this moment, for ever!

And he never guessed it.

One word. One little cry from her. One pause in his rapid, reckless walk. Any of these, and I might lay down my pen and write "The End" over against their story.

But she stood like a frozen form.

And he never looked back.

It's the way of the world, alas! It's the way of the world!

It took Stella Atherton a full month to learn that Rodney Ray was really gone—gone without another word with her—gone without a message of farewell. I won't begin to tell you the time and money she spent in finding where he had gone. It took both, and she gave them freely. It meant much to her when she learnt that he had buried himself in the wilds of America and was hunting for gold.

She fought with her other self such fierce battles as our two selves can fight; her love and her tenderness, and her sense of justice against her pride and her anger.

Could she have seen him, had she even had his picture, I believe she would have won. As it was, she lost. She wrote one letter to him, and destroyed it because it was too short; she burnt another because it was too long; this one was too cold; that one was too tender.

It ended by her letting silence fall between them.

Other suitors came—all sorts and conditions of men.

One was persistent. No matter that he was old, and that this woman loved youth; no matter that he had money, and that she despised it because she had been so foolish as to pile it up as a barrier between her and the truest heart she had ever known; no matter that she told him "No!"

He was honest and kindly. He was thoroughly in earnest. He asked again and again. He won, as other men have done, a weary woman's promise, without love or heart in it.

But how was the exile in the mountains, reading of her marriage, to know that?

It was a hard life that to which Rodney Ray had condemned himself. He rose early and retired late.

He spared himself in no way. He worked in all weathers—he grew rich. He had gold stored away in more than one place among the hills.

He would smile quietly to himself as he thought of it all, although he sometimes wondered what the use of it would be, since he had failed to win Stella Atherton. Then again he would have a feverish desire to have as large a fortune as hers, and would hurry away to his work.

One year there was the news that the woman he had loved was the wife of another! What matter? She was no more dead to him than she had been when he walked away from her that night by the sea, with the glare of the moonlight all about him, and the hateful blare of the dance-music in his ears.

The next year she was a mother. A son had come to her—a boy who would grow up with the face of another man.

I think this hurt him more than her marriage had done.

It was much like the sensation one in a trance would have when the sods began to rattle down upon his coffin.

The third year death came near her. The man who had given her his name and his fortune went down through the silent gates, and left her only fortune and name.

Did she love him? Would she weep over him?

Rodney Ray could not guess. He would never know.

No matter for that. She was nothing to him—less than nothing.

The next year she went to America. A vain man would have at least wondered! Rodney Ray did not. She came, with money and furniture, and comforts and luxuries, and settled down in the village where he lived. Perhaps to trouble and annoy him, was his first thought—a thought which he put away from him as unworthy and unjust, and which he did not follow with another that was any more to the purpose. He said to himself that he had conquered his passion; he said that his wound was healed. He gave his words the lie by avoiding the newcomer. He moved further up into the hills and never saw her.

Perhaps she had done all that a woman could well do. Perhaps she would have done more. I cannot tell. The end has left it all unknown.

The snow lay deep in the valleys. There was an icy wind from the mountains. More snow was falling. The sun was set. The brief twilight was almost gone.

"Rodney," said a rich, womanly voice.

Rodney Ray might have wondered why his name had been given to the boy. Or he might not have wondered. I cannot say. There are men who will take a woman at her word, I suppose, and hold to it all their lives long.

"Rodney."

There was no answer.

"Rodney."

Her voice was louder and full of anxiety.

Still no answer.

A hurried search everywhere. No boy to be found. Then the mother hurried out to follow the tracks of the little wanderer through the snow. Only three years old, and he had not been gone a half hour. Surely she must find him.

She ran through the blinding storm, finding his tracks as far as the little foot bridge across the mountain torrent. Further than that, nothing certain. No footprints; no trace. Perhaps, in God's mercy, because the snow had covered them. Perhaps——

Digitized by Google

"Perhaps, in God's mercy, because the snow had covered them," she said to a neighbour when she reached the village again.

And the rough old man drew his hand across his eyes, repeated "in God's mercy" in a doubtful way, looked at the hills and shuddered.

She did not understand him then. There was certainly a mercy in that.

* * * * * *

It was late. It was so late that Rodney Ray was hurrying home, and beginning to look and feel anxious. There was a sound here and there in the forest that reminded him of the music across the sandy stretch of beach the night he went home from Stella Atherton, though why such a horrible suggestion should have come to him I can scarcely tell. Men listen as they feel, I suppose.

He reached his door at last, to find what? A line of tiny footsteps leading past it!

He shut his lips together tighter, increased his speed, and followed the baby's trail.

He found the child a half-mile away.

"What's your name?" he asked, as he caught him up in his arms, and rapidly turned to retrace his steps.

"Rodney," said the little fellow, looking up at him with eyes like Stella Atherton's.

Rodney Ray stooped over with a sudden impulse and kissed the boy.

The strong man shuddered.

"Oh, Heaven, give me help!" he said under his breath, as a wolf, cowardly because it was alone, slunk away.

Five minutes later it was evident that they could not reach Rodney Ray's house. There was a steep rock near the path, up which he climbed, carrying the boy with him. By dislodging a large fragment he made it impossible for either animals or men to follow them unless they had ladders.

The snow fell, the wind blew, the cold increased. And for hours the boy talked and laughed, to fall eventually into the sleep of exhausted childhood, protected from the cold by the clothes of the man who had found and saved him.

* * * * * *

They found them so in the morning. The wolves had gone home to their dens from their night-long riot of vain endeavour. The child looked up and smiled. He had lain with the coat and vest of Rodney Ray wrapped closely about him.

Rodney Ray smiled. But it was the smile that never changes—the smile that we always remember best because it comes last. In it was a prayer to the Heaven he had found. In it was thankfulness to the God who had given him the honour of martyrdom. No more sorrow, no more pain, no more care.

He had his revenge!

He gave his life for it!

Clarence Bontelle.

"THE PAPER A BOY CAN TAKE HOME."

The Third Number of . . .

. . THE . .

BOYS' LEADER

Pearson's New Paper.

NOW ON SALE. ONE PENNY.

"Funny Pips" is a separate paper Given Away each week with "The Boys' Leader."

Your Editor Chats.

Last week I mentioned to you that a series of stories very much to your liking would soon begin in this paper. "The Bridge of Ruin" has been immensely popular, as it thoroughly deserves to be, but all good things must have an end, and these episodes will soon be brought to a thrilling conclusion. I have no doubt that your sorrow in saying "Adieu" to Miss Olive Beresford will be forgotten in your pleasure at making the acquaintance of your new heroine, whom, I may say, is a brave girl who risks much danger for the sake of her absent lover. Her exciting escapades at the hands of relentless people, her stubborn courage, and her undaunted love will bring forth your ardent admiration, and I am sure that all my readers will thank me for inducing her to relate her experiences. But more of this later.

RESULT OF BURIED STATIONS COMPETITION.

The task of checking the attempts of this competition has been necessarily a long one on account of the extreme care which had to be exercised. A large staff of checkers was busily engaged, and their work is now completed. Most of the attempts contained a large number of words which, under the conditions of the competition, were inadmissible. After these had been eliminated from the attempts it was discovered that the greatest number of correct words was sent in by Miss A. P. Sargent, Draycott, near Cheddar, Somerset, who is therefore the winner of the £50. This attempt contained 688 words in all, 520 of which were admissible.

The winner of the £25 is H. A. Upward, "Edfon," Romford, Essex, whose attempt contained 713 words, 517 of which were admissible.

The winner of the £10 is Alex. Smith, Oakamoor, Stoke-on-Trent. His attempt consisted of a total of 725 words, 513 of which were admissible.

The Twenty-Five Gramophones have been awarded to the following competitors, whose attempts come next in order of correctness.

D. Boardley, Mint Street, Kendal; S. Hill, 61 Kendal Road, Sparkbrook, Birmingham; A. E. Roby, 27 Victoria Road, Stoke Newington, N.; H. Barnes, 2 Vauxhall Walk, S.E.; P. A. Foulds, 37 Ribblesdale Road, Bolton; E. Birkenhead, 3 College Villas, Grays; F. Parker, Bruce Cottage, Sinderby, Thirsk, Yorks; F. T. C. Wickett, 38 Victoria Road, Exmouth; F. Simkin, Edmondthorpe, near Oakham; A. F. Marshall, 11 Whellock Road, Chiswick, W.; Miss Lily Peddle, 10 Raeburn Street, Brixton, S.W.; M. Mackenzie, 46 Teulon Street, Walton, Liverpool; Rev. J. A. Beard, Melksham, Wilts; Geo. Laxton, 10 Raeburn Street, Brixton, S.W.; A. C. Ford, Station Road, Rainham, Kent; Mrs. Bell, 17 Castledine Road, Anerley, S.E.; W. Berry, 97 Gladstone Buildings, Willow Street, Finsbury; Jas. Cameron, Scotchman Lane, Morley, Leeds; H. Osborne, 90 Orlando Street, Bolton, Lancs; A. E. Oldham, 58 Westward Street, Middlesborough; B. R. Hill, 61 Kendal Road, Sparkbrook, Birmingham; F. White, 162 Camberwell New Road, S.E.; A. Backhouse, 15 Barton Street, Moss Side, Manchester; Mrs. Mackenzie, 46 Teulon Street, Walton, Liverpool; V. Cameron, 32 Scotchman Lane, Morley, Leeds.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

REPAID BY LOVE.

A Very Pretty Little Tale of a Borrowed Sovereign.

The air was chill and wintry, and the short uncompromising afternoon was already deepening into night as Max Villiers crossed the great open space of Trafalgar Square and turned into the Strand. A cutting east wind met him as he did so, and he buttoned his great coat still more closely about him. A couple of poor, ill-clad, hungry-looking children passed him, and he dived into his trousers pocket for a stray sixpence. He knew it was there, for his cash balance had now dwindled far below the limits of arithmetical calculation. Finding it, therefore, with very little difficulty, he tendered it to the astonished urchins, and, mumbling something about "buns" and "cakes," hurried off as though the police were on his track.

"Poor little souls!" he muttered. "It's rough enough for a man, but it's worse for kids!"

He walked on a few paces, and a smile—half sad, half humorous—crossed his handsome, thoughtful face.

"Six from six-and-three leaves five-and-nine," he mused. "That's bad enough, but I must have some tea, which is worse. True, I've still got one 'gold-boy' here"—he touched the sovereign purse which dangled at his watch chain—"but that I am afraid I must regard as the property of Mrs. Jinks. Her eye was more evil than usual this morning, and her hints about 'gents as didn't pay their doos to lone widders' savoured strongly of the personal. So that cannot be regarded as an asset, and I must limit my understanding to the contemplation of the aforesaid five-and-nine. Heavens, what it is to be an author!"

He turned into an A.B.C. shop, and, taking a seat at one of the tables, ordered an exceedingly modest tea. Then, while he waited for its arrival, he resumed his meditations and gazed thoughtfully into vacancy.

There was something very striking about the strong, handsome, intellectual face, and a quiet, shy-looking girl, seated at an adjoining table, found herself attracted by it in spite of herself. But Max Villiers was wholly unconscious even of her presence, and went on with his reflections as before. Eight or nine months ago he had been well-known in some of the second-rate and one or two of the first-rate journals as a tolerably clever short-story writer, and there had been no lack of guineas to reward his labours. But one day he awoke to the hitherto undreamt of conviction that he was destined for bigger things. A great inspiration had come to him—and he knew that his time had come. So he had cast his old, casual, purposeless work into the pit of oblivion, and sat himself down to a new and nobler creation—the writing of a great novel. Almost before he was aware of it, the work had absorbed his every faculty. He forgot everything else—even his growing difficulties and pressing needs—and lived only in the world he was creating. Slowly the many intricacies of the masterful plot spun themselves out. Bold and vigorous treatment, flashes of merry humour, touches of deep-stirring pathos—all found a place in this masterpiece of fiction. And now the work was done. With feverish haste and a new light in his grey eyes, he had read it through to himself, and then, with the flush of victory on his face, he had carefully wrapped the manuscript in brown paper and deposited it with a firm of publishers in the Strand. That was a week ago, and he had heard nothing since.

But when he had drawn that last dramatic picture—when the world he had created shook off its fetters of sordid selfishness and soared upward to a new millennium—and when, over this brightly glowing picture, he had drawn the curtain and written the last forceful word, then he had awakened to that old world—the world of bitter remembrances, of pressing needs, and of stern realities—and he knew that he was poor. But, with a brave heart, he had set himself to mend the situation, and had managed, in spite of the mental exhaustion following his greater work, to write and dispatch a short story to one of the magazines. So he waited, and hoped, and dreamt of the future, though now keenly alive to the difficulties of the present, and the great warm heart of the man shone out of those deep grey eyes as he lingered lovingly over his recent work, and anticipated the success which was to follow it.

He was roused from his reverie by the sound of voices at the adjoining table. For the first time since he had entered, he became aware of the presence of the girl whose eyes had more than once been attracted to his face. She was in obvious embarrassment now, though Villiers was as yet ignorant of its cause, and a waitress was standing at her side. The girl was fumbling nervously in her pocket, and a very slender purse lay on the table before her. There was a look of unbelief on the face of the waitress, which the girl was not slow to notice. Her embarrassment increased each instant, and a look of utter hopelessness crept into her face as her search revealed nothing.

"I had a sovereign in my purse," she said feebly. "I can't think what has become of it. Oh, dear, I hope I haven't lost it, for I haven't enough change to pay you."

The waitress preserved an uncompromising silence, and the girl grew more and more nervous.

"Oh, what shall I do!" she said, almost crying.

"Perhaps you might leave something instead, until you can get the money," suggested the waitress. "If a lady forgets her money, she sometimes leaves her watch or ring, and sends for it later on."

The girl shook her head.

"I have neither," she said, and the waitress sniffed significantly.

Max Villiers looked searchingly at the girl, and his heart softened at the sight. Her face was very pale, and there were dark circles under the large blue eyes that seemed to tell of recent tears. There was an air of gentleness and refinement about the girl too, that contrasted ill with the evident poverty of her attire. She was unmistakably a lady—Max Villiers could see that—but——

Digitized by Google

"Poor little thing!" he said to himself, as he saw the blue troubled eyes slowly fill with tears. "It's rough on a man but a girl——It's too dreadful to think about. But what can I do? It wasn't so difficult with the kids, but a sovereign is different. And then there's Mrs. Jinks!" Again he looked at the poor, troubled face of the girl, and he ground his teeth.

"Confound Mrs. Jinks!" he muttered to himself. "But how can I do it? She wouldn't accept help from me, even if I offered it, or I know very little of the sex. And even if she would——" And he touched his sovereign purse again. "Phew, what a mess I should be in!"

Suddenly an idea flashed through his brain. There was a brief conflict within him, and the sad face of the girl before him gained the victory. Secretly extracting his last gold coin from its receptacle, he stooped suddenly, noisily jerking the table as he did so. A moment later he rose and extended his hand to the girl at the adjoining table. Between the finger and thumb was a sovereign.

"Is this what you lost?" he asked steadily. "It was on the floor."

A rich flush suffused the girl's face as she rose from her seat.

"Oh, thank you!" she said gratefully. "It must have dropped out of my purse."

Instantly the tears vanished from the blue eyes, and a sweet smile lit up the pale face, and Max felt himself well rewarded. A few moments later, and she was gone, and Max, again lightening his pocket by the sum of sixpence, went out into the Strand and turned down a side street in the direction of the Embankment.

"An expensive outing," he said comically as he mounted the narrow stairs to his attic.

Mrs. Jinks, hearing him enter, came out of her sitting-room to meet him.

"Two letters for you, sir," she said, and looked at him significantly. "I 'ope as 'ow it's good noos, sir, for your bills arunnin' up and I'm only a poor widder, sir, and money's shocking tight, and the butcher he do say——"

She stopped. Max Villiers had torn open one of the envelopes and the pink flush of a cheque caught her watchful eye. She hastened to apologise.

"I'm sure I means no offence, sir. You've always been a good lodger, and paid me reg'lar up to the last few weeks. I wouldn't trouble you now, sir, but a woman must live, and it comes 'ard when you're a widder and 'ave to work hard like me."

"I know, I know," said Max hastily. "I'm not offended. I'll just go out and change this, and then I'll settle up with you."

Mrs. Jinks retreated with a satisfied sigh, and Max, left to himself, tore open the second envelope. One glance, and the colour leapt to his face and his eye brightened.

"Ah," he said, "it's come at last! 'Messrs. Caxton and Wall present their compliments to Mr. Villiers, and request the favour of an early interview in order to arrange preliminaries regarding the publication of the novel now in their hands. Both the partners will be in to-morrow morning, if that will suit Mr. Villiers' convenience.' That looks very much like business. Very well, to-morrow morning be it. I must drive a good bargain, I suppose, though that is not much in my line. At any rate, I shall stick out for royalties, for the book might sell like strawberries in summer."

He went out, cashed the cheque he had received for his short story, paid Mrs. Jinks' bill, and waited for the morrow. And when the morrow came, he found Messrs. Caxton and Wall surprisingly easy to deal with, and when he left, after an hour's interview, he carried with him a very substantial cheque and a copy of an agreement drawn up by that estimable firm for his future emolument.

* * * * *

Nearly two years had sped by since Max Villiers' first book had taken the world by storm, and its author found himself famous. A second book had just been published, and the avidity with which it was already being read promised well for its success. The old-time poverty was almost forgotten, though there were still times when his mind went back to those early days, and that sympathy with the poor, awakened only by personal experience, warmed his heart with the love of humanity and led him to many a noble deed. It was early autumn, and he had accepted the invitation of a wealthy book-lover to spend a few weeks at his estate in Rutlandshire. Other guests, he was informed, would be present, all more or less of an artistic or literary turn of mind, and he anticipated an agreeable time. The place was not easy of access, and, after accomplishing about three-fourths of the journey, he had to catch a local train at a sleepy country junction, which would convey him to his destination. But even here there were complications, and he was directed to take his seat in the front part of a train. The third carriage was comprised of first and second-class compartments, and into one of the former he stepped. There were three other carriages in the rear of the train, but these were to be disconnected a few miles further on. He settled himself comfortably in a corner of the compartment, and waited for the train to start. Presently he heard the voice of the guard.

"Is this what you lost?" he asked, holding up a sovereign.

"Front of the train, miss. This way, please!"

There were footsteps on the platform, and, a moment later, the guard flung open the door of his compartment, and a young lady, pretty and well dressed, entered. She started at sight of Max Villiers, but took her seat with apparent unconcern.

"Straight through for Magden Park," said the guard as he slammed the door.

Magden Park! Villiers looked up from the newspaper he was reading, and across at the girl opposite him. He was going to Magden Park. Was this girl one of the guests his host had spoken of? He hoped she was, for she looked sweet and dainty, and the blue eyes were frank and sunny. As soon as the train moved out of the station, she picked up a book she had brought with her, and, opening it half-way, began to read.

There was a light in Max Villiers' eyes as he recognised it as his own recent production. It was clear the book absorbed and fascinated her, but, once or twice, he thought he caught the girl's eyes fixed inquiringly on his face, while a little puzzled expression lingered about the pretty curved brows. Perhaps she recognised him. A great many people did that every day in his life now, and he was not surprised.

Digitized by Google

Soon they stopped at the station where the latter half of the train was to be disconnected. The guard who had accompanied them hitherto, remained in his van at the rear of the rear half of the train, while a new guard, who had been waiting on the platform, took his station in a similar van between the engine and the three carriages which were to go on in front. The carriage containing Max Villiers and his fair fellow-traveller would therefore be at the extreme end of the first train.

There was some slight delay at first, owing to the mistake of a sleepy-looking porter who officiated at the little country station. It was his duty to disconnect the couplings of the train in order to divide it for its respective journeys, and, instead of doing this behind the carriage containing Max Villiers, he did so between it and the carriage before it. Fortunately, the guard chanced to notice the mistake before the engine moved on, and the porter was ordered to connect the couplings again and disconnect those at the rear of Villiers' carriage. A few moments, and they were off again.

The district was hilly, and, half a mile further on, they could look back at the sleepy little station they had just left, lying peacefully down in the valley below. They were going up now, and the gradient was unusually steep. But there was little to encumber the locomotive, and it sped up the steep incline as though it were on level ground. On they went, the ground still rising, until one could look over a vast expanse of fertile country.

But the girl was deep in her book, and Max Villiers' thoughts were divided between his newspaper and various speculations as to his fair companion's opinion of his own work. So the magnificent view passed all unnoticed, and the train approached the crest of a hill.

Suddenly there was a violent jerk, and, in spite of the speed at which they were travelling, the carriage came almost simultaneously to a standstill. Both its occupants were taken at a disadvantage, and assumed different but equally ridiculous postures. Recovering themselves, however, their eyes met, and the comicality of the situation made them both laugh.

"Some obstacle on the track, I suppose," said Villiers. "But the engine-driver might consider the dignity of his passengers with a greater degree of nicety."

The girl laughed and looked out of the window.

"But we are running back," she said. "I wonder if anything is wrong."

Max Villiers rose from his seat and put his head out of the window. They were, indeed, running backwards down the steep grade of a hill, and the pace was growing greater as they descended. But that was not all he saw. Glancing momentarily forward, he saw, far away in the distance, the remainder of the train, now disappearing over the crest of the hill. Something must have happened to the couplings, for their carriage had separated from the rest of the train, and, answering to the law of gravity, had come to a standstill on the brow of the hill and then run back down the steep incline. There was a catch in the man's throat as he drew in his head and looked at the girl's inquiring face.

"We have been separated from the rest of the train and are running down hill again," he said quietly. "There is no cause for alarm, however, and I will stand out on the footboard to keep a sharp look-out ahead."

The girl's face grew white and her lips twitched.

"The second half of the train is somewhere behind us," she said.

"It is in front of us now," corrected Max. "But have no fear. We are in no danger as yet, and we must keep up courage."

The girl nodded, and, rising, straightened herself bravely.

"That's right," said Max approvingly. "We shall come to very little harm if we both keep our heads."

He opened the carriage door as he spoke, and, stepping out on to the footboard, peered searchingly ahead. As yet he could see nothing of the second train, and hope rose within him. It would, he knew, be delayed some minutes at the little station, while a locomotive was connected. There was just a bare possibility that they might come in sight of the station before the second train had started. Yet, even if this were so, would their danger be thereby lessened? Would they not go crashing into the great mass of metal? He scarcely dared think—and he stood far out on the foot-board and waited till the carriage should turn the curve in the track and come in sight of the distant station. They were going much too fast now to think of leaping from the carriage. It was not so steep a little lower down, and the impetus would decrease. Perhaps he might risk it there. But the girl. He could not leave her—that was out of the question.

He had made light of their danger, but he could see she was not deceived. He looked back, and saw her still standing where she had risen, her face very white, but with the light of courage in her blue eyes. Even in that moment, Max marvelled at her mingled beauty and courage, and an admiration the like of which he had never before felt for any woman, entered his heart.

Presently they turned the curve, and Max saw the second train still standing by the station platform. It was just on the point of starting, and the first white column of steam shot upward from the locomotive. Then it stopped, and, with quick presence of mind, the driver reversed the propelling lever and the train steamed backward out of the station. But it was too late. The impetus they had gained was now too great to save them from collision, and the speeding carriage was almost at the station.

But another person was watching the racing carriage. Up in his box the station signalman stood, his hand on a long steel lever and his face pressed against the window. Not until he saw how inevitable was the impending collision did he jam the great lever down that altered the points at the little station. There was a short siding on the opposite side of the platform, where the locomotive waited until the first half of the train had gone on. A buttress of stonework and masonry was at the end, in which two black iron buffers were embedded. The impact here would be even greater than with the retreating train, but the signalman had to consider the safety of the train and its passengers, as well as that of the solitary carriage and its two occupants. Max saw the points jerked back, and, instantly realising what this portended, leapt back into the carriage, swung open the door on the further side, and stepped on to the footboard.

"Now for it!" he said. "You must trust yourself to me, and we may get off scot-free. Come close to me. You are not very big, and I am not a weakling. Do not be frightened. I am going to jump!"

He lifted her up in his arms as if she had been a child, and waited, his back against the speeding carriage. They were going less swiftly now, but still fast enough to make the leap he meditated perilous in the extreme. But there was that stout buttress of masonry ahead, and, going at that pace, the springs with which the buffers were fitted might as well have been wholly absent.

A few moments and they were abreast of the platform. Setting his teeth, and summoning up all the dormant strength in his manly frame, Max Villiers tightened his arms about the girl and leapt. The platform seemed to spin under him as his feet touched it, and he stumbled forward with a great gasp. But he kept his feet, though the great veins stood out like cords in his temples and neck, and beads of perspiration stood upon his forehead.

Then, placing the trembling girl on a seat close by, he sank down exhausted and leant his head on his hands. Even the crash of the carriage as it struck the buffers—the splintering and rending of wood and the twisting of ironwork underneath—failed to reach him. Man as he was, Max Villiers had fainted.

* * * * *

A fortnight had slipped by, and most of the guests in the big

Digitized by Google

modern mansion at Magden Park had taken their departure. Max Villiers and his fair travelling companion of two short weeks ago were among the few who still remained, and more than one was heard to whisper a prediction concerning them regarding their future relationship. And there was, in truth, ample reason for such predictions. For the first time in his life, Max Villiers had yielded to an attraction so potent that it subjugated every other consideration. He was in love, and he fully realised it. But the lady? Well, he was not addicted to vanity, but he saw quite clearly that she, too, took some apparent pleasure in his society, and this gave him hope. He had by this time learnt who she was. It had dropped out, piece by piece, in their frequent conversations of late, and Max felt a growing sympathy with the girl whose early life had so nearly resembled his own. She was an artist, but, until the last two years, Success had eluded her. And then the turn of the tide had come, and she, like himself, had taken it at the flood. Steadily but surely she had mounted the ladder of Fame, and now stood not far from the topmost rung. One brilliant masterpiece—a conception of great originality and power—had effected the change, and now her progress was easy and her name well-known as one of the greatest living lady artists. And then Max told her his own story, so like hers that it seemed almost repetition, and their common experience bred that uncommon understanding which nurtures the truest sympathy and finds the warmest echo in the human heart.

He lifted her in his arms, and waited. The carriage was nearing the buffers. "Now for it!" he cried.

And now they, too, were about to bid farewell to the lovely Rutlandshire scenery, and once more take their place among the toilers in the big city. But before they went away, Max Villiers was determined to know his fate. They had wandered out into the great shady park, and were sitting in a little arbour hidden away beneath the tall old elms. There was a curious note in the man's voice that made the girl look quickly up into his face. Then, with a soft pink blush on her cheeks, she turned away her head, for she had read his purpose.

"Miss Tempest," he began, "I have something to say to you which may surprise you, but which I cannot put off any longer. In three words—I love you."

He paused. The girl's eyes were on the ground. But she was not angry, he could see that, so he proceeded:

"True, it is only a fortnight since I first met you in the train on your way here, but love is not slow to grow when once the seed is sown." He paused again, and a twinkle came into his eyes. "Besides," he continued, "if this love is somewhat premature, so also was our acquaintanceship, for I held you in my arms within a quarter of an hour of our first meeting, and the experiment has given me an appetite."

Blanche Tempest looked up quickly.

"You mustn't be impudent," she said sternly, but there was no rebuke in her eyes.

"Ah," said Max earnestly, "I think you know enough of me to make you free from fear on that account. You are the only woman I have ever loved, dear, and it seems like a new world to me. But that world will know no sunshine until I have heard from your own lips that it is not I alone who love. Do not think me over-bold, dearest, but remember that your answer affects the whole of my future life. With you, that life will be untold happiness—without you, it must be an endless regret."

Digitized by Google

He stopped and looked down at the averted face of the girl at his side. She took out her purse, and, from an inner compartment, drew out a sovereign. She looked at it a moment, and then handed it to him.

"I think I owe you this," she said shyly. "Let me discharge the debt before we talk further."

Max Villiers was bewildered. His face flushed, and he rose from his seat. But Blanche rose also, and stood facing him, the gold coin still in her hand.

"I don't understand," Max faltered at last. "You—you owe me nothing. How could you? I have never lent you anything."

"It was nearly two years ago," said the girl steadily. "You and I were in an A.B.C. shop in the Strand, and we were both poor. I had lost a sovereign, or thought I had, and you pretended to pick it up. No one knows how grateful I felt to you, for that was my last sovereign. But when I got home, I found my sovereign in the lining of my dress, and then I understood. I tried to find you, in order to return it to you, for—for—I thought you might need it as much as I. But I couldn't. And it was only when I saw you in the train two short weeks ago that I recognised you. But you were prosperous then, and so I waited."

Max Villiers looked at the proffered sovereign in evident embarrassment.

"But I can't take it," he said. "Keep it in remembrance of that our first meeting."

Blanche shook her head.

"No," she said decisively. "You must take it."

There was a long pause, and then their eyes met. A great joy leapt into Villiers' heart, and he grew bolder than before.

"What about the interest?" he asked, taking the little hand, sovereign and all, into his strong grasp. "It accumulates in two years, you know."

"How much do you demand?" she asked archly.

"The biggest I can get," he said.

"Single or compound?" inquired the girl.

"A better than either," was the answer.

'And what interest may that be?" she asked again.

"Human interest," he said promptly. "I am a novelist, you know, and the demand is therefore appropriate."

They both laughed, and looked deep into each other's eyes. Then Max Villiers drew the girl into his embrace and took the first kiss of love from those ripe, sweet lips. For a moment or two they stood thus in silence—his arms about her waist, her heard resting on his shoulder.

Walter J. Mowbray.

THE INDECISION OF ELSA

Telling of a Waiter who Spoke French, and of a Happy Deception.

"TELL me, Elsa, what is it to be?"

"Oh, I do not know what to say; I feel differently every minute, Jack."

The speakers were Jack Selwyn and Elsa Cunningham. This made the fifth occasion during the past three months on which Jack had proposed to Elsa; but she could never make up her mind. She always knew that she was very fond of him but exactly how fond she was never certain.

"But surely you must know, Elsa. I know that I love you. It seems to me you must be certain one way or the other."

"I cannot help it, Jack; I really do not know. I have never had to do without you since I have known you well."

Neither spoke again for some time, and each appeared to be thinking deeply. At length Jack broke the silence.

"I cannot understand, Elsa, why you are unable to say 'yes' or 'no.' It is a subject on which I should think every man or woman would be decided."

She made no reply, evidently she had no answer to his attack. Suddenly she exclaimed:

"If you were to go away, Jack."

"Go away?" he cried in pained tones.

"Yes, just for a few months, then I should know. Besides, it would be a good test for you, perhaps you might meet some other girl you would like better than me."

"Elsa!" There was real pain in his tones now. And then with a little compassionate cry she put her arms round his neck and kissed him. A short interval ensued.

"I mean it, Jack," Elsa went on. "It would be better for both of us if we do not see each other for a few months."

"Not that, Elsa. I must have you," he cried.

"But, Jack, old boy, you must see it will be for the best."

"But why need we separate? You care for me a great deal, and that will increase as time goes on."

"Will it, Jack? That is just what I want to make sure of."

She put her arms round his neck again, and gazed right into his eyes. A wonderful pity seized her as she saw the mute pain that was apparent there.

"If I was certain, Jack, dear, I would not hesitate a moment." The upshot of it all was that Jack Selwyn agreed to Elsa's proposal for a separation. It was to be for three months; then, if Elsa felt she really could not do without him, she was to write. It was taken for granted that he would not forget her in that time.

After some discussion it was decided that an occasional letter might be written, but in no case were they to become frequent.

It was with very heavy hearts that they parted that evening. When the time for the last "Good-bye" came they found it much harder than they had anticipated. But they were resolved to carry out their plan. And so they parted.

It was at the end of June that they said "Good-bye." July had now gone and August was half over. Elsa was seated on the verandah of the High Cliff Hotel at Westport. She was engaged in reading a letter from Jack Selwyn; the third she had received since they parted, now nearly two months ago.

A wistful look was in her eyes as she read and re-read his letter. A look which, had Jack Selwyn seen, would have vanquished all his doubts for ever.

So she sat and dreamt dreams of days that were gone, and days that might be. Would he come back, she wondered, when those three months were over. But her reverie was disturbed by the entry of a waiter, whose slouching gait and dark, sinister face were just as foreign to the object of Elsa's thoughts as chalk is to cheese.

Elsa Cunningham and her aunt, Mrs. Crabtree, were staying at Westport for several weeks. The holiday did not seem to be doing Elsa much good, for she invariably wore a pensive, almost worried look. Mrs. Crabtree grew quite upset at times.

Digitized by Google

"My dear Elsa," she would say, "you must look better or else your father and mother will be sorry that they ever let me take you away."

"That's all right, Aunt Lou. Don't you worry; I shall turn up trumps."

Elsa's style of speech was often rather slangy, but that is the mode of the present day.

"That Mr. Ward is a nice young man. Do you not think so, Elsa?"

"Cannot say that I'm particularly struck with him," replied Elsa, to whom young men, with one exception, bore no attraction now.

"I wish you would not use those slang expressions of yours, my dear. They do not sit well on you. Now, I think Mr. Ward is a very nice, gentlemanly young man, and I think he likes you, Elsa."

"Does he?" was the indifferent reply.

"Yes, I am sure he does, dear. In fact, I have asked him to take tea with us this afternoon."

"What!" Elsa started as if she had been shot. "Asked him to take tea with us?" she repeated. "Whatever for?"

"Oh, I like him," replied Mrs. Crabtree somewhat lamely. "And I thought he would be company for you."

"Company, I don't want his company," cried Elsa scornfully; and to herself she said, "Oh, Jack, Jack, why are you not here?"

"Surely Mr. Ward is near enough," she went on, "without asking him to tea. He is staying in the same hotel, and I should have thought that it was quite enough to see him at dinner, let alone inviting him to tea."

"Surely, Elsa, the young man is not objectionable to you."

"Oh, my dear aunt, no. Mr. Ward can come if he likes or stop away if he likes." Which was equivalent to saying that she wished to hear nothing more about Mr. Ward.

Mr. Frederick Ward was a young gentleman favoured with plenty of money and nothing to do but to spend it. I say favoured, for to have nothing to do but to spend money is regarded by many people as the greatest of favours. At any rate, Mr. Ward was honouring the High Cliff Hotel with his presence. Also he was very much smitten with Elsa Cunningham, and with the wiliness of a diplomatist, had set himself to woo the chaperon first. Thus it was that Mrs. Crabtree characterised Mr. Ward as "a nice young man."

He had introduced himself on the cliff, and had immediately rendered Mrs. Crabtree assistance by raising the hood of her chair so as to resist the sun's rays. In many ways he had made himself useful to Elsa's aunt, and had thus succeeded in the first stages of his campaign.

There was too much self-opinionated conceit about him to please Elsa. He smirked as he spoke, and smelt like a perfume shop. And when I say that Elsa loathed him, I am well within bounds. In fact, she had referred to him as "an insufferable cad."

However, he duly presented himself at the private sitting-room which his hostess occupied, and professed himself "charmed" to see Mrs. Crabtree and her niece.

The same waiter who had already offended Elsa's artistic susceptibilities brought in the tea. Not that I wish to infer that waiters are artistic subjects, but there are waiters and waiters, and this man was one of the other sort.

As he passed Mr. Frederick Ward his foot appeared to catch in a rug, with the result that a certain amount of hot tea disported itself on the immaculate clothing of Frederick. That gentleman swore, not loudly, I admit, but Elsa caught the words, and her lip curled scornfully.

The waiter apologised, and Mr. Ward was good enough to say that it did not matter, for it occurred to him that such an attitude would perhaps raise him in the estimation of the ladies. Inwardly, though, he was far from smiling, for, in common with many small-minded people, he was exceedingly mean.

When the waiter returned again with some more edibles, it occurred to Mr. Ward that this would be a remarkably fine chance of displaying how clever he was. Thereupon he turned to Elsa, and slowly, with a painful accent, said:

"Voici encore le cochon gauche," which, for the benefit of those who have studied other languages than French, is interpreted as "Here is the clumsy pig again."

If it had been possible for him to have sunk lower in Elsa's estimation he would have done, but I think it was impossible. Also I am perfectly sure she beamed with enjoyment when the waiter remarked:

"Merci, Monsieur," and his accent was admirable.

Ward flushed very red; how dare a waiter know French? He turned, and in agonising French asked the waiter how he came to know the language. Elsa has said she could have almost kissed him for his reply, which was:

"Pardon, sir, but I do not speak German."

Elsa laughed outright whilst Mr. Ward almost boiled with indignation. The waiter bowed himself out.

"These common fellows have too many airs, do you not think so, Miss Cunningham?"

"He seems a very well educated man, and speaks French as well as he does English, you should get him to teach you."

And with this Parthian shot Elsa retired from the room.

All this time Mrs. Crabtree had sat in bewilderment, glancing from one to the other. But when Elsa had gone out of the room she turned to Ward and said:

"My dear Mr. Ward, I am very sorry that this has taken place. You will please accept my apologies; Elsa is such a wilful girl."

Mr. Frederick Ward had been swearing to himself ever since the departure of Elsa. The calamities that he wished would overtake the waiter would have excited the admiration of the most barbarous of savages. He mentally resolved that the man should suffer for being the means of his discomfiture.

Some days passed by, and in the meantime Elsa had replied to Jack Selwyn's letter. Now, whether there was anything in the letter she wrote which gave him a clue to her more settled feelings I cannot say for certain; but I know that she received, just a few days afterwards, a very long letter in reply. In that letter he stated that his feelings had undergone a change, and that he loved her still more than ever.

Thereupon Elsa resolved that when she wrote again it should be to summon him to her. But she decided that it would not do to appear too hasty and came to the conclusion that it would be as well to wait a few days.

Frederick Ward seemed in no wise knocked under by the severe snubbing he had received at Elsa's hands, but became more and more attentive to Mrs. Crabtree and her niece. When I say Elsa snubbed him, I hardly express her real attitude, she seemed almost rude to him. But then, there are some creatures to whom it is not rude to be rude, to use a Hibernism.

But Elsa put up with it quite happily, the thought of Jack keeping her spirits high. She seemed quite a different girl to the dejected Elsa who had come to Westport. Mrs. Crabtree put it down to the attractions of Mr. Ward, and endeavoured more than ever to throw them together at every opportunity.

In her last letter to Jack, Elsa had referred to Ward, and in his reply Selwyn had said, "I should like to teach that cad a lesson, do not be surprised if I do." Which remark Elsa had looked upon as a fond extravagance.

Mr. Frederick Ward still nursed a bitter feeling of resentment against the unfortunate waiter, and during the past few days had concocted a plan by which he was to revenge himself.

Digitized by Google

The general hour for dining at the High Cliff Hotel was seven o'clock, and on the Wednesday evening the large saloon was fairly full of diners.

Enter Mr. Frederick Ward.

Mr. Wilberforce, the manager of the hotel, in evening dress, passed through the saloon soon afterwards, but his progress was arrested by Ward.

"By the way, Wilberforce," he exclaimed loudly. "During the last two nights a diamond pin and a pair of diamond cuff-links have disappeared from my room, and I have reason to believe that they have been stolen."

Had he accused the manager of stealing them himself, I doubt if the diners would have been more astonished. Certainly it was annoying to lose things, or have them stolen, but it was hardly the thing to announce it as Ward was doing.

"I am exceedingly sorry, but if you will come to my office I will look into the matter without delay."

"It does not require looking into, for I have means of knowing that the thief is there."

Ward pointed in a melodramatic way at the unfortunate waiter. Beyond a slight trembling of his hands, however, that individual took no notice of the accusation.

"Barton," cried the manager to the waiter, "come to my office. I should be glad, if you, too, Mr. Ward, would come when you have finished dining."

"Certainly," he replied. "You will, of course, keep a sharp watch on that man, though."

The manager and waiter withdrew to the office, and there a long conversation took place, the details of which I shall set down later.

Meanwhile Mr. Ward was giving his views in general on the subject.

"Have a detective down from London," he said. "Most abominable, have things stolen like this."

Although he was always speaking, Ward made a practice of using as few words as possible, with the idea that it would be a striking reality. At any rate it served to exercise the talents of mimicry possessed by various of the more junior males at the "High Cliff," much to the delight, I am afraid I must record it, of the opposite sex.

"When he had finished dinner Frederick departed to the manager's office.

"In an inquiry of this sort," began the manager, "it is always as well to form a kind of committee of the guests at the hotel."

"Quite so," agreed Frederick.

"With your permission, then," went on the manager, "I will leave Barton in charge of you and my clerk, whilst I ask a few gentlemen to favour us with their assistance."

"By all means," beamed Frederick. Events were falling in with his plan even better than he had bargained for. His plan, I said; but it is hardly fair to call the petty mean artifice which he had conceived a plan. At any rate this was his idea. He had made friends with a rather smart girl employed at the hotel who had been unsuccessful in her overtures to our friend the prisoner, and was, therefore, quite eager to fall in with Ward's scheme.

Just before dinner this estimable lady had piloted Ward to the servants' quarters which were quite deserted at that time, and placed the articles of jewellery at the bottom of Barton's box. His idea was to cause the box to be searched and thus disgrace Barton.

This was a man who would refer to himself as a gentleman, and yet a petty spite would allow him to lower himself to this extent. Such a creature is not worthy of the name of man.

Presently the manager returned, and with him several of the guests. Prior to their arrival at the office an animated conversation had taken place, which resulted in broad smiles on all their faces.

"Mr. Ward, you have made an accusation against this man, and we shall be pleased to hear your case."

"My case, gentlemen, is very simple," began Ward. "Last night, going along corridor, saw man leave my room hastily, that man was that waiter. Found my tie, pin, and my links were missing."

"I did not go in your room at all last night, neither have I been in it at all," said the waiter.

"I demand to have his box searched," cried Ward. "He is sure to have hidden the things."

"Is that justifiable, do you think, gentlemen?" asked the manager.

"Certainly," was the reply.

"Then let us go to his room," cried Ward triumphantly.

They started towards the servants' quarters, the manager starting forward to lead the way. Someone seized his arm and restrained him, at the same time pointing to Ward, who, in his eagerness, was acting as guide.

The manager chuckled quietly and followed.

Ward led them straight to the room and threw open the door.

"Now, gentlemen," he cried.

"You seem to know your way about, Mr. Ward," remarked the manager.

Confusion reigned with Frederick, and he mentally reviled his eagerness.

"Notice things, you know," he remarked with an attempt at coolness, but he was obviously ill at ease.

"Nice cigars you smoke, Barton," said the manager. "I thought I had forbidden smoking in the servant's bedrooms."

"I have not smoked any cigars in my bedroom," replied the waiter.

"H'm! curious," remarked Mr. Wilberforce, and then he suddenly stooped and picked up the coloured paper band from a cigar.

"Los Huelvos, better cigar than I can smoke. By the way, that's your favourite brand, isn't it, Mr. Ward?"

"Yes, I do smoke them," muttered Frederick, more ill at ease than ever. "But let us carry out our programme."

"Ah, yes, the box," cried the manager.

The box was opened and presently every article was out on the floor but not a vestige of the jewellery.

"They've been moved!" shrieked Ward, and then regretted it immediately.

"Exactly as you anticipated, Barton," said the manager; and then he produced from his pocket the links and pin.

Ward turned a pasty hue and glanced from one to the other in dismay.

"These articles were handed to me by Barton just before dinner," said Mr. Wilberforce. "It strikes me as a curious thing that Mr. Ward should know his way to Barton's room so well. It is also queer that the room smells of cigar smoke and that cigar of a similar brand to Mr. Ward's, who, I believe, is the only one in the hotel to smoke them.

"The pin and links were given to me by Barton, who stated that having found himself to be without a handkerchief, he had hurriedly rushed to his room to obtain one. There he found a distinct smell of smoke, and observed that the lid of his box was down, when he distinctly remembered having left it ajar. He immediately opened the box and saw that the contents had been disturbed; continuing his search he found the jewellery which he gave to me.

Digitized by Google

"I asked him if he had any clue, and whether there was anyone who had any grudge against him. The only man he could think of was Mr. Ward for the reasons which I have given you."

Here the manager referred to the incident of the French conversation at the tea table.

"Now, sir," he said, turning to Ward. "Have you anything to say to disprove this?"

Ward made no reply, but his abject look condemned him.

"We are waiting," said the manager.

Then Ward began to bluster, and spoke of his honour and other equally foreign things. But he made no impression.

"Gentlemen," went on the manager, "I think you will agree with me that Barton is quite innocent, and that, having no direct proof, the person who has done this thing is unknown apparently. But I must ask Mr. Ward to be good enough to vacate his rooms by to-morrow."

"And if I do not?" snarled Ward.

"Then I shall make the story public, and I think I know what the general verdict would be."

Thus Mr. Frederick Ward passes out of this history to be seen no more.

It transpired that the servant girl on observing the commotion had become frightened and confessed her share in the matter to the manager, but he had preferred to hear Ward convicted out of his own mouth.

"That's your nice young man," remarked Elsa. "What do you think of him now, Aunt Lou?"

"My dear, I am going to bed," replied that lady; which was hardly an answer to the question.

As soon as Mrs. Crabtree had gone out of the room, Elsa sat down and hastily commenced to write. She had decided to summon Jack Selwyn, and with that intent, was inditing a letter to him.

Suddenly the door opened, and the waiter entered with a letter on a tray. Elsa pounced on it, and saw to her joy that the handwriting was that of Jack Selwyn.

It was but a short note, and Elsa eagerly devoured the contents, quite unaware that the waiter was still in the room. The letter ran as follows:

"My Dearest Elsa,—I cannot wait any longer, and am coming to take my answer verbally. I shall be with you this evening; please be merciful.

"Yours ever,

"Jack."

In her excitement she laughed aloud, and cried "Dear old Jack," and then impetuously kissed the letter. The waiter coughed. With flaming cheeks Elsa turned on him:

"Why, Barton," she said, "are you still here?"

The waiter thought for a moment, and then admitted that he was.

"Oh, Barton, I wanted to say how pleased I was that Mr. Ward was found out please get me a Bradshaw." This all in a breath.

When he departed to fulfil his mission, a sudden thought struck Elsa.

"Why, Jack told me not to be surprised if Mr. Ward was taught a lesson, only he said he would do it. How quaint a coincidence!"

Here Barton entered with a Bradshaw.

"Can I find you the place, miss?"

"I want trains from London, Barton."

"There are no more trains to-night, miss. Last train gets in at half-past seven. It's nine o'clock now."

"Are you sure?" cried Elsa, with all the gaiety gone from her voice.

"Quite, miss."

"Thank you, Barton. That will do."

"Are you sure, Elsa?" came another voice.

With a glad little cry Elsa jumped up, but there was only Barton there.

"Why I thought——" she began, then she stared at Barton who actually smiled at her.

Suddenly she sprang forward, and placed her hands on the waiter's shoulders.

"Jack!" she almost screamed. "Jack, you?"

"Yes, Elsa, me," remarked that individual as he removed a heavy dark wig from his light brown hair, and a large black moustache from his upper lips. He gravely proceeded to dust the charcoal from his eyebrows, and to rub out a few painted wrinkles. Whilst all the time Elsa watched in happy wonderment.

"Oh, you dear, silly old boy," she cried. "And do you mean to say you have been here all the time?"

"Yes, dear, I could not bear to be parted from you altogether, so I got a friend of mine connected with the stage to make me up, and then I got a situation here. Of course, I had to disguise my walk and voice as well."

"I only intended to keep it up a little while, though, but friend Ward interested me so much that I resolved to see him out. I sent my letters to a chum in London to post down again. And now here I am. Are you glad to see me?"

"Glad," she echoed. "Oh, Jack, I am so happy, and I never want to let you go away from me again."

I will not chronicle the rest of the proceedings, which were purely of a private nature. Mr. and Mrs. Jack Selwyn may often be seen at Westport now, at least once a year, and they always stay at the same hotel.

E. Newton Bungey.

Pearson's

Fortune Teller.

By PROFESSOR P. R. S. FOLI.

Crown 8vo, Cloth. Price 1s. Post Free 1s. 2d.

Some of the subjects in this interesting book are:

Augury by Birds—What Birds Foretell—Astrology—Gipsy Fortune-tellers—Antiquity of Card Reading—Charms—Christmas Customs—Facts about and instances of Clairvoyance—Crystal Gazing—The Crystal Globe—Three Kinds of Vision—Magnetic Precious Stones—Divination by a Wedding Ring, by Dominoes, by Palmistry, by Rods, Teacups, and by the Wheel of Fortune—The Divining Rod—Odds and Ends of Omens—Advice and Hints for Beginners in Fortune-telling—Gipsies—Hallowe'en Charms—Lucky Stars—Mesmerism Supersedes Witchcraft—Lines on the Hand in Palmistry—Precious Stones and their Meanings—The Koh-i-noor—Psychometry—Rings and Bridecake, etc., etc.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "Pearson's Fortune Teller," for which I inclose the sum of 1/2.

Name .....

Address .....

OR AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

Digitized by Google

Clever Animal.

JINKS: "Yes, she has brought her dog up in the most fashionable way." Binks: "Indeed." Jinks: "Yes, he barks at anyone who is worth under half a million."

No Doubt About It.

YOUNG HUSBAND: "My dear Mabel, I must say that this pudding doesn't taste very nice." Wife: "All imagination, dear, it says in the cookery-book that it tastes excellent!"

Suited Her Admirably.

MR. GOODENOUGH: "I have so much trouble with the pronunciation of my name; it is properly pronounced Good-no, you know." She (shyly): "Yes, but it is Good-enough for me."

Would Realise His Hopes.

MR. HIGHNOTE (at an amateur musicale): "What's he singing?" Miss Sweetvoice: "'Let me like a Soldier Die.'" Mr. Highnote: "If I had a gun with me he should be gratified."

Smith Knew Something.

JONES (leaving for the Continent): "When I'm in Rome I'll do as the Romans do." Smith: "Indeed, you won't. You'll do as the English do—pay twice as much for everything as anyone else would."

He Was Number One.

EXCITED LADY (at the telephone): "I want my husband, please, at once." Telephone Girl (from the Exchange): "Number, please?" Excited Lady (snappishly): "How many do you think I've got, you impudent thing?"

The Bonnet—or Death.

HUSBAND: "Wake up, wake up! The house is on fire, Maria." Wife (imploringly): "Oh, save my new bonnet, John!" Husband (determinedly): "I will. It cost more than anything else in the house."

And Then They Went to Press.

THEY were sitting side by side on the sofa, when the young author said: "Yes, I have a new volume in the press." "How I envy that volume," said the roguish girl; and when he saw the point, they were both very, very happy.

Tricks of the Trade.

MRS. RUSHYEW: "But are you not taking considerable risk in letting your young men owe for two or three weeks?" "Yes, there is some risk," said Mrs. Hashcroft. "But then, you see, they worry over it so that they lose their appetites. So I save money in the long run."

Quite Like the Real Thing.

MRS. JOCELYN: "Don't you miss your husband very much now that he is away?" Mrs. Golightly: "Oh, not at all. You see, he left me plenty of money, and at breakfast I just stand a newspaper up in front of his place and half the time forget that he really isn't there."

A Very Clever Cook.

"THEY have some wonderful chefs in Paris." "Indeed!" "Yes. One of them can boil water in seventeen different styles."

The Turnip is a Beau.

"DON'T talk to me," said the lettuce to the turnip; "I have a heart, and you haven't." "I don't see how that can be," replied the turnip. "You never get mashed, and I do."

The Worst of Cheap Cigars.

MR. EDWARDS: "There's a terrible smell of boiling cabbage throughout the house." Mrs. Edwards: "Yes; we're boiling the lace curtains, in the hope of getting the tobacco smell out of them."

You Don't Say So!

"WHAT is that old proverb about the moss and the rolling stone?" queried the country girl. "A revolving fragment of the paleozoic age collects no cryptogamous vegetation," replied her cousin from Girton.

Not the War Office This Time.

A HEALTH officer recently received the following note from one of the residents of his district: "Dear Sir,—I beg to tell you that my child, aged eight months, is suffering from measles as required by Act of Parliament."

Smart Youth.

SAMMY: "Going to move soon, Tommy?" Tommy: "Yes." Sammy: "How do you know?" Tommy: "Ah! how d' I know? Didn't me mother lemme break a winder tother day an' didn't say nothin?"

They Were Always Late.

ROBERTS: "Time is precious." Smith: "It is, indeed, and I've wasted lots of it." Roberts: "By indulging in foolish pleasures, I suppose?" Smith: "No, I lost it by being punctual in keeping my appointments with others."

Accounted For It.

"IT is strange what a time we have with cooks, dear," said Mrs. Inniscuos. "Dawson was telling me to-day that they've had theirs for ten years." "Yes, dear; and did he tell you who she was?" "No. Who?" "His wife."

A Terribly Tragic Poem.

HE blushed a fiery red; her heart went pit-a-pat; she gently hung her head, and looked down on the mat. He trembled in his speech; he rose from where he sat, and shouted with a screech: "You're sitting on my hat!"

Then the Division Bell Rang.

"PAPA," remarked the M.P.'s daughter, looking at the clock. "What is it, Lou?" asked papa, who had lingered in the drawing-room with the young people. "It is nine o'clock. At this time George and I usually go into committee." Then papa retired.

John Did His Duty.

"I HOPE you try to push business, John, even after office hours," said a coal dealer to his clerk, last January. "I do, sir," replied John. "I call upon a different girl every night, and never leave before twelve o'clock, and have a big fire going all the time."

He Wouldn't be Caught.

A MOTHER of four daughters, of whom one had recently married, asked a young man sitting beside her in the drawing-room whom she would like to have for a son-in-law, "And which of my girls do you most admire?" He (fighting shy): "The married one."

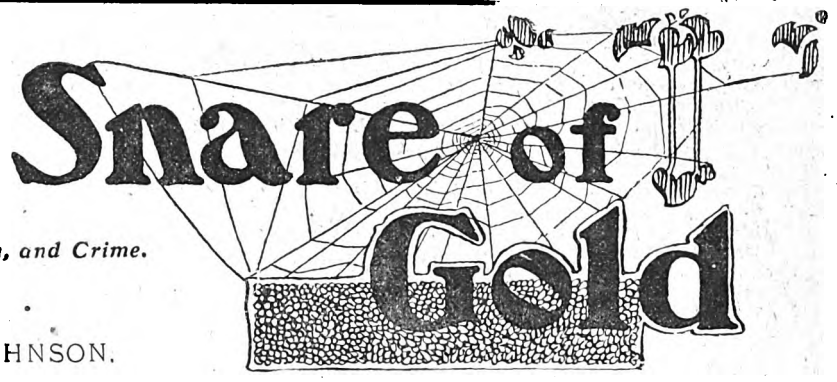
He Would Long for the End.

"I FEEL," said the young man to her father, "that existence without your daughter would be only a dreary task, whose completion could not come too soon." "Very well," said the old gentleman, "take her, and presently you'll feel the same way, only more so."

Digitized by Google

GRAND SERIAL STORY.

The Snare of Gold



A Tale of Love, Ambition, and Crime.

By

Henry T. Johnson.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS IN THIS SPLENDID STORY ARE:

George Geldart, a former prosperous City merchant, supposed to be dead, and now known as "Old Mystery."

Eric Geldart, his elder son, who conspired to kill his father, thereby coming into his property. He is elected as an M.P.

Ronald Geldart, the younger son, who has been disinherited because he has been falsely accused of robbing his father.

Clare Armitage, the adopted sister of the two brothers, and who is betrothed to Eric.

Boanerges Blagdon, the traitorous partner of old Geldart, whom he has cheated in business, and who plots with Eric to murder him.

Sampson Scrimshaw, company promoter, who befriends "Old Mystery."

Mr. Stanyer, an Australian financier, who gives "Old Mystery" the post of English agent for his business.

Madeleine Lorraine, daughter of Lord Lynton, who is beloved by Eric Geldart.

Phyllis Daventry, typewriter to Scrimshaw, who takes a fancy to "Old Mystery." She is rescued from Hooligans by Ronald Geldart.

Jack Widdicombe, cousin to the brothers Geldart, and who is engaged on the Meteor.

EIGHTEENTH CHAPTER.

"What a Nice Girl!"

The Meteor was living up to its name. Its racy articles, brief but sparkling, contributed materially to the gaiety of nations. Its reviews and criticisms were the most brilliant of the day, its interviews were interesting word pictures of notable people with every little point of character accentuated without being exaggerated out of focus.

Society ladies were as keen on getting their portraits in its pages as on securing the lion of the season at their dinner parties. Politicians, authors, actors, artists in general preferred a slating in the Meteor to its ignoring them. The Meteor was blazing brilliantly, and Cousin Jack, its managing director, was partaking of and reflecting its brilliance.

No longer shabby and seedy with all the shine that ought to have been on his hat and boots transferred to his knees and elbows, but spruce and dapper, with a flower in his buttonhole and a twinkle in his eye, he positively beamed with prosperity at first nights and other press functions, and men who, seeing him approach, set their features and eyes in a cold, vacant, ignoring stare, relaxed them when they observed that Jack was in company with an M.P. or perhaps shaking hands with a lord.

And whereas George Geldart, who had in earlier days given Cousin Jack a start now and then, with the result that Jack had merely added one more to his list of failures, and he, Geldart, had with a grim chuckle upbraided himself for his folly in putting his money on so unreliable a horse, Scrimshaw metaphorically patted himself on the back for having made Jack Widdicombe business manager of the Meteor, besides having so found him work in other directions.

"That's the secret of success, Old Mystery," he said one night as they sat chatting after hours and enjoying a quiet dinner sent into the office on the second floor, "putting the right man in the right place; that was Napoleon's gift.

"Now lots of people shrugged their shoulders when I told them whom I was going to send to Bilbao, over the manganese job, and to Berlin to approach the Chancellor regarding the East African concessions. When I made the same man business manager of the Meteor they laughed outright, but I knew what was in the man and I knew how to get it out of him."

"Who is he?" asked Old Mystery, more out of politeness than curiosity.

"A capital fellow, good as gold, only a square peg in a round hole till I took him up. He knew my old dad and he was very good to me as a nipper, besides I could see a lot in him that other people couldn't. He came out of a very good stable, too; his name is Jack Widdicombe."

"What! Jack Widdicombe!" Old Mystery burst out involuntarily.

"You know him?" said the other with a keen glance.

"I used to slightly," said Geldart, with a forced air of indifference. "Of course you lost your money?"

"Just what I didn't do. Whatever the man put his hand at positively hummed along; he's been a regular mascot to me."

"It can't be the man I know," said Geldart, unable to realise the possibility of Cousin Jack being a success in anything, and not realising that when he himself had given Jack a chance, he had had it in a half-hearted way with a sort of settled conviction that it would be of no use, and that failure was a foregone conclusion, whereas Scrimshaw had set his man afloat wholly and heartily, and with the confidence in him that begat confidence in the man in himself.

But they were too intent upon the various ramifications of the System to devote further time or thought to Jack Widdicombe's failure or success.

They had, on a small scale, been giving the System a trial, and in the main the result had, to Scrimshaw's surprise, justified Old Mystery's faith in it, and they were now at work on figures and other matters with a view to remedying trifling defects or miscalculations that had come out in the working, prior to giving it another experimental trial.

They had started their experiments with a thousand pounds, a month's working had turned that into five thousand.

Now five thousand pounds was not a sum to take Scrimshaw's breath away; he frequently gave cheques to public subscriptions for much larger amounts; not necessarily in good faith, but as a guarantee for publication

Digitized by Google

As he frankly said, if you judiciously selected your objects you could easily get out of ten thousand pounds in donations twenty thousand pounds' worth of common or garden advertisement, and he looked on public charity as a splendid field for booming.

But a profit of four thousand on a month's working with a thousand pounds was not a matter to be lightly estimated or appreciated, even by a Rothschild.

Four times one's principal on a month's working, or four thousand eight hundred per cent, upon the year—it was terrific! And on accumulated principal it opened up possibilities that staggered one.

Why, one man could corner all the gold and silver and copper—aye, all the wealth in all the world within a given, and not a lengthy period, only, as Old Mystery had pointed out at the beginning, you couldn't bring the principle of accumulated working into his System—it wouldn't do; it was against the principle of the System.

But he had demonstrated to Scrimshaw the pet scheme of his life—the scheme he had never yet found a man strong enough, keen enough, bold enough to venture on, and the scheme, that of its inherent nature could not be worked single-handed, but could be carried out as completely by two persons as by a dozen.

And so through the long summer evenings after dinner, dining at Crosby Hall or perhaps having dinner sent in, Scrimshaw, when not in requisition at the House, sat with Old Mystery over their cigars and their coffee elaborating, perfecting, and expending the wonderful wealth-gathering System.

But one evening between the lights, when the City was almost deserted, Old Mystery, gliding close to the wall, as was his habit, under the archway leading down the steps into, Crosby Square, almost brushed against—Cousin Jack, who, having jumped alertly out of a hansom, was scudding along to keep an appointment with the Meteor's proprietor.

Just for a moment or two the two men's eyes met, and Cousin Jack pulled himself up with a jerk like one who had received the shock of an electric current, then looked round. But It was gone. And when a few minutes later Jack Widdicombe sat in Scrimshaw's private office preparatory to going into certain matters of account, the Napoleon of finance scanning him curiously, said:

"I say, you're looking a bit off colour. Aren't you fit? Can I get you anything?"

"Well," said Cousin Jack, "if you happen to have any brandy, I'd like a nip."

"Certainly, I'll get you some," said Scrimshaw, suiting the action to the word. "By George, old fellow, you look as though you'd seen a ghost!"

"Thanks," said the other, gulping down the brandy almost neat; "by George, I think I have!"

Clickitty-click-click-click came the clatter and chatter of a typewriter from a distant room.

Then they went into the matters of the Meteor, and the proprietor remarked, "I say, that man Harvey Bligh was a good find of ours."

"Yes," said Widdicombe delightedly, "he was my find."

"Well, yes," replied Scrimshaw, "but in a way ours, for I discovered you and you discovered him. Have a cigar? By-the-way, what's his real name?"

"I'll have a cigar with pleasure," answered Widdicombe, "but I can't tell you his name."

"Why not?"

"Because I've promised."

Clickitty-clickitty-clackitty-clickitty—ting! Somehow Cousin Jack was reminded of a grasshopper.

"I never asked a man to break a promise yet," said Scrimshaw, "and I wouldn't give a pinch of salt for one who would."

"I know you wouldn't, Scrimshaw," said Cousin Jack. "I understand you better than most people."

"I think there's only one man understands me as well as you, Widdicombe."

"And he?"

Clackitty-clackitty-clack—rrrrrr! laughed the grasshopper-

"Well, I mustn't tell you who he is. Everybody has some secret to keep; you have yours, and if you blabbed to me the identity of Harvey Bligh I could never be sure that you weren't blabbing the identity of the proprietor of the Meteor. But now to business.

"I want a slashing article in next week's issue, it must be headed "Concerning Eric Geldart and his Little Party." Geldart's ratting, and he wants to take us of his party with him, bound hand and foot, into the Ministerial camp. I know his game; they've been promising old Lynton, whose daughter he's after, something in the Household and the reversion of the Lord Lieutenancy, and possibly an Under-Secretary's portfolio for Geldart himself. But he'll find the Little Party a mutinous and rampaging party if he tries to sell us, to deliver us, bound hand and foot, to the Philistines.

"Hammer it well in that the Meteor sees its game and that the Meteor means the public to see its game, and the Meteor means to baulk the paltry job. And now here comes my motor, I can give you a lift along the Embankment, but I've had a four-lined whip; I must get to the House in half an hour.

The door opened and in its frame there stood the prettiest picture Cousin Jack thought he had ever looked upon. What a shame for such a girl to be kept slaving at such an hour, and yet somehow he felt quite glad that on this occasion she had not left early.

"Ah, Miss Daventry, finished at last?" said Scrimshaw.

"Yes, Mr. Scrimshaw," said Phyllis pleasantly, but not quite able to repress a sigh of relief as she handed him a neatly-arranged and docketed set of papers.

"That's a good girl, sorry to keep you so late, only this was important and confidential."

Oh, then, this was an exceptional case. Cousin Jack wasn't quite so angry. And then the latter went on:

"Of course you've had some tea sent in?"

"Oh, no, sir, I knew that you were waiting and was afraid there wouldn't be time and I hardly liked to risk it."

"Then you're a silly, obstinate, brick of a little girl, and now be off with you."

With a laugh Phyllis nodded good night to her employer, also to Cousin Jack, who had risen to hold the door open.

"What a nice girl!" he said. He said so again to himself later in the evening strolling out of the theatre and musing that after all a fellow wasn't quite a fossil at forty-five.

And that night, strolling out of his club back to his flat, his comfortable, but rather lonely flat, he said again, quite to himself in confidence:

"What a nice girl!"

NINETEENTH CHAPTER.

The Brothers Meet.

THEN came the time when Ronald Geldart upbraided himself that he had renounced the name that was his own and that he had not been more strenuous in clearing that name from the stain of unjust accusation.

His faith in his own work had been justified, but by his own action in dropping out of the circle he had lived in and in adopting another name, he had justified that circle's want of faith in his innocence.

He felt himself in a position of a man who has fairly run for and who has bravely won a race, for which he had entered with a false description.

And most of all he reproached himself after his second meeting with Madeleine Lorraine, for that second had been quickly followed by a third, a fourth, a dozen others.

It would be hardly accurate to say that their acquaintance, had, with time and opportunity, ripened into affection, because, as a matter of fact, they had fallen in love with each other almost spontaneously at their first meeting; all that happened was they had ceased all attempt to conceal this fact, either to themselves or each other

Digitized by Google

As for the air of mystery surrounding her lover, Madeleine, who was after all only a girl, with a girl's natural predisposition to be romantic, delighted in it; it was an additional charm to her love affair to think that she was heart-in-heart with one of whom the world was saying, "Who can he be? What manner of man is this, whose work wins fame, a celebrity that thousands strive after in vain, yet who never mingles with the social world to taste the sweets that are his own?"

At times she yearned to tell her father, feeling that she was acting undutifully towards him, but she was restrained by the thought of his anger at discovering an obstacle to her marriage with Eric Geldart. For, as time went on, Lord Lynton became more frequently and urgently insistent in the matter of her acceptance of Eric Geldart's suit.

Geldart was making giant strides in politics, and the Earl's political interests were bound up with his own and those of his guerilla party; besides which, though she was not aware of it, her father was associated with Eric Geldart in certain financial ventures whereby Lynton sought to retrieve his shattered fortunes and Eric to multiply his own tenfold.

Again, all her life her father and she had somehow been far apart. Politics, fat stock breeding, and other pursuits had monopolised so much of Lynton's attention that there was not much to spare for the little motherless girl who had lived mostly, when away from school, with her aunt, Lady Harwardine, or with friends.

"Child and parent scarce regret,
When they part as strangers yet."

It was perhaps this feeling of isolation, despite her position, that drew Madeleine towards her clandestine lover. He loved her for herself.

At last she had met one to whom she would be and who would be to her all in all, and so for a brief space there were blissful stolen hours of sunshine, hours of drifting in the twilight down the river, watching the westering glory bathed in its bosom, she reaching out her shapely arms with punt pole, sculls, or paddle, while her lazy lover, in the seventh heaven of delight, leant back on the boat cushions, plunkitty-plunking the banjo beloved of both, and watching the love-light in the face and eyes he deemed the fairest and the dearest in the world.

And on autumn mornings, while the mists were gliding upwards from the river like fairies in their robes of gossamer, sprinkled here and there by a munificent sun with diamonds, they would rest their cycles after an early morning spin against the lever beam of the lock gates, watching alert anglers, anxious that the early fish should catch the worm, and ardent boating men in shorts and sweaters, snatching a breather before donning the black coat and silk hat of civilisation, and taking morning trains to town.

And Eric Geldart took occasion to remark to Lord Lynton how strangely averse Madeleine of late had grown to town, and how remarkably devoted she had recently become to her aunt.

"Yes, egad!" said Lord Lynton, "she seems to think a lot more of Amelia than she does of me, but then you see she's off my hands; only there was a time when she used to find it frightfully dull at Amelia's with no other young people there."

This set Eric wondering. Was Lord Lynton's supposition as to the absence of young people well founded? Suppose—suppose. And all at once it dawned upon him that he was feeling fagged; an autumn sitting was in progress, there was no getting away, at all events for the grouse, and possibly not until late for the partridges; he'd have a week-end on the river.

Madeleine and her lover were leaning side by side on the rail of a foot-bridge crossing the river creek just between the lights, when the elms were looming black against the golden sky and the summer evening breeze was whispering

(Continued overleaf.)

HOLLOWAY'S PILLS
THE FAMOUS HOUSEHOLD REMEDIES.

THE PILLS

have gained their wonderful reputation by sheer force of merit, because every person who uses them recommends them to others. They have positively no equal for thoroughly cleansing the system and putting the liver and kidneys in functional order, without pain or griping. They are the best known remedy for Indigestion, Biliousness, Headache, Dizziness, and the common condition of ill-health, known as "run-down" or "out of sorts." Females of every age find Holloway's Pills an invaluable remedy and aid.

THE OINTMENT

is known throughout the world as positively the best and quickest remedy for Bad Legs, Old Wounds and Sores, and Skin Eruptions of every kind, and should be used in conjunction with the Pills. It is also the speediest remedy for Rheumatism, Lumbago, Pains and Stiffness in the Limbs and Joints, Backache, &c. For pains and Soreness at the Chest, and for Throat and Lung Complaints arising from Cold or Weakness, Holloway's Ointment affords most welcome relief in a very short time.

A COMPLETE DISPENSARY IN THEMSELVES.

AND OINTMENT

Digitized by Google

to the rushes below, and the boughs above, that they twain were lovers, and the leaves were laughing at what the breeze had said the lovers said.

"Good-bye, Harvey, dear," said Madeleine.

"Until to-morrow."

"Until to-morrow, I hardly know," she answered. "Harvey, I sometimes think that it would be better if—if we didn't see each other, at all events for a while."

"Madeleine, why?"

"My father begins to ask questions about my frequent absence from town. Auntie, too, wonders what inducement I can have for such long and lonely rambles."

They laughed, and she went on: "And sometimes it seems to me it would be better for us not to meet for a while, until——" She paused.

He knew the meaning. Until he could stand out in the light of day before his fellow-men who only knew him by his work, throwing off the mysterious cloak of reserve and self-exclusion, the reason for wearing which he never yet had told her.

Swiftly he formed his resolve; he would tell her now, there should be no secret between them, she would believe him, aye! against the world, and in the ardour of his newly-formed resolve he bitterly reproached himself. Why had he not formed and carried out that plan before.

"Ah! Why?"

For it was now too late.

"Very charming and restful," a well-known voice drawled.

Turning, she and her lover stood face to face with—Eric Geldart. The two men faced each other defiantly, and Madeleine, with a strange foreboding tremor in her heart, noted the angry light in their eyes, but with perfect self-command she said:

"How do you do, Mr. Geldart. I didn't know that you were up the river."

"Or perhaps you would have been elsewhere," and she, blazing up at the impertinence, answered:

"I should have consulted my own inclination."

"And of course your friend's—which is equally of course the same thing."

"At all events," said Ronald, "that is no concern of yours."

"How dare you address me!" said Eric Geldart. "You know that I do not desire—more than that, I will not tolerate any communication with you."

"You, you Judas! it is not you who cut me off, it is I who abjure you."

So angrily they faced each other; somehow the same fierce light in the eyes of both, the same tightening of the lips and the setting of the jaws, that Madeleine, filled with a strange alarm, cried:

"Gentlemen—gentlemen! Mr. Geldart—Eric—what right have you to address such words to Mr. Harvey Bligh?"

"What!" Eric, crouching like a panther, with clenched hands and set face, hissed between his teeth, "Mr.—Harvey—Bligh—why, then, at last the veil is torn aside, now I understand it all! So having disgraced one name, having under one name robbed our dead father of his gold, under another you seek to steal from me that which I prize above all treasure in the world!"

"Coward! Liar!" And in their mad passion they would have flown at each other's throats, but that with clasped, uplifted hands she sprang between them:

"Eric! Harvey! Oh, no, not Harvey!"

There was an agonising quiver in her lips, her voice, her heart, as she uttered these last words. He had deceived her. Whether the cruel accusation she had heard concerning Ronald Geldart, the alleged black sheep, had truth or falsehood at its back, he had lied to her, had wooed her in disguise. What right had he to woo her love even as he wooed the public favour, under a false name; how could she be sure that Harvey Bligh was even his own nom de plume, if all that was said of him was true? Oh, horrible! perhaps he had stolen that! And yet—she loved him, loved him so dearly that turning to him she said:

"Tell this man he lies."

"He lies!" said Ronald, "with a half lie that is the worst lie of all. I never robbed my father. It is true that poor dead dad was brought to believe that cruel lie, and on account of it disinherited me."

"Then it is true that you are Ronald Geldart, his brother?"

"It is true," he said. "I am his brother, even as Abel was the brother of the man who slew him."

"I shall not leave you two men here to quarrel. Harvey Bligh—oh, no! there is no real Harvey Bligh, it's only a name—a label things are sold under. Good night—good night! Eric, you will take me back to the Oaklands. I know not which of you is Cain and which is Abel, but I will not leave you together with Cain in both your hearts!"

TWENTIETH CHAPTER.

Eric Resorts to Strategy.

"ERIC," said Boanerges Blagdon one morning as M.P. strolled into his partner's room. "Look here!" His fat hand trembled as he handed a letter in the handwriting of Clare Armitage.

Eric, recognising that hand at a glance, bent his brows thunderously.

"So!" he said more to himself than the other, "she's going to be troublesome, the she-cat. What's her little game?" He glanced at the missive which, omitting formal parts, ran:

"You know what I have done and risked for Eric, you know the bargain and the bond between us. He has broken that bond, repudiated that bargain, defies, dares, spurns me. Now I warn you unless he keeps his word, lets Lynton's girl go, and makes me his wedded wife, I will speak out. You were in the swim with us and you too must suffer, people are already whispering about you, wondering what agony of remorse led to that strange exhibition of yours at your meeting, and I have one more trump card left. If Eric Geldart spurns me I go to Ronald Geldart. I am told he is still in England; he has been seen in London, if Eric Geldart will not repair the wrong he has done me I will repair the wrong that he has done his brother, and that will mean his ruin and your own."

"Well!" said Eric, tossing the letter on to the table. But the other was in a far more worried mood.

"What's to be done? You know what a wilful, wayward creature she is, and, besides, that was the bargain between you; you told her you'd marry her when you were a mere nobody, a woman doesn't release a man lightly from that promise, especially when he becomes a somebody. I told you too not so long ago that Ronnie was still in England."

"I know he is," said the other.

"Have you seen him?"

"Yes."

"What happened?"

"Murder would have happened, only someone else was there."

"Well, Eric, what are you going to do? You're not going to risk that woman speaking out."

"Certainly not."

"But there's only one way of silencing her."

"Really. What's your way?"

"You'll have to marry her."

"I'll see her somewhere else first."

"I expect it will be pretty much the same thing for her."

"I never suspected you of so much humour, Boney, but that's not my way."

"What is your way?'"

"If you weren't such a coward I'd tell you, only for the present we must have her watched."

"Who's to watch her?"

"People who's trade is watching. I can't commission them, you can't commission them, we must get somebody to employ a private detective agency to shadow her every movement and report weekly, daily, and hourly, if need be."

Digitized by Google

"Yes, but who's your man?"

"He isn't a man, he's a shred. I've got him at my finger's ends, a fellow Scrimshaw employs to copy letters, swear at, and run errands. I've been civil to the fellow because I know what a wisp he is, but shred of a man that he is, he's in the opposition stable. I can get, through him, at Scrimshaw's waste-paper basket, now and then at his correspondence; the man's a bounder.

"Because I'm M.P. and a bit of a personage nowadays he fawns on and kow-tows to me, a nod and I won his confidence, a handshake, and 'How do you do, old fellow?' and he's my slave. I'll ask him to my club to dinner, and he'll sell his soul to me to be able to brag about it."

"What's his name?"

"I almost forget—what the dickens is it?"

"What's he like?"

"A flabby, underdone face, straw hair, no chin, a lot of collar. Oh! I know the name, Spring—Sprinkle—Springle!"

"And then," said Boanerges, "supposing we find Clare communicating with your brother?"

"Why, then," replied Eric, "Boanerges, we must, as the Frenchmen say, take our courage in both hands." He added to the words a significant nod, and there was an angry shimmer in his eyes that made his partner's flesh creep.

"Eric," he whispered, "we mustn't do anything very—very—desperate."

"Look here," said the other, leaning across the table, in an undertone, that smote Blagdon's ears and Blagdon's heart more than any other man's shout would have done. "Consider what I stand to win, consider what I stand to lose. Do you think I'm the man to take a licking lying down?"

"No! No! I know you too well."

"You know the game I'm playing, you know the stakes I'm playing for. Men who play my game have use for neither sentiment nor scruple. If Clare Armitage resolves to be my stumbling-block I shall resolve on her removal, the consequences will be on her head."

Mr. Springle, occupied ostensibly with the uncongenial task of indexing the current letter-book of the Cosmopolitan Trust and Exchange Limited, was actually engrossed in mind with the recollection of the triumph achieved on the previous evening by the inimitable Blarer in his song, "The Missus has Slumped my Togs," and the reflected honour that had radiated round himself when later in the evening Blarer himself, gorgeous in his fur-coat, his diamond rings and stud, condescended to accept Mr. Springle's invitation to have a drink with him.

The recollection was marred to some extent by the fact that Blarer had called for, instead of the expected Scotch-and-soda, a bottle of fizz, but after all the greater the cost the greater the glory. Blarer had drunk with him, had said "Cheer-oh, old man" to him in the presence of the world, as represented by the habitués of the lounge at The Eldorado.

He was aroused from this reverie by the catch-bell of the plate-glass door, and hopped off his stool, exclaiming:

"Why, Mr. Geldart, it's you, sir. Here, Triggs, confound you! Set a chair for Mr. Geldart. What do you mean, sir, by letting a distinguished visitor wait there?"

This to the office boy, who a few minutes earlier he had threatened with divers pains and penalties if he discontinued the paging of a number of documents he handed him, and then suavely stroking his hands, he remarked to Geldart:

"I am extremely sorry, sir, Mr. Scrimshaw has gone early this afternoon to the House on a committee, sir."

"Ah, well, never mind about that, it's really you I want to see, Mr. Springle, if we can have ten minutes chat."

"By all means, sir," replied Springle, "please step into

(Continued overleaf.)

SEIGEL'S SYRUP

Food, well digested, is the origin of strength. Imperfectly digested or not digested, as in dyspepsia, it is the fruitful source of illness. Every act, every thought, every movement of muscle or mind uses up some of the substance of our bodies. Food repairs this loss, but only when it is digested. Undigested food is worse than useless—it is dangerous. It ferments in the stomach, poisons the blood, starves the body, and lowers vitality.

MAKES FOOD NOURISH YOU.

To be strong and healthy assist your stomach, liver, and kidneys to do their work perfectly by taking Mother Seigel's Syrup, which contains food-digesting ferments and gentle tonics for the stomach, and has cured more dyspeptics than any other medicine in the world. It will purify your blood, cleanse your system from the poisons caused by undigested food and strengthen and invigorate your body by increased nourishment infused into your blood. Seigel's Syrup aids digestion, and food well digested means strength, vitality, health.

SEIGEL'S SYRUP

"For many years," writes Mr. A. Pike, of 1 Mary Street, Point, Cowes, Isles of Wight, "I suffered from indigestion. At night the pain across my chest was so severe that I used to get up and pace the room in agony. When the pain had subsided somewhat, I would return to bed and fall asleep through sheer exhaustion; but the morning found me fagged out, quite unfit for the day's work before me. A few doses of Mother Seigel's Syrup enabled me to eat a hearty meal without suffering any pain after. As I continued taking that remedy, I felt stronger, could do a hard day's work, sleep well, and wake in the morning refreshed and ready for my work.

CURES INDIGESTION.

Digitized by Google

the governor's room," and in a few minutes Eric was seated in Scrimshaw's sanctum along with Mr. Springle.

"Now," he said, "before I mention my business you are quite sure I am not taking you from your important duties. I know what a deal you have to do, and how important your work and your time are, especially with Scrimshaw away."

"Oh, pray don't mention it, sir," said the junior clerk, wishing that Mrs. Skimper and all her paying guests were there to hear. "Of course, when the governor's away a great deal devolves on me, but in your case, Mr. Geldart, we make an exception."

"Very well, then, we'll begin talking business, but perhaps you wouldn't mind asking your subordinates not to disturb us," and Springle strode to the door of the general office and informed the office boy, the only person subordinate to him in the establishment, and in his most imposing manner impressed upon that youth that he and Mr. Eric Geldart, M.P., were not to be disturbed on any account."

Meantime, Eric Geldart, left alone in Scrimshaw's room, took an opportunity of peering in the pigeon-holes and over masses of correspondence, generally availing himself to the utmost of Springle's absence to pick up various crumbs of information.

"Now," said Eric, on his return, "I have a little matter of a rather delicate nature, and I came to you, knowing that you are not only cute but discreet as well, that you are as discreet as you are cute."

It's doubtful whether, had Mr. Springle known the sense in which the words were spoken, he would have beamed quite so effusively. As it was, he inquired eagerly the nature of the commission, expressing his willingness to accomplish it if he had to jump over a house, or if it snowed.

"Of course," said Eric, "I'll take care to make it worth your while."

Springle beamed again.

"It's really very simple. I want you to go to Varney's, the private inquiry people, and commission them to shadow a young lady."

"A young lady! Oh, I say, Mr. Geldart, what a lot of trouble the fairies do give us!"

"They are to report to you, and I'll get you to wire me from time to time, making an appointment at my house or my club, when over a bit of lunch or supper you can transmit their report to me."

"Why, certainly," said Mr. Springle, elated at the social distinction as well as the emolument in store for him, and reflecting what a telling item of conversation it would beat Mrs. Skimper's table, the casual remark that he had been lunching with or supping with "My friend Geldart, the member for Little Claverton." Why, Grimmage would turn positively green!

"I'm on it like a shot," he said. "I'll see Varney's this afternoon. What's the lady's name?"

"She is Miss Clare Armitage, and lives in Belsize Gardens. Of course, Springle, old chap, you won't breathe a word of this to Scrimshaw."

The "old chap" completed the capture. Springle was bound hand and foot.

"Not a word, Mr. Geldart," he said. "You know I don't in the least look on Scrimshaw as I do on you. We ain't pals in any sense of the word. I give him my time and my work here for a consideration, there's an end of it—between you and me, he's not much class."

"By-the-bye, he's been a bit mysterious lately, your boss, what's he got on?"

"I don't quite know," answered Springle, "there's something on the board; he puts in a lot of time here after hours and he's bustling about like an electric whirligig, which is his way when he's bringing off anything new or big, but, to tell the truth, I can't quite stand him, and I don't invite his confidence much, except when I want to know anything it pays me to find out. I can do a bit of ferreting."

"Yes, yes, Springle," said the other, "you're very, very clever at ferreting, ver—y, and I want you to do a little ferreting for me—on a consideration, of course."

"What, in the office, Mr. Geldart? I don't mind, sir, so long as it ain't risky, because you know if Scrimshaw did find me prying into affairs he didn't want me to, he'd not only fire me from here, but there's no knowing quite what he wouldn't do, and he's a scorcher when he's riled."

"You're quite right, Springle," replied Eric sententiously, "and I should think that a man of your intellect finds it very often a bit of a trial to tolerate him."

"You've just hit it. Do you know I've frequently felt that I must dismiss——I mean leave him, but then he's useful in a way."

"Yes?" said the other, "and there's no knowing what may turn up. For instance, I may later on be changing my secretary, he's rather an elderly man, and in politics of course one occasionally has opportunities of helping one's friends, you understand? And, by-the-bye, meantime you will, as heretofore, kindly let me know anything that transpires, particularly affecting my interests inside this establishment."

"Certainly, Mr. Geldart, and if at any time you do happen to know of anything that will suit me, I'd chuck Scrimshaw at a moment's notice," said Mr. Springle, eagerly and volubly knowing how imminent the chance of dismissal had hovered over him ever since he had entered the offices of the Cosmopolitan Trust and Exchange Limited.

"By-the-bye, is there anything you want particular attention paid to with regard to this young lady's movements, Any other chap you suspect her of meeting, eh? You see I'm pretty wide, I am!" and Springle sniggered sapiently.

"Oh, as to that," answered Eric, "I want to know her movements generally. And yet, by the bye," he added quickly on second thoughts, "yes, there is one man with regard to whom I want her movements particularly closely watched, that is a certain"—his brother's real name was on the tip of his tongue, then he reflected that possibly he would be more generally known by his assumed one, so he said, "Mr. Harvey Bligh."

"Harvey Bligh! What, the chap who writes, that people have been making such a fuss about?"

"Yes. Have you heard of him?" asked Eric, somewhat surprised to find Springle acquainted with even a modern novelist.

"Heard of him? Should think I have! Why, I know him!" Eric started. "What, you know Harvey Bligh, the author?"

"Yes, the chap that writes the verses and the short stories for The Meteor. Why, he stays sometimes at the boarding-house where I am a paying guest; used to live there regularly before he made his mark. Ah! and he was on pretty hard pan, too, till all of a sudden he went up like a rocket. Nowadays he's rambling all over the country, making a good thing out of his work, and I fancy he doesn't care for town much; in fact, I've always thought there's a little bit of a story about Mr. Bligh independent of those he writes, and this seems to confirm it."

"By Jove!" said Eric, "do you like Bligh?"

"I hate him," said Springle, "the bumptious, over-bearing bounder!" For it was Springle's way to attribute his own peculiar characteristics to such as excited his disapproval, and he added viciously: "I've got a little score against him; if ever I get a chance to pay it off, I'm there!"

"Why, Springle," said Eric, "it seems to me your chance may some day come. Keep your eye on him; let me know whom he meets, where he goes; if possible, Springle, what letters he receives; and, look here, his letters might be worth a few pounds to me, and to you; keep this in earnest of what I shall give you later.

"But, by the bye, don't mention my name or indicate that you are at all in touch with me in his presence." He pushed a couple of five pound notes across the table to Springle, and leaving the office, returned to his cab muttering to himself: "By Jove! that's killing two birds with one stone!"

(Another long instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

"DONT'S" FOR THE DEAF.

The things that deaf people should avoid are specially described in the last
REVIEW OF EAR, NOSE AND THROAT DISEASES.
Anyone whose hearing is failing should send for a free copy of this Medical Journal. Address all communications to The Editor, 10 Marble Arch, London, W.

GIVEN AWAY with the
GRAND AUTUMN DOUBLE NO.
of
HOME NOTES
(No. 507)

A PAPER PATTERN of this CHILD'S FROCK
with Full Instructions by Isobel.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.
PRICE TWOPENCE.

USE
BORAX
FOR WASHING CLOTHES — BORAX — FOR CLEANSING EVERYTHING
DRY SOAP

Goes farther in use and does the work better than any ordinary washing powder made.

Common washing powders which gall the hands will harm the clothes, and should never be used.

Borax Dry Soap cannot injure the most delicate fabric.

Its superiority keeps it first in favour with the women who know the best.

Try it in your next wash.

Sold everywhere in packets and in dozens.

BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENT — MAKERS TO THE KING.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham.

Write for FREE SAMPLE AND NOVELTIES.

Name this Paper and your Grocer.

ESTABLISHED 1851.
BIRKBECK BANK,
Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.
2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%
The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free
C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

BORAX STARCH GLAZE
IMPROVES ALL STARCH

Ask your grocer for
EPPS'S
(The most nutritious)
COCOA
And take no other.

SULPHOLINE LOTION
For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.
SHILLING BOTTLES.

REAL HEALTH.
It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well
TOWLE'S PILLS
have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally.
Avoid injurious imitations.
In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.
The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)
of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors,
E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

PUNCTURE PUNCTURE PUNCTURE PUNCTURE

A Holiday Spoilt Is Pleasure Lost.
Thousands of Cyclists ride in fear of Punctures. WHY FEAR! when the National Puncture Preventer will prevent all Punctures without any Reduction of Speed.
Hundreds of Testimonials! Phenomenal Success!
Thousands in daily use. The only
PREVENTER
on the Market which guarantees to prevent all punctures or refund the money. Average weight, 1oz.
Price 2/- single; 3/6 PER PAIR
When ordering state size of wheels.
Sole Patentees and Inventors:
THE NATIONAL CYCLE MANUFACTURING CO.,
27 & 28 King William Street, London, E.C.
Our £5 5s. Cycles have a world-wide reputation. Send for List.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM
(CLOTTED).
Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil, invaluable for children and invalids; ¼lb. 1/4; 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs. CONYERS, Morchard-Bishop, Devon.

YOUR FUTURE IS KNOWN.
For 1s. WILLE will send a Reading of the Stars W. T. STEAD, Esq., and many other prominent gentlemen have testified to the accuracy of their forecasts. All that is required is that you send the exact or approximate hour of your birth, date, year, &c., together with P.O. 1s. and stamped addressed envelope. Satisfaction will be guaranteed.
THE RESULT WILL ASTONISH YOU.
SEND TO-DAY TO (DEPT. S.S.)
GEO. WILDE, 143 High Holborn London, W.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE
can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."
Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor
66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.
Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ross Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Between Two Stools.

"ABOUT a month ago," writes "DAUNTLESS" "I made the acquaintance of two girls. One of them was in the habit of going out with a young man, but since I got to know her, she has broken it off. I have now grown very fond of her. How should I act? I have on several occasions been out with the other girl, who says she is very fond of me?"

* * * * *

You are rather fickle, "DAUNTLESS," in thus trifling with two girls, especially as you say you are very fond of the one, and that she has made a sacrifice on your behalf. Stick to the one you are most fond of, and avoid getting too intimate with the other. When a girl sees that a man is fonder of her friend than herself, she will, in most cases, withdraw from the contest, out of friendship.

❦❦❦

A Stab in the Dark.

"W. E. R." has been the victim of a spiteful anonymous letter writer. He is engaged to be married, but the other day his fiancée received an anonymous letter which stated that "W. E. R." had led a very wild life, and was not a suitable husband for the girl. "W. E. R." believes the letter to come from a girl he once knew, but whom he has never in any way injured. How should he act?

* * * * *

Anonymous letters are best ignored. Your sweetheart should be made to understand the facts of your past career, and how far the letter was written out of spite. If you have good reason to know who wrote it, put the letter in the hands of a solicitor, and warn the writer against sending any more letters of the same kind.

❦❦❦

The Father Again.

"I AM deeply in love with a girl," writes "MAX," "and my feeling is returned. We have decided that we are thoroughly suited to be man and wife. However, my means are limited, and the girl's father has told me that he cannot allow his daughter to marry me until I can point to a larger income. Her mother, however, is strongly in favour of our becoming engaged. What is the best thing for me to do?"

* * * * *

I think you should respect her father's wishes inasmuch as you should do your utmost to prove to him that, if you are not at present well off, you will be in future. Meanwhile, just continue paying attentions, and with the help of her mother—generally a powerful ally—the sterner parent may sooner or later relent. When young people show themselves determined in love affairs, the hardest of fathers has been known to give way. At all events, do not incur his displeasure.

Deserted by a Lover.

"MAY" has been engaged to "FRED" for six months. Both were very happy until a few weeks ago, when "FRED" met another girl, of whom he seems very fond, and neglects "MAY'S" society to be with her. When spoken to on the subject, he refuses to have an understanding. "MAY" does not know what to do. Should she break off the engagement, or try to win back his love?

* * * * *

It seems by far the nicer alternative to try to win back his love, if "MAY" has that in her power. At the same time, she should give the young man to understand that so long as he continues to pay attention to another girl, "MAY" will hold herself free to act as she likes. If another young man appeared on the scene, perhaps "MAY'S" neglectful fiancé would suddenly return to his old love. "MAY" might try the experiment.

❦❦❦

A Soldier's Difficulty.

"JACK" is a soldier, quartered in India. He is married, and when he was transferred to his present regiment, went to India for twelve months. At the end of that time he wrote and asked his wife to go out to him, but she refused, saying that "India was not a fit country for a decent woman." She had gained this impression from a few discontented soldiers, but "JACK" does not agree at all. He has another five years to spend out there, and has stopped sending his wife money unless she agrees to go to India. As a result of this, she has written to his commanding officer to get some of his pay stopped, a course likely to injure him.

* * * * *

Your wife is doing wrong in refusing to go out to you. When a woman marries a soldier she should be prepared to accompany him anywhere where his regiment is stationed. If she refuses, then she lays herself open to action such as you have taken. Why not lay the matter before your commanding officer? There must be very many cases such as your own, and his advice would be your best reply to your wife, as she has written to him.

❦❦❦

A Boy's Love Affair.

"I KNOW a girl of twenty-two," writes "LOUVAIN," "who is engaged to an officer abroad. We have always been a great deal together and nobody has ever said anything. The only thing is that I am quite young—sixteen, in fact—and though it seems conceited, I may say I am very good-looking. The other day, on returning from a party and saying 'Good-night,' she kissed me, and I returned it. I now know that she is passionately fond of me, and I am devoted to her. What is now the honourable course to pursue?"

* * * * *

To leave the young lady alone, "LOUVAIN"—or rather, to see that she leaves you alone, for she is very much older than you, and is really acting very wrongly in putting temptation in your way. You are very young and cannot even think of marriage for six years or more. By that time the girl will be twenty-eight—very much your senior, and you will probably have entirely altered your mind about many matters. I daresay the girl is passionately fond of you, but probably regards you more in the light of a pet or a toy than as a serious lover. As she is engaged, it is your duty to avoid becoming too intimate with her, as trouble can only result for both of you in the future. I think this is a case in which a girl is trifling with a boy's affections, as she can scarcely be really in love with one so much younger than herself.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A QUESTION OF NATIONAL IMPORTANCE.

"The Boy is Father to the Man," and the British Boys of to-day in a few years' time will be the backbone of the Empire.

To read is to provide food for the healthy mind, and the question of the kind of matter suitable for boy palates is one not to be lightly considered. Hence the appearance of Pearson's new boys' penny magazine.

The King of all Boys' Papers.

The Paper a Boy can take Home.

A MANLY PAPER FOR MANLY BOYS.

Number 3 of "THE BOYS' LEADER" is now on Sale,

PRICE ONE PENNY,

and contains dashing stories of pluck, fun, and adventure, by JULES VERNE, SIR HENRY SETON-KARR, M.P., HENRY T. JOHNSON, SIDNEY DREW, and other writers of great repute. Story Illustrations by ALBERT MORROW, T. W. HOLMES, "VAL," and similar accredited artists. Screamingly funny comics by all the best humourists of the day, including

THE ADVENTURES OF SUNNY JIM AND DISMAL DAVID,

By the inimitable YORICK.

AN UNPRECEDENTED SUCCESS

in modern journalism has been attained with the early issues of "THE BOYS' LEADER," and the Editor is receiving every encouragement from Parents, Clergymen, and Older People generally, in his strenuous crusade against the harmful, pernicious, reading matter now being foisted upon the boy public, beyond a doubt to the future detriment of the nation.

Digitized by Google

The Survival of the Fittest.

MEDICINES COME and MEDICINES GO—BUT

BEECHAM'S PILLS

GO ON FOR EVER.

The advertisement pages of the papers, and the hoardings, have been for some time past particularly noticeable for advertisements of new mixtures and compounds professing to cure many serious diseases. Numbers of sufferers have been induced by the publication of strange stories of sensational cures or "telling testimonials" in appealing language, to give these so-called remedies a trial. In many cases what bitter disappointment must have resulted! But, fortunately, wise folk generally refrain from experimenting on their health with strange nostrums. These people keep well and robust by taking from time to time, and in due season, the thoroughly tried and undoubted remedy BEECHAM'S PILLS. Notwithstanding the number of new preparations, most of them of foreign introduction, and the startling methods adopted in placing them before the public, the trusted medicine—BEECHAM'S PILLS—still stands foremost, both in point of popularity and in demand.

The Sale of BEECHAM'S PILLS is greater than ever.

Why? Because

They have PROVED themselves a reliable remedy.
Time and trial have shown them to be trustworthy.
They maintain their reputation for keeping people in good health.
They cannot be equalled as a Family Medicine.
They are carefully prepared from the finest curative drugs of vegetable origin.
They retain the confidence of the people.
Their patrons everywhere recommend them to others.
They are WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

Digitized by Google

No. 770.
Week ending
October 3rd,
1903.

SHORT STORIES

PRICE
1D.

THE MAN SLIPPED AND FELL. THE GIRL HE LOVED POUNCED UPON HIM WITH A SHRIEK OF TRIUMPH, AND COILED THE THICK TRESSES OF HER HAIR ROUND HIS THROAT. See story inside.

Digitized by Google

THE IDEAL SHAPE AND SIZE AT LAST.

A New Model No. 3a F.P.K taking Pictures 5½ by 3¼.

KODAK

THE MOST PERFECT FOLDING POCKET KODAK YET PLACED ON THE MARKET.

"The Camera is of the Folding Pocket type, but, as though to give the new shape every possible chance of a good reception, the Kodak makers seem to have exceeded themselves both as to design and finish, and it were difficult to conceive of a more beautifully turned out instrument. It has an automatic self-setting "instantaneous" shutter, giving from one sec. to 100th exposure with alternative ball or time exposures. The lens and shutter are both by Bausch and Lomb, the former working at F/4."—Amateur Photographer, September 10th.

Folding Pocket Kodak No. 3a for Pictures 5½ by 3¼ inches, with Rectilinear Lens working at F/8 and F.P.K. automatic shutter £4 10 0

Do., with Bausch & Lomb automatic shutter £5 2 6

OF ALL DEALERS, OR OF

KODAK LTD. 41-43 Clerkenwell Rd., London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, LIVERPOOL; and 72-74 Buchanan Street, GLASGOW.

Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, W., 171-173 Regent Street, W.; and 40 Strand, London, W.C.

Kaputine is not a single dangerous drug, such as has been condemned by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The medical paper "Health," recommends

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache,

Toothache & Neuralgia.

Cures in Ten Minutes.

Safely, surely and without bad after effects.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1; Samples 1d. each

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free. Kindly mention this paper.

J. G. GRAVES'

Supplied Direct from the Factory to the Home. CUTLERY

THE

"ENTERPRISE" PARCEL, 25/-

Is the Finest Table Cutlery Value in the World.

51 Articles, making a complete outfit of Table Knives, Forks and Spoons for 25/-. Sent on receipt of order with 5/- and promise to complete purchase by monthly instalments of 5/-. Send for Catalogue No. 8.

AGENTS WANTED. WRITE FOR TERMS.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., Sheffield.

BALDNESS.

A French Specialist who has devoted his life to the study of Hair Diseases, having cured thousands of almost hopeless cases, will send a FREE TRIAL PACKET of a genuine inexpensive treatment to all who write enclosing 2stamps. New Hair grows in 4 to 10 Days.

Mr. C. R—— writes: "Your small sample has done me more good in a week than another much advertised remedy did in 6 months."

P. HENRI-FRANCIS, BRIXTON ROAD, LONDON.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

TESTIMONIAL.—Oaksey Manor, Malmesbury, 19/5/1903.—LADY FAIRBAIRN writes:—"Received the Skirt, with which she was greatly pleased, and hopes to order more soon."

SALE PRICE 3/6 Postage 4d. extra.

Free Gifts.

Sizes: 38, 40, 42

To Readers of "Short Stories," 3/10/1903. F. HODGSON & SONS, City of Leeds, will forward, carriage paid, on the following conditions, namely, on receipt of postal order for 3/6, with postage (4d. extra), a Ladies' Beautiful Tailor-made Cloth Serge Dress Skirt, in Black or Navy, smartly trimmed with mercerised satinette strapping (as illustration), also fitted with good linenette pocket.

We shall include Free with each Skirt a Pretty Open-hemmed Lawn Handkerchief. Money willingly returned if not approved.

Sale Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Skirts, Curtains, &c., post free if mentioning "Short Stories," 3/10/1903.

F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.T.S.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY!

This Phenomenal Offer is made to the readers of Short Stories (3/10/1903). On receipt of Postal Order for 5/- we will forward, DIRECT FROM OUR LOOMS, to your address, one of our 10/6 GENUINE SEAMLESS WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in 30 different patterns and art colourings, to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an Advertisement for our goods, below the Actual Cost of production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the purchasers all Middle Profits.

OVER 200,000 SOLD DURING THE PAST 12 MONTHS.

GIVEN AWAY! GIVEN AWAY!

With every Carpet we shall Absolutely Give Away a very handsome Rug to match, or we will send 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs for 9/6.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

Thousands of Repeat Orders and Unsolicited Testimonials Received. Illustrated Bargain Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Table Linen, Curtains, &c., if mentioning Short Stories, 3/10/1903, when writing, Post Free.

F. HODGSDN & SONS (Dept. S.T.S.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 770.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending October 3rd, 1903.

The Girl in the Next House.

The Thrilling Story of a Misplaced Love.

Containing the Incident Depicted on the Cover.

I SUPPOSE I ought to have been delighted when Uncle Gregory offered to have me as an inmate, giving me my board and lodging for nothing, and, as he told my mother, "See to the young cub's manners and morals."

My parent was charmed with the plan, it had so much in her eyes to recommend it; economy, companionship of the proper kind for me, and a certain scarce-to-be-breathed hope that Uncle's wealth would, in the due course of things, be mine.

As a clerk in an insurance office, with shadowy prospects, I did not feel justified in declining so handsome (Uncle Gregory's word, not mine) an offer, therefore with a sigh I bade farewell to the boarding-house at Brixton, where we had musical evenings, and where I had been instructed in the mysteries of ping-pong by a skittish young thing of a governess, and betook myself to Uncle Gregory's large and gloomy abode that was situated on the Hackney Downs.

My relative greeted me in a chilly fashion, and expressed a hope that I should apply myself to my work and not be out late at night.

"I don't know many people in London," I observed meekly, "so I don't go out much."

"Excellent thing for you that you don't," he retorted sharply. "Now listen to me, Paul. I give you a home here because I am anxious to save your mother's pocket, and also because a young man of your age (you're three-and-twenty, aren't you?) is exposed to temptations when he lives alone or in a boarding-house. I should have suggested this plan of mine when you first came to town four months ago, but I have been ill; I am only just recovering my usual health, so you will kindly remember not to go shouting and whistling about the house; it would drive me mad. The housekeeper, Mrs. Burgess, will look after your things, and you are not to give her or the maids any trouble. I know what young men are, and I hope to train you to be something different."

I felt inclined to suggest that he had far better leave me alone, that the task of transforming me into an elderly lady, for instance, was surely beyond even his talents; but I was wisely silent, and he dismissed me with the observation that we dined at half-past seven and that it would strike that hour almost immediately.

My uncle's house was large, gloomy, and of most unattractive appearance, but it rejoiced in a beautiful garden, and thither I was thankful to escape after a solemn meal, in which the great feature was the enormous quantity of china and plate and the small amount of food.

The moon was silvering the pear-tree tops and there was a high wall separating my uncle's domain from his next-door neighbour's, but though everything combined to make me feel like Romeo there was no Juliet in the case. I sucked at my pipe, and felt very sentimental; I tried to sigh over the recollection of that arch little governess at Brixton, who must have been almost old enough to be my mother, but the sigh was but an artificial one. I gazed at the solemn moon and wondered vaguely whether—supposing I fell in love—Uncle Gregory would let me promenade in his garden with the lady of my heart? I doubted it. My uncle had sustained in his youth what is known as a "disappointment," and it had had the effect upon him of making him object to all female society, except that of his phenomenally ugly housekeeper and two equally unattractive maids.

The air was wonderfully still, a faint and faraway roar of traffic sounded like the distant thunder of the ocean; it seemed incredible that London lay so near. Certainly this garden with the serene hush that brooded over it, was an improvement on my Brixton boarding-house. I was just congratulating myself upon the change, when a strange sound reached my ears. I stood motionless, listening. It seemed to come from the other side of the wall, my neighbour's garden. Again and again it was repeated; there could be no doubt about it, someone, man, woman, or child, was sobbing in heartbroken fashion within a few yards of me.

Sympathy, combined with that desire for investigation that our enemies call idle curiosity, drove me to attempt to discover who was there, bewailing their lot, and I safely scrambled to the summit of the wall, which I was devoutly thankful was not garnished with protecting broken glass bottles. Seated firmly thereon—a conspicuous object I felt in the brilliant moonlight—I looked eagerly into the adjoining garden and beheld a vision that I at first took to be a ghost. If all spooks resembled the one upon which my gaze was now fixed, I marvelled that everyone was not a member of the Psychical Research Society.

The ghost was a girl, all in white, with the most beautiful golden hair imaginable, flowing past her knees; she was standing just below me, looking up with eyes dark and beseeching, and glorious as the eyes of a stag. It was as clear as though it had been midday; I saw every feature in that perfect face. How long we gazed at one another I could not say. I sat there feeling as stupid as an owl. I longed to say something, but I could think of no fitting phrase with which to open the conversation. I was in every sense of the word in an awkward position. My lovely companion spoke first.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"Have you come to help me?" she asked in a voice that was scarce above a whisper; "oh, say you have."

"Help you?" I echoed, hardly able to get the words out, so excited was I. "How, when, now? What can I do for you? Only tell me?"

She pressed her little hands together, and I saw tears in the great eyes gazing up at me, a sight that so moved me that I nearly overbalanced in my distress.

"It is asking too much of you," she whispered, "but I am in great, in deadly peril, and—unless I am rescued—promise me"—she broke off suddenly—"that you will tell no one about me—that you will not mention to a living soul that you have seen me or spoken to me—promise—or I shall suffer cruelly, if it be known that I have dared to complain of my miserable lot, that I have tried to find a friend."

"Of course, I promise," I protested eagerly, "not a word concerning you shall pass my lips. I swear it."

"Thank you"—she smiled as she spoke, and shook back the heavy waves of her wonderful hair—"I see you are to be trusted, then take me away—take me away—before—before he kills me!"

She was close beneath me now, and by leaning over I could have grasped the hands she raised imploringly to me, but as I feared to topple over I dared not risk such a proceeding.

"Who will kill you?" I asked in alarm, "no one surely would hurt you, how could they?" I grew warm as I looked into her exquisite face. "Why, they must be perfect brutes if they don't worship you."

"You don't understand—I am in the way," she answered sadly. "I am a prisoner; oh, if you will only help me—I will never, never forget it. I shall be your debtor for ever. Help me to escape—to get away into safety; you don't know what it is to live in constant fear of your life—never to be sure from one hour to another what is going to happen to you. I have contrived to escape to-night, but what is the use? I can't get over this wall—every gate is locked."

"Why don't you call for help?" I asked; "shriek as loud as you can, you'd attract someone's attention."

She shuddered and cowered down. "You don't understand," she answered hoarsely, "he would—oh, my God—listen!"

A deep, bell-like sound rang through the night air; it was the musical discord, the sweet thunder that can never be mistaken for anything else—it was the bay of a bloodhound. The girl crouched for an instant, listening to it, then gathered herself up with a cry, and fled across the lawn to the house. The beautiful notes came nearer. I started—in so doing, I overbalanced myself, and fell backward into the soft garden mould, snapping in my swift descent several branches off the espalier pear-tree.

For a few minutes I lay upon the ground, half-stunned; all was silent again, and as I sprawled foolishly amongst the sweet-scented tobacco flowers, it occurred to me that it had been a distinctly fortunate thing for me that I had fallen into my uncle's garden and not into his neighbour's, whose dog by this time might be making a meal of me.

I picked myself up, and after having ascertained that no bones were broken, I again with much caution clambered up the pear-tree and peeped over the wall. The moonlight was here, and the soft black shadows cast athwart it by the house, but of living being there was no sign. I slid abruptly down again, convinced in my mind of several things. Firstly, that I had fallen madly in love at first sight; secondly, that the "he" to whom the mysterious fair one had alluded must be a fiend incarnate if he kept a bloodhound to terrify her; and thirdly, that I would make as good a show as I could in endeavouring to rescue her.

And all that night my dreams were disturbed by visions of glorious red-haired angels, pursued by bloodhounds from out whose mighty jaws there belched forth fire and smoke, urged on by hideous giants to annihilate beauty in distress.

It was the following evening, when my uncle and I were discussing our modest dessert of shrivelled walnuts and strawberries of dubious freshness, when I put the above question; "Uncle Gregory, who lives next door?"

My relative looked at me with eyes that glowed angrily beneath his rugged brows.

"Why do you wish to know?" he asked coldly; "my neighbour and I are not on terms of intimacy."

"I thought perhaps you might know the name of the man who has the bloodhound," I said boldly, though I confess I quaked somewhat as I noted his expression; his face grew dark, and he drew in his breath suddenly with a strange sound.

"I can tell you one thing about that man," he said slowly, and his old wrinkled hand lying on the tablecloth doubled itself suddenly, "he is a villain, a scoundrel, and, if ever I find you attempting to scrape acquaintance with him, out of this house you go, and—out of my will. So remember that, young man. I shall never again allude to this subject—nor will you. You know my wishes on this subject and I expect you to obey them. Have I spoken with sufficient plainness?"

"Quite, thank you, Uncle," I said humbly, but as I called to mind the face of the girl in the next house who intreated me to help her, I thought that the loss of Uncle Gregory's money would be as dust in the balance weighed against the delight of being of service to her.

That night I again strolled out, listening with strained attention for some sound from the adjoining garden, but all was silent. I climbed up to my post of vantage on the top of the wall, but the place was deserted, the house dark. I slid down again in a very depressed state of mind. Was I never to see my mysterious divinity again? Surely the Fates would be kind.

I could not sleep that night, and sick of tossing restlessly from side to side, I got up and looked out upon the quiet beauty of the night. Not a sound disturbed the silence; even the nightingales my uncle vowed inhabited his garden, must have been asleep; but as I stood there a very disagreeable interruption to the perfect peace came in the shape of the long-drawn howl of a dog.

It evidently was the bloodhound, and as I listened, the animal suddenly passed from his expression of canine woe into a horrible snarl, more like that of a wild beast than a dog—a hideous noise with a suggestion of ferocity that was really terrifying. I listened for some time, and then, thoroughly chilled both in body and spirit, I crept back to bed.

For five nights did I repeat this programme; the brute of a bloodhound always began his concert at the same hour, and I always awoke at that hour or was awake when he gave vent to his first blood-curdling howls.

"What a nuisance that dog next door is," I ventured to say to my uncle; "it howls every night, making the most awful row. I wonder you don't complain."

My uncle gave an odd smile, not a pleasant one, and rubbed his hands slowly together.

"I don't mind hearing it," he said composedly, "in fact, I rather like it. One day that beast will be too much for Harvey Payne, and it will kill him."

Digitized by Google

He laughed as he spoke, and there was something malicious, unpleasant in his mirth; I could not help wondering what Mr. Harvey Payne, if that were his name, had done to my uncle to make the old gentleman so vicious against him.

That evening as I dutifully accompanied my uncle on his constitutional, we saw coming down the steps of the next house a very unprepossessing, haggard individual, with shifty eyes that were swiftly raised to glance at us, and then as swiftly dropped as their owner hurried past us. Uncle Gregory, who was leaning on my arm, suddenly gripped it fiercely.

"That was the man," he whispered hoarsely, "that was Harvey Payne. How—how I hate that man!"

"Why?" I asked in astonishment. My uncle gave me a dark look.

"What is that to you?" he said sternly; "suffice it that I do hate him, and remember I forbid you to have anything to do with him. He is a man without proper pride—he might try to force his acquaintance on you."

"Has—has he a daughter?" I asked eagerly.

"Yes," answered my relative curtly, "now you are to ask me no more. Henceforth the people in the next house are not to be mentioned."

I subsided, but that night I made another attempt to see my mysterious divinity. Since I had seen her father I did not wonder that she feared him, and from my uncle I had heard what a scoundrel he was. So I persuaded myself I was doing quite the right thing in attempting to save her, and I made my way across the lawn, keeping in the shadow, and over the wall that separated the two gardens. As I crept cautiously up to the house, I perceived that a window on the ground floor was open, but it was protected by thick iron bars. At the same moment the horrible snarling howl of the bloodhound sounded so close beside me that I involuntarily exclaimed; the noise ceased, there was a low cry, something white flashed at the window, and the next instant across the shrubs that kept me from her, I saw the woman I had come to save.

"You have kept your word," she said in a hysterical whisper, "but it is hopeless. He will be here directly, his visits are constant, now—since that night when I escaped him. Slot—the bloodhound—found—me—"

"And hurt you?" I asked furiously, "the brute——"

"Oh, no, no, only betrayed me," she answered hurriedly, "to my father. But go—go now, my father will be here directly; in three days he is going away—there will be only Slot and old Martin—the servant—if you come then—you will save me—it will not be too soon, for I know he means my death."

"He daren't," I answered hotly. "I'll lay an information with the police. I'll——"

"You promised," she breathed quickly, "recollect that, and—and he is my father—I will not have it known what he is. Only help me to get away from him—only that—oh, then—then when I am free what does anything matter? I don't want him punished; come and take me away—before I die."

I could just see her beautiful face, white as marble in the darkness, her voice was the sweetest, the most fascinating I ever heard, and I—I was a hot-headed young man.

"I'll come," I said recklessly; "though I don't even know your name I love you, and I'll do anything for you."

She held out her hand across the bushes; I was about to crash through them to seize and kiss it, when she disappeared; there was the sound of an opening door, and rightly imagining that someone had entered the room I hurried away, negotiated the wall safely, and entered the house without anyone having known of my expedition.

Though it is a good many years ago now, and I look back upon my mad youth from the sober superiority of middle age, I can still recall the thrill of excitement and exultant anticipation with which I set out on my adventure. It was a dark night. I had provided myself with a file to saw through those iron bars that divided me from the Girl in the Next House. I had mapped out quite clearly what I was to do with my prize when I should have secured it. I would at once take the poor child down to my mother's, where she could remain until Mr. Harvey Payne's wrath had somewhat subsided, and till I had a rise in my salary sufficient to justify me in thinking of matrimony. My poor dear mother! she had always spoilt me, and I was not in the least doubtful as to how she would receive me and my companion, but I was a little afraid that she would be dismayed when she should learn that by my doughty deed I had in all probability lost Uncle Gregory's favour.

I saw that my heroine was not at the window as I cautiously made my way to it; the bushes crackled horribly as I struggled through them. The window was wide open, and the room apparently empty and in total darkness. As I produced my file there floated out towards me the sound of the bloodhound's howl. It seemed close to me, as though the brute were in the room into which I intended to break. I do not think I am a greater coward than the generality of human beings, but I confess as I heard that dog the relish for my task died out of me. I crouched motionless whilst the howl changed into a snarl that had something hideous, bestial in it. I thought I heard the soft thud of an animal as he pattered about the room, then silence, then the swish of a gown, and the voice I loved calling softly: "Is—is anyone there?"

I was on my feet at the window instantly; my beloved was behind the bars. As she saw me she gave a little sob of joy.

"Quick, quick," she said, "there is not much time."

"I—I thought I heard the bloodhound in your room," I stammered, ashamed of my fears; "I began to fear that you were not there."

"Indeed I am," she answered petulantly, "take away these bars—let me out—or I shall die!"

I obeyed her command. As I filed away at the bars she retreated from me into the farthest corner of the big room, so that all I saw was an indistinct black mass. Now and again when I required encouragement, I glanced in her direction, but she never moved or spoke.

At last—my perseverance was rewarded; the bars yielded, I wrenched them apart, and leaped into the room. I was hot, dusty, exhausted, but—I had triumphed. I went up to the captive and held out my hand to her.

"Come," I said gently, "we must be going, there is no time to be lost."

She rose—I could see her pale face gleaming white in the darkness—she took my hand after a faint hesitation, the next instant she had hurled herself upon me, her arms gripping me like steel bands, and fastened her teeth in my throat.

The horror of this hideous and totally unexpected attack for an instant took me at a disadvantage, and I staggered back, the awful thing clinging to me as some vampire to its prey. I could feel the warm blood trickling down from the wound she had inflicted on me. I tried to free myself from her, but she seemed endowed with the strength of twenty men; strong, young fellow as I was, I was helpless. Once she released me—panting for breath, and I shouted for help, but she flew at me with renewed fury, striking at me with her fists as I beat her off, whilst she gave vent to the most awful cries. Even in the extremity of fear and horror, it flashed across me that these were the diabolical noises I had attributed to Slot the bloodhound, as I had lain and listened to them night after night.

I cannot describe the awfulness of that fight in the dark with that she-fiend: Her hair swept across my face over and again, almost blinding me; sometimes she tried to strangle me with it, twisting it into a thick coil to wind about my neck, but in this she failed. In vain I tried to stun her by a well-directed blow, for I was now desperate. My calls for assistance were evidently not heard, and I knew it was a question now whether I was to kill or to be killed. But she had the swiftness of a snake with the strength of an enraged lioness, and if I succeeded in throwing her off, and rushing to the window, she was upon me again before I could reach it, and her deadly grip fastened on me once more.

Digitized by Google

I had hitherto succeeded in keeping my footing, for I felt instinctively that if I fell, all would be over with me; it would not take her long to strangle me as she desired, but I was growing exhausted whilst she seemed to gain fresh vigour with every onslaught. I slipped—half fell—recovered myself with a desperate effort, only to stumble once more, and this time I crashed heavily on to the floor, whilst my destroyer sent forth a hideous yell of triumph. I was conscious of something being twisted about my throat, of an agonisign sensation of suffocation. The girl was throttling me with her long, golden tresses. Then upon the darkness there burst a light, the she-fiend sprang to her feet, and ran howling from me, someone bent over me and caught me up in their arms. I was conscious of being borne away, whilst the cries still rang in my ears. I hear them sometimes even now, after all those years, they constitute my worst nightmare, from which I awake with the cold sweat pouring down me, and the scent of the red hair with which she tried to strangle me in my nostrils.

* * * * *

I was young and possessed a good constitution, therefore I recovered from the illness that supervened on my terrible adventure. I shrank at first from learning the mystery that surrounded the Girl in the Next House, but one day when my uncle and I were alone, he told me the whole story. He had been most devoted to me whilst I lay ill, and I took this opportunity of telling him how I regretted that I had disobeyed his injunctions, forbidding me to have anything to do with our next door neighbours.

He looked at me very strangely, and then he told me the truth. The girl in the next house was a raving lunatic, but her wretched father, Harvey Payne, was devoted to her; his one idea was to conceal her terrible condition, for he feared he might be forced to send her to an asylum, and though she hated him, he loved her. She was subject to homicidal mania, but for days would be tranquil and apparently sane. It was during one of the intervals that Mr. Payne left home on business. Her one idea was to escape. As is the case with lunatics, she displayed a diabolical cunning in attempting to gain her ends.

Often for weeks she would be perfectly rational, then an outbreak would occur, and she was more like a wild beast than a human being. Her hideous, bestial cries had induced Mr. Payne to keep a dog to account for them, and this animal was trained to guard the wretched girl and track her if, as was sometimes the case, she escaped into the grounds; but Slot never touched her, and proved a most effective keeper. Had it not been for the sudden return of Mr. Payne I should have been killed. He had come only just in time, for she had twisted her hair like a rope about my neck, and was deliberately strangling me.

"The servant had fallen asleep," said my uncle; "he was worn out with watching her, and he thought she was tranquil. It is all over with Harvey Payne's keeping it dark that she is mad. She is in an asylum now and there she will remain. I've hated him all these years, and even hoped that that red-haired fiend would kill him, that was why I never reported him for keeping a dangerous lunatic, but—I've seen him and it's a pitiable sight—my hatred died when I saw it."

"Uncle Gregory," I said timidly, "why did you hate him so?"

My uncle did not answer me at once, then with averted face he spoke.

"Because," he said, "Harvey Payne was the man who stole from me the woman I loved, the woman who was my promised wife became his, and she was the mother—she died when the child was but a few days old—of the Girl in the Next House."

Sybil Campbell Lethbridge.

IN THE SHADOW OF CRIME.

Telling How a Girl Saved Her Lover from Death.

A small cottage, plain and unpretending, neatly painted, with roses and honeysuckle clambering over the windows and almost hiding them from view. It was set back a little way from the road, and was separated from it by a wooden fence.

Everything about had the appearance of being well cared for. The lawn in front was close-shaven, and the large garden in the rear was in the best of order.

If things outside the cottage looked trim, the inside of that pleasant abode was precision itself, and well it might be, for, as a housekeeper, Dora Martin, John Martin's daughter, was second to none in the county.

She was a motherless girl, had been so for years, and lived in this lonely spot with her father and an old aunt; their nearest neighbours on the town side being six miles away while those in the opposite direction (with the exception of a man named Dixey who lived about a mile from the farm), were twice that distance.

Old Martin had always been passionately fond of his only child, and, not caring to lose her, made it a point to discourage suitors. Still, following Dora's footsteps for some time, there had been two very devoted lovers.

One was Joe Gorham, rather a handsome young fellow, with the reputation of being somewhat dissolute and reckless. His father was at one time a wealthy farmer, but, on dying, left his property in such a mortgaged condition, that when the affairs of the estate were finally settled, there remained from the wreck just sufficient to yield the heir a small income, which was generally spent before it came to hand.

Everybody knew that John Martin had a snug bank account, and that when he died Dora would come in for both money and farm. People said this was more of an attraction to Joe Gorham than Dora herself.

Be that as it may, the girl cared little for him, and when asked why, gave as a reason that she had heard he was idle and dissipated. The truth was, she loved somebody else, that somebody being Paul Ellis, a young physician from the neighbouring town of Answell, who had come there about a year previous.

He was not handsome, but had a quiet, pleasant face, and he worked hard to build up a practice.

Digitized by Google

Paul Ellis became acquainted with Dora in this wise. John Martin, with his sister and daughter, drove into Answell every Sunday morning to attend service in the one little chapel which the town boasted. Paul was also an attendant, and regularly once a week he sat in the same seat, from which he commanded a good view of Dora.

Gradually he grew to divide his attention between her pale, beautiful face, and the words of the white-haired old minister in the pulpit. The girl never glanced his way, but it was a pleasure for him to mingle with the little flow after service, when they were leaving the church, and as Dora came by, to feel her dress brush his hand as she passed him in the aisle.

Farmer Martin's family used to drive to worship in an old-fashioned wagonette. One Sunday when they had arrived at the chapel, Dora attempted to alight unaided, while her father was securing the horse. In so doing she fell, and Paul, who was passing slowly along, watching her intently, ran to the rescue, getting for reward a pleasant "Thank you, sir."

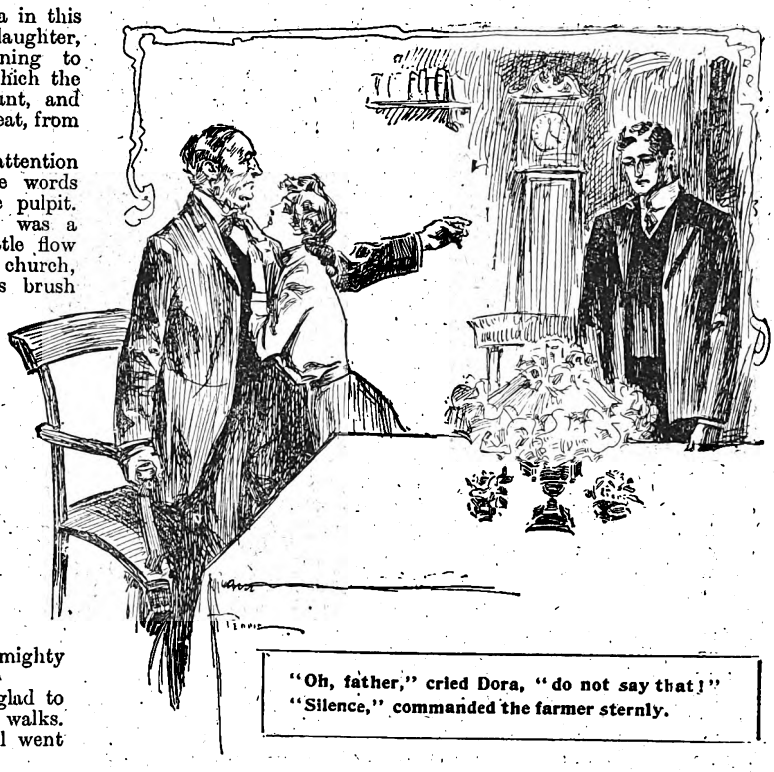
Farmer Martin cried, in his bluff way:

"Why, Dora, how awkward you are."

Then turning to Paul, he continued:

"You are the new doctor, if I don't mistake? Come in and see us when you are passing. Who knows but what we may give you a job some day, though I think it's not probable, as we are a mighty healthy lot.

Paul answered something about being glad to go in any case, as he was fond of long walks. There were a few more words and they all went into service.



"Oh, father," cried Dora, "do not say that!"
"Silence," commanded the farmer sternly.

The weeks slipped by, and then, somehow, almost before he knew it, Paul was calling often at Farmer Martin's quiet home, and Dora had grown to look for his coming as eagerly as he watched for the days on which he could visit her.

This had not escaped Joe Gorham, and he was bitter thereat, for poor as were his chances before of winning Dora's hand, he now saw that success was impossible. Affairs stood in this way for about six months previous to the evening on which my story commences.

This particular day Paul had spent at the farm, where he remained to tea. His visits had been so regular for some time that Farmer Martin looked upon his presence as quite a matter of course. The young man's conversation was interesting, and he liked him.

When he saw that things were "going too far," as he phrased it, then he would speak out. As usual in such cases matters had progressed very rapidly, and Dora marvelled at the pleasant way in which her lover was treated.

Everything looked very bright. Paul had already told his love, had gained Dora's promise, and on this evening he was to ask her father's consent to their marriage.

Tea was over, Aunt Margaret, Mr. Martin's sister, was dozing in her easy-chair. Dora leant against the window-sill, looking out into the falling shadows, and the two men still remained in their places on opposite sides of the table.

Paul had been trying vainly for some moments to say what was in his mind. At last, mustering up courage, he began in an off-hand, manly way, although a little nervous, and told the old farmer his secret.

A change swept over the face of Dora's father. His jovial smile disappeared, and in its stead came a stern, hard expression. The girl at the window, her heart beating rapidly with hope, waited eagerly for his words. They came slowly and decidedly.

"Mr. Ellis," he began, "I might have known how your visiting would end, if I had not been a fool and placed too much confidence in you. Couldn't you come here without making love to my daughter? If I had suspected anything of the kind, you should never have darkened my doors. What, take my girl from me? Never, sir, until I am dead. And now, Mr. Ellis, you will please not come here again."

"Oh, father!" cried Dora, rushing forward, "do not say that!"

"Silence!" cried the farmer angrily. "The man has bewitched you with his sweet talk. I say again that no one shall have my child and my money until I am dead."

Paul's face reddened, but knowing that words were useless at such a moment, he arose, and passing quietly out, said:

"Good night, all."

Dora, through her tears, saw him going down the road, not towards Answell, but in the opposite direction. She threw herself into a chair and wept piteously, but her father was inexorable. After a few minutes, he said:

"I'll have no more of those fellows about. The next time I come home and find Gorham here, I will serve him the same way that I served Ellis. And now, girl, tell William to saddle the horse. I'm going to Rockford to-night to settle for that piece of land which I bought last week. I drew the money to-day, and want to get it off my hands."

Dora passed out to do as she was ordered, while the old man sat down, and drawing forth a huge leather purse, counted his money—two hundred pounds in bank-notes. He wrapped them up again and settled himself for a smoke before starting on his journey.

Presently Dora returned. As she entered the door, her aunt suddenly started up, and pointing towards the window opposite to where she was sitting, cried excitedly:

"What's that?"

"What's what?" growled the farmer.

"I thought I saw a man's face at the window."

"You must have been dreaming," said her brother, emptying his pipe.

Dora wondered if the face could have been Paul's, or if her aunt had only imagined she saw somebody. Her musings were cut short by the appearance of the horse. The farmer went out and mounted him, saying to Dora and his sister:

Digitized by Google

"I'm going to stop for an hour or more at Dixey's on my way to Rockford, so that it will be late before I get home. Don't wait up for me. Go to bed early. Good night." He turned his horse's head then, as if a thought had come to him called to Dora: "See here, girl. Kiss your crusty old father good-night. Keep up your spirits. It will be time enough for you to go to someone else when I am dead."

His daughter kissed him and watched him out of sight. Turning wearily back into the cottage, she fell at her aunt's feet, laid her head in the old woman's lap and seemed heart-broken. Neither spoke a word.

When the clock struck nine they retired to the room which they shared in common. Aunt Margaret was soon enjoying a tranquil sleep, but Dora lay awake until late in the night, planning how she would win her father's consent to her marriage with Paul.

The following morning, at the early hour of five o'clock, both women were awakened by a loud knocking at the front door.

Rising hastily, Dora went to the window, and opening it cautiously, looked out. Standing below on the doorstep was Dixey, the man at whose house Farmer Martin was to have called the night before. The opening of the window caused him to glance up. His face was ashy pale.

"Miss Martin," he said, "will you tell your aunt to come down quickly. I want to see her."

Dora, marvelling at the man's early visit, his scared face, and excited manner, grew alarmed, and, having delivered his message, ran to her father's room to acquaint him with the strange occurrence.

Throwing open the door, she gave a start of surprise. The room was untenanted, and the bed had not been slept in.

Filled with a singular misgiving, she rushed to the side-door by which her father always let himself in when he came home late at night. It was just as she had arranged it for him. The bolt was still drawn, showing that he had not returned.

Running to her room, she hastily threw on a wrapper, and, in another instant, accompanied by her aunt, was descending the stairs. Opening the door they found Dixey, his hat in his hand, a frightened look on his face. Before he could speak Dora had clutched him by the arm, and was saying in a husky voice:

"Mr. Dixey, what is the matter? Don't keep me in suspense. There is something wrong with father. In Heaven's name, tell me what it is! Did he fall from his horse?"

"Yes, miss," the man said confusedly, "I think he did."

"Is he badly hurt?"

"Yes, miss," was the reply.

Dora loooked straight into the messenger's face, saying in a slow, measured way:

"My father is dead."

"Yes, that's it. He's dead—murdered!"

Aunt Margaret screamed, and Dora fell to the floor, insensible. The former, although well-nigh stunned, did not lose her presence of mind.

"Mr. Dixey," she said, "go into the kitchen and get me some water."

He started for it, while she, half-dragging and half-carrying the girl, managed to place her on a sofa in the parlour.

The water having arrived, she proceeded to bathe the face of her charge, listening meanwhile to Dixey's story.

"Mr. Martin," he began, "called at my house early last night. We talked for over an hour. Then he started off, saying that he was going to Rockford. This morning, about three o'clock, some country people who were coming to Answell, woke me up and said they had found the dead body of a man on the bridge about five miles back. There was a knife sticking in the breast. Down below on the rocks was a horse with his legs broken. When they had finished the account we started back. As soon as I had seen and recognised the body, I felt fit to die of fright."

"Where is it now," asked the old lady.

"At my house," replied Dixey. "We brought it along in the cart"

"Return at once," said Aunt Margaret, "and drive here with it."

The man left.

Dora had now opened her eyes, and was moaning and muttering in an incoherent way.

After some trouble she was placed in bed, where she lay completely dazed. The hours dragged on.

At length a cart appeared, bearing all that was mortal of John Martin. With it were a dozen or more people who had joined the mournful proccession as it came along the road.

At sight of her brother's lifeless body, Aunt Margaret was overcome with grief. Dora remained in bed, where she was experiencing the first symptoms of a fever. Dixey, having in his possession the knife which had remained sticking in the farmer's breast, went on to Answell to notify the authorities of what had occurred. They were soon on the ground trying to solve the mystery.

A couple of days passed and the inquest was held, the verdict being "murder at the hands of some person or persons unknown." Then came the funeral, followed by the startling report that the murderer had been apprehended and that he was none other than Paul Ellis.

Everybody scouted the idea of his guilt until the existing suspicions were revealed. Paul protested his innocence in vain. All the circumstances surrounding the murder pointed towards him as the assassin, and he was imprisoned to await trial.

Weeks passed on, and for a time Dora hovered between life and death. The trial had been postponed until her recovery. The first use she made of her returning strength was to visit her lover. To no purpose did she speak to him with words of comfort and consolation. His only reply was: "I am innocent, but everything is against me, and I foresee the result."

Still the girl was hopeful, and each day found her a visitor at the jail.

The morning of the date fixed for the trial dawned at last. First called to the witness-box was Aunt Margaret. She told of what occurred at the cottage on the night when the crime was perpetrated—of Paul's demand for Dora's hand, and the stormy refusal of Farmer Martin's saying: "No one shall have my child and my money until I am dead."

Then she spoke of Paul leaving the house, and going, not towards his home in Answell, but in the direction of Rockford. Whether he was aware that her brother had a large sum of money in his possession she could not say.

Damaging as was this testimony, Dora was obliged to corroborate it, and did so, feeling almost crazed at the thought that she was helping to convict the man who was dearer to her than life.

Now came the evidence of Dixey and the men who had discovered the body. They recognised a weapon shown as the one which had been found sticking in the body. Nothing further could be elicited from them. Joe Gorham was next in the box and proved a valuable witness for the prosecution. He carefully examined the knife, and swore that he had often seen it in the prisoner's possession.

It was a peculiar surgical instrument which he well remembered. His testimony was succeeded by that of the woman at whose house Paul lived. It was to the effect that her lodger had been away from home nearly all of the night on which the crime was committed, and that he had returned about three o'clock in the morning, looking pale and haggard, his shoes thick with dust, and his clothing travel-stained.

On being questioned respecting his absence, he replied that he had been out taking a walk. Some further testimony ensued, all of which tended to blacken Paul's case.

However, no trace could be found of the money which Farmer Martin had with him when he met his death, and, as it had been proved conclusively that the murder took place on the way to Rockford, if was pretty clear that the assassin had secured the purse.

Paul testified in his own behalf that, after leaving the cottage on the eventful night, he had walked about half way to Rockford, and turning into the woods, seated himself on a fallen tree, thinking over his disappointment. While there, he dropped asleep.

Digitized by Google

Waking later in the night, he sauntered back to Answell. The knife found in the body was undoubtedly his, but he could not explain its presence there, as he had not even missed it.

This was his whole story. Witnesses he had none. His lawyer made the best defence possible, and the case was given to the jury.

In half-an-hour they returned with a verdict of "Guilty." Sentence of death was pronounced.

The doomed man was thoroughly crushed. He had fallen into a deep melancholy from which nothing could rouse him, and in this state was returned to his cell.

The days sped by like lightning. Dora saw her lover and told him that she still believed him innocent, but she began to despair. Turn which way she might there was no help to be had. She could do nothing. Her face had grown thin and white, as day succeeded day and brought only its own weight of woe.

The time lying between Paul and death was almost over. Only three days more. Surely, she thinks, God will send some help to them. She prays and hopes on. Nothing comes.

It is the eve of Paul's last day on earth. His life is spanned by hours only. To-morrow he will be dead. Dora is with him, still strong in her belief of his innocence, still as true and trusting as in the old, happy days when first she learnt to love him. They are standing together, each peering into the other's face, the sunlight of the dying day pouring in a rich flood through the barred prison window. Paul is speaking. He says, like one in a dream:

"Dora, darling, this is the last time I shall see you."

"No," she replies brokenly; "to-morrow, Paul—to-morrow I will come in the morning and remain with you till—the end. God may yet send something. Why is he so hard on us?"

"It is fate," Paul answers.

Then, seeing that the jailor had left them for a moment, he continued rapidly:

"Dora, when they call me to-morrow I shall be dead. Do you understand? Don't betray me. I have a knife in my pocket. If no help comes by daylight, I shall be my own executioner."

"Oh, Paul, Paul," she sobs, "do not be guilty of that! If we have no hope in this world, let us at least hope for a hereafter."

A step sounded near the door.

"Don't betray me," he whispers hurriedly. "Do you want me to submit to the disgrace of the gallows? Be brave."

Dora is weeping on his breast as the turnkey cries: "Time is up!"

She found the weapon with which her father had been murdered.

Paul gently loosens her arms, kisses her repeatedly, and, with his white face grown whiter, says, in a low tone: "Good-bye, my love, until eternity."

They take her away. She acts like one demented, and is repeating, half-aloud: "Oh, Heaven, send us a sign—send us a sign."

She goes slowly home. Aunt Margaret expects to see her weeping bitterly, but she comes in pallid and stony, saying still: "Oh, for a sign—a sign."

The old lady asks what she means, and gets no reply. Dora, her hands clasped on her knees, sits rocking to and fro until bedtime. The clock tells the hour of nine, and together the two women ascend the stairs.

Aunt Margaret goes quickly to bed, having given up the useless task of persuading her niece to do likewise. The latter, habited in a loose white wrapper, lies stretched on a sofa, still repeating in a sort of wail:

"Oh, Heaven, give us a sign—give us a sign."

Aunt Margaret has been sleeping soundly for some time. A noise disturbs her and she starts up. The pale rays of the moon shining through the window, light up the part of the room where Dora was lying.

She is no longer there, but, instead, almost prone on the floor, her arms stretched under the sofa, as if groping for something, her eyes staring wide, and her whole appearance that of a maniac. Just then she rises, her right hand closed tightly, and says, in a tone of triumph: "I have it! I have it! Thank Heaven!"

The old woman tenderly folds her arms about the white figure. Dora wakes with a bitter cry of disappointment, moaning, "It was only a dream."

Weepingly she tells how she dreamt that she visited the spot where her father had been murdered. On the rocks below she saw his missing purse. The thought struck her that it would clear Paul, and she had placed her hand on it, when she awoke.

Her aunt says soothingly: "My poor child!"

Dora once more throws herself on the sofa and closes her eyes, while Aunt Margaret goes back to bed and slumbers quietly. Not so with her niece. In a few moments the hands are busy again, and she is muttering incoherently.

Suddenly she is standing in the middle of the room, wide awake, every nerve quivering with intense excitement. Her hands are pressed against the sides of her head as if to keep it from bursting. The dream has been repeated.

She is trying to think what it means, or if it means anything. Heartbroken from thoughts of the morrow, and ready to grasp at any hope, however faint, she is still inclined to chide herself for placing the slightest faith in it.

Digitized by Google

Then she remembers all the stories about visions which she has heard from her childhood. She shakes her head mournfully and sits down. In a moment she is up again pacing the floor restlessly.

Her eyes light on the clock. It is a quarter of two. She almost swoons with horror when she reflects that at four it will be daybreak.

One moment she stands irresolute; the next she has passed out of the room and is stealing noiselessly down the stairs. Something seems to impel her onward.

She opens the door cautiously. Within and without there is a hush like death. Now she is skimming along the road towards Rockford.

On, on she goes, past Dixey's cottage, running as she never ran before, and every little while glancing over her shoulder—looking for the first faint streaks of dawn.

The bridge looms in sight; her brain reels as she sees it. Soon she is flying over the well-worn timbers, and descending the rocks on the other side. Now she hesitates and fears to put her dream to the test.

Slowly she goes downward step by step. She has reached the place indicated. Only to turn an angle of the bridge and she will be on the spot where the dream showed the purse. She glides round the corner.

The rock, white from waters pouring over it, shines clear in the moonlight. There is nothing on it. Dora falls with a cry of agony—what right had she to hope? Her last straw is snatched away.

The night breeze chills her, and she wearily rises to commence her homeward journey. As she does so the sound of horses' hoofs falls on her ear.

They grow nearer and nearer. It is probably a farmer on his way to Rockford. She waits for him to pass the bridge—this he does not do.

Instead, he fastens his horse in a clump of bushes away from the roadside, and cautiously descends the rocks. Dora, terrified though she is, creeps into the shadow and watches his every movement.

A slouch hat conceals his face, but his manner is strangely familiar. He appears to be searching for something, and turns stone after stone, peering carefully into the crevices. Finally, he gives up in despair. Dora sees him mount his horse and ride swiftly away. Who was he, and what did he want, are the thoughts which fill her brain.

So absorbed has she been that fear has almost driven Paul from her mind. She moves forward. Almost unknowingly she is doing what she saw another doing a few moments before—turning over the stones and peering into the crevices.

The fading moonbeams strike something lying on a little ledge. It gleams like silver. She reaches forth her hand and shudders as it touches something cold as steel. It is steel—it is a dagger.

Raising it close to her eyes, she sees a red, rusty stain halfway to the hilt, and on the hilt itself, gracefully carved, she discerns this letter—J.

The familiar manner of the man who was there but now comes back to her.

Link on link in a chain of evidence flashes through her mind. She has found her father's murderer.

Two words escape her lips—"Thank God!"

She struggles up the rocks, gains the road, and renewed strength fills her body. Once more she is flying along—this time back to Answell.

How far away the town appears. Will she ever reach it? Despair gnaws at her heart. Already her feet begin to burn, and a sharp pain has crept into her side, but she never wavers. Daylight is rapidly approaching. Oh, for an hour of respite—a half-hour.

"Paul, Paul!" she cries. "Wait for me—wait for me!"

Dixey's cottage is near. For a moment she thinks of rousing the man and giving him the knife—but the time he will lose in getting ready may cost Paul's life.

No, she alone must do what is to be done. As she passes her own home the light in the east glows brighter. Streaks of dawn are creeping above the hilltops. She has still three miles to go. If she could rest but for one minute.

With a failing heart she hears the birds commencing to twitter in the trees. Will she be too late, after all?"

At last the town is in sight. It is just below her. She reaches it and totters along to the jail.

Scarce strength enough is left her to beat upon the heavy entrance. In a short time the turnkey is at the door, and starts back at the sight which meets his gaze. Dora, scarcely able to speak, mutters:

"Here is the knife which killed my father. Joe Gorham did it. I have proofs. For Heaven's sake, tell Paul at once!"

"But——" begins the man.

"Go, go!" cried the girl. "Every second is precious. It is a matter of life and death. Paul must know it this very instant." The jailer goes towards the prisoner's cell, Dora following. He throws open the door.

Paul is lying as if asleep, his face to the wall. In vain the turnkey tries to awaken him. Dora rushes forward. The condemned man's face shows ghastly in the early light. She catches his arm. The blood is dripping from a severed artery. Throwing up her hands, she falls to the floor, crying:

"Too late—too late!"

In another instant all is commotion. A physician is called. He arrives barely in time, for the prisoner has bled almost to death. News of the attempted suicide spreads through the town.

Following fast in its wake is another rumour that the real murderer has been arrested, and that he is Joe Gorham. This creates the wildest excitement, and when Dora's story becomes known she is the heroine of the hour.

When a month has flitted by, the second trial is over, and another prisoner occupies the cell where Paul had seen so many bitter days.

Joe Gorham made a full confession. On that fatal night he was on his way to visit Dora. In the road he found a knife dropped accidentally by Paul. He put it in his pocket intending to return it.

As he passed the cottage-window (where Aunt Margaret saw the face), he overheard Farmer Martin speak of going to Rockford with a sum of money. Starting off, he waylaid him at the bridge.

After the crime had been committed he threw away the weapon, and, remembering the knife that belonged to Paul, pressed it into the body, knowing that by so doing he would fasten suspicion upon his rival.

Not feeling secure so long as his own knife lay hidden among the rocks beneath the bridge, he went to search for it on the very night of Dora's dream. The coincidence was a fortunate one for Paul.

In Farmer Martin's house there has for years been a happy family, presided over by Paul and Dora. Often in the summer twilight and again before a blazing fire in winter, when the little ones are snug in bed, they recall an eventful past. To Paul the dream still seems wonderful. Dora, however, with her woman's faith, always looks upon it as one of God's great favours, and tells Paul that it was a sign. Then he says: "But the age of miracles has passed."

Dora answers:

"Whatever it was, we cannot help being grateful for it."

And they are grateful.

Ramsay Morris.

To Story Writers.

We shall be pleased to consider complete novelettes of about 20,000 words in length, and to pay cash down for those accepted. Manuscripts must be type-written (or very legibly hand-written), and should be sent to The Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Postage for return of MSS., if unsuitable, should be inclosed.

Digitized by Google

DR. HARLEY'S MISTAKE.

A Tale of Love, Wealth, Strychnine, and a Strong Will.

EVERYBODY wondered why Robert Harley, the young M.D., had not fallen in love with his cousin, Kitty Marriott, but had chosen to devote himself to Miss Bertha Wilson. The former was a sweet, amiable girl, according to the gossips, whereas the latter was proud and haughty in her bearing, attractive—almost beautiful—yet not the sort of girl that most men would care for.

Love, however, is a strange thing, and it often happens that a man selects the very woman least in the minds of those who are speculating on the choice he will make. That is exactly how it was with Dr. Robert Harley.

When he looked about for a practice that might be going cheap, one that might be worked up into something good, he considered himself fortunate in acquiring the connection of the recently deceased Dr. Marriott. The practice had suffered considerably through Marriott's illness and enforced neglect of his professional duties, and this condition of things had been taken advantage of by a rival practitioner, so that it was not worth a great deal; but Harley was confident that he would wake it up. He was not a man of means; nearly all the money left by his father had been spent in his training, and the sum required for the purchase of the connection was just within his power. One reason for regarding himself as fortunate was that he had the goodwill of the widow and her daughter; they lived in very straitened circumstances, but their influence still counted for something.

Dr. Harley was the kind of young man who would soon win the favour of most persons with whom he came in contact; this was a good backing for his professional skill and the combination quickly began to tell. He had passed his exams brilliantly and had done some good hospital work; most people believed that he was a clever fellow, and not the man to vegetate in the town; yet there was a feeling among others that he had just a trifle too much confidence in himself.

"It's a fine thing to have such confidence in one's abilities," observed a modest tradesman on whose daughter the doctor had attended, "and I don't say that you can get on without it, because you can't. But there is a danger of allowing it to go too far. Conceit? No, I can't say he puts on side, because he's most unassuming in his ways. It's difficult to explain, but it strikes me that there's not enough ballast. Yet he is quite unconscious of it."

Only a minority shared the opinion of the worthy tradesman and Robert Harley increased in favour until it dawned upon the majority that he had fallen in love with Bertha Wilson instead of Kitty Marriott. Then he went down a little in popularity. The only proper and natural thing for him to do was to marry Kitty Marriott, they imagined, and they resented his contrary action; but they got over it and, although they did not approve, they admitted that he had a right to please himself.

There was not the shadow of a doubt that he was madly in love with Bertha, and there was equally as little doubt that Kitty received a terrible blow when she discovered the fact. If Robert Harley had been less blinded by his passion, he would have noticed the wan appearance of the usually blooming Kitty, and he could not have failed to observe that her gaiety had almost disappeared. He did not notice these things, partly because his visits to Mrs. Marriott became less frequent—in fact, they practically ceased, for his time was always occupied with Bertha.

It was confidently expected that the engagement would be announced, there was no secret on the part of Harley concerning his feelings towards her. The announcement that did come at length was not anticipated and staggered the circle in which Dr. Robert Harley moved. The announcement was preceded by an interview between Harley and Bertha. He called on her, as usual, but was checked in his customary outburst by the manner of greeting; he felt chilled.

"What's wrong, Bertha? What have I done that I am denied the lover's kiss?" he asked, his voice quivering with emotion.

"My dear Robert, you have done nothing, except that you are poor!" she replied coolly, seating herself in a comfortable chair and looking at him without flinching.

Robert stepped back in amazement.

"I know I am poor, Bertha, but I shall succeed! You have told me so yourself! And what does it matter if we love each other? I love you, and you return that love. You cannot deny it!" he added passionately, as she shook her head.

"I have no intention of denying that I have some affection for you, Robert, but it is not proof against the prospect of poverty. You may succeed, but I do not think I can wait for that. I have had a very advantageous offer of marriage, which it is my intention to accept!"

It was all said in so cool and business-like a fashion that Robert Harley went nearly mad. He raved and strode about the room; then he knelt by her side and pleaded; but she was immovable.

"I want riches, and I mean to have them!" she assured him. "But need we be bad friends on that account?"

She smiled at him bewitchingly, pleadingly. His head was in a whirl; he knew not what she said or how he answered, but she twisted him round her finger and he left her just as much her slave as he had ever been. She was slipping away from him, yet—what? He only knew that she loved him and that he did not blame her for leaving him for one who could give her riches. They could still be friends.

So the announcement was made, not of the engagement of Dr. Robert Harley, with Miss Bertha Wilson, but of the approaching marriage of that young lady with Mr. James Yates, an elderly man with a banking account of considerable importance. Questions levelled at Harley elicited no satisfactory reply and in the end people gave up the task of fathoming the mystery.

Two years passed away, and those two years wrought a change in the opinions of Dr. Robert Harley. Slowly the effects of his infatuation had worn off and he wondered how he could have been so blindly in love with the woman who was now Bertha Yates. He noticed the change in Kitty, whose mother he visited more often, and he became conscious that the alteration from a merry girl to a charming, but quiet woman had been caused by his own love affair with Bertha. He asked himself if he loved Kitty—really loved her—and if she could forgive him for the past and return his affections, but to those questions he was unable to find a satisfactory answer. He drifted on without daring to probe the subject more deeply, content to be regarded as the friend of Kitty and her mother.

Digitized by Google

The Yates's were not happy; so much soon became the current rumour, and rumour deepened into certainty. There were frequent quarrels because he would not allow her more money and they spent much of their time apart. Mr. Yates suffered from chronic dyspepsia, which did not tend to make the household any the happier, for it made him irritable and complaining.

It was about a year after Yates' marriage with Bertha that Dr. Robert Harley was called to see him and prescribe. This was rather a trial for Harley; at the beginning of their married life he had been a guest, with others, at the Yates's on several occasions, but he had discontinued these visits as his better self had returned, and it was necessary to summon all his self-possession to respond to the professional call. Yates, although Harley was not aware of it, had called him in because he had gained a reputation and because he had divined something of what had gone before. "If I swear that he could do me no good, it will damage him," thought the elderly husband, "and it will torment her to see him here!"

Yates could never discover, much to his chagrin, whether the second object was attained or not, but it is certain that he failed in the first. He was bound to admit that, although Harley did not effect much, he did accomplish a little more than his predecessors in the office of medical attendant, and for that reason he was always called in to see Yates when the dyspepsia was bad.

About five o'clock one cold morning he was aroused by a violent ring at his night bell and, on placing his ear to the tube, learnt that Yates was very ill, and that he, Harley, was wanted at once. Muttering something rather uncomplimentary to persons who had pet ailments, Harley dressed, not too quickly, and went out. He was admitted to the Yates's dwelling by Bertha herself, whose face was white but calm.

"I am glad you have come, doctor," she said quietly, "but I fear that you are too late."

"What do you mean?" queried Harley in surprise, as he followed her to the bedroom.

She made no answer, but pointed to the bed and then covered her face with her handkerchief and wept. One glance at the motionless figure on the bed was sufficient for Harley, but he made an examination.

"Dead!" he exclaimed, as he turned to the widow. "Mrs. Yates, I am very, very sorry. How did it happen? I fear that there must be an inquest."

She shuddered.

"Inquests always seem so dreadful. I thought that an inquiry would not be necessary, as you have attended him regularly. But if it must be——I will tell you how it occurred."

She turned her face and hid it once more in her handkerchief, raising it again after a minute's weeping.

"I cannot say that we were happy, but this is terribly sudden. He awoke and complained of pain, so I suggested that he should have a cup of hot water, which he thought was good for his complaint. I boiled some water myself, as I did not wish to disturb the servants, and gave him a cupful. It was very hot and I told him to wait a minute or so, but he was always very obstinate and would do as he liked." She stopped and heaved a sigh. "By long habits he could drink liquids hotter than most people. He drank the water pretty quickly, although it was so hot that I could scarcely bear to touch it with my lips. As he handed the cup back to me, he gave a cough and a groan, sank back on the pillow, and never moved again."

"Very sudden!" ejaculated Harley, in real sympathy.

"I thought he had fainted and tried to bring him round; but he didn't move, so I sent for you. Can nothing be done?"

"Nothing," replied Harley solemnly. "Try to bear up, Mrs. Yates. It is a sad trial. There must be an inquest, but it will be very formal."

He slipped off as soon as he decently could and sent a note to the coroner in due course. Harley was deputed to make the post-mortem examination, but found nothing more than a small quantity of fluid in the stomach.

At the inquest, all eyes were turned on Harley; it was a curious position, to be certifying to the cause of the death of the man who had supplanted him. There was but little to be said, and Harley gave his evidence clearly and easily. Death was due to syncope; the drinking of the water at something like boiling heat had been too much of a shock for a system already weakened to an abnormal degree and had caused failure of the heart's action. It was true that Mrs. Yates said that her husband had been in the habit of drinking fluids very hot, but the habit had availed nothing in this instance. He had done it once too often. He had no doubt as to the cause of death.

How vividly this evidence recurred to his fevered brain a week later. He was paying a visit to Mrs. Marriott, and the worthy lady had found an excuse for leaving him with Kitty.

"Can't you do something to stop the sale of rat-powders with free strychnine in, Dr. Harley?" she asked seriously. "Do you know, we have discovered that we have a rat here, and mother is dreadfully afraid. I went to a chemist for some rat killer, and he labelled it 'Poison.' He explained that he had made up his mind to do so for his own safety; he knew that there was free strychnine in it, but it had never occurred to him to label it until he heard of the death of Mr. Yates. I inquired why he should have been influenced by that, and he replied that Mrs. Yates"—there was a break here which Kitty tried vainly to cover—"had purchased some rat killer at his shop a day or two before, and the silly, nervous man took it into his head to imagine what would be said to him if somebody else's husband died suddenly after she had bought rat killer with strychnine in it and it was proved that she poisoned him! He declared that he was quite relieved on hearing that death was due to natural causes. But you ought to do something in this matter, really!"

Harley tried to tell her that there was a law on the subject, and that he would inquire into the particular rat killer in question, but he felt himself turning white as a horrible fear seized him. He took leave of Kitty and tried to shake off the sickening fear that weighed on him, but the more he tried, the tighter it seemed to grip him. By the time he reached his home he was reeling like a drunken man and his reputation for sobriety had been damaged in the eyes of the few who saw him.

Free strychnine! He uttered the words aloud, but they sounded hollow as they came from his parched throat. Had he made a mistake? He had performed his duty very perfunctorily; it had never occurred to him to go deeply into the matter. The more he thought it over, the more he became convinced that death was not due to the cause he had so airily assigned. The words of a certain tradesman, repeated to him by a "good-natured friend," came to his mind: "Self-confidence is a grand thing, if you haven't too much of it."

He determined to find out for certain whether his fear was founded or not; at any cost he would solve the doubt. The only way in which he could do this was to put a question to Bertha that would make her betray herself.

He sprang up and rushed to the door, but pulled himself up on the doorstep. It was absurd to suppose—Yet, they were not happy, and there might have been some hidden reason. He would go!

Digitized by Google

He was shown into the reception room and Bertha Yates entered, looking charming in her half-mourning, her face radiant with a bewitching smile.

"It is so good of you to come, Dr. Harley! It is like old times, and I was nearly guilty of calling you 'Robert.' Don't think me very dreadful! You know that I never loved him and that my life with him was unendurable. I cannot even pretend that I bore him any affection, and I am already in half-mourning. You understand, or you would not have come to me so soon after I had regained my freedom!"

The heartlessness of her words made him shiver. He nerved himself and looked her straight in the eyes as he spoke.

"Was that why you gave him strychnine in that cup of water?"

He noted the tell-tale look in her eyes; he saw the colour fade from her cheeks and lips. If it were true! He had been guilty of a blunder that would ruin his professional career and cast a stigma on medical testimony in general, if it were known. And if he remained silent, he would be guilty of abetting this woman, and he would allow to escape a woman who would not stop at murder to free herself and—and what? He guessed, and he trembled. Bertha herself told him, and the words seemed to stab him.

"What if I did?" she asked defiantly. "I learnt to hate him; I only wanted his money. He was too miserly, so I played my game. I cajoled him into making a will entirely in my favour. Last night he threatened to alter it." She was forgetting herself; she meant the night preceding the murder, but Harley understood. "So I gave him strychnine, you know where I got it from, I see! Now I am free—to come to you, the man I love!"

He turned from her in horror.

"It is my duty to make this matter public," he said with determination.

She recoiled as if from a blow.

"You would deliver me up to justice when I have freed myself from an intolerable existence and opened up the path to our mutual happiness! You dare not! You would ruin yourself and I would prove you to be my accomplice. Look at this letter!"

She took from the bosom of her dress a letter which she held up to him. He recognised it well; it was written when he was mad, mad in his infatuation, and in it he told her that he would do anything to win her, that nothing and nobody should stand between them for long! She laughed hysterically as he placed his hand to his forehead.

"Go and tell, and stand by me in the dock!" she cried. Then she added more gently. "Go now, and come back to me when you are calmer."

He went from her presence like one in a dream. His blunder would not be taken as a blunder in the face of that letter and supported by what she would say in her baffled rage. He felt unable to act for himself; he yielded to a sudden impulse and sought Kitty, in whom he confided, as a child might confide in a sister. He told her all, too full of his own misery to see hers.

"Mother is out this evening," she said in tremulous accents. "Wait here, dear, till I come back."

Neither observed the term of endearment. Harley remained in the chair with his face buried in his hands, and he heard her pass out without lifting his head.

"She loves him," murmured Kitty. "If she loves as I do, she will be ready to sacrifice herself for his happiness."

Kitty expected to find herself confronted by a woman fierce and obdurate, whom she hoped to melt by her appeal, but she found Bertha broken and weeping. She looked up at Kitty with a weary gesture.

"Why do you worry me?" she asked. Then she fired up, and demanded: "Did he send you?"

"No!" replied Kitty bravely, although she was trembling at the thought of the danger that threatened her beloved. "I have come because I love you, to ask you to do as I would do for his sake. I ask you to show that you love him, to prove the sincerity of your words."

"What do you want?" demanded Bertha more gently.

"I want you to save him. You have threatened him, but a woman who loves would never drag the man down with her in her crime by means of trickery, such as that letter and false-swearing. That is not love!"

Bertha gazed at her curiously.

"Would you sacrifice yourself for him? Yes, I believe you would! See!" Bertha walked to the fire, drew forth the fatal letter from her bosom and threw it into the flames. "There!"

She turned again to Kitty and stood motionless. The two women looked at each other for fully two minutes without speaking, each wondering what was passing in the mind of the other. "So that baby girl would sacrifice herself for Robert Harley!" thought Bertha. And Kitty was wondering what this strange woman would do to save Robert.

"Go back to him and tell him that he need fear nothing, nothing!" cried Bertha suddenly, making Kitty start. "I will show him that I, too, can do something for the man I love! Leave me now!"

There was a gleam of hope in the hearts of Dr. Robert Harley and Kitty Marriott as they separated after Kitty's return from her interview with Bertha, although neither could see how the ruin of the young doctor or the punishment of Bertha was to be avoided. Harley was determined to tell the story on the following day; he could point to the absence of any outward signs of the cause of death, due to the quick action of the poison, as proof of his innocence, but there was no excuse for his bungling of the post-mortem.

He was late in obtaining rest and as a consequence his troubled sleep lasted well into the morning. He had barely finished his toilette when Kitty Marriott was announced.

"Have you heard?" she gasped with a white face. "She has been found dead in the canal. It is supposed that she walked into it by accident in the thick mist last night. Did she? Or——"

"The criminal is punished, Kitty, and—there is no need to expose her crime," said Robert Harley brokenly. "The crime and the mistake will alike remain unknown to men. I understand now what she meant by saying that I need fear nothing!"

"It proves that she did love you, and that love will do much!" murmured Kitty. "Poor misguided woman!"

Geo. Day.

No. 4 is Now On Sale

. . THE . .

BOYS' LEADER

The latest, the best, and the purest of all boy's papers.

"THE PAPER A BOY CAN TAKE HOME."

Digitized by Google

Powerful Thrilling Series.

THE "BRIDGE" OF RUIN.

Being the

CONFESSIONS OF A GIRL GAMBLER.

EPISODE TWENTY.

Mr. Taskot in a Difficulty.

"Well, Olive Beresford, if anybody had ever told me that you would marry a man like that I wouldn't have believed them! Fancy fretting after a creature that can't look at you without sticking a piece of glass in his eye!"

It was Mrs. Windsor who thus voiced her disapproval of the engagement about which all the village folks were now wagging their tongues, and I hadn't the heart to be vexed at her candour. But I had no mind to let her think that my recent depression had been caused by fear lest Mr. Taskot should fail to put in an appearance, and I exclaimed vehemently:

"I didn't fret about him! How could I? He's not so charming as all that."

My friend looked at me with astonishment, which speedily gave place to concern as she noted my pale face and the dark rings which a night's weeping had brought round my eyes.

"Look here, dearie," she said, "there's something wrong about this business. I believe you've just let your vanity run away with you, and accepted the man without taking enough time to think about it. But it isn't too late to alter your mind, and you had better face the anger of a rejected lover than make a miserable marriage."

"I cannot help myself," I moaned. "He has my promise, and I dare not break it."

"You dare not? And I always thought you had any amount of courage! There must be something very queer behind this."

"Mr. Taskot!" announced our one maidservant, and Mrs. Windsor, looking very much upset, hurried out of the little drawing-room just in time to avoid meeting the individual who posed as my fiancé.

A curt nod was my only reply to his fulsome greeting. But he was not in the least embarrassed by my coldness. On the contrary, he smiled in evident enjoyment of conscious power, and plunged at once into the errand upon which he had come.

"I have been to see the vicar," he observed, sitting down opposite me. "There is no reason why we should not be married as soon as possible, so the banns will be read for the first time next Sunday."

"Next Sunday! How dare you make such an arrangement without first consulting me?"

"Because it would have been useless to consult you. You would have declined to permit the banns to be published so soon, and you would have urged all sorts of arguments against an early marriage."

"I shall still urge them. And I absolutely refuse to be married within six months."

"As I have said, I have seen the vicar, and the date is settled. I didn't want Maurice Ray to get it into his head that you hankered after him, and by being married first you can always deprive him of that boast."

"What do you mean?"

"Read this. Then you will know."

With trembling fingers I took from Mr. Taskot the Morning Post which he produced for my inspection, and read an announcement to the effect that a marriage had been arranged, and would shortly take place, between Miss Isola Lewis, only daughter and heiress of the wealthy manufacturer, Mr. Harrison Lewis, and Mr. Maurice Ray, the famous miniature painter.

I suppose Mr. Taskot had anticipated the effect this news would have upon me, for my pride really was instantly in arms, and I was furiously angry at having deluded myself into the belief that Maurice Ray had felt a warmer feeling towards me than the facts warranted. He had been very kind and helpful. And his manner had certainly not been that of a man who took merely a passing interest in me. But if he had cared much for me, I thought, he could not have so soon engaged himself to somebody else.

And yet, was there not ample excuse for forgetfulness on his part in the scene which he witnessed between Mr. Taskot and me? And was it not quite possible that it was the actual means of parting us for ever? The very thought diverted my anger from myself to my obnoxious suitor, and I turned to him with withering contempt both in my manner and my voice.

"Do you think," I asked, "that I am nothing more than a musical instrument, out of which you can evoke any tune you like? If so, you shall find yourself mistaken. You have been anxious from the first to make me think ill of Mr. Ray. Why, I do not know, for he and I hardly know each other. But I have come to the conclusion that you will say anything to further your own plans, and I think it very probable that you inserted that social item yourself. Otherwise, why be so eager to show it to me?"

A dark flush mounted to Mr. Taskot's flabby cheeks, and I was so sure that my shot had hit the mark that some of my lost courage returned to me. So also did a little wisdom, and though I resolved to fight for my future happiness, I had the sense not to put my companion on his guard yet by open rebellion when he answered:

"You are excited and out of sorts, my dear. In a few days, when you have fully realised how different your position will be as the wife of a rich man you will give me credit for desiring nothing so much as your happiness."

"You speak of yourself as a rich man," I rejoined, forcing myself to talk dispassionately. "Do you mind telling me what you call rich?"

A voluble flow of words answered me, and I was assured that the five thousand a year which Mr. Taskot enjoyed now would soon be supplemented by ten thousand per annum more.

"I am the destined heir of my uncle, Walter Taskot, Esq., of Malvern Dale, and as he is already old and feeble I am not likely to be kept long out of my inheritance."

This last was said with an air of triumph which made me shudder with dislike of the man who was evidently longing for the death of his nearest relative. But it gave me the cue for checkmating him, and my voice was quite firm as I asked:

"Has Walter Taskot, Esq., of Malvern Dale, any other nephew who expects to inherit from him?"

"Yes, I have a cousin. But his chances are too remote for consideration. He has never had the sense to cultivate the old man, or to keep his own little extravagances from his knowledge."

Digitized by Google

"I'm not so sure that your cousin's star is not in the ascendant, after all."

"Indeed! How can that be?"

"Because the sight of the duplicate set of snapshots which I rescued from the clutches of the Vernons may induce your uncle to reconsider his will."

Ah! Here was a masterstroke at last! Mr. Taskot's face became visibly paler, and he with difficulty suppressed the oath which rose to his lips. But he quickly recovered himself and smiled confidently.

"If he were like most people's uncles," he said "he would probably kick me out of his will for more than one thing I have done. But he admires nothing so much as ingenuity, and will laugh heartily when I tell him about that signal code business. He will also welcome you as a congenial addition to the family circle, for he only needs to see the snapshots to know that you are not of the insipid schoolgirl type he detests."

This sounded fairly plausible, for one family may easily produce more than one rogue. But I did not ignore the momentary confusion my chance shot had caused, and I refused to regard Mr. Taskot's ascendency as irrevocable any longer.

"Your uncle would consider me a very insipid schoolgirl," I retorted, "if I allowed myself to be coerced into marrying you without making an attempt to get out of my difficulties without your aid. Anyhow, you can consider the engagement 'off' until I have interviewed Walter Taskot, Esq., myself."

And from this position, neither threats nor persuasions were able to move me. My set of snapshots were a strong enough weapon wherewith to fight my antagonist, and, when he left me, there was this difference between us—his show of confidence was fictitious, mine was real.

EPISODE TWENTY-ONE.

The Value of Local Esteem.

While recently visiting at Vernon Towers, at the invitation of a former school friend who had forgotten the reputation Olive Beresford acquired at school, your parishioner, by pretending to know nothing about cards, induced other guests to play with her for money, of which she won a large sum, both by fair means and by foul. The foul means consisted in inventing a code of signals which was exchanged between Miss. Beresford and another equally unscrupulous visitor named Taskot. Suspecting something of the sort, the host, Mr. Vernon, in order to protect his other guests from being swindled, took several snapshots which show the two conspirators in the act of giving the signals by which they were enabled to make phenomenal winnings, the result being that both of them were expelled from Vernon Towers, after being compelled to disgorge the greater part of the money they had won. Mr. Taskot departed there and then, but Miss Beresford, not content with the mischief she had already done, stole various things out of Mr. Vernon's private room. These were fortunately found in her dress-basket, packed ready for removal. But Mrs. Grainger, another lady guest of the Vernons, was induced to believe Miss Beresford the victim of a foul conspiracy to ruin her, and actually offered her hospitality to both the card-sharpers. This hospitality was accepted. But Mrs. Grainger was soon disillusioned, for she overheard Miss Beresford laughing about the way in which she had robbed the Vernons, and she instantly cleared her house of the treacherous visitors, and went to apologise to Mr. and Mrs. Vernon. The writer has only to add that Miss Beresford and Mr. Taskot went off together, and it is quite on the cards that two such congenial companions will marry each other, on the principle that they can pursue their career of fraud more easily as man and wife."

But my rising spirits were soon destined to be effectually damped. For, not long after Mr. Taskot had gone, with the unwelcome promise of returning on the morrow, Mr. Snaith, our vicar, came to see me, and his first words prepared me for something unpleasant.

"Good evening, ladies," he said, as both Mrs. Windsor and I rose to receive him. "I—I—I came to see Miss Beresford on a matter of some importance. Can I see her alone for a few minutes?"

Of course Mrs. Windsor immediately left us to ourselves, and I waited with some anxiety to hear what the vicar had come about.

"Miss Beresford," he began, the stiff manner in which he sat down showing that he was very ill at ease. "I hope you will exonerate me from any desire to cause you pain. But I have had a most extraordinary letter, conveying still more extraordinary charges against you, and I think it only right that you should be given an opportunity to refute them."

"Certainly," I agreed, my voice coming gaspingly, for I guessed at once that the letter which Mr. Snaith handed to me had something to do with the recent events at Vernon Towers and the neighbourhood. "Of course it was best to come to me at once, if anyone has said anything against me. Will you allow me to read the letter?"

Without a word, Mr. Snaith handed me the missive, and the while my blood seemed to turn cold within me, I read the following:

"To the Vicar of Essondon.

"Dear Sir,—You may not be aware that Olive Beresford, a resident in your parish, who no doubt poses as an eminently respectable person, is a gambler, a swindler, and a thief.

Did ever a girl have to read a more frightfully humiliating letter about herself than the shameful effusion which stamped me as a disreputable ingrate? I was frozen dumb with horror, and Mr. Snaith's look of grave sympathy changed gradually into one of contemptuous disgust.

"Your answer, Miss Beresford?" he demanded. "For Heaven's sake, tell me that this anonymous letter is as devoid of truth as most anonymous letters! What foundation is there for such a scandalous accusation as is here brought against you?"

"I shall go mad!" I murmured convulsively. "I allowed myself to be persuaded to do one foolish thing, and all the others were built upon that. It was the Vernons who cheated, and whatever Mr. Taskot and I did was only done in self-defence. It is Annabel who has thus tried to ruin me."

"Did you visit Mrs. Grainger? And did she overhear you admitting your guilt to Mr. Taskot?"

"She misconstrued something she overheard me telling him."

"You and he left her house together?"

"Yes."

"And you journeyed by train together?"

"Yes, but——"

"Pardon me, Miss Beresford, but I do not wish to hear any more subterfuges, for the matter looks fairly clear. Mr. Taskot, I take it, is the same person whose banns are to be read next Sunday, in conjunction with yours, a fact which at once verifies my correspondent's statements, although it may not justify their anonymous nature."

"So you believe all that has been said of me, Mr. Snaith?"

"I see no other course open for me."

"Very well, sir. Go your way, and I will go mine. But, remember, those banns were put in without my consent, by the man whose schemes have brought this disgrace upon me, and I forbid them to be read either next Sunday or any other Sunday."

Digitized by Google

"Miss Beresford, is it possible, after all, that——"

"No, sir, nothing in the way of explanation is now possible between you and me. I have lived nearly all my life in your parish, and you can never have heard a breath of evil against me before. Yet you outrage me by believing a vile, anonymous letter! I have been the victim of circumstances, and I have almost allowed myself to be made unhappy for life, rather than risk losing the esteem of the people amongst whom I have hitherto lived. I now see how foolish I have been to give their consideration or sympathy a moment's belief, and I wash my hands of you and your parish for ever! Go, sir, and learn to practise a little of the Christian charity you are so fond of preaching from your pulpit!"

EPISODE TWENTY-TWO.

A Cowardly Attack.

All indecision was now at an end with me. I had put a fictitious value upon the esteem of my daily associates, and I had found it worthless. The vicar was the barometer upon which parish opinion would measure itself, and if he proved himself so susceptible to the stabs of slander, of what use would it be for me to rely upon anybody else here?

The letter was a cruel one, and I guessed that it was the outcome of Annabel's desire to avenge her defeat. But it proved of great value to me, for it opened my eyes to the folly of allowing myself to be subjugated by dread of exposure. Things could not very well be more unpleasant for me than they already were, and I resolved to at once leave a neighbourhood which no longer had any attractions for me.

Wherever I lived, my income would remain the same, so that did not need to enter into my calculations. But I had no money wherewith to take a journey which must necessarily be slightly expensive, for I had many belongings with which I did not intend to part.

To do her justice, Mrs. Windsor was very indignant with the vicar, who was never a great favourite of hers at any time. She, at any rate, believed in me, although I did not think it desirable to take her fully into my confidence. It was enough for her that I had fallen into the hands of rogues, and that there was a conspiracy to ruin me. She pitied me.

"I'll tell you what it is, dearie," she said, on the morning after the vicar's visit. "You go to my sister's, and stay there for awhile. If you like, I'll leave Essondon, too, for I'm not much in love with it myself. At least, I sha'n't be after you've left it."

"But I can do nothing without money."

"No, that you can't. But I can lend you some to leave with now, and you can pay me back at the quarter. After this Mr. Taskot has gone away, which he is sure to do when you are no longer here, we can arrange about what things you want to sell."

"Mrs. Windsor, you are a good woman, and a true friend, and I hope you and I will never be parted for long. I'll do exactly as you advise me. If I go away this afternoon, I shall escape any further unwelcome attentions, and, of course, you will not tell anybody where I have gone."

A few hours later, everything was in readiness. Mrs. Windsor had sent some luggage to the station, and as I wanted to go away without my departure being noticed, and without the risk of meeting any of the village folks, I bade good-bye to my friend in the house, and went alone towards the station by a roundabout road which would keep me clear of all the houses.

I could not help shedding many tears at having to go away under such a terrible cloud. But I saw no means of dispelling it just now, and my departure was the only way to get rid of Mr. Taskot, so I was trying to make the best of the situation when I was startled by hearing footfalls on the other side of the hedge which bordered the country lane I was traversing.

A hasty glance round convinced me that I had been mistaken, and I thought no more of the stealthy footfall until somebody sprang towards me from a gap in the hedge. So sudden was the surprise that I had no time to cry out ere a heavy cloak was thrown over my head, and in a few minutes I was in a state of absolute helplessness, being blindfolded, gagged, and securely bound by a man at whose identity I could only guess!

(To be concluded next week.)

THE GAME OF LOVE.

How an Uncertain Lover Won His Wife.

They sat in the conservatory, which place since time immemorial has been the one sought after by lovers. They were not lovers avowedly. He thought he was, but it seemed that he had made a mistake. And as for her—well, he had begun to think his case was hopeless in that direction.

Her name was Helen Travers, and he was Herbert Langdon. As they sat there, looking towards the ballroom, a fine-looking, military man passed before their view.

"What a handsome man he is," said Helen.

He, jealous at once, was not of that opinion, but he thought it politic to agree with her.

"Is he your ideal type?" he could not help inquiring bitterly.

"Not exactly," she said hesitatingly. "But I admire his looks."

"He certainly admires yours," he said significantly.

She blushed and suggested that the subject be changed.

"Not on my account," he said, taking his revenge and noting how her colour deepened. "I find the subject you have selected extremely interesting. I should like to know exactly what your ideal man is."

"Do you mean that I shall describe him as he exists in my imagination?" she asked. "I don't believe you could give a sketch of the woman you love in imagination."

"Yes, I could," he said boldly, "if you would sit for the portrait."

He had shown his hand now, and, according to the rules of the game, he should have received a blush at least in return for this speech. But she cheated him out of his due.

"I haven't time," she said in answer to his remark.

"It's not the time that's wanting, but the inclination," he replied.

Digitized by Google

"Perhaps," she acquiesced.

"Well, describe him—your ideal," in his eagerness playing into her hand.

"Of course, to begin with, he must be tall."

"How tall?" he asked.

"Oh, I don't know. What is a good height?"

"My height," he offered as a suggestion. Then he asked what colour he should be.

"Dark," she responded.

"I think you'd better make him fair," he responded. He was fair, and thought he was losing a point. "Opposites always fall in love, you know."

"Not always," she said, laughing. "Besides, I can't give him curly hair."

"Why not?"

"I can't bear curly hair. It means bad temper. And you are violent, you know."

There she threw away a trick.

"But you are sweet-tempered, you know. And your hair curls."

"Does it?" she asked. "Yes, I suppose it does. But that's different. Besides, I like it in a girl, don't you?"

"I think it's lovely!" he said. "Let's see now how far have we got? He is of medium height, is fair, and has straight hair. And is he to have a beard?"

"No, certainly not," she said. "How can I tell if he has a good firm chin unless he is clean shaven?"

This was true, and he felt his jawbone furtively. It carried a blond beard, but he thought that this could be shaved off, and he believed a good square chin would be left. He also resolved to have his curly hair clipped short so it would appear straight.

"What about his other features?" he asked.

She gave an affected yawn.

"I'm tired," she said. "I can't imagine any more. I think he may have a mouth and nose like yours."

"And moustache?" he asked.

"I am not quite sure how you would look without a moustache," she replied, in an unguarded moment. "It depends on what sort of a mouth you have."

"This sort!" he said, playing trumps as he kissed her.

"Don't," she exclaimed, "or we can't be friends."

"Do you refuse my love?" he asked.

"How can I refuse something which never has been offered me?" she replied indignantly.

"Has it never been offered?" he inquired wonderingly.

"Not to my knowledge," she replied, as if the matter were one of no particular concern.

"I was not aware of that," he continued. "If it should happen to be so it can be easily remedied."

And it was remedied.

Mabel Trangmar.

"Did she make you feel at home?" "No; but she made me wish I were."

Nellie (aged twelve): "Our family is awfully exclusive. Is yours?" Bessie (aged eleven): "No, indeed! We haven't anything to be ashamed of."

Barber: "How do you prefer to be shaved?" Customer: "On the outside, please." Barber: "Eh?" Customer: "Don't you understand? I don't want you to go beneath the skin."

Mamma: "Yes, the elopers have been discovered in Scotland. They are going to telegraph home for forgiveness." Papa: "Thank goodness! I thought they were going to telegraph home for funds."

Young Mistress: "I don't see why you should leave me so suddenly. I'm sure I've done all I could to help you with the housework, and I've done all the cooking." Maid: "Yes'm; that's what's the matter." "What?" "I can't stand y'r cooking."

Your Editor Chats.

Nobody, I think, will deny that the cover illustration of this week's number is an exceptionally strong one, and neither ought anybody to be disappointed with the story of which it is the subject. I believe my readers fully appreciate the efforts I am making to keep this paper first and foremost, as it always has been since its birth, in the ranks of light literature, but I am always delighted to read criticisms from any of the thousands who regularly peruse these pages, because it is very helpful for me to know your opinions. So when you have a moment to spare, do me a favour, will you? Just take a postcard and on it express in a few words exactly what you feel about the new development of our striking covers, or the general style of the paper, or about any of its contents. Perhaps there is a new feature you would like to see started? If so, name your idea, and I will give my very best attention to see what can be done in the matter.

Next week the concluding episodes of "The 'Bridge' of Ruin" will appear, and I am positive that my readers, both male and female, will deem them to be a fitting climax to an exceptionally interesting series of confessions. If, as possibly they may, they have influenced anyone to steer clear of the vice of gambling, especially as regards that one from which is fascinating Society so much at present, the game of Bridge, I shall consider myself doubly satisfied, insomuch that I have provided my readers with entertaining matter, and have also perhaps staved them off from the whirlpool surrounding the green card-table.

Now, in the issue dated October 17th, commences a series after your own heart, a series over which, I believe, you will go into raptures. I am sure that my policy of discovering young ladies and of inducing them to write about their own romantic experiences is a very much appreciated one, because then my readers know that the details are both true and realistic. In my next chat I will tell you the heroine's name, and also about a coming grand new serial from the pen of your favourite author, Mr. George Griffith.

I wish everyone who reads this page would do me a favour. It is but a small matter, though it would give me great satisfaction. All I want you to do is to tell as many people as you can about the coming grand, new stories. By doing so you will oblige me, and you will earn the thanks of your friends. If you give them a copy of the paper, the bright reading matter will do the rest.

The result of the "Juggled Letters" Competition I hope to announce next week.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

DELISLE'S REVENGE.

Telling of a Faithless Friend and a Doubting Love.

I FINISHED my letter to my old friend, Clarence Bell, whom I had not seen for two years, with the following paragraph:

I wish you could see Gladys. Beautiful is not an adequate word for such a face as hers. I cannot describe her to you, for I should utterly fail to convey to you her sweetness and purity.

One morning, a few days later, the door of my office opened and Clarence entered, cool, careless, handsome as of old—the same Clarence who had ruled me by the charm of his presence, laughed at me, and borrowed my money during our college days.

"You did not expect me?" he said, after I had warmly welcomed him. "The fact is, Delisle, your letter aroused my curiosity. In the first place, I don't believe half of it, mind; but, allowing even for a lover's exaggeration, you have apparently found a jewel, eh? What is her name?"

"Gladys Lorimer."

"Her age?"

"Twenty, with soft, dark eyes and rich, red-brown hair."

"Perfection!" he exclaimed, laughing in his half-mocking way. "I perceive that I shall envy you."

"It will do credit to your taste," I replied. "However, you shall judge for yourself. She expects me this evening. Come with me and prepare to admire." He came.

I was proud of my friend, with his handsome face and winning manner.

And how beautiful she was, in her white summer dress, with her favourite scarlet flowers in her bosom, and a delicate flush in her cheeks as she rose to welcome us!

I saw Clarence start as he beheld her, and a look of undisguised wonder and admiration displace his ordinary careless expression. Contrary to his usual habit, he talked but little, keeping his eyes fastened upon Gladys, as if fascinated.

When we left her, he walked beside me in silence for some time. Suddenly he drew a deep breath, and said, as if to himself:

"She is a revelation!"

"Is she not!" I exclaimed triumphantly. "Am I not a fortunate fellow to have won her love?"

"Her love!" he repeated absently. "She loves you? True," he added, bursting into a laugh, "I had forgotten. I congratulate you, Delisle; you are indeed the most fortunate of men. You wanted me to envy you, and I do with all my heart. A man might give his right arm, his life even, to be in your place. There; am I sufficiently enthusiastic?"

He relapsed into silence, and during the rest of the evening remained moody and abstracted.

If love is blind, friendship is certainly near-sighted. During the three weeks that followed, if anyone had told me that my dearest friend was revolving in his mind the basest injury one man can do another, or that the woman I loved in the deepest fibre of my heart was being slowly but irresistibly drawn away from her plighted faith, I should have laughed the story to scorn.

There was no leaven of doubt in my love for them both, nor any shadow upon my happiness.

I had indeed observed a change in Clarence Bell. He was no longer the careless, idle friend of former times. He had become restless, gloomy and irritable. From visiting Gladys with me almost daily, he refused to see her at all.

"Let me alone," he said almost savagely, when I had repeated my customary invitation one evening. "Why do you persist in tempting me to contaminate that pure girl with my presence? I am a villain, the worst of villains, I tell you; I hate myself and everybody else; and if I were anything but a mean-spirited coward I would go and drown myself."

And, uttering an incoherent imprecation, he rushed out of the room, leaving me in the fear that he had lost his senses.

I was destined to receive a second surprise the same evening. Gladys was in the habit of waiting for me in the garden, but to-night she was nowhere to be seen. I went through the grounds, looking for her in our accustomed haunts, until I reached a rustic pavilion at the further side. Parting the leaves before the door, I peered cautiously within. She was there, but her attitude startled me. She was sitting with her head resting on the table before her, her face buried in her handkerchief, sobbing convulsively.

She rose hastily as I entered and looked at me confusedly.

"Is it you?" she said, in a tone almost of alarm.

"Whom did you expect?" I responded, in astonishment; "and why are you weeping?"

She sank down again, and put her hand to her side, as if to still the throbbing of her heart.

"Yes, I expected you," she murmured; "I don't know what is the matter with me. I am nervous and ill."

But I was not satisfied; an indefinable uneasiness disturbed me. I passed my arm around her, and putting aside the fallen tresses of her hair, looked at her earnestly and said:

"You are suffering, darling, will you not tell me what it is?"

"Nothing, nothing," she replied, averting her face. "I am only unhappy, that is all."

"Shall I leave you?" I asked, hurt at her manner. "I will come another time."

"No, no," she cried hysterically, clasping me tightly; "do not leave me. I dare not stay alone. I feel as if I were being drawn away from you by a power over which I have no control, as if I were under an evil spell."

"Everybody seems unhappy to-day," I replied. "I left poor Clarence in a desperate mood. I would have brought him with me, but he was nowhere to be found."

She started to her feet and pushed me from her with a shudder.

"Do not bring him here again," she exclaimed passionately. "Do not speak his name to me again."

"What has the poor fellow been doing now?" I asked in surprise. "He has not been here lately, at least."

"You do not know," she gasped, as if making a violent effort. "He comes when you are not here. He is a traitor, and your enemy. Avoid him! drive him away! As you value your peace of mind and mine, protect me from him."

Before I could reply, she lifted her skirts, and fled across the lawn, leaving me stunned and amazed with what I had heard.

There was a dreadful significance in her incoherent words. Was my friend indeed untrue to me? Had he secretly endeavoured to undermine me in the affections of my betrothed? Was that the secret of his strange conduct of late? My soul revolted at the idea! I could not believe that the friend to whom I had been so loyal and true would seek to do me so terrible an injury. There must be some mistake, some misapprehension. I would have an explanation from Clarence and give him an opportunity of clearing himself.

I returned to my house, and went to his room, but he was not there. I sat down to wait for him; but as the moments passed a nameless anxiety, almost terror, crept upon me, until at the end of the hour I could bear it no longer.

Digitized by Google

I rose, resolving to go back to Gladys, and to postpone my interview with Clarence until the following morning.

Passing up the main avenue of the grounds surrounding the home, I caught the glimmer of her white dress in the adjacent shrubbery, and turned aside to meet her. As I drew near I discovered that she was not alone; another step, and I recognised her companion. It was Clarence Bell!

My first sensation was mere wonder; the next, a cold chill of terrible doubt—doubt of both of them. I instinctively concealed myself behind a hedge, and waited for them to approach.

As they came nearer I saw—and I seemed to be in the midst of some mad nightmare as I saw it—that his arm was about her waist and her hand lying in his.

I rubbed my eyes and looked again. Yes, it was indeed so. I was deceived by my friend and betrayed by my betrothed wife!

I caught at the slender twigs of the hazels to support myself, for the sky seemed to be reeling above me and the earth to be sinking beneath my feet. Before that moment I did not know that a man could endure such suffering and still live.

Presently the convulsion passed, and there was nothing left in my heart but a consuming hatred.

As they came towards me, I watched them with eyes starting from my head. I heard his low, tender tones and her smothered replies. False lover and faithless friend!

I saw his arm around the waist of my betrothed, and they were talking in low, tender tones.

"It is too late to repent," he was saying, "I loved you from the moment I saw you. It was useless to combat it. I have as much right to be happy as he."

"I shall never be happy again," she replied, in a broken voice. "He was so good and true, and he loved me so tenderly. "It will break his heart. I wish I were dead—I wish I were dead!"

"He was my friend, too," he responded; "but love is stronger than friendship."

"And stronger than manhood, honour, and truth, too," I interrupted in a loud, stern voice, stepping from my concealment and confronting them. "Look at me, both of you—the man whose heart you have broken, whose life you have crushed!—and may the memory of me stand between you and accuse you, day and night, to the end of your lives!"

Then, without heeding her wild, supplicating cry, or his hoarse exclamation of shame and terror, I sprang over the hedge and rushed away like a madman.

I have but an indistinct idea of what I did or where I went all that long, terrible night, until at daylight I found myself, torn, haggard, drenched with rain and tottering with fatigue, before my own door.

But out of all my mental chaos I had evolved one clear, relentless resolve—revenge!

I made my way mechanically to my room, and there, upon my dressing-case, found two notes awaiting me.

One was from Clarence, brief, shameless, desperate.

It ran:

"I have deceived you. I have robbed you of your betrothed wife. I have played the scoundrel. Well, I have no excuse to offer. I love her, and have inspired her with a fancy, if no more, for me. It suffices, however. We have taken the morning boat to Castletown, where we shall be married."

The other from Gladys, a blotted, tear-stained sheet, was so confused and rambling that I could only decipher a few sentences.

"Oh! forgive me, if you can," she said, "for I am as wretched as you could wish me to be. I am all that is wicked and false; for I love you yet, and do not love him. But I am drawn on by an irresistible impulse, I do not understand myself. I——"

And here the letter broke off suddenly. I threw the notes down scornfully, and, opening a drawer, drew forth a revolver and loaded it carefully.

I examined the time-table, and made my preparations for the terrible task I had set myself with the cool deliberation of a maniac. I knew that the boat would touch at Rockampton, at the harbour's mouth, four hours later, and that by taking the train I should be able to intercept it.

My plan was terribly simple. I would destroy them both, and then myself. As I could not die alone and leave them to be happy in their treachery, so I could not live after I had meted out to them their fitting punishment. When I had once arrived at this determination my agitation left me. My nerves seemed made of ice and my muscles of steel.

No one aboard the train could have guessed that the quiet passenger who sat by himself in a corner was bent upon a mission of death.

When I reached Rockampton the steamer was already at the wharf. A storm had been raging all the morning, and now a terrific gale was blowing across the waste of turbulent water. Muffled in my overcoat, with my hat drawn over my eyes, I made my way aboard. I did not look for those I was pursuing. I knew that they were in my hand, and that was enough until my time should come.

Digitized by Google

Wrapped in my own stern meditations, I paid no heed to what was going on about me. I knew, in a vague way, that the gale was increasing; that the steamer laboured heavily; that there was alarm among the passengers and anxiety among the officers. But I was indifferent to it all.

It was not until late in the day that I was aroused from my stupor. There had been a heavier lurch than usual, then a terrific crash that shook the fabric of the vessel from end to end.

I rose and went forward, the one calm being among the panic-stricken crowd. I found that in the heavy fog the ship had lost her course, and, striking upon a shoal, was fast going to pieces.

Amid the running to and fro, the shouts, cries and agonies of terror, I saw and thought of nothing but the two figures standing side by side near the bow—Gladys and Clarence.

I watched them awhile, with a smile of scorn upon my lips and a cold, deadly calm at my heart. My hand would not be raised in punishment; my revenge would be consummated by a power greater than mine. Moment after moment passed by, and the water was already creeping about my feet; in less than half an hour all would be over.

Suddenly, as if my fixed gaze had fascinated her, Gladys raised her head and saw me. Even in the wild uproar I heard her cry of mingled shame, terror and love. Instinctively she stretched out her hands towards me, with a piteous gesture of appeal. In an instant all my hatred was swept out my heart, and all my love, betrayed as it had been, returned.

I pushed my way through the crowd and stood before them. I took her cold hand in mine; I turned and looked him calmly in the face.

"I followed you," I said, "to destroy you both for the wrong you have done me, and to die myself. In this hour, which may indeed be our last, I forgive you freely. If we escape, go your way together in peace, and I will go mine."

"No, no," she cried, clinging to me, "take me with you. Despise me, kill me if you wish, but do not believe I love anyone but you. I was mad, deluded, sinful, but in my heart true to you always."

"Say no more," I replied gently; "we have no time to think of that now. Clarence Bell, if you are a man, help me to save this woman."

"I cannot swim a stroke," he answered sullenly.

"Then I must save you both," I said. "The shore is not far distant, and I am a strong swimmer. Gladys, come with me. Clarence, remain where you are; I will return for you."

My preparations were soon made. I threw off my superfluous clothing, drew off her shoes and wraps, and bound a handkerchief over her mouth. Then, taking her in my arms, I sprang overboard, and began the terrible journey shoreward.

The sea was running mountains high and the wind was full in my face. The shore was less than half a mile distant, but in that short space I was more than once on the point of giving up my efforts.

But I was labouring for a life far more dear than my own, and I struggled on. At length, faint and gasping, I was drawn, with my precious burden, out of the seething billows upon the land. Waiting only long enough to regain my breath, I plunged into the water again and swam back to the wreck.

When I reached it again only a small portion of it was left. Clinging to a broken timber, in stolid despair, I found Clarence Bell.

"I did not believe you would return," he said, looking at me in haggard amazement. "Are you more than a man that you should risk your life for one who has injured you as I have?"

"This is my revenge," I replied. "Good for evil; life for worse than death."

He uttered a groan, and covered his face with his hands.

The renewed struggle was indeed a hopeless one. Wearied by my previous efforts, with a heavier and quite as helpless a burden to support, I believed from the start that we were doomed.

For more than half an hour I laboured desperately on, till I could scarcely move my cramped limbs. My eyes were blinded with spray, and my breath came in groans. Finally, I felt my senses leaving me.

"I can do no more," I gasped; "I am sinking!"

My arms relaxed, and I floated helpless at the mercy of the waves.

"You are dying for me," he moaned; "and I—oh, God! Claud, forgive——"

A swell passed over his head and he disappeared. The next instant I became unconscious.

* * * ** *

An age seemed to have elapsed, when I became vaguely aware of a sense of great pain, and the sound of a woman's voice in prayer.

"Oh, Father in Heaven! spare him to me" it said—"spare him that he may at length forgive me for my sin, and take me back to that noble heart which I betrayed!"

"Gladys!" I murmured, stretching out my hand feebly towards her.

"He lives!" she cried, falling upon her knees beside the bed, and covering my hand with kisses. "Oh, it is more than I deserve!"

"Hush!" I said gently; "don't speak of that now. Tell me of Clarence."

"He still lives," she answered, averting her face; "but it is said that he was mortally injured by a piece of wreck and will die. He has asked to see you."

He was lying in the next room, conscious of his approaching fate, desiring only to see me before he died.

On the following morning I was able to get to his bedside. Battered, dying, with the last vestige of his once wonderful beauty gone, he was indeed a sorrowful sight.

"They tell me that my time is up," he said feebly, trying to smile; "and I am heartily glad of it. You can forgive me now, can you not, old friend?"

"Fully and freely, before Heaven," I replied solemnly.

"You used to say no woman could resist me," he continued, with a momentary flash of his old, mocking manner. "I tempted, deluded, fascinated her; but under it all she was true to you. During our journey on the steamer she came to her senses. She loathed me, and did not disguise it. She would never have married me, and what would have been the sequel I cannot guess, but for the providential storm that killed me and restored her to you unharmed. Forgive her, Claud. She loves you, and has never ceased to love you."

"I have forgiven her," I said, "as I have forgiven you."

With a faint smile, in which there lingered something of the gay, careless friend I had known and loved so long, he closed his eyes, and so I left him.

His death drew the last bitter sting from my heart, but it was months before the memory of that sad time faded to a plaintive dream. Even then, with my love strengthened and my faith renewed, it was long before the prospect of happiness was again opened to me.

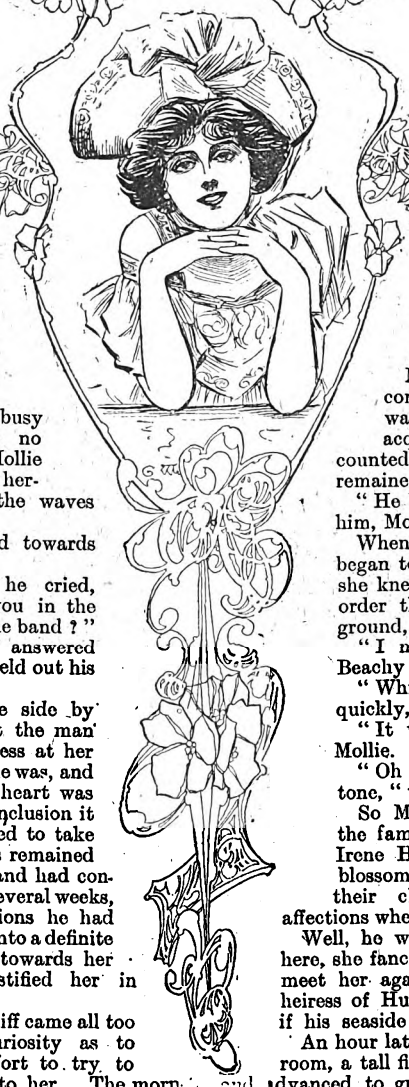
The folly I had pardoned, Gladys could not forgive in herself. She was not worthy of such love as mine, she said. It was fitting she should pass the rest of her life in the hard penance of self-denial and regret.

But we were both young, and love conquered with her as it had with me, as in all true hearts, though tears and fire, sorrow and shame, intervene, it reaches that union which is a foretaste of Heaven.

Charles Hildreth.

Digitized by Google

A Seaside Flirtation.



A Tale of Envy and Love.

It was late in the summer, nearing the end of September, and Mollie Armstrong was thinking regretfully that in another week she would have left the gay little seaside resort where she and her father had come for a change and be back once more in the quiet rectory at home.

This morning, having left her father busy over his correspondence and having no definite plans to put into execution, Mollie strolled down to the beach, and, seating herself on a breakwater, idly watched the waves coming in.

Presently a tall young man sauntered towards her.

"Good-morning, Miss Armstrong," he cried, raising his hat. "I've been looking for you in the gardens. Won't you come in and hear the band?"

"Yes, I should like to, very much," answered Mollie, as Charlie Maitland came up and held out his hand to help her to rise.

As they walked down the promenade side by side, Mollie smiled quietly to herself, but the man with her did not see the smile nor guess at her thoughts. She was thinking what a flirt he was, and wondering how much or how little his heart was touched this time. She came to the conclusion it was just as well she had hitherto declined to take his attentions seriously. Only a few days remained now before her departure and Mr. Maitland had constituted himself her devoted cavalier for several weeks, but in spite of compliments and attentions he had spoken no word that could be construed into a definite declaration. And yet his whole bearing towards her was such as might easily have justified her in anticipating one.

The last day of her visit to Beachy-at-Cliff came all too soon, and Mollie felt some little curiosity as to whether Maitland would make any effort to try to see her in the future or at least to write to her. The morning drew on to afternoon and he arrived at the station to see her and the Rector off, with a bunch of flowers in his hand, which he offered to her as a parting greeting.

"I hope we shall meet again before long," Charlie Maitland said, pressing her hand, while Mollie reflected that under the circumstances it would be the merest chance if they did.

The train steamed out of the station as he stood on the platform a moment, waving his hat to her, but he had turned away long ere she was borne out of sight.

Mollie watched his fast-diminishing figure. "A flirt!" she said to herself, bending over the flowers. "Well, I am glad I had the sense to recognise it." And she asked herself whether on her part she had been altogether guiltless of flirtation?

* * * * *

Summer had gone and autumn was being merged in winter. It was November; a drear month truly, but Mollie Armstrong, in the stately old Yorkshire mansion of her friends the Hursts, felt both gay and cheerful. She had just arrived on a long-promised visit, and she and Irene Hurst were now busy chatting in the latter's boudoir, previous to descending to dinner.

"Mr. Maitland is coming to-night," said Irene. "I do want you to see him, he is quite an intimate friend of ours, you know."

Mr. Maitland! Mollie preserved her composure and gave no sign that the name was familiar to her. A summer holiday's acquaintance formed at a boarding-house counted for nothing, she decided, so she remained silent while Irene went on:

"He brings his brother sometimes; you'd like him, Mollie, he's quite your style."

When Irene mentioned a brother, Mollie began to wonder which of the two it was that she knew, and with a view of finding out in order that she might feel more sure of her ground, presently she remarked carelessly:

"I met a Mr. Maitland these holidays at Beachy; I wonder if it is the same?"

"Which did you meet?" asked Irene quickly, "Charlie or Guy?"

"It was a Mr. Charlie Maitland," answered Mollie.

"Oh!" said Irene, in a slightly disappointed tone, "that is the one we know best!"

So Mr. Charlie Maitland was the friend of the family at Hurst Dene! Mollie looked at Irene Hurst with her golden hair and peach-blossom complexion and wondered whether their charm had succeeded in riveting his affections where her own attractions had failed.

Well, he would be somewhat surprised to see her here, she fancied; no doubt he had never expected to meet her again and if he were paying court to the heiress of Hurst Dene, he might not be best pleased if his seaside flirtation became known.

An hour later as the two girls entered the drawing-room, a tall figure came out of a corner by the window and advanced to greet them. He shook hands with Irene and she presented him to Mollie: "Mr. Guy Maitland—Miss Armstrong."

Mollie looked up with interest, and if ever there was a case of love at first sight it flashed into his eyes as they met hers, and Mollie, without knowing why, suddenly felt a strange shyness come over her.

"So your brother has not come, Mr. Maitland," said Irene, and a close observer might have noticed a shade of disappointment in her voice.

"No, he was unfortunately prevented," answered Guy, "and deputed me to utter his keen regrets." Bending a look on Irene, he saw the blush he had half anticipated colour her cheeks at his concluding words.

The evening passed pleasantly. Mollie played and sang, and Guy Maitland lingered at her side as if he asked nothing better. When, some hours later, Mollie found herself in her own room she threw herself into a luxurious armchair, feeling her heart stirred as it had never been before. She had met her fate! At last he had become a reality! And oh! surely he loved her too, incredible as it might seem in the short space of time. He was cast in a different mould from his brother, she felt convinced, or did her love blind her? No, she must not give her love lightly. But how if it were already given beyond recall.

Digitized by Google

* * * * *

The next night Charlie and Guy Maitland both came to dinner at Hurst Dene.

Charlie seemed markedly pleased to meet Mollie again, and somewhat to her surprise there was no alteration in his manner to her of a few months back. Mollie was a little at a loss, for from one or two chance remarks Irene had let fall and a blush here and there, she had imagined there might be something in that quarter. But she certainly had no clue to the fact that Irene had refused Charlie just before he came to Beachy, nor did she guess that he might be trying to annoy her by bestowing his attentions on another.

But to-night Irene seemed quite preoccupied with Guy, and Mollie could not help feeling a slight twinge of the green-eyed monster as she looked across at them. Guy in his turn sent many a glance in her direction and felt irritated to note, judging from the talk and laughter, that she and Charlie were meeting on the ground of old acquaintances. It suddenly occurred to Guy, who well knew his brother's secret, that Mollie might take his attentions seriously. Lots of people preferred Charlie to himself, and if Mollie—heavens! how he loved her already!

All that evening Guy tried hard to get Mollie to himself if only for a minute, and invariably Charlie circumvented him. The two brothers hovered round Mollie's chair, talking to her, amusing her, and persistently glancing at one another. Mollie was amused at the comedy and was quite quick enough to see that while Charlie appeared to be whispering soft nothings into her ear, his eyes betrayed themselves by constantly sending messages of quite another sort in Irene's direction. That demure maiden would not encounter one of them, so engrossed did she appear to be in a game of chess with her father.

At last, when the whole party made a general move to break up, Mollie found herself momentarily deserted by Charlie. That was Guy's chance and he immediately possessed himself of it.

"Don't you think we have had an awfully slow evening compared with last night?" he said. "My brother is a little apt, you know, to force his attentions on people. Of course, Irene, being an old friend, forgives him a good deal of his nonsense, but you must not take him too literally."

"Now he is jealous," thought Mollie, with a thrill of conquest; but loud she said quietly: "I think you do your brother an injustice." Guy looked at her in silence.

"Is she in love with him already?" he asked himself.

* * * * *

Irene and Mollie were exchanging confidences, and the conversation had naturally turned on the Maitland brothers. Charlie's tactics were already producing the desired result. Irene, in spite of herself, was beginning to feel a little jealous of Mollie and to find the thought that she might perhaps plume herself on a double conquest rather trying. Still, she did not believe that Charlie had really so far faltered in his allegiance as to be in earnest, but Mollie, who knew nothing of what had gone before, might believe him to be, and Irene felt the time had come to say a word in season.

"Charlie and Guy are too funny, don't you think?" she observed. "Directly Guy admires anyone Charlie must come and interfere, and it's the same the other way round. Because Charlie met you at Beachy, Guy immediately jumps to the conclusion he is in love with you—ridiculous, isn't it?—and must try to cut him out. Guy is always playing that game. You never heard the story about Julia Roberts? But I must say that Guy was right there for she was ten years older than Charlie. But Charlie always declared he would pay Guy out for it."

As may be imagined this speech was a revelation to Mollie and opened her eyes very considerably. Like a flash it dawned on her. Charlie was pretending love to her to pique Irene, so much she had guessed herself. On her own part she knew that she was permitting his attentions to cover her preference for Guy. And Guy? Guy was making love to her to spite his brother or for private reasons of his own. Oh! it was cruel, cruel! But she quite grasped the situation now and would never let Irene or anyone guess how utterly she had been deluded!

And Irene chatted on, little dreaming of the havoc she had wrought, and went to bed to sleep the sleep of the just, satisfied that she had made it clear to Mollie that Charlie Maitland was her special property, to be resumed at will, when she so pleased.

* * * * *

An impromptu dance suggested by Irene and indulgently assented to by the Squire and Mrs. Hurst, was taking place at Hurst Dene. Mollie was sitting in a secluded corner with Charlie Maitland, while the band played that most seductive of waltzes, "The Blue Danube." Mollie moved impatiently as the young man bent his dark eyes upon her. She was feeling worried and unhappy, tired of his make-believe which she seemed powerless to evade, and longing for the next dance on her programme when Guy would be her partner. Charlie bent nearer to her, how near she did not know, for a dark shadow fell across the portière and she leant forward ever so slightly. The kiss that would have brushed her cheek fell on a little curl that was straying out from behind her ear, and before she had time to give her wrath utterance, Guy's deep voice was heard apologising for disturbing them.

"Awfully sorry to intrude," he said, with a fierce look at his brother, which belied his words. He offered his arm to Mollie. "Our dance, I think." She rose and accepted it, and together they moved away.

Charlie remained standing alone, hiding a smile as he pulled at his moustache.

"Guy is in deadly earnest at last! I wonder how he liked being cooped up behind the portière, obliged to listen to my pretty speeches, got up for his benefit. It's too bad of me, I declare, but then I owed him one over the Roberts affair—I was hard hit at the time. And he's no right to take me to task about Irene. I don't believe she cares two straws for me, less, in fact, than Miss Armstrong does, and anyone can see where her choice has fallen. But I'll ask Irene again!"

* * * * *

As they walked away together Guy's dark head was close to Mollie's, and he whispered:

"Don't let us dance. Do sit here a little while; I want to talk to you, Mollie! I must speak to you while I can. You must have guessed how I love you! And I cannot control my feelings any longer. Do give me one little word of hope."

Mollie drew herself coldly away, afraid to believe in his words. "I don't understand you, Mr. Maitland, you must be making a mistake." He looked quickly at her to read her meaning, drew a long breath, and remained silent.

Suddenly voices near by arrested their attention. Irene exclaimed: "Oh, Charlie, I am so happy. I was beginning to think that—that——"

And Charlie answered reproachfully:

"There's only one girl in the world for me, darling, and that's your sweet self."

Mollie made a movement to go but Guy for some inexplicable reason detained her—why he could not tell.

"You see," went on Irene, "it's really a matter of difficulty to tell when you and Guy are in earnest. You so often only pay attention to a girl to spite each other. And I told Mollie so!"

"But Guy is in deadly earnest," exclaimed Charlie. "Whatever did Miss Armstrong say? Perhaps after the way you libelled me to her, she is under the impression Guy is only trying to cut me out. Whew!"

At this point Mollie would have fled away in deepest confusion but Guy's hand clasped hers.

"Is that what you thought?"

Her eyes filled with tears as she struggled to escape. "Yes," she acknowledged, "I thought it."

"Mollie, Mollie," he cried, "believe that I love you!"

And as he was in a position to enforce his words she yielded to them.

Ellice Beere.

Digitized by Google

Might Try the Same Game.

Miss Peart: "Do you think one is liable to catch anything from kissing?" Mrs. Placid: "That's the way I caught my husband."

She Wasn't the Only Pebble.

She: "If I refuse you, I suppose you'll do some foolish thing or other." He: "Oh, yes; no doubt I'll go and marry some other girl, most likely."

And Hubby Scored.

Wife: "You can't say I ran after you before we were married." Husband: "H'm: The trap doesn't run after the mouse, but it gets him in all the same!"

He'd Sooner Not Say.

She: "Oh, yes, I quite believe there's a fool in every family. Don't you?" He: "Well-er my opinion's rather biassed. You see, I'm the only member of our family."

Did He Do It?

She: "You say you would do anything for me, Charlie." He (fervently): "I would, darling." She: "Well, you know how frightfully red my hair is, I want you to dye yours red, just to keep me in countenance!"

George Would Pay No Parson's Fees.

Laura: "I don't know, George, it seems such a solemn thing to marry. Have you counted the cost?" George: "The cost, Laura? The cost? Bless me, I've got a clergyman cousin that'll marry us for nothing!"

A Clear Course Open for Him.

Old Richfellow (desperately): "If you refuse me what is there left for me to do?" Sweet Girl: "Well, I read the other day about a rich man who made his will in favour of the woman who refused him, and then went and hanged himself."

She Was Engaged at Last.

Mr. Beetleson: "Would you like the date put in our engagement ring, dear?" Miss Beryl: "By all means; and then if there's room, run in some little motto like 'Any port in a storm,' or 'A bird in the hand,' or something pretty like that, you know."

Suited Both Reasonings.

"I wish you would give me that gold ring on your finger," said the village dandy to a country girl, "for it resembles the duration of my love for you—it has no ending." "Excuse me, sir. I chose to keep it as emblematic of my love for you—it has no beginning."

She Had Made a Start.

He (accepted): "You say you were never engaged before?" She: "Yes." He: "How does that happen? I thought all women usually had three or four engagements?" She (guilelessly): "Well, I presume I shall, too. You see, this is the first chance I've had."

Was Her Reply Encouraging?

He: "Will you marry me if I ask your father?" She: "Yes, if you don't get disfigured too badly."

He Didn't Dispair.

Dasher: "Clara, dear, will you be my wife?" Clara: "Have you asked mamma?" Dasher: "Yes; but she won't have me."

Popping the Question Artfully.

Edgar: "You wear pink all the time; I should like to see you in a lace-like white frock." Ethel: "How awfully—awfully sudden."

A Successful Marriage.

Wise Father (to married son): "You are living very nicely, I see; but are you saving any money?" Wise Son (whispering): "Yes, but don't tell my wife."

Not Finally Rejected.

De Long: "Your daughter, sir, has declined me with thanks. She is literary, you know, and she says she is in need of shorter articles." Paterfamilias: "Um! Couldn't you get her to accept you as a serial?"

They Don't Speak Now.

Ella: "Pa says we can't marry for ten years. But don't look so sad, George; you are yet young." George: "Yes, I know I am, dearest. I wasn't thinking of myself, but of you, love." It was at once put off indefinitely.

A Great Shame.

Chappie: "I knelt befoah her, and asked her to be my wife." Chollie: "And she wejected you?" Chappie: "Yaas." Chollie: "That was wough." Chappie: "Yaas. I got my twousahs bagged at the knees for nothing, bah Jove!"

The Joys of Marriage.

"If I had known," sobbed young Mrs. Fits, "that you would be such a brute to poor Fido, I never, never would have married you." "My dear," replied Mr. Fits, "the anticipation of kicking that miserable little beast was one of my chief reasons for proposing to you."

Not Difficult to Believe.

"Your father is worth at least a million," said Hunter to his jealous sweetheart. "Yes, he is," she replied. "And you are his only child!" he impressively said. "I am;" she responded. "And yet you doubt my love," he cried, in tones of blended satire and sorrow.

She Rather Liked It.

Daughter: "What do you think, mamma! That strange gentleman who just got out when we were going through the tunnel kissed me!" Mother: "But, my child, why didn't you tell me at once, so that I could call him to account for it?" Daughter: "Why, you see, mamma, I thought—I thought—that we were coming to another tunnel!"

She Helped Him On.

Bashful Bachelor: "My dearest, I—I have long wished to tell you that I am full—I mean my heart is full—my palpitating heart—I—I mean your smiles—dearest, would shed—would shed——" Aspiring Maiden: "Perhaps, dear, we could live in a flat at first, and then we should not need a wood-shed." (The all important date was settled in five minutes.)

A Foregone Conclusion.

"Now, Algernon," said Miss Fussanfeather, as she was tightly held in the embrace of her fiancé, "they tell me that men get tired of squeezing after they are married. Will you promise me not to give it up after we are man and wife?" "Oh, I assure you it is not necessary to make any such promises," replied the young man. "I guarantee you'll have all the squeezing you want to get along on thirty shillings a week."

Digitized by Google

A Forced Engagement.

The Story of a Lover's Stratagem.

THERE was some consternation in the village of Reynsham when it was known that Joe Warner, the gamekeeper, had not returned to his lonely cottage. He had gone out as usual, and no one had anticipated any scrimmage with a poacher, yet Warner had not returned at the ordinary hour in the morning.

An affray with poachers was such an out-of-the-way occurrence on Lord Mensem's estate, that the mere mention of such a thing provoked a smile; therefore the notion that Warner had been hurt in a scrimmage was dismissed at once as improbable.

Some accident had befallen him, the villagers agreed, and they made up a search party to scour the woods.

Annie Rawson looked up with a startled glance when a neighbour entered her mother's humble dwelling with the intelligence that a search in the woods was to be made in order to find Joe Warner, and her face grew pale as she listened to the scanty information.

"I'm sorry to be bringing you bad news, Annie," concluded the neighbour with assumed sympathy. In truth, she was proud of being the first to acquaint the girl with what was supposed to have happened. "Perhaps there's nothing in it, and Joe'll be coming home and laughing at us all for being so foolish! I thought I'd better come and tell you before someone else broke it to you rough-like!"

Annie laughed uneasily.

"Perhaps he has gone off somewhere before going home," she observed quietly. "There does not seem to be any cause for alarm."

"That's just as you may like to think," answered the old woman sharply. "If he had had a quarrel with anyone he might go off in a huff, but it takes a lot to make Joe Warner go out of his way. I'll be going now, Mrs. Rawson," she concluded, turning to Annie's mother, who had not said a word, and ignoring Annie.

She left the cottage, and Annie turned a troubled gaze towards her mother.

"Do you think that anything has happened?" she asked, with just a quiver in her voice.

"Yes!" said Mrs. Rawson slowly. "It isn't like Joe's style to act like that. Did you quarrel with him last night, Annie?"

"Yes, mother."

"You have agreed to marry him, yet——" began Mrs. Rawson, but her daughter interrupted her.

"I agreed to marry him and I will marry him!" she cried passionately. "But he must take me as I am. He must——" She broke off abruptly. "I don't wish to talk any more about it, mother. Let us go and join in the search."

Mrs. Rawson rose and went into the next room for her bonnet and shawl; the morning was somewhat chilly. Annie surveyed herself in the mirror, mechanically, as she set her hat on the wealth of brown hair.

The reflection was that of a maiden of twenty years, tall and graceful, with a sweetly attractive face, bright eyes that changed in expression with every mood, and rosy lips through which could be seen the faintest glimmer of white teeth.

There was an appearance of resolution in the girl's face that could not be mistaken, but this seemed to add to her beauty rather than detract from it, as is so often the case in woman.

Annie, although her eyes were fastened on the mirror, saw nothing of this, for her thoughts were far away. A curious struggle was going on within her, a struggle between the sentiments of attraction and repulsion.

Joe Warner had forced himself upon her, and had done his best, or worst, to oust his brother. Joe was a quiet, steady fellow, whom everybody regarded as a man of sterling worth and incapable of a mean action; he was six years older than Annie and three years older than his brother. A match between Joe and Annie was not the kind of union that people would anticipate.

Dick Warner was quite unlike his sedate brother; he lived in town and was better dressed, more alert in manner, and more of a ladies' man than Joe, whom he secretly despised. At least, that was the opinion generally held in the village of Reynsham.

It was not surprising that Dick Warner was smitten by the charms of Annie Rawson; indeed, it would have been wonderful if he had not been. And Annie, although not entirely unsophisticated, yielded to his tender glances and honeyed words. It was at this stage that Joe Warner stepped in and won the prize out of his brother's grasp. How?

Annie's face flushed as she remembered how Joe had forced her to become engaged to him, although she favoured the suit of the more stylish and fascinating Dick Warner.

Almost on the eve of an engagement with Dick, the elder brother had called upon her and threatened—yes, threatened—to expose a certain transaction of her dead father.

She did not understand the matter properly, for she was not versed in business, but she grasped enough of the subject to comprehend that it would be a disgrace to her mother and herself if it became known to the world. Joe, in response to her indignant vindication of her father, told her quietly that he could back it up by proof, and she gave in with a sob.

Yes, to save her father's memory and to keep disgrace from her mother, she would marry Joe, although she would hate him as long as she lived. Joe smiled, a quiet smile full of sadness and not at all indicative of triumph, and left her.

Dick Warner received his dismissal in anger; he asked for a reason, but Annie could give him none, save that it was for the best. Dick said afterwards, with perfect frankness, that if she preferred Joe he could not object, and he hoped she would be happy with his brother.

The engagement was only a month old. During that time Joe had been undemonstratively attentive, and Annie had recognised in him certain excellent qualities which did not accord with the part he had played; notwithstanding his cowardly action, he had commanded a certain amount of respect.

"Are you ready, Annie?" came her mother's voice. "I do hope that nothing has happened; but since Mrs. Booth brought the news I have had an uneasy feeling that I remember a shot while I was in a kind of doze last night. Perhaps it's only imagination, but a hazy recollection comes to me!"

Digitized by Google

"Do you really think that Joe has had an affray with poachers, mother?" inquired Annie, hurrying to the door in advance of her mother, so that the latter might not see the agitation in her face.

If anything had happened to Joe Warner she was free, and her father's memory was safe. Was it just to permit even the trace of a sentiment of elation at the thought? She shuddered. "Oh, I hope not!" she concluded fervently, her better nature gaining the mastery.

It was strange that such a commotion had arisen because a gamekeeper had failed to return home in the morning; but it was an extraordinary thing in Joe's case, and all the villagers were filled with the same vague unrest. The people set off into the woods in twos and threes; Annie and her mother went by themselves to an especially secluded portion of the estate.

They wended their way here and there, Annie's anxiety increasing without apparent cause as the time passed. Suddenly Mrs. Rawson uttered a cry, and pointed to the foot of a tall oak.

Joe Warner sat at the foot of the tree, his back against the trunk. His head was thrown back against the tree; his hands clasped a gun half-way along the barrel; the butt end of the weapon rested on the ground between his feet, and a piece of twine ran from the trigger to his foot.

Joe Warner had shot himself! That was the first thought that crossed the minds of the two women. Mrs. Rawson hastened forward, and knelt by Joe's side. She placed her cheek close to his lips and remained motionless for a few seconds.

"He is alive!" she cried abruptly and with animation. "Run and tell them, Annie, and bring a doctor."

Annie gave another horrified glance at the motionless figure and was about to dart away for help when a curious, indefinable sentiment impelled her to go forward, kneel near her mother, and kiss the pallid face of the wounded man.

Mrs. Rawson untied the string and put it in her pocket. Then she threw the gun into the bushes.

"Oh, mother," she burst forth, "has he tried to kill himself because—because he forced me to take his ring, and——?"

"Run for help, quick!" cried Mrs. Rawson sharply. She did not understand her daughter's words. "And don't tell anyone that he had the gun like that! I don't believe in it! Don't forget!"

Annie ran off for assistance, while Mrs. Rawson, with set features, untied the string and hid it in her pocket. Then she took Joe's gun and threw it among the nearest trees. Having accomplished so much, she again knelt by his side, opened his waistcoat, and examined the wound.

"It did not bleed much," she muttered. "The soft shirt seems to have staunched the blood. This has not been done long. No suicide about this, but—an attempt to kill, in my opinion. It was a clever dodge, and the villain will expect to hear that Joe Warner was found in such-and-such a position. He will be amazed when he hears nothing of the kind, but he will not be able to say anything. I must keep my ears wide open. The rascal may let something slip in his surprise and annoyance that will afford a clue!"

It was not long before help arrived, including the village doctor. Joe's wound was pronounced to be less dangerous than it appeared to be, much to the relief of the inhabitants of Reynsham, and he was borne tenderly, but still unconscious, to his own home.

Annie went with the rough ambulance and assisted Joe's housekeeper to attend to him and make everything comfortable for him. The old woman would have resented it if Mrs. Rawson had done it, but Annie had a right to be by the side of her affianced husband. So she stayed.

The greatest excitement prevailed in Reynsham; there really had been an affray with poachers, then, however improbable it had seemed to the worthy people.

The police were informed, and everyone was waiting for poor Joe Warner to recover consciousness and give some clue to his assailants.

Annie heard of the expectations of the inhabitants and she dreaded the awakening of the man to whom she was engaged; her mother had destroyed the evidence of attempted suicide, but that was to prevent Joe from being punished if he should recover, she thought. Suppose he were to utter some incriminating words before he was fully conscious?

Why had he done it? Was it out of remorse for his conduct towards her? She felt a kind of pity, a sense of grateful clemency springing up within her; he would renounce his intention and allow her to choose freely, keeping to himself the dread secret.

At last he opened his eyes with a long-drawn sigh. Annie waited in a state of feverish anxiety; she longed to be able to give him some sign that should warn him, but the police were represented, and the doctor was there.

Joe gazed about him vacantly and Annie's heart contracted; he would betray himself.

"Am I much hurt?" were his first words.

"Oh!" responded the doctor with grave cheerfulness. "You will soon pull round. Of course you remember how it occurred?"

"Someone fired at me!" returned Joe, after a pause. "I fancied—that I recognised him, but—I can't describe him."

This was rather disappointing to the police, but it was a relief to Annie, although she was convinced that Joe was not telling the truth.

"We mustn't worry him any more," declared the doctor authoritatively. "He will get stronger and then he will be able to tell you."

He asked them to leave, and quitted the house himself shortly afterwards. Annie sat by his bedside; she expected a confession that would make her glad, she longed for Joe to gain strength so that she might know that she was free to marry Dick Warner.

"Annie!"

It was Joe's voice; the girl had fallen into a reverie from which she was aroused with a start.

"Annie, I'm sorry I spoke roughly to you last night," the wounded man proceeded. "It isn't my usual way, but youangered me when you told me that you thought twenty times as much of Dick as you did of me!"

Digitized by Google

His voice wavered; he stopped to regain breath, and the girl dare not trust herself to speak.

"It was hard on me, for I love you a thousand times more than he can, Annie." There was a ring of suppressed passion in the weak voice. "Do you hear that? It cut me to the heart, and I said angry words."

The girl remained silent.

"You hate me, Annie! You hate me, when I would give my life for you any day. Ah, you don't know how I have tried to save you. And now, if I die, I sha'n't be able to save you."

"What do you mean?" The girl's question was sharp and full of wondering surprise. "You tried to kill yourself to save me, yet you say that if you die—— Keep still, Joe, you are wandering in your mind."

"It's false. Who says I tried?"

"You were found propped against the trunk of a tree, holding your gun. Mother and I found you, but we have said nothing." And she told him the circumstance.

"The villain!" he gasped, raising himself on his elbow and falling back with a groan. "He tried to kill me; he thought he had killed me; and he endeavoured to make it appear suicide. Clever, but he forgot the bullet! My gun is still loaded, unless he discharged it purposely; and even then, it must be possible for these clever detectives to find the bullet or to prove by the wound that I was shot with a pistol."

He lay panting for a few moments, while Annie looked at him in bewilderment. The housekeeper was out, so she had Joe to herself.

"Who was it?" she asked, and the reply stunned her for the time.

"My brother!"

Annie sank back in her chair limp and inarticulate. Joe fixed his eyes on her; a great resolve settled in them. Speaking in a low tone in order to husband his strength, he told his story steadily.

"My brother was here yesterday. He met me in a quiet spot and said that he was sorry for all the trouble he had caused me. He was glad that I was to marry you, as he was not worthy of you. He was so different from his usual manner, so full of remorse for the past, that I was deceived. He told me that he intended to emigrate and to do better in another country. I believed he was sincere, and we parted like brothers.

"Then, when I saw you last night, I found that he had been to see you in spite of what he said to me; I found that he had been at work again in his underhand way and had tried to make you dislike me all the more. In my annoyance at his treachery, in my vexation at having been fooled, I spoke sharply to you and we quarrelled.

"Yes, we quarrelled because you believed him to be all that is good and you take me to be a mean, despicable rascal, who would force you into a marriage against your will. It surprises you to hear me speak of my brother and his past. I have always spoken considerately of him; that is because I would not betray my brother. He took advantage of it. But he has tried to kill me, and it is well that you, at least, should know the truth."

Annie Rawson remained in the recumbent position in the chair; her eyes were fixed straight in front of her, but she was listening to every word.

"I went on duty last night," continued Joe, "without fear of any mishap. It was getting light when, as I stood by that tree, I turned and saw a figure levelling a pistol at me. I know who it was. I had no time to make any attempt to save myself. There was a report and I fell. It was my brother who fired at me."

Annie shuddered. Joe noted her ashen face, and continued:

"It is time to tell you why I forced you to give him up. It was to save you from a villain. It was because I loved you so, that I could not endure the thought of your giving yourself to a man who would either desert you very soon or break your heart by his own heartlessness.

"I saw that he was exerting his usual fatal fascination and that you were falling a victim. I knew that you did not care for me; I knew that what I thought of doing would destroy for ever my hope of winning your love—for I had hoped to win it, Annie! But I sacrificed myself for your sake.

"Dick has already broken one woman's heart, and he is a forger. He did it cleverly and escaped his deserts, but I possess the information that would send him to prison. I have kept it secret to spare him the horrors of penal servitude, but if it were known I should be indicted with him and sent to prison as an accessory after the fact. Nevertheless, I ran the risk, because he was my brother.

"Then he came down here and tried to take you. That was more than I could bear. I threatened in my desperation that I would expose him and he laughed at me, saying that I should be punished with him. I would have risked that rather than see you fall a victim, but he artfully got into my room and destroyed the evidence!

"After that, my only course was to use the other method. I hated myself, but it was for your sake. Perhaps I acted foolishly; perhaps there might have been a better way; but I did what I thought was best in my ignorance!

"I tried first of all to persuade you to give up Dick, but you refused. I expected that and it did you credit; you are so true. So I brought pressure to bear on you by telling you something which Dick had told me about your father. I judged that it would have the desired effect.

"Out of regard for your father's memory you yielded, and you did not say a word to your mother. I was glad, for I do not believe a word of it. It was my intention to impose on you till I had got Dick away—away somewhere so that you could not marry him, or else to keep matters hanging on till he tired of you and went to some other woman, I thought I could wear out his patience. So——"

He ceased speaking and Annie turned her eyes, full of tears, towards him. She could not doubt the sincerity of his story; a man in that critical condition does not say what is false. She began to realise his sacrifice.

She recognised the sterling qualities which prompted him to shield his brother and to save her; and even his crude method of doing this service to her by temporarily blackening her father's memory was not inexcusable. He thought it was the only sure way of effecting the purpose, and it was only between themselves. No one else knew it.

It was a cruel blow to her pride that she had been deceived by Dick, and this made her more lenient towards Joe.

"I am sorry," she said simply. And he was satisfied.

They were so intent on their own immediate concerns that they did not hear a slight rustle near the door. It was Mrs. Rawson slipping away, with a hard expression on her lips. She had entered very softly in time to hear Joe's story.

"So he tried to blacken Will's character, eh?" she murmured. "Well, I know enough to send him to pri on for a long term. The piece of string attached to the trigger of the gun is the piece I saw him take from the stool in front of the house when he left Annie yesterday afternoon. I can swear to it, so can Annie when I point something out to her. And we both saw it attached to the gun. There's no escape for him, but shall I——? If he will give me a written denial of that lie, and clear out of the country, I'll let him go so as not to upset Joe and Annie."

Mrs. Rawson left Reynsham next day for London, and when she returned she looked radiant, and as soon as Joe was well enough, she told him in Annie's presence all about her interview with Dick Warner in London and showed him the statement written out by his rascally brother.

"He will leave the country within a week or I'll put the police on his track, and he knows that I mean what I say. Then I made him confess on paper," said Mrs. Rawson.

"I am glad," said Joe, in his grave, simple manner. "Perhaps Annie will learn to like me a little some day."

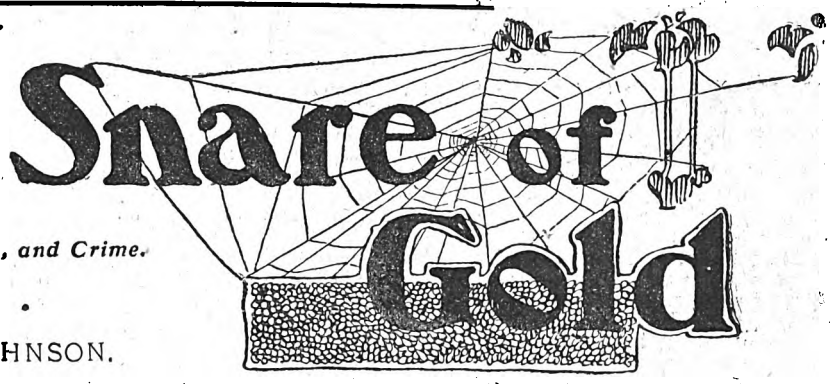
The girl blushed, and Joe took her in his arms.

G. Hubert.

Digitized by Google

GRAND SERIAL STORY.

The Snare of Gold



A Tale of Love, Ambition, and Crime.

• • By • •

HENRY T. JOHNSON.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS IN THIS SPLENDID STORY ARE:

GEORGE GELDART, a former prosperous City merchant, supposed to be dead, and now known as "Old Mystery."

ERIC GELDART, his elder son, who conspired to kill his father, thereby coming into his property. He then enters Parliament, where he forms a new party.

RONALD GELDART, the younger son, who has been disinherited because he has been falsely accused of robbing his father.

CLARE ARMITAGE, the adopted sister of the two brothers, and who is betrothed to Eric.

BOANERGES BLAGDON, the traitorous partner of old Geldart, whom he has cheated in business, and who plots with Eric to murder him.

SAMPSON SCRIMSHAW, company promoter, who befriends "Old Mystery," by whose assistance he is successful in endeavouring to become an M.P.

MR. STANYER, an Australian financier, who gives "Old Mystery" the post of English agent for his business.

MADELEINE LORRAINE, daughter of Lord Lynton, who is beloved by Eric, but who loves "Harvey Bligh," the popular author, really Ronald Geldart.

PHYLLIS DAVENTRY, typewriter to Scrimshaw, who takes a fancy to "Old Mystery." She is rescued from Hooligans by Ronald Geldart.

JACK WIDDICOMBE, cousin to the brothers Geldart, and who occupies a responsible position on the Meteor.

TWENTY-FIRST CHAPTER.

Mr. Springle Does Some Detective Work.

"RONALD! Ronald! Heavens! is it you?"

It was Clare Armitage's voice, it was Clare's hand laid on his arm, and Ronald Geldart, just emerging from the offices of The Meteor, paused.

"Clare!" he exclaimed. An impulse possessed him to extend a friendly hand; then he remembered the hard, accusing look she had fixed upon him at their last meeting and their last parting, and the impulse was gone.

Still, rancour was gone from his heart too, for she had greeted him in the old familiar tone, the old smile was on her lips, and then again there were lines in her face and hollows, too, that touched his heart to pity.

"They told me that you were leaving England, that you were gone," she said.

"They told many things regarding me," he answered bitterly, "quite as untrue and infinitely more cruel."

"Yes, yes, I know!"

"You knew they were untrue? Then why did you not speak?"

"Oh, don't ask me; I—I can't tell you now. Only, Ronald, we must meet somewhere, you and I, for a quiet chat; I've a lot to tell you, not here, nor now, my heart is too full. Tell me where you can be found?"

Ronald for a moment hesitated then gave her the address in Bloomsbury Square.

He had that morning arrived in town for the purpose of calling on several publishers with reference to commissions, and also with the intent of booking his passage a few days hence for the States, whither he was bound on a trip partly of business, partly of pleasure, for his works were attracting considerable attention on the other side. He scribbled the address upon a card.

"Write to me there," he said, "and I will keep any appointment you may like to make. Only tell me, Clare, you don't believe me the thief that once you thought me?"

"Oh, no, no!" she said. "Ask me nothing now, I will tell you everything when next we meet. But, Ronald, you have given me somebody else's card. This says "Harvey Bligh." Why, that's the new man whose work has caught on so wonderfully. Do you know him, are you in his line? You always had a hankering that way!"

"I am Harvey Bligh," he said simply, without boasting, and yet not without a kind of simple, honest pride that he had made honoured and well known the name he had chosen—yes, even better known than that it was his right by blood to bear.

And so they went their ways. He wondering what strange message she had to tell, she exulting in her heart that the means of avenging herself upon the man who had wronged her and of righting the brother he had so cruelly betrayed were at last within her power.

As she hurried along, she looked up, her eyes encountered the gaze of the very man against whom she plotted that revenge. Yes! there he sat in an open carriage drawn by a pair of horses, and facing him, beside her father, sat the Hon. Madeleine Lorraine, radiant in the sunshine of her twenty summers.

Clare's heart writhed in the anguish of a woman's jealousy as she gazed upon the rival whose loveliness, whose wealth, and whose prospective coronet had won from her the heart to win which she had lost so much.

And the tempest in Clare Armitage's heart swelled and whirled into a cyclone. She felt she could have sprung there from the pavement across the open street and, pointing an accusing hand at Eric Geldart, charged him then and there with all his perfidy—perfidy to her, requiting with brutality all she had risked and dared for him, perfidy to his own blood brother, whom he would without a scruple have relegated to a prison cell, perfidy to his dead father. Yes! she felt she could have screamed all this into his ear there in the open street.

A moment and the carriage had rattled past, its wheels splashing Clare as though in token of the scorn of Eric Geldart for whom she had dared all, of Eric Geldart, slanderer of his brother, robber of his father, his dead father.

"Oh Heavens!" She clutched at her heart with her hands, for there for a moment in the busy crowd that came and went, her eyes rested for a moment upon the image of one she thought she recognised; but the face and the eyes seemed to her to be those of the dead!

Digitized by Google

* * *

Mr. Horace Springle that night returned to Bloomsbury Square with so portentous an air that Arethusa, taking up his hot water, was constrained to inquire if anything "'ad 'appened," the inquiry being met by a chilling recommendation to mind her own business and remember her position. Descending towards the dining-room he was met on the landing by Mrs. Skimper with palpably a bill in her hand and a deadly determination in her eyes.

"Mr. Springle, sir," the good lady observed with asperity. "I am sorry to be imperative, but there is a little matter which I must have an understanding about, once for all."

"Really, Mrs. Skimper," Horace replied airily. "Yes, and, by the bye, before we go into that, there's another matter, perhaps of less importance, that I should like to dispose of first, one of those matters I never like to keep hanging about."

"Indeed, Mr. Springle, and what may be the nature of the matter?"

"Oh, it's merely your little account. Perhaps you'll kindly have it made out and let me have it receipted with the change out of this"—and, with the air of a Midas, Mr. Springle handed his hostess one of his newly acquired five-pound notes.

Mrs. Skimper gasped, clutched at the bannisters to save herself from falling, then, gazing at Springle's five pound note with open eyes, she stammered, meanwhile surreptitiously thrusting the slip of paper in her other hand into her pocket.

"Oh, thank you, Mr. Springle. What I was going to say was—dear me! I've almost forgotten what I was going to say. Oh, let me see. I remember. I was going to ask whether it would be convenient for you to have the ceiling of your room whitewashed, only, of course, your anxiety about your account quite drove it out of my head. I'll have it made out certainly this evening, it won't take long," which remark she made with perfect confidence in the knowledge that it was in her pocket.

Mr. Springle, entering the dining-room, nodded jauntily to Miss Amaranth, somewhat casually to Mr. Grimmage, glared at Mr. Dodgerson, who was glaring at him, and there directly opposite him sat the man of all others with whom he desired to come in contact—Harvey Bligh.

Ronald for his part was too much occupied with his own reflections to observe Springle's start of surprise. He had returned to Bloomsbury Square for the purpose of gathering together such of his traps as he would require during the projected sea trip and make arrangements for the storage of the rest, for which purpose he had arranged to pitch his tent in Bloomsbury Square for some few days.

That start, however, was not lost on Miss Amaranth nor on the rest of the company.

"We are honoured to-night," said that lady in her most gushing tones, "with the company of a celebrity."

"Quite right," said Springle. "Been away, Mr. Bligh? Seaside? No! Moors? No! Ah! it's nice to be you, pitching your tent and striking it at will, and no being late at the office because other people are late with your breakfast," and he winked at Grimmage and the rest, while Mrs. Skimper coloured to the hue of her cherry ribbons.

Ronald on this occasion experienced two surprises. Firstly, Mr. Springle was uncommonly polite; secondly, he was more than usually inquisitive.

Not that he plied the usual questions addressed to the successful man in any particular branch of art or literature, as to how he did it, what made him think of those sensational scenes, that sparkling dialogue, what suggested that magnificent picture, or such and such a haunting melody. Were the people in his book or play really taken from life?

On the contrary, Mr. Springle's apparently casual inquiries appertained to Mr. Harvey Bligh's personal movements, antecedents, and projects.

How long was he remaining at Mrs. Skimper's? What were his movements after leaving there? Where had he been during his absence? Indeed, the pertinacity of his questions might have struck Ronald as peculiar, but that his thoughts were far away, and the answers he returned were vague and absent-minded.

For his mind was full of Madeleine. Ever since they parted he had been wondering would they meet again, and where, and how, and would she be as cold to him as when they parted?

Then he thought of that strange haphazard meeting with Clare Armitage, and of her wild words. What did it all mean? Why had she so suddenly, albeit so late in the day, veered round to a belief in his innocence?

He remembered how she had been when first the appalling accusation was hurled at him by his father that he had robbed him, and he, Ronald, appalled by the very horror of the thing, had flown first to Clare, who had always been to him and Eric so like a sister, for solace, for sympathy, and for advice. Even now her words rang in his ear.

"You say this accusation wrings your very heart. Do you imagine it causes less anguish to your accuser? If, as you say, you are innocent, all you have to do is to disprove it."

Yes, that was all he had to do, disprove that base and baseless charge. But, groundless as that accusation was, that was just what he could not do—disprove it. And now that his accuser had died, believing that awful charge well founded, to Ronald it seemed almost as if it did not matter as to the rest.

"Be thou chaste as ice, pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny."

He knew himself that he was innocent. It was too late now to convince him, whose esteem he valued most, of the truth. As for the others, let them go! So that for the remainder of the evening the company at Mrs. Skimper's found Harvey Bligh peculiarly preoccupied, and with charming generosity attributed his taciturnity to superciliousness, self-consciousness, swelled head, and other kindred causes.

When after dinner he left the house, they expressed themselves accordingly with volubility, declaring that success had spoilt him and that the room of that conceited, overrated scribbler was preferable to his company. The one exception was Miss Amaranth at the piano, who pensively reflected that there was no one to turn over her music in the absence of the one real gentleman she had ever met at Mrs. Skimper's.

And just after he had left the postman brought, with others, a letter addressed in a feminine hand to Harvey Bligh, Esq. It happened no one else was in the hall and Springle, quietly slipping it into his pocket, took it with him to his room, then rang for hot water.

"And when I say hot, Arethusa," he said sharply, "I don't mean tepid, I don't mean lukewarm, I mean H-O-T—hot!"

"Like his own temper," murmured Arethusa, descending the stairs. "He's been and paid his bill, that's what he's done; he always gives hisself these airs. What's he want shaving water twice in one evening for?"

Nevertheless, she took him up the hot water and Mr. Springle, lifting the lid, placed Harvey Bligh's letter over the steam, and, assisted by its persuasive power, unfastened the envelope. This done he read as follows:

"My Dear Ronnie,—Since seeing you this morning my brain has been in a whirl. It is late in the day for the wrong that has been done you to be repaired; still, it is never too late to mend. Give me an appointment at some quiet hour in some quiet place, and I will tell you that which will lift the shadow from your life.—Yours, Clare Armitage."

Mr. Springle, having noted its contents, reclosed the letter, descended the stairs in his coat and hat, stealthily replaced that letter in the rack, and in a moment he was whistling for a cab at the hall door.

"Why, whatever's the matter with Springle?" growled Mr. Grimmage. "Has he come into money? He was as cool as a cucumber to old Mother Skimper at dinner, and just now when I asked if he would make one at a game of whist, said he'd got an important appointment—at the Mogul, I suppose, or the Oxford, or the Royal."

Digitized by Google

"I suppose so," replied Mr. Dodgerson, who at times had strange lapses out of his deafness, "there he is whistling for a hansom," and moving to the hall door, he gently opened it a trifle ajar, then a moment later he turned to Grimmage, asking: "Did you hear where he told him to drive to?"

"Well, if you didn't," growled Grimmage, "how can you expect I did?"

"But I did," answered Dodgerson, "he told the man to drive to the House of Commons, and to drive like blazes, and it's my belief that Springle's coming into money."

Meantime Mr. Springle, almost as inflated with importance as the frog who emulated the ox, whizzed along in a hansom towards the House of Commons, and, making his way to the outer lobby, asked loftily and sufficiently audibly for all bystanders to hear, for his card to be taken immediately to Mr. Eric Geldart.

A few minutes later Mr. Springle swelled more than ever with importance when the member for Little Claverton, hastening along the corridor, greeted him with an effusive handshake and a "Hallo, old chap, how do you do? What has brought you here?"

"News," whispered Springle, "important news."

"What! Already?"

"Yes, only, Mr. Geldart, do you think there's any chance of my running up against old Scrimshaw?"

"Not the slightest: he left the House after the last division. I heard him asking one of the Whips if he'd be wanted any more."

"Ah, gone to his flat to sit up all night over those mysterious calculations he's been grinding at lately, or perhaps gone back to the City to work at 'em with Old Mystery, who seems to live in that little office over ours."

"Very possibly, very possibly," said Eric impatiently, "but, Springle, your news—your news, what have you ascertained?"

"Well, I've seen him."

"Seen whom—not my—my—the man of whom we spoke?"

"Yes, yes, your friend, Mr. Harvey Bligh. He was at our place to-night."

They went into the library, seeking a quiet corner.

"By Jove, Springle," said Eric, "you're a smart man. I knew your calibre when I asked you to take up this little business. Have you anything else to report?"

"I should think I have," said Springle. "Are all these people M.P.'s? They don't look very imposing."

"Yes, yes, but what else have you to tell me?"

"He's received a letter this very evening."

"Do you know from whom?"

"Oh, yes. By the bye, before I go you might get me into the Strangers' Gallery."

"Certainly, certainly, only about the letter, a letter from whom?"

"Why, from the very party you told me to get Varney's to shadow."

"What, from Clare Armitage?"

"That's her, only I'm not quite certain she hasn't put the wrong letter in his envelope, because she commences it: 'My dear Ronnie,'" and then Mr. Springle went on to read his note of the contents of that letter. "Why, Mr. Geldart, ain't you well?" for over Eric's face had stolen a ghastly pallor. The man he had wronged and the woman he had wronged were approaching each other, might soon be joining hands and planning their revenge and his destruction.

"Oh, it's nothing, nothing," he said, wiping the cold drops from his brow, "a little faintness, I've been rather overworked lately. Look here, Springle, you've done your work well, and I'll reward you well. There's one other item of information I want you to get me. Find out and let me know at once by telegram, telephone, anyway as quickly as possible, when and where those two are going to meet?"

Mr. Springle promised and was further honoured by being accompanied by the hon. member to the members' own buffet, and there being regaled by the hon. member with a Scotch-and-soda and a cigar, after which the hon. member, having obtained for him a seat in the Strangers' Gallery, Mr. Springle listened to a debate drearier than any at which he had ever assisted at any public-house discussion in the Metropolis.

TWENTY-SECOND CHAPTER.

The System Is Put into Force.

THE bond between Sampson Scrimshaw and Old Mystery grew closer and stronger, greatly to the mystification of the extensive clerical staff of the Cosmopolitan Trust and Exchange Limited, who were puzzled to account for the continual telephonic and speaking-tube communication between their managing director's private room and the quiet, dreary little room upstairs, the sheaves of papers covered with armies of figures, the often continual clatter up and down the staircase of messengers with cablegrams for Old Mystery, and the intermittent and protracted visits of Scrimshaw to the office upstairs, followed by, on his return, periods of bustle in the first and ground floor offices, taxing the energies of the staff, and driving Mr. Springle to the verge of distraction.

For the system was booming. Scrimshaw's scepticism with regard to it was quite broken down, and, like most sceptics when converted, he had become a bigot. But it had stood the severest tests, had been proved and as its scope of operations had expanded, so also had the success of its result.

Scrimshaw, who had regarded himself a past master of finance, freely confessed that in Old Mystery, the weird, lonely old man in the little room upstairs, he had met one to whom he was but as a little child battling with rudiments.

But only to himself he confessed it, for he was loyal to his partner in the system and to the system itself, which could not have succeeded but for the observance of that first and last condition.

And as their operations expanded, so the Stock Markets began to experience strange unaccountable waves, which at times played havoc with the ordinary routine of business.

For it was part of the principle of this complex system to buy for certain rises, to sell for certain falls, and, strangely enough, to sell for certain other falls, and to buy for certain other rises; in fact, financial juggling entered largely into the scheme.

So that it happened that every now and then the market was mystified by unexpected, undreamt-of slumps, unaccountable for by the ordinary logic of business; or now and then a boom which, according to sound calculation, never ought to have happened, staggered Capel Court, and for hours kept Throgmorton Street in a whirl.

And meantime Scrimshaw was amassing a pile that he found absolutely ponderous, garnering wealth, the weight of which oppressed him. His donations staggered the world, Brixwell blessed the hour that it elected him, and wondered how it could even for a moment have hesitated.

Nearly every issue of a Society paper recorded some princely gift or purchase by him. His yachts, his horses, his motor-cars, were the theme of awe-stricken wonderment, and even American millionaires drew in their horns at Christie, Manson, and Wood's, Sotheby's, and Quaritch's, when his agent began to bid in earnest.

Duchesses in difficulties, impecunious peers, statesmen, artists, divines, besought his counsel as to their investments, but as a rule to these supplications he was deaf and adamant.

"I don't mind buying up your charity bazaar. I'll give you a peal of bells for your church tower, a new tower for your peal of bells, a new church for your new tower, if you like, but advice is a line I don't trade in. It's an article I've never been partial to taking, that's why I'm where I am. It's always seemed to me a sort of morphia, people who have used themselves to taking it get into a way of not being able to do without it, and are generally the worse for it."

Occasionally, however, he would relax this rule and tell some struggling, almost despairing man that such and such a stock would be good to buy and hold till such and such a time, or would give a friend a warning that unless he wanted to lose his capital he had best get out of certain securities without delay, or as when he said to Jack Widdicombe :

Digitized by Google

"Look here, I'm very pleased with the way you've engineered The Meteor. I'm going to show my appreciation in a tangible shape. Now, Widdicombe, if I were to give you a cheque for a thousand pounds by way of bonus what would you say ?"

"I should say," replied Cousin Jack, "that I'd been well paid for what I've done, and while I shouldn't be fool enough to refuse it ; I should consider it an unearned increment."

"Precisely," said Scrimshaw, "and unearned increments are not to be encouraged, so I sha'n't give you that thousand pounds, Jack. But I'm going to hand you scrip of the face value of two hundred and fifty pounds in Golden Slippers Ordinary," whereupon Scrimshaw handed his trusty lieutenant two hundred shares in a mine which two months later was paying a dividend of two hundred per cent. its shares being absolutely unpurchasable for love or money.

And in another instance, when sending Phyllis Daventry upon her annual holiday he handed her with her salary a share transfer with the remark : "Now, don't sell these, my dear, but lock them up for just about three months and then you will have a little by you to make a comfortable marriage portion," which, as Phyllis with indignant blushes said to Mr. Widdicombe afterwards, was absurd, as she never meant to marry, but to be a little old maid with a tortoise-shell cat singing on the hearth, a canary singing in the window, a bright brass kettle singing on the fire.

"And you'll let me call sometimes for a cup of tea ?" said Cousin Jack, who was thinking how delightful it would be if he, too, had a canary singing in the window, a tabby or a tortoiseshell cat singing on the hearth, a bright brass kettle singing on the grate, and a bright little body singing at the piano across the room, for Cousin Jack was getting dreamy.

It is not to be imagined that Mr. Scrimshaw's gains were made without entailing other people's losses ; that is not the Market's way.

The gigantic deals, the sudden coups, the swift unloading or hauling in of a stock at this price or that, these operations that meant fortunes to Scrimshaw and Old Mystery were fraught with disaster to others, since in the Share Market, as elsewhere, omelettes are not made without breaking eggs.

Many an unfortunate broker, misled by the temporary turn the wave had taken, had unloaded his stock just too late, and as a consequence been incontinently hammered.

Well in the swim of those to whom Scrimshaw's and Old Mystery's successful coups had meant disaster were Eric Geldart and his partner Blagdon, who, thinking the time was ripe to get rich in a hurry, had plunged well out of their depth.

And so well Scrimshaw and Old Mystery kept their secret and manipulated their financial operations that though the financial world was convinced that some deep laid and subtle movement was afloat, no one in the world could identify the movers.

All kinds of rumours were abroad, connecting all kinds of public people with the mysterious influence that one day bulled a stock apparently below par to a startling premium, and perhaps the next beared another till its holders, unloading in panic, threw it on the market at any price, on which occasions Old Mystery was exceptionally busy and Scrimshaw seemed to live with his ear and mouth glued to the telephone.

Russian princes, great financial houses, a certain South African potentate, an uncertain ex-Cabinet minister, a great lady in Society, a talented actress, whose face was not her only fortune and who had a genius for figures, an eminent boat-building bacon curer—these, and a hundred others were guessed at as prime movers in the movement.

But so closely was the secret kept, that Scrimshaw's own clients, hastening to him with the above and other rumours, intrusted him with various commissions, avowedly based upon anticipation of the next move of the unknown wizards.

Eric Geldart, hastening into the offices of the Cosmopolitan Trust and Exchange Limited, mysteriously, agitatedly, almost breathlessly, said :

"Look here, Scrimshaw, I must have another slap at Westralians."

"Ah ?"

"Yes, Kenilworths will touch ten before the week's out ; Lynton and I have decided to buy for the rise."

"But Lord Lynton's account shows a very heavy balance against him ; and yours—um !"

"Yes, but, my dear fellow, this is bound to come off, I've got it straight from the stable by a side wind, that confounded mysterious syndicate is going to bull the stock for all its worth."

"Indeed ?"

"Yes, a man told me at the Duchess of Shropshire's last night ; he had it from Anastasia Amburgris—she's Prince Paul Stanislaus' friend, you know. It's right as rain."

Mr. Scrimshaw booked the transaction with an imperturbable countenance, and various others from time to time, sometimes in his office in the City, and others in the dining or smoke room of the House of Commons, with the result that ere long when Eric faced Scrimshaw he flinched.

Old Mystery and Scrimshaw sat together one night in the little office upstairs counting up their gains upon the day, upon the week, upon the month, upon the System.

"Why !" exclaimed Scrimshaw, laying down his pen with a sigh of astonishment, almost of bewilderment, "Old Mystery, this beats Monte Cristo hollow !"

"Yes," said the other, "only this is fact, the other was fiction. What do you think of the System now ?"

"I think it's only a question of time for us, by rigidly adhering to it, to garner in the wealth of all the world."

"Given time it would be bound to, but for other things—the revolutions and the riots that would be born of the panics it would cause, even practised upon our narrow scale."

"Narrow scale !" exclaimed the other, looking at the row of eight figures representing his share of the net gain. But Old Mystery went on thoughtfully :

"Yes, narrow scale ; for supposing we had begun where we are leaving off, not a house in Europe but must have gone, scarcely a throne or state whose credit would not have been shaken. Only last week Paris was mad with panic, laying it all at the door of the Jews and Dreyfusards."

"It's playing the dickens with a lot of people," said Scrimshaw sententiously ; "a lot of my clients, little guessing I've been working the oracle, have been telling me the croppers they've come. There's old Viscount Lynton in despair."

"Why, he ought to be jubilant, the Pneumatic Intacto has boomed like a Yankee show."

"True, but my lord couldn't afford to wait. His one pound shares went up to three, and he got smitten with some wild-cat scheme young Geldart and that jelly-bag of a partner of his were keen upon."

"Jelly-bag is good !" grunted Old Mystery.

"Geldart brought the thing along to me ; but I didn't see it, it clashed with a concern of my own, though I didn't tell him so, and I was bound to strangle it, which I did, though no one guessed I had a hand in it."

"So all the money Lynton made with you he dropped in the other affair ?"

"Yes, and a bit more, and now he's tearing his hair and vowing that one thing only can save him from bankruptcy."

"And that is ?" the other asked, with a quick gleam in the eyes sunk like caverns beneath his bushy brows.

"His daughter consenting to bar the entail and bringing her own money to the rescue."

"And she ?"

"She's willing enough, but it's a question whether it can be done, whether the dead hand doesn't grip the estates too tight ; they are the points the lawyers are considering."

"Aha !" Old Mystery chuckled, "the dead hand grips hard sometimes."

"Yes," said the other, "I've another case in point ; there's that fellow Geldart, he's got bitten, too, and it makes my flesh

(Continued on page 446.)

Digitized by Google

ALFOSCO REG.

Call or Write.

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Call or Write.

ALFOSCO REG.

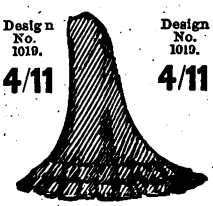
BUY DIRECT AT FIRST COST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

Design No. 1240. 10/6

Design No. 1240. 10/6.

The Famous Half-Guinea Jacket of the Season, by far and away the best value ever off-red. 30 inches long, full sac, single-breasted. Made in Black Vicuna, Grey Frieze, or in a smart Grey Tweed with narrow stripe. Collarless style with stole ends and two shoulder capes, trimmed good ornaments and tailor-stitching. Price only 10/6; carriage paid, 6d. extra. A Bargain. Satisfaction guaranteed. This Jacket, 33 inches long, will be 11/6; 36 inches long, 13/6; or 39 inches long, 14/6. All sizes in stock. Send bust measurement and length required. Money refunded if goods not approved.

Design No. 1019. 4/11



Design No. 1019. 4/11

Design No. 1019. 4/11.

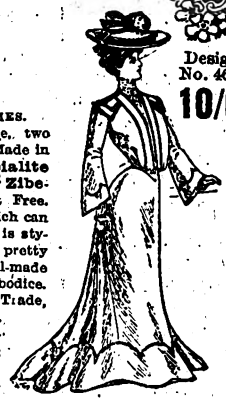
Costume Skirt in good wearing Black and Navy Serge, trimmed two flounces and braid, lined throughout linenette. Price only 4/11; carriage, 5d. In ordering, give length of Skirt in front, and size of waist. Post orders receive prompt attention.

Ever Lady should see Allen Foster & Co.'s new Illustrated Catalogue of Skirts, Blouses, Corsets, Underskirts, &c., sent Post Free.

Design No. 461. 10/6

LATEST STYLE IN COSTUMES.

Fashionable collarless bodice, two shoulder capes, bell sleeves. Made in ALLEN FOSTER & CO.'S Specialite Serge, Venetian Cloth, or Zibeline Cloth. Patterns Post Free. Bodice has pouched front, which can be worn open or closed, and is stylishly trimmed with very pretty Galon trimming. Full, well-made Skirt also trimmed to match bodice. The cheapest Costume in the Trade, unrivalled all the world over. Price complete, 10/6; carriage, 6d. Skirt alone, 5/11; carriage, 5d.



Design No. 461. 10/6

VALUE FOR MONEY.

Send Postcard for Patterns and New Sketch Book of Winter Fashions in Ladies' Costumes and Jackets. Free on application. Call or write.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.,

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,

47 GOLDEN LANE, BARBICAN, LONDON, E.C.

J. G. GRAVES' COSTUMES

J. G. GRAVES' Handsome Fashion Book of Mantles and Costumes is sent Post Free, and fully illustrates the present Season's Designs. All Garments are sent subject to approval, and accounts may be paid by Easy Monthly Instalments, or Important Advantages to Cash Customers.

ASK FOR CATALOGUE No. 4.

J. G. GRAVES, Division St., Sheffield.

MEDICAL OPINIONS ON DEAFNESS

A medical discussion of great interest to deaf people is given in the last issue of the REVIEW OF EAR, NOSE, AND THROAT DISEASES. Anyone whose hearing is failing should send for a free copy of this Medical Journal. Address all communications to The Editor, 10 Marble Arch, London, W.

THE DAILY EXPRESS

1D. 1/2

TO CURE SICK HEADACHE.

Sick headache means an overtaxed stomach and a derangement of the digestive organs.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

have proved themselves a boon for removing that distressed feeling and discomfort. A dose will remove the immediate cause, and if repeated for a few days will enable your system to work normally.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

Digitized by Google

creep to hear him reviling his dead father for tying up the money so that he couldn't deal with it in a heap."

"And lose it in a heap," chuckled the other.

"Exactly so," Scrimshaw went on, "only it's a bit off after hearing his Nibs distributing prizes and hammering the Fifth Commandment into the Mutual Improvement young men and young women, and his smug references to his ever-lamented father. Yes! and the very tablet he rigged up where the worthy old man's lying, to hear him going for his thick-headed stupidity and crassness. Well, good-night, Old Mystery, I must be off to the House," and Scrimshaw, looking at his watch, hurried to the door.

On opening it suddenly he exclaimed:

"What the dickens are you prowling about here for?"

"I just came up to ask if you wanted me to wait any longer, sir," stuttered Mr. Springle, shambling there on the landing.

"I never told you to wait."

"No, but I thought you might want me, sir."

"You thought! If I thought for certain what I'm almost thinking I'd kick you down those stairs. Mark me, let me catch you prying into my concerns, listening to my conversations, or playing the spy, I'll make you wish you'd never been born. You thought I might want you; nobody in the world wants a thing like you; you're only fit to wear a stand-up collar and to talk skittles to a barmaid across a counter."

"If that's so, perhaps, sir, I'd better look out for something else," said Springle, trying to be brave.

"Just as you like," said the other, fixing him steadily with a gaze before which Springle squirmed, "only before you go remember I'm going to check your petty cash account myself. Now go downstairs, don't let me catch you loitering near this door again."

Springle, white and trembling, obeyed. And Old Mystery, who had hastened to the door, asked: "What does that mean?"

"That some of the petty cash has stuck to his fingers, that's about the size of it," said Scrimshaw.

"Then I should get rid of him," said the other; "there's not much use in a thief."

"I don't know; sometimes they are useful, as for instance when we set one—to catch one."

"Ah!"

"And this fellow is useful in many ways. I know he carries what he thinks are secrets to various of my high-minded clients, who think any trick or dodge is fair against the 'bucket-shop keeper,' and so I take care to myself select the information that is going to leak. When a man plays me false, Old Mystery, I leave no stone unturned to crush him underneath my heel. Good night."

"Good night," Old Mystery replied, and returning to his little office he sat there alone in the silence of the City after hours, intensified rather than broken by the scratching of his pen, the ticking of the clock, the creaking of doors and timbers and the other sounds that seem born of stillness. And he too added up the figures of his gains.

"Just as I always told them!" he soliloquised, "and they believed I was dreaming, mocked and scoffed at me. No doubt, now, deeming me dead and gone they still scoff at what they deemed the excrescence of my disordered brain. How well it happened, after all! They say all's for the best!

"It was a near thing to the horror of all horrors, only a chance that when I woke up I didn't wake to find all dark with tons above me, walled in by wood and hemmed in on every side by bricks and earth, to that and swift suffocation. But as it all turned out I woke in time to learn that those I had believed false were true, that those whom I had believed faithful were false.

"And now haven't I carried it far enough? I've made enough in this second spell of mine to render what I left them to wrangle for, to lie for, to thieve for, a flea-bite. I've proved the System, the system that I dreamt about and worked out all through the old life, I've carried out in the second. Now I am hungering to go back to the first; I want to go back to my boys; I'm hungering to forgive the one and to ask forgiveness of the other."

TWENTY-THIRD CHAPTER.

Ronald Learns the Truth.

With a beating heart, Clare Armitage set forth that night to meet Ronald Geldart and make a clean breast of the story of the wrong she and his brother had wrought him, to lay bare the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth; for in her hand she held his letter answering hers:

"Meet me to-morrow night at ten outside the Sloane Museum in Lincoln's Inn Fields. Ronald."

What was it, that vague chill that seemed to strike her like an icy wind, when standing before her glass she fixed on her hat and cloak. What was it that the wind without seemed moaning to the trees? "Don't go! don't go!"

She went out in the busy street, let herself out at the door—the latch had slipped and for a while stayed fixed and sodden as though its will was that she should not go. Out in the streets she hailed an omnibus, the driver took no heed and the conductor shook his head.

"Full up, miss!"

Impatient and annoyed she signalled to a cab that rattled past.

"Got a fare, miss!" he shouted cheerfully.

She walked on; a drab mist was gathering, a bleak east wind was blowing, bearing on its cutting breath an icy sleet that beat her veil against her face, as though to bid her not to go and drive her back! A clock chimed out the hour. Half-past nine and as its clang fell on her ears it seemed to say: "You are too late, go back—too late to go, not too late to turn back, turn back in time!"

But she would go on, she was going to do right, she said, not for the sake of doing right, but of getting quits with one who had done wrong. Not because he had done wrong to him she was going to right, but because he had wronged her, had not kept faith even in wrong doing.

A little child approached her, she had lost her way. Would she help her to find it? The way lay behind and the little child's imploring voice whimpered: "Lady, take me back!" But no, no, she had no time, she pointed the way back to the child, then on she went.

A black cat stalked across her path, almost beneath her feet, so that she almost stumbled over it, and, startled by her cry, it turned and, arching its back, blazed its yellow eyes and spat at her.

Round a sharp bend in the street four men crossed her path, and she, halting, with an icier chill than ever at her heart, saw they carried something on their shoulders, and the covered shell, whether empty or not, seemed to whisper to her: "Don't go—don't go!"

But on—on she went, though life and death both seemed to whisper warning. Shutting her eyes and ears to the reiterated unfavourable omen on she went.

In the Hampstead Road she succeeded in securing a cab at last. Reaching Tottenham Court Road, however, the driver turned to the right, despite her expostulation, and presently the cab's violent eccentric motion, the horse's affrighted behaviour, and the spasmodic jerking of the reins and frequent slashings of the whip, told all too plainly the condition of the driver.

Clare made every effort to prevail upon the man to stop, or, failing that, to attract the attention of passers-by and police.

Presently there came a succession of excited warning shouts, a thudding crash, and Clare was whirled from one corner of the cab to the other, back against the window, expecting any moment to be overturned.

Springing up with the aid of a constable, she scrambled out of the swaying cab, while a number of men secured the head of the prostrate, plunging horse, and another constable, dragging the driver from his seat, took him into custody, exclaiming: "You drunken ruffian, you might have killed that lady!" and Clare, with a shudder, thought of the omens that had met her on the way.

(Another long instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

"I really must use Vi-Cocoa."

Thousands of men and women, after reading the particulars published respecting the merits of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa, have been induced to become regular drinkers of this popular food beverage. But many have said to themselves, "I really must use Vi-Cocoa," and have failed to do so. Why? There is no more agreeable and inexpensive cocoa on the market. A 6d. packet or a 9d. or 1s. 6d. tin is value indeed, for Vi-Cocoa does all that it is claimed to do, and there is no so-called concentrated or foreign cocoa in the world to equal it. It is highly nutritious, imparts stamina to the system, is refreshing to the weary brain-worker, and recuperates the body after physical fatigue.

HYPNOTISM

Learn at home. Startle your friends. Also strong personal magnetic influence. Wonderful nerve power. Scientific. Great advantage. Illustrated book sent free. Published by Psychic Research Co. (Dept. 437), Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, E.C. (1d. stamp).

TRIUMPH Cycles

£10 10 to £19 19

or by Deferred Payment System.

"The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce."

CATALOGUES GRATIS.

TRIUMPH CYCLE CO. Ltd., COVENTRY.

4 and 5, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

30 Deansgate Arcade Manchester. 4 King Edward St. Leeds

PRUDENTIAL GIGANTIC BALE

49/6

BEDDING & DRAPERY

6/- DEPOSIT 1/6 WEEKLY

This Bale contains Pair Full-sized heavy Whitney Blankets, 1 quilt, red and white, blue and white; White Honeycomb Marcella or Red Twill your choice; Pair Full-size White Twill Sheets, 2 Pillow Cases, 1 Bolster Case, 5 Toilet Mats, 1 Toilet Cover, 2 Turkish Towels, Pair Fine Lace Curtains, 1 White Table Cloth, 1 Fringed Damask Table Cover, 6 Dusters, 2 Tea Cloths—28 Articles 49/6. How to pay. Send 6/- only, we send Bale, carriage paid for approval; balance can be paid in six monthly payments of 6/-, and one of 7/6. If you pay balance on receipt, send only 38/6, saving 5/-. Address below.

55 ARTICLES FOR 25/- ON CREDIT.

Our Gigantic Parcel contains 6 Table Knives and Forks, 6 Dessert Knives and Forks, 12 Tea Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 1 pair Sugar Tongs, 2 Table Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, and 2 Salt Spoons. We send, carriage paid, on receipt of 3s.; balance 1s. weekly.

PRUDENTIAL FURNISHING STORES, 150-150L Seven Sisters Rd., Holloway, N.

Page Woodcock's WIND Pills

60 years' British reputation has proved to be the safe, sure, and speedy remedy for Wind on the Stomach.

PAGE WOODCOCK'S (WIND) PILLS

Indigestion. Biliousness.
Sick Headache Palpitation.
Depression. Nervousness.
Languor, &c.

Sold by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ and 2/9.

SMITH'S

An admirable Food of the

EPPS'S

Finest quality and flavour.

COCOA

Nutritious and Economical.

Free. Free. Crystal Gazing

The coming craze. Said to have wonderful visionary powers of divining or guessing the present doings of absent friends, &c. Send postcard for full particulars to G. MAROC, 15 Goswell Road, London.

PINK'S MARMALADE IS PURE.

TRY IT.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 57 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ross Hill, Torver, Comiston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

YOUR FUTURE IS KNOWN.

For 1s. Mr. WILDE will send a Reading of the Stars W. T. STEAD, Esq., and many other prominent gentlemen have testified to the accuracy of their forecasts. All that is required is that you send the exact or approximate hour of your birth, date, year, &c., together with P.O. 1s. and stamped addressed envelope. Satisfaction will be guaranteed.

THE RESULT WILL ASTONISH YOU.

SEND TO-DAY TO (DEPT. S.S.)

GEO. WILDE, 143 High Holborn, London, W.C.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Stores, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Familiar Flirt.

"I FELL really in love a week or two ago," writes "GERTY," "and thought the young man returned my feeling. We met at a friend's house, and he paid me marked attention. He called several times and took me out. Then he suddenly told me he was going abroad. He did not even say where he was going. He parted quite suddenly, left no address, and did not promise to write. Can you explain this?"

* * * * *

I fear this is a favourite habit with many men. They really like the society of a girl, and are prepared to trifle with her affections so long as it suits them. Then they suddenly break the connection. Why? Well, in many cases because it is impossible for them to go further. Sometimes these men are actually married or engaged. At other times they are just unscrupulous flirts, who like a girl for the moment, but no longer. I am sorry for you, "GERTY," as you are one of too many girls who have been similarly treated by "charming" men.

A Wife Who Is Too Tidy.

"I AM very fond indeed of my husband," writes "LENA," "but he is a very careless man. What do you think? On muddy days he very often comes into the drawing-room without first changing his boots. Then he sometimes sits down on my new chairs or sofa in a dusty coat in which he has been cycling. After he has gone out I have to spend ever so long with the carpet-sweeper and duster before the room is neat and tidy again. What do you advise me to do? I do not want to 'blow him up,' as he is rather quick-tempered."

* * * * *

"LENA" is, of course, quite right in one way. A man certainly ought to cultivate neat habits for drawing-room use, and not enter with muddy boots or dusty clothes. But I rather sympathise with the poor fellow myself for having such a very neat and precise little wife. After all, a man's home should be home to him, and when he is there, he should not be always on his "company" manners. A man does not want to be always changing his coats and boots before sitting down in one of his own rooms. My advice to "LENA" is that she should be a little more human. A chair is meant to be sat on, not as an ornament. Supposing your husband did omit to change his cycling coat? The amount of dust left on the chair cannot be enough to seriously injure it. As to the muddy boots question, see that he wipes them properly on coming in. If he is a very busy man who cannot always be changing clothes, I suggest that you should use one room as a "den" for his own use, and another for purely drawing-room purposes. Men, as a rule, hate drawing-rooms, and if there is anywhere else to go, very seldom wish to sit in them. Just think over my advice, "LENA," and see if you cannot take it.

Cousins' Love.

"I AM very much in love with a girl cousin," writes "D. F." "Is it right for me to tell her this, as she is a relation, or is it wrong for a man to marry his cousin?"

* * * * *

Love between relations is not necessarily wrong. Cousins are, as a matter of fact, very often the best friends. But I do not advise a proposal. As a general rule, such marriages are not to be encouraged, though they may, under some circumstances be very happy. I advise you not to say a word for at least a year, when you will know whether or not your cousin is the girl who is necessary for your future happiness.

Sea Side Airs.

"THE girl I am engaged to," writes "FREDERICK," "has just come back from her holidays. Her manner towards me has altered very much. She seems superior, and, to put it plainly, 'puts on side.' They were staying—she and her people—at a smart boarding-house."

* * * * *

Very likely the "side" will not last. The girl has been probably living a little above her ordinary social life for a few weeks, and it has turned her head. When the dark days come on, and she again settles down to humdrum life, she will soon become her old self again. Meanwhile, just be fairly independent yourself, and do not let her think she can snub you as she pleases.

How to Start Courtship.

"IGNORANT" writes: "I have been seeing a young lady home from chapel lately, and now want to start courting in earnest. How should I let her know my intentions? Must I gain her father's consent? It will have to be a long courtship, so I want to know when I should pop the question?"

* * * * *

Don't be in too much of a hurry about the "question." Go on seeing the girl home from chapel, and if you are really fond of her, you will soon find yourself telling her so without wanting to know how to go about it. When you get on more intimate terms, ask her if she feels she could love you as more than a friend. If she agrees, then ask her father's consent to pay her attentions, telling him your prospects, and when you would be in a position to marry.

A Captious Yankee Girl.

"I VERY much admired an American girl I met recently," writes "GUS," "but I cannot quite understand her. She seems to expect a man to be eternally at her beck and call, never thinking of moving herself. She very often says the most biting things to me, should I make a slight blunder in conversation, or fail to turn a remark into a compliment. Can you advise me how to proceed with such a girl?"

* * * * *

You have evidently hit on a "real American girl," from your description. Over in the States, a woman is looked on as an object of worship by most men, and girls are quite used to the kind of treatment your friend seems to demand from you. It is just an international difference, that is all. In Britain men, nowadays, are far more independent, and often selfish, than their American cousins. As to your own case, I certainly do not advise you to become a creature of this fair American. It may be customary in her own country to regard men as glorified light porters, but if I were you, I should politely show her that it is not the view taken in our own land. Be as attentive to her as you would be to the most charming British lady, but not one whit more, and in time she will get to see that the position of the stern sex is not quite the same as in her own country.

Cynthia.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Ready October 10th, 1903.

THE ENTIRELY NEW SERIES OF

THE LONDON READER

An Illustrated Magazine of Fiction.
(Under the management of T.P.'s WEEKLY.)

The first number of the NEW SERIES will contain, amongst other interesting features, the Opening Chapters of

TWO EXCITING NEW SERIAL STORIES:

"LINKED BY FATE,"

By CHARLES GARVICE, author of "A Silent Witness," &c.
Illustrated by M. Fitzgerald,
AND

"MARGARET DENT,"

By EFFIE ROWLANDS, author of "Margery Daw," &c.
Illustrated by Brinsley Le Fanu.

ALSO THE FIRST INSTALMENT OF HUGH CONWAY'S FAMOUS STORY:

"CALLED BACK,"

(Now First Published in Serial Form.)
Illustrated by A. D. MacCormick.

The feature of The London Reader will be FIRST-RATE FICTION

ON SALE EVERYWHERE ON TUESDAY.

GENERAL OFFICES: MOWBRAY HOUSE, NORFOLK ST., W.C.

THE LONDON READER

THE PAPER A BOY CAN TAKE HOME.

No 4. of THE BOYS' LEADER, Pearson's latest success, is now on sale. Better than ever. It contains instalments of each from the pen of a well-known and accredited author, including that of Jules Verne.

FIVE SPLENDID SERIAL STORIES,

"THE STOLEN FOOTBALL TEAM."

A Capital Complete Story by DONOVAN MART.

"A HUNDRED MILE COAST."

Telling how LORD ERNEST HAMILTON coasted 100 miles down a mountain-side in a handcar. Written by Himself.

"THE ADVENTURES OF SUNNY JIM AND DISMAL DAVID,"
By the Inimitable YORICK.

And many other grand unique features of exceptional interest.

A COMPLETE HALFPENNY PAPER GIVEN AWAY EACH WEEK.

THE BOYS' GREAT PENNY MAGAZINE.

"No Better Food."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa

"Strongest and Best."
—Health.

TRY ALSO FRY'S MALTED COCOA

A Combination of Fry's Pure Cocoa and Allen and Hanburys' Extract of Malt.

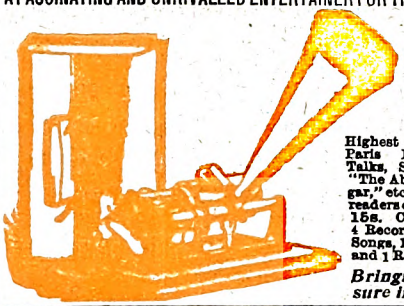
Strongly recommended by the "LANCET" and "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL."

Digitized by Google

"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."

CAMPBELL'S GRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.

A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.



CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation.

Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.

CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS

With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories

Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, „ 10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, „ 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, „ 16/6

Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount

Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1901-2, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—

CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW.

Established 80 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

MATCH "MATCHLESS"

YOU COULDN'T

There's no METAL POLISH equals it.

GUARANTEED FREE FROM ACID.
PRODUCES QUICKLY A LASTING BRILLIANCY.

MANUFACTURERS:
THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH CO., LIVERPOOL.

73,368 PAIRS

REPRESENTS THE INCREASE IN THE SALE OF

"OCEANIC" BOOTS

DURING THE LAST SIX MONTHS.

Half-a-Guinea Everywhere

TRY THEM!

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 771.] Week ending October 10, 1903. [Price One Penny.

Reflected in the glass, I saw the door of my room open. A man entered with a stealthy, cat-like tread—in his hand a pistol, cocked and loaded.

(A Dramatic Incident from the Story, "The Mystery of Enid Bouce." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

Kaputine is not a single dangerous drug, such as has been condemned by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The medical paper "Health," recommends

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache,

Toothache & Neuralgia.

Cures in Ten Minutes.

Safely, surely and without bad after effects.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1; Samples 1d. each

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free. Kindly mention this paper.

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

"Cause and Effect"

"When I started business, single handed, sixteen years ago, I realised that a satisfied customer was my best advertisement. To-day I head one of the Largest Business Enterprises in the World, employing nearly 3,000 people in my Offices, Warehouses, and Works in Sheffield. Every article which leaves my Warehouses is sent out on the distinct understanding that, if when received it is not perfectly satisfactory, it must be returned to me. I consider this arrangement a happy combination of Free Trade and Protection."

"I PROVIDE EVERYTHING."

If the goods are perfectly satisfactory you can pay for them as you prefer: Cash or by Easy Monthly Instalments, full particulars of which are enclosed with each Catalogue, together with Order Forms and details of important advantages offered to Cash Purchasers."

Each Departmental Catalogue sent Post Free on application.

MENTION NUMBER OF CATALOGUE REQUIRED.

1. Watches. All my well-known Watch Specialities fully illustrated and described. Our Watch Department is the Largest Watch-Sales Concern in the World.
2. Tools and Machinery. Thousands of illustrations. Every known Tool and Machine is supplied on Easy Terms of Payment.
3. Furniture. Every furnishing requirement is illustrated. My System of Furnishing by Easy Instalments is fully explained.
4. Mantles & Costumes. A beautiful Album of the Fashions of the Season.
5. Gent's Tailoring. This Stylish Department is splendidly equipped, and is probably the Largest Clothing Business in Great Britain.
6. Boots and Shoes. Beautifully illustrated. A Splendid Choice of the Newest Ideas in Foot Wear. Contractors to His Majesty's Government.
7. Bookselling Department. Catalogue describes a vast assortment of Standard and Current Literature.
8. Sheffield Cutlery and Plate. The produce of my own Factories illustrated and fully described. Hotel and Shipping Orders a Speciality.
9. Glass, China, Lamps and Stoves. Dinner and Tea Services, Toilet and Bedroom Ware, Lamps, Stoves, etc.
10. Clocks. Every known style and make supplied on Easy Terms of Payment.
11. General Draperies, etc. Dress Goods, Blankets, Sheets, Furs, Ladies' Outfitting, Babies' and Children's Clothing, etc.
12. Gold Jewellery and Diamonds. Engagement and Wedding Rings, Bracelets, Brooches, and all kinds of Gold Ornaments, fully illustrated and described.
13. General Fancy Goods. Bags, Umbrellas, Albums, every kind of Leather Goods for Wedding Presents and Home Use.
14. Cameras and Optical Goods. Hundreds of Designs by the most reliable makers.
15. Bicycles and Domestic Machinery. Cycles of all kinds, Mail Carts, Perambulators, Washing and Wringing Machines, Sewing and Knitting Machines, Knife Cleaning Machines, etc.
16. Musical Department. Pianos, Organs, and every known Musical Instrument supplied on Easy Payment Terms.
17. Army and Navy. A Catalogue representing all kinds of Goods required by all grades of the Services.
18. Colonial Department. A comprehensive Illustrated Book which deals with the requirements of customers abroad, and quotes Special Cash Discount for Shipping Orders.

Agents Wanted in Spare Time. Liberal Commission. Persons in regular employment should write for terms and particulars.

J. G. Graves 69 Division Street, SHEFFIELD.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 771.] Week Ending October 10th, 1903. [One Penny

The Mystery of Enid Boyce.

A Tale of a Lost Father.

Containing the Incident Depicted on the Cover.

I SUPPOSE there never was a girl more lonely than I was on the day when I stood before the altar, and took Fabian Chambers as my husband, for better, for worse, for richer, for poorer, till death should part us!

I was an orphan, with, as far as I knew, not a single relation in the whole, wide world, and although Fabian's family had been civil to me as his promised wife, their civility was of a distant and formal kind. They did not take me into their hearts or lives; they never allowed me to feel one of themselves; I was outside the charmed circle inside which dwelt all the Chambers clan!

Perhaps their attitude of mind was not surprising, when it is remembered that Fabian met me (picked me up—his mother said, I believe) at the house of some people to whose child I was governess; when it is further recollected that my whole worldly wealth consisted of twenty pounds a year left me by my mother, and when it has still further to be told that I was able to tell Mrs. Chambers nothing whatever about my family or belongings—good, bad, or indifferent. To all my future mother-in-law's probing questions I could only give the same answer:

"I do not know," and it was literally true. I knew that my name was Enid Boyce; I knew that I had lived with my mother in the pokiest, dreariest of lodgings until her death, and that she had saved and scraped and pinched—first to give me a decent education, then to leave me a tiny sum that I might not be utterly penniless. About my father I could give no information whatever. My mother never spoke of him. She merely told me that I had lost him when I was a baby, and that he had left her in terribly straitened circumstances. I had often thought it odd that we seemed to possess no portrait of him; but after my mother's death I found amongst her papers, a miniature which bore underneath it the words "Robert Boyce"—my father's name; and this I treasured greatly, marvelling much that my mother had spoken so little of the singularly handsome man whose gay, reckless eyes met mine out of the picture, making up my mind finally that her great love, and her great grief, rendered speech about her lost husband impossible, even to me—their child.

Before I married Fabian, Mr. and Mrs. Chambers made, I believe, every possible effort to discover some particulars about my family—but their efforts were unavailing, and as Fabian loved me for myself, and not for my family, he insisted upon marrying me in face of the stern disapproval of his own people.

Thus it came about, as I say, that I was a very, very lonely girl on my wedding day; married from lodgings, dressed by a sympathetic landlady, and given away by the doctor who had attended my mother, and who was kind and friendly, though he only became our friend during my mother's last illness.

It had been arranged that we should drive straight from the church to the station, whither I had dispatched my modest luggage on the previous day; and my new relations saw us off from the church steps, their frigid courtesies striking a chill to my heart, after the emotion and strain of the great service in which I had just taken part.

Mr. Chambers made one or two commonplace remarks to me, whilst his wife drew Fabian aside to bid him farewell. Were my ears more quickened than usual that day, or did she purposely raise her voice? I only know that I heard her say, in tones pregnant with meaning:

"Remember, Fabian, what's bred in the bone comes out in the flesh. You have given no heed to our warning, you have taken your own way, but I insist on speaking now."

I fancy Fabian tried to stay her flow of eloquence, but she continued without heeding his protest:

"You have married a girl of whom we know nothing, less than nothing, except that she is pretty! She is your wife now; I will say nothing against her, I intend to be civil to her, but—remember—we are in utter ignorance of her antecedents, and they may be of the very worst. I only advise you, Fabian, to watch over her carefully, to check evil tendencies,

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

and to guard her from all associates who can harm her. She is young and easily moulded. I warn——"

"Thank you, mother," Fabian's voice at last managed to interrupt her torrent of words, "I am perfectly satisfied with Enid—as she is, I don't care a straw about her parents; I beg that in future you will remember you are speaking of my wife, when you mention her name."

At that, he came down the steps that separated us, drew my hand under his arm, said softly:

"Come, my darling," and led me away to the carriage, amongst whose cushions I sank back, stifling a choking sob.

"I will try to make you a good wife," I gasped out, when he drew me into his arms, heedless of gaping passers-by, "I wish I could tell you all about my father—my mother was the dearest, sweetest soul on earth! My father died so long ago—surely——"

I broke off with a sob, and Fabian soothed me tenderly, murmuring some remarks about his own mother which were neither filial nor complimentary.

"Never mind, my sweet," he went on presently. "I am entirely independent of my people—as you know—thanks to my dear old godfather. You and I will be as happy as the day is long in our country home—and by and bye my people will understand that my wife's beautiful face is only an index to her beautiful soul!"

In this way my husband comforted me, and surely never was there so blissful a honeymoon as the one we spent in dawdling through Switzerland and Italy, coming back in the early autumn to Fabian's lovely house in Surrey, left to him by an old godfather, with a sum of money which, to my unsophisticated ears, sounded like the fortune of a millionaire.

I had never in my life known such luxury as Fabian loved to heap upon me. The lodgings of my childhood, the uncomfortable rooms of my governess life made me appreciate the charm and comfort of the exquisitely furnished and appointed house of which I was now mistress.

Whilst as for the garden! I—a cockney born and bred—simply revelled in the garden, and in the gorgeous expanse of moorland surrounding it. We were in a somewhat lonely neighbourhood, the next house to ours being a mile or so away, and surrounded by its own park, and the village was two miles distant. But I loved the loneliness, the peace, the restful silence of the country, and Fabian and I were blissfully happy with our books and music indoors; our walks and drives; our gardening and sketching without. We had a certain amount of gaiety as well. Fabian, rich and attractive, was popular in the country-side, and we were invited to many dinner parties and receptions which I enjoyed with all the zest of youth, and with the knowledge that I was fair to see and pleasant to talk to!

Fabian loaded me with gifts; my toilettes were admired, and, I think, envied by the ladies of the neighbourhood, whose husbands were less generous than mine, and my jewels were talked of with awe, and were indeed superb. Fabian had a most ingenious safe built into the wall of his dressing-room for them, lest, as he said, "the wily burglar" should hear of their fame and come to look for them!

One evening in early November, a few months after our wedding, we had been dining at the house of our nearest neighbours—the Lynn Davis's—and as I was tired I had come home early, leaving my husband to enjoy a game of billiards with our host. I went straight to my bedroom, and having taken off my satin gown, dismissed my maid, whose eyes showed that she was worn out, and began to prepare myself for bed.

My jewels I always put away myself, for by Fabian's express wish, not a soul in the establishment (excepting our two selves) knew of the existence of the safe in his dressing-room, and until my maid had left me I always laid my rings and other trinkets in a casket on my dressing-table—conveying them to their permanent quarters when I was alone.

On this night I proceeded leisurely to unclasp my pearl necklace and lay it in the casket, where I had already placed the magnificent rings, which were Fabian's latest gift, and then lifted my hand to draw from my hair the sparkling diamond combs which shone like stars against my dark tresses.

As I stood thus, my hand uplifted, my lips idly humming the latest waltz tune, my eyes absently fixed on my own reflection in the glass before me, I suddenly saw a sight which so paralysed me with horror, that I remained motionless, transfixed—my hand still clutching the comb in my hair, my face growing white and terror-stricken before my very eyes.

Reflected over my shoulder in the glass, I saw the door of my room—which was behind me, slowly, slowly open. I saw a form enter with a cat-like, stealthy tread, which was in itself unutterably terrifying, and finally I saw the dim form resolve itself into that of a tall man in evening dress, holding in his hand a fully-loaded pistol, which was directed towards the back of my head.

"Utter a single sound and I fire," said a low voice, which was a perfectly superfluous command, for I could no more have spoken than I could have flown out of my barred and shuttered window, so frozen was I with deadly fear.

I simply stood where I was, watching with fascinated stare, whilst the intruder shut and locked my door behind him, and then crept across the room towards me, his hateful little pistol always pointing straight at me. His face was as sinister and evil a one as I have ever seen, the face of a man between fifty and sixty, who has lived a wicked and a hard life, but the face nevertheless of a gentleman! And he was clad in irreproachable evening dress.

All this I took in as he advanced towards me, but when he had come close to me, when he was able to catch his first glimpse of my white, terrified face in the glass, of my wide, frightened eyes and quivering lips, a most extraordinary change passed over his own countenance. The pistol he held dropped from hands grown suddenly nerveless, an awful terror looked out of his deeply sunken eyes, his lined cheeks grew ashen white, his jaw dropped, his lips fell apart in a perfectly ghastly fashion. All at once he stretched out two feeble, shaking arms towards me, crying out in the voice of an old, old man:

"Enid—my wife—my wife!" and sank a crumpled, huddled heap at my feet.

Dazed, terrified, bewildered, I shrank away from his unconscious form, my eyes gazing at him with a horror and amazement too deep for words, when a step behind me made me start violently round, to find myself face to face with my husband, who had entered by the dressing-room door.

His face was set and stern, as I had never before seen it; his mouth was closed firmly in a straight, severe line; his eyes looked at me hardly and coldly, as though I had committed some crime.

Digitized by Google

"Fabian, oh, Fabian!" I cried pitifully, tottering towards him. "I have been so frightened—help me—that man——"

"That man, your husband!" was Fabian's amazing answer, as he drew himself away from the touch of my clinging hands. "I happen to have heard his remark before he fell at your feet. 'Enid—my wife—my wife!' So this was the reason of your great fatigue at the Lynn Davis's—this was why——"

"Fabian! Fabian!" I almost screamed, aghast at the awful things he was saying, at the terrible fabric he was building up out of what seemed to me such slight materials.

"What are you saying, dear? I am so frightened!" And again I shuddered nearer to him. "This man came in and threatened to shoot me; then he suddenly called out—what—what you heard, and fell—like that." I glanced at the inanimate form, and shivered from head to foot.

"Why did your husband wish to shoot you?" Fabian asked, with hideous emphasis on those two words.

"He is not my husband," I cried. "I never saw him in my life, I do not know who he is. I thought he came to rob me—I never saw him in my life."

My voice faltered under my husband's stern, searching gaze, he mistook the reason of its trembling.

"Your own shaking voice betrays you," he said shortly, "we will not discuss the question now. That man must be attended to." And, paying not the slightest further attention to me, Fabian dragged the unconscious stranger on to a couch at the foot of the bed, and proceeded to try to restore him to a sense of his surroundings. After what seemed to me an interminable time, a sort of long shiver ran through the man's frame, and he opened his eyes. They fell first on me, standing at the foot of the couch, and with a gesture either of fear or repulsion, he half-raised himself on his elbow, and waved his hand wildly towards me, saying in a thick, husky voice:

"Enid—my wife! Do not—do not ——"

Then, with a horrible rolling of his eyes, and a dreadful contortion of his face, he sank back amongst the cushions again, in total unconsciousness.

How the weary hours of that night dragged by I do not know. They seemed as though they would never end, as I sat in my dressing-gown, watching Fabian's efforts to revive the stranger, forced to listen to the stern, cold words he now and again spoke to me, carrying out the short commands he occasionally gave me.

The unconscious man roused up more than once, but only to babble deliriously and unintelligibly, and when morning dawned Fabian sent one of the grooms to summon the nearest doctor, and, meanwhile, transferred the stranger to the bed in his dressing-room.

"For the sake of your reputation and my name," he said to me, "I shall tell everyone that this man is a relation of yours, whom I brought back with me from the Davis' last night; and that he fell ill after we reached here. You still decline to tell me his name?" and Fabian's eyes, cold and stern, scrutinised my face searchingly.

"I do not know his name," I said. "Fabian—believe me—please believe me, I never saw the man till he broke into my room last night. I have never deceived you—never, never!"

He laughed, a sarcastic laugh. "My mother was a wise woman," he answered. "She gave me a warning. I disregarded it. I trusted you." (Oh, the biting scorn he threw into that word). "You have given me the reward I doubtless deserved. When your husband is able to speak, no doubt he will be more ready to speak and tell the truth than you are. I wish to have nothing more to do with you. Your place is by his side."

I think my heart broke when Fabian spoke those words, but I only looked at him gravely and sadly, and replied:

"God grant that some day you may know how grossly you have misjudged me—your faithful and loyal wife"—and then I left the room, seeing that argument and explanation were useless.

All that day I wandered about the house and grounds too miserable to do anything, refusing my meals, and fleeing whenever I caught sight of Fabian. I felt that I could not bear further reproaches and scorn, they hurt me to my very soul's core. From my maid I heard that the sick man upstairs had not recovered full consciousness, and I think she wondered why I did not take my place by his side, seeing that according to Fabian's story, he was a relative of my own. But I feebly explained to her that the sight of his unconscious form upset me most terribly, and she accepted my statement with the stolidity of a well-trained servant.

My husband I successfully avoided throughout the day. The doctor came and went and returned again, bringing with him a trained nurse, but evening had fallen before I again saw the stranger who had wrought such havoc in my life.

Fabian found me at eight o'clock sitting listlessly in my boudoir, and said sharply:

"Come upstairs and see your husband, he is asking for you." Lacking the spirit to contradict him, I rose wearily and followed him to his dressing-room, wondering whether I could really be the same woman, whose cup of joy had yesterday overflowed its brim, who had been so full of irresponsible girlish gaiety.

Fabian preceded me into the darkened room, then drew back and allowed me to approach the bed.

The man who lay upon it, his eyes turned towards me, shrank away into the furthest corner when he saw me, then his hands went out to me with a supplicating gesture, very pathetic to behold.

"My wife," he whispered, "I thought—I thought——Forgive me now, let bygones be bygones—I——"

His voice died away, his strength seemed insufficient for the effort he had made—his face grew so ghastly, that the nurse who stood by his side put a glass to his lips, and said gently:

"He must not be excited."

"You had better stay here," Fabian said in a hoarse undertone. "This is your place."

"Is he—dying?" I asked, in an equally low voice, my eyes going back involuntarily to the figure on the bed.

"No, he is not," Fabian answered grimly. "Do not buoy yourself up with that hope. He has had a stroke, but the doctor says there is no reason why he should not soon be well again. Death will not release you."

The cruel, cutting words, penetrated my brain and heart. I was worn out, exhausted by hunger, fatigue, and the long strain of misery, and without a word of reply, I lifted appealing eyes to Fabian's hard, unresponsive face, and then slipped at his feet in a dead faint.

Digitized by Google

I do not know how long that faint lasted. For hours and hours I seemed to be groping about in impenetrable black darkness, where was no life, nor human voice, nor cheering sound.

Then gradually, very gradually, a far-away light struck upon the blackness, and a confused sound like that of rushing waters, came to my ears—a sound that presently resolved itself into voices speaking softly.

"She is coming round, but it is plain she has had some great shock." It was the doctor's voice. Fabian replied. "She has had a great shock," he said, and I dimly recognised some anxiety in the tones. "Is she recovering, doctor?"

"Hush, yes. You are feeling better, Mrs. Chambers?" I opened my eyes and met the doctor's kindly glance.

"Yes," I said, my voice sounding far-away, "but—tell my husband I——"

I wanted to tell Fabian all that was in my heart, but no more words would come, and I heard a low exclamation break from his lips, as he muttered, so that only I could hear:

"She has owned it. He is her husband."

Those words gave me strength. With a tremendous effort I raised myself, and put out my hands to Fabian.

"He is not—he is not," I cried, greatly to the doctor's stupefaction. "I never saw him before, never—never." And, with that, my hardly worn strength gave out again, and I sank back into the darkness.

For many days after those two long fainting fits I was genuinely ill, and as I heard afterwards, the doctor sternly forbade all reference before me to the stranger who still lay in Fabian's dressing-room.

My maid nursed me, and Fabian came to see me at stated intervals. He was kinder now, I think because the doctor had insisted upon it—but he was kind as an acquaintance might have been, not as a husband.

And as I slowly crept back to health, the bitterness of all that had caused my illness sank deeper into my heart. The iron entered my soul.

When I was pronounced really well again, Fabian came into my boudoir one afternoon, and, standing before the fireplace, whilst I sat back in an arm-chair, said quietly:

"This state of things cannot go on, Enid. Do you still refuse to own that the man who came to you on that fatal night is your husband?"

"I entirely refuse to own it," I said firmly. "I never saw him before—he came for my jewels, I am sure of it. Why, otherwise, did he level a pistol at me?"

"It is not a pleasant thing for a man to find his wife has married someone else. He probably intended to kill you when he was struck down by illness. Enid—for Heaven's sake own the truth! In any case you cannot remain here; you are not my wife; you must leave this house; must leave me and return to your own husband; but I beseech you—own the truth."

I grasped the arms of my chair, and looked at him blankly.

Leave him? Leave the man I loved—the home in which I had been so happy? Go away from Fabian—my husband? Oh, impossible—impossible!

"I have spoken the truth," I said, rising to my feet, and advancing towards Fabian with outstretched hands. "Indeed, indeed, you need not drive me away. I am your own true wife. I am not the wife of that man. I——"

A low exclamation at the door startled us both, and we turned quickly to see, standing there, the very person of whom we spoke. He still looked very ill, but his eyes had in them a clearer expression than I had seen before. They were fixed strangely on me, and I left Fabian's side and went slowly towards the other man.

"I am not your wife," I said firmly. "Look at me well; you have made a mistake. I am not your wife."

The man drew his hand across his eyes with a bewildered gesture, then looked at me again; his hand grasped mine suddenly, his eyes left my face and fixed themselves on a miniature hanging before him on the wall.

"Who is that?" he cried. "Can you deny that it is my portrait?"

"Your portrait?" I exclaimed, too bewildered to take in the full significance of his words. "Oh, no, it cannot be yours. That is my father, Robert Boyce."

There was dead silence for a moment, then he said slowly, his hand still grasping mine:

"You are the living image of your mother. I thought you were her, I thought—thought you were Enid—my wife. But I—child—I am your father—your father." And, as he uttered the words, his voice broke—I saw that his eyes were full of tears.

It was all true! The man who had come to rob me was my father, who had not died in my childhood, but who had passed from one evil course to another, until he had sunk to being a gentleman-burglar. It was his custom to do his burglaries in evening-dress as rousing less suspicion should he come across a stray servant.

Having heard rumours of Mrs. Fabian Chambers' jewels, he had watched the house—seen me come in alone—opened the front door with a skeleton key (it had been left unbolted for Fabian) and stole upstairs.

Then the sight of my face in the glass had made him think he was in the presence of his wife—for he said I exactly resembled what she had been when he deserted her, and the awful shock had prostrated him at my feet.

Fabian has never been able to do enough to make up to me for his want of trust—and he is goodness itself. My father, who, broken down and aged, lives with us, is devoted to his grand-children—Fabian and Enid. My girl bears her mother's and grandmother's name—may, she never endure the agony I endured at hearing those words: "Enid—my wife!"

L. G. Moberly.

Digitized by Google

Daisy and the Curate.

Telling of a Petulant Girl and a Strong-Minded Young Clergyman.

"I WONDER if this one will fall in love with you."

"Harry, don't be so horrid!"

"But you know very well they all do. I am sure I don't know why,"—with brotherly candour.

"I know, and it's very disagreeable!" said Daisy.

"You don't seem to think so at the time."

"The disagreeability comes when—when they propose," said Daisy ruefully. She jumped up from her seat suddenly. "I know what I shall do this time. I shall snub him unmercifully; show him unmistakably that I—I am——"

"Not indulging in curates," put in Harry, and dodged the sofa cushion thrown at him skilfully.

"Wretch!" said his sister.

"Let me go through the list now," continued her tormentor. "There was Long John."

"Pooh! Animated bandbox!"

"Old Whiffles we will not count, as he had a large wife and six small children."

Daisy sniffed.

"Then there was dear little Bobby with his red hands and his red hair."

"Harry, you are irreverent!"

"No, not at all. Simply stating a series of palpable facts."

"Oh, do be quiet," exclaimed Daisy; "go and play tennis with Connie Weston. She'll make love to you!"

This was carrying the war into the enemy's camp, as Daisy Kemp knew.

"Not I," said Harry loftily, "not quite my taste."

"She used to be," said Daisy softly.

"Oh, shut up!" And Harry retired defeated.

The scene was the morning-room at Avondale Vicarage, and the speakers were the only children of the Reverend Archibald Kemp, who adored them both, and as his parishioners—some of them—averred, spoilt them. The time was June, and the pretty garden on which the open French windows looked out, was ablaze with sunshine and bloom. Daisy Kemp—everyone called her that, though her real name was Margaret, after her long-dead mother—was twenty-one, her brother nineteen. There was no trace of Tennyson's "Rare, Pale Margaret" in the former. She was a curly-haired, round and rosy-faced kitten, with a dimpled chin, and, as may have been gathered, a horror of being made love to by curates! Her brother Harry was a replica of his father—open-browed, tall, broad-shouldered, and honest-eyed, a typical country English lad of the type one hopes, for the honour of the country, will never be extinct.

Perfectly true it was that all her father's curates fell in love with Daisy. She sincerely wished they would not. But they all did, some at first sight, some gradually—but they all did! Then they proposed to her, were friendlily but firmly refused, and went away in search of pastures new and forgetfulness. It was, as Daisy said, and she meant it, too, very disagreeable.

The Vicar, easy-going and large-hearted, was amused probably. But he went on tending his roses, of which he was a lover and a connoisseur, as well as a great grower, and only bemoaned one fact—that he was singularly unlucky in his curates. The last one, whom Daisy had refused in terms more straightforward and unmistakable than usual, had been a fine specimen of muscular Christianity, and the Vicar had liked him more than the others. But he went; and his successor was expected daily. The Vicar did not want to lose his little housekeeper, as he called her, but he would not have been very displeased to give her to Ronald Mortimer. However, there it was—and the Vicar hid his disappointment, if any existed, in his roses.

Avondale was not a large parish, but in it every strata of society was represented, from the aristocratic, through successive stages, to the democratic. Some of the Vicar's curates had found it difficult to manage. Those who got on well with the higher circles, were very unpopular with the lower. And, quite naturally, the Vicar wanted to keep friends with both. Hence the reason, in addition to refusal by Daisy, of the frequent changes of curates. They came, they saw, they were conquered—and they went!

"What is Mr. Bentham like?" was Daisy's question at lunch that day. Harry gave a grin; the Vicar looked at his daughter innocently.

"Wait and see, my child," was all he said.

"When is he coming?"

"I told Mr. Smithers to have his rooms ready to-night."

"Another victim," murmured Harry, in a low tone, and was favoured with a sisterly frown from Daisy. More than this her father would not say, indeed, did not know. But on her return from a kindly visit to an old pensioner whose cottage lay some mile beyond the outskirts of the little town of Avondale, Daisy found out for herself what "Mr. Bentham was like." For she found her father and the curate in the twilight, saying "Good-night."

"My daughter, Mr. Bentham," said the Vicar absently. "Yes, as you were saying, there is much always to be thought of and to do."

"Yes, indeed," replied Mr. Bentham, in what struck Daisy as a peculiarly unpleasant voice.

"Dad," she remarked, when indoors later, "he is absolutely ugly."

"Oh, no, dear, Plain, perhaps, but not so bad as that."

"I don't like him."

The Vicar discreetly said nothing. He knew his daughter almost as well as he knew his favourite roses.

Seen in the daylight, Richard Bentham almost, but not quite, bore out Miss Daisy's opinion. But only the close observer, with perception of character, would have seen that his mouth was firm, strong, and humorous; his eyes were keen, honest; his bearing that of a mannered gentleman, if his figure was slight and, perhaps, a little crooked. He was quiet—some of the ignorant called him shy—but in less than a month the Vicar adored him, and he was Harry's inseparable companion when duty offered occasion.

Digitized by Google

But Daisy hated him, and made no scruples about saying so. He hurt her pride by snubbing her, by being quite indifferent to her. He came into the morning-room at the vicarage, where the Vicar had established him as one of the family, and caught Daisy in a favourite position, namely, sitting on the table. Out of sheer defiance she remained where she was. She was apt to be wilful at times.

Richard Bentham shook hands with her, and in a voice whose matter of fact tone robbed the remark of every trace of rudeness, said:

"A curiously inelegant position, Miss Kemp."

"I like it," retorted Daisy.

"I don't think it very ladylike," said the curate calmly, turning to Harry as he spoke.

Daisy coloured furiously.

"And who taught you what ladylike manners are?" she demanded, as angry as a child in a fit of temper.

"My mother," said the curate simply.

Daisy sprang from her seat, opened her lips to speak, and ran out of the room without a word.

"You have put your foot in it," said Harry, after a short silence.

"I forgot. You have had no mother for years. Oh, will she ever forgive me?"

"If you ask me," said Harry drily, "I don't think she will. You know, old fellow, the Vicar loves you, and you are the best friend I ever had, but my sister hates you—there—the truth is out. And she doesn't trouble to conceal the fact."

"That is very evident. I am sorry. Will you apologise to her for me? I was inexpressibly rude. Now, what is this business you wanted to ask me about?"

But Daisy was too angry, too full of wounded pride to cry. She was locked in her own room overlooking the roses, saying over and over again, "I hate you, I hate you." Presently she saw her brother and Richard Bentham crossing the garden. She clenched her little fist and shook it at the curate.

"I hate you," she repeated; "and I will never forget it, or forgive you!"

After that day she studiously avoided Richard Bentham. If compelled to be in the same room with him, she never addressed him. She accepted his gently tendered apology with the curt remark that she had completely forgotten the matter, and did not understand his meaning. This was quite true—in one sense. She had never thought of the use by him of the word "mother" in reference to herself. He thought she did, and that he had offended her past all pardon. Nothing was further away from Daisy's thoughts. He had hurt her self-pride, that was all she could think. He made one attempt at explanation. She refused point-blank to listen to him. She calmly ignored him. And Richard Bentham did not know whether he was sorry or merely surprised.

Out of such small beginnings as this, great things grow. But two months of July rain and August sun tempered with such changes of the climate as the beneficent clerk of the weather felt from time to time inclined to bestow upon Avondale, went past. Upon the very hottest day in that summer, Daisy Kemp was cool—to the curate. When they met, as they necessarily did at times, she spoke as little to him as possible and looked less. It may have hurt him, but if it did he did not show it.

One muggy, unseasonable day in late August, Daisy met her brother on the tennis lawn. He was swinging his racquet carelessly, but the expression on his face was not quite careless. Daisy knew that he had, with the Vicar, been talking to Mr. Bentham.

"I have a message for you," Harry said curtly, as though he did not much enjoy the delivery of the said message. Daisy smiled. Then she noticed her brother's serious face, and the smile died away.

"What is it?" she exclaimed with some anxiety. For Harry was as a rule so bright and merry that a premonition of ill seemed to strike her at once.

"Oh, it's all right! But Bentham told me to tell you not to go up to the Sinclairs again until he lets you know."

"He lets me know!" said Daisy, with a scathing emphasis.

"Yes," said Harry; and he turned away.

"What right——" began Daisy; but her brother was out of reach and hearing. Her heart began to beat furiously. Indeed, what right had Richard Bentham to send her such a peremptory message. The Sinclairs were her friends—the little four-year-old Dolly Sinclair was her especial pet, and Mr. Bentham had forbidden her to see them! What did it mean?

Daisy stamped her little wilful foot on the green lawn. It made no kind of impression on the grass, but it relieved the beating, angry heart very much.

"I will go," she said to herself, "and I will go this very afternoon."

The Sinclairs lived in a tiny cottage in the worst part of Avondale, and Daisy, having once been able to help them, had taken a great delight in making frequent visits to their unpretentious home. She adored little Dolly, and the child gleefully looked forward to her visits.

And now—and now—thought Daisy, Mr. Bentham had forbidden her to go and see the Sinclairs, without one word of reason or explanation. What did it mean?

"I will go!" said Daisy angrily, hating Richard Bentham, curate, with all the power of hate she could muster up in her womanly heart. And she went.

That same afternoon Richard Bentham found her, sitting in the little parlour of the Sinclairs' cottage, with Dolly Sinclair asleep in her arms.

"Hush. She's asleep," said Daisy, in a more tender tone than she had ever addressed to him. Richard Bentham stood clenching his hands.

"You!" he said. "You!"

"Why not?" said Daisy defiantly.

"Did Harry give you my message?"

"Yes—and what right have you to say what I shall do or shall not do?"

The curate dropped his hat on the little table and sank into a chair.

"I only——" he began.

"Well?" said Daisy, as he hesitated.

The curate rose and paced the little room for a few moments before he spoke.

"You have been away, Miss Daisy," he then said, "away for ten days."

"Yes."

"You do not know what has happened since you went in Avondale?"

"Of course not. I only returned last night."

"Your father did not tell you?"

"No. He was out late—very late—last night."

"Can you not guess—or must I tell you? Fever, malignant fever, has broken out in this part of Avondale, and is claiming its victims, old and young, every day. That little mite you are holding in your arms is sickening for it. Now—now can you understand why I warned you, through Harry, not to come to the Sinclairs?"

Daisy gave a brief, tender glance at the child in her arms.

"I should have come even if I had known," she said; "even you——even you could not have prevented me."

"But——"

"I knew when I came into Vale Cottage; Mrs. Sinclair told me at once. I am nursing Dolly while she is lying down for half an hour. I am not afraid. Are you?"

The scorn in Daisy's voice went through Richard Bentham's heart.

"I was thinking of—of you," he said.

Daisy's silence was more expressive than words. But, hearing voices, Mrs. Sinclair, with profuse apologies and much tearful gesture, came upon the scene

Digitized by Google

"Give her to me now, Miss Kemp," she said. "I told you Mr. Bentham said I was not to let you nurse her or come near her."

The few simple words were as a lightning-flash to Daisy's brain.

She threw a brief glance at the curate, but he was unconscious of it. Then her pride arose within her and, with a few words of adieu to Mrs. Sinclair, she went away. Mr. Bentham opened the door for her without a word. Daisy herself was too—well, what was it—hurt, offended, proud, pained ?—to speak. But ten days later there was a little white form in the cottage, a baby voice hushed for ever, and a footfall silenced in this world. For Dolly Sinclair—little four-year-old Dolly—was dead. Never again would those little round arms be laid lovingly about Daisy's neck—never again would one sweet baby face be lifted up to receive a kiss.

And then — ah, yes, and then — Daisy Kemp learnt how unselfish, how brave, how strong Richard Bentham had been. It had only been a brief epidemic, which had carried away to the eternal rest some little ones who had scarcely learnt the meaning of life, and some others who had learnt almost all the world could teach them — but it had been a bitter month for Avondale, a time of grief and mourning, work, prayer, and sorrow, and Richard Bentham, beaten at last, lay in his room at Mrs. Smithers' tiny cottage, fighting for life.

"No wonder," said the Vicar sadly. "No-wonder," echoed all Avondale. He had absolutely slaved during that brief time of trouble. Now he lay, weak as a child, careless of living or dying, at the mercy of the very fiend he had been strenuously fighting against for the sake of others.

That same afternoon Richard Bentham found Daisy in the cottage of the Sinclairs, with the child asleep in her arms.

Over and over again those words of Connie Sinclair came to Daisy's mind. "I told you Mr. Bentham said you were not to nurse her or come near her." He had thought of her and her safety then. Why ? She had so scorned him, so despised him ; and he was now lying so near to death. Why had he so thought of her ? Could it—could it be that he, too, like the others, had fallen in love with her ? But no. There was never any suggestion of such a thing in his voice, his manner, his—oh, and now there never might be !

"If he dies !"

That was the one phrase ringing in Daisy's thoughts.

"If he dies !"

The brief epidemic had passed. Richard Bentham's work had killed it, had stamped it out. And as if in revenge the demon-fever had seized upon him, laid him low, bound him, and was dragging him hourly nearer and nearer the gates of eternity. His was the last case—and the worst. The Vicar had obtained a London specialist, but his verdict was "perhaps," and the glorious golden September sunshine flooded the ripe earth, the green leaves turned browner and browner, the sweet days shortened twilight by twilight—and Richard Bentham, curate, knew nothing, felt nothing, saw nothing.

The fever passed, but the heart, sadly weakened by the long strain, was at almost its last ebb. The haggard face, uglier than ever, and yet with a half divine light in the pitifully weary eyes, lay on the pillow from day to day, and the lips ever spoke in a low whisper, barely audible, one name :

"Daisy !"

Not a little wilful English rosebud was she now, but a reproachful and sorrowful woman—woman all of a sudden. Ever and again that old question would return to her. Why had Richard Bentham been so careful of her ? Why had he thought of her in——

Then she knew. As a flash it came to her. He loved her. Oh, how was it she had not divined it all along !

"Daisy !"

It was her father's voice, broken with unmistakable tears.

"I want you to be brave, my girl, and come and say good-bye to — to ——"

The Vicar broke down here.

"Good-bye ?" whispered Daisy ; "is—is he——?"

"Yes. He is dying."

Without a word Daisy Kemp went with her father hand in hand to Richard Bentham's bedside. She steeled herself for the ordeal, and with agony in her heart, knelt down beside the dying man whom she knew now she loved — loved indeed.

His tired eyes turned to her drawn face ; his thin hand clasped hers.

"Daisy !" he murmured ; "I wanted to see you before—forgive——"

She put her quivering lips to his hand in reply.

"Daisy—I love you—I have—always loved—you—from the—first."

"Dear——"

"Tell me—you—care—if——"

Daisy's eyes were blurred with tears, her whole form shook with pain. She rose slightly and put her warm lips upon those of Richard Bentham, and kissed him tenderly.

No one but herself heard the words that he murmured :

"You have—brought—me back—to life—beloved."

And she had.

The love of a strong man is not always shown by sweet words and tender expressions, but by his deeds.

Clifton Bingham.

Digitized by Google

Jack Browne's Mistake.

How a Young Officer Made a Bad Affair Worse.

Jack Browne and a select few of his brother officers sat in solemn conclave in the mess-room one evening after their seniors had retired, discussing the desperate condition of his affairs.

Jack was a foolish, extravagant, young subaltern in a line regiment, who had contrived to get deeply into debt without the slightest chance of extricating himself from his difficulties. His only relative was a strong-minded maiden aunt, who not only refused to assist him, but even threatened to withdraw the allowance she made him since he entered the Army.

He considered he was being very hardly treated, for the truth is, he did not properly appreciate what his aunt had already done for him.

There was no doubt, however, that he was in an awkward predicament, for on the one hand he could not possibly remain in the regiment unless his debts were paid, and, on the other, his aunt declared that if he resigned his commission she would have nothing more to do with him.

Jack did not at all relish the prospect of being compelled to earn his living, especially as he had no idea how to set about it. Moreover, he was extremely popular in his regiment, and was consequently loath to leave it. His brother officers, unfortunately, could only assist him by their sympathy, and by suggesting various expedients for raising money, none of which were practicable.

"I should try the old lady again," urged one of his friends; "make a clean breast of everything and work upon her feelings."

"She has none!" returned Jack ruefully. "Her venerable heart is insensitive to tender emotions."

"I suppose you haven't concealed what a serious fix you are in?" suggested another.

"No. At least, I put my position to her as plainly as I dare," said Jack; "but it's no go."

"Won't Isaacs raise the wind?" suggested somebody.

"My dear fellow, the only possible way I could raise a shilling would be by pawning my boots, and as they are not paid for I might get into difficulty over that," said Jack, as he plunged his hands deeper into his pockets. "Besides, I've no evidence that I'm named in her will."

"I've an idea!" exclaimed his particular friend, Charlie Bashford. "Why don't you volunteer for service in West Africa?"

"Volunteer to catch cholera! No, thanks," said Jack, making a grimace. "Besides, there is no fighting going on now, so what would be the use?"

"There is a terrible deal more danger now than there was during the war," remarked Charlie, sagely.

"Yes, but no glory. If I wanted to exchange, I would go to India, but, the fact is, I'm past that dodge. My creditors would be down on me directly if they heard I was off. They are down on me enough already," he added despondently.

"What I meant was that you might bamboozle the old lady. Hang it all, Jack! She must care for you, or she would have thrown you over long ago," said his friend, with charming candour. "Perhaps if she heard you had determined, in desperation, to go to Africa, at the risk of your life, she might relent."

"Well, there's something in that," said Jack, brightening up. "At all events, she might give me a cheque for an outfit. The worst of it is, I don't want to go."

"I know a namesake of yours in the 78th, Jack, who is going out next month," interposed another. "If the worst came to the worst, you might go by proxy."

"By Jove! I really think that might be managed," exclaimed Jack excitedly. "It is just possible, as Charlie says, that the old girl would pay my debts to keep me in England. If she doesn't, seeing the other fellow's name in the papers, she will imagine I have gone."

"You can easily keep up the joke by getting your namesake over there to post some letters for you," chimed in Charlie Bashford. "If she doesn't beg you to return after a week or two, you can pretend to be laid up with cholera. That will bring the old lady up to time, if anything will, but in case it doesn't, you can be ordered home—see?"

"Meanwhile, I shall have to keep quiet, and will go away on sick leave," added Jack, in a great state of excitement. "Here, give me pen and paper. I'll fire off a letter at once."

Impulsiveness was one of Jack's failings, and on the spur of the moment he sat down and wrote the following heart-rending epistle—

My Dear Aunt,—Your refusal to assist me further leaves me no alternative but to quit my native shores for ever. I have volunteered for service in West Africa, where, as you know, the cholera is raging. I start on the second of next month per P. and O. steamer Capua, and proceed to join the 78th, which is stationed in the centre of the most infected district. It would be useless to attempt to conceal the fact that I shall encounter terrible risks from the awful disease, but the desire to serve my country at a post of real danger is no less an inducement to me than the prospect of being released by the hand of death from my debts and embarrassments. I can scarcely hope, from our recent correspondence, that my departure will be a source of concern to you, but, at all events, I shall always gratefully remember your many kindnesses. My outfit means a matter of two hundred pounds, but whether you care to assist me in getting it is a question which you alone can decide. Hoping your rheumatism is better,

"Believe me, your affectionate nephew,

"J. L. Browne."

All the company had a hand in producing this masterpiece of composition, which was universally admired.

The general opinion was that the old lady would be entirely overcome. Jack was easily persuaded to indulge in hopeful anticipations, though he had secret misgivings.

Unfortunately his forebodings turned out to be well founded for his aunt did not attempt to dissuade him from going.

Her reply was so cold and formal that Jack could not help suspecting that she doubted his good faith, and more especially as, in consenting to pay for his outfit, she stipulated that the bills should be sent in to her for settlement.

Jack was somewhat unreasonably aggrieved at this precaution, which, however, reconciled him to the idea of carrying out his project of deception.

He had no difficulty in securing the co-operation of his namesake, and by arrangement with this fatefully good-natured young gentleman, he succeeded in securing the best part of the money which his aunt advanced for his outfit.

The old lady little suspected that she was paying the bills and the passage money of a perfect stranger, and that the latter handed to Jack the amount he had intended to devote to that purpose.

Jack suffered considerable qualms of conscience while hatching his conspiracy. His necessities, however, were so pressing that he could not resist the chance of getting a little ready money.

Digitized by Google

Had he anticipated that his aunt would have manifested genuine emotion when he went to bid her farewell he would probably have abandoned his scheme.

But by that time it was too late, for he had paid away the two hundred pounds among his hungry creditors, and the date of his supposed departure was fixed for the next day.

Jack applied for three months' leave of absence from his regiment to obviate the risk of his presence in England coming to his aunt's ears.

The colonel, knowing nothing of his plans, but sympathising with his pecuniary troubles, granted his request without asking inconvenient questions.

Jack's brother officers were pledged to secrecy, and one of them—the incorrigible Charlie Bashford—wrote the old lady a pathetic account of his friend's departure. Jack, on his part, retired to a remote village in North Wales, where he could solace himself with trout-fishing while awaiting the issue of his equivocal manœuvres.

He was not without hope that his aunt would speedily recall him from Egypt with a promise to pay his debts.

He had authorised his namesake to open the old lady's letters, and to telegraph to him immediately in case his anticipations should be realised.

Meanwhile, he had furnished his fellow-conspirator with a number of letters to be posted in West Africa from time to time, and these contained such harrowing details of the ravages of cholera that his aunt could scarcely fail to become seriously alarmed and uneasy.

Jack remained a month or six weeks in Wales, during which his scheme worked without a hitch.

His aunt was completely deceived, and even forwarded his first letter from Africa to his friend, Charlie Bashford, to read.

The note in which she inclosed the letter plainly showed that her heart was softening towards him, and Jack began to feel a good deal ashamed of himself.

During his solitary walks and rambles he had fits of penitence which considerably damped his satisfaction at the success of his experiment.

He even felt tempted at times to abandon the deception he was practising, but before he had arrived at any determination to do so he was surprised at receiving a visit from his friend, Charlie Bashford.

"Hullo! What brings you here?" demanded Jack apprehensively as they shook hands.

"You've heard the news, haven't you?" said Charlie.

"What about?" said Jack.

"Haven't you seen the papers lately?" asked Charlie, opening his eyes.

"Not for a week or ten days. What is it?"

"Then you don't know poor Browne is dead," said Charlie. "We all of us thought you knew of it, or I should have written. It was in all the papers a week ago. He died of cholera."

"What! you don't mean the man who went to Egypt the other day?" gasped Jack.

"Yes," said Charlie, grinning at his friend's dismay.

"Well, but that is fearfully awkward for me! My aunt must be under the impression that I am dead. What the dickens shall I do?" exclaimed Jack.

"I wrote the poor old lady a letter of condolence to keep up the deception," said Charlie.

"What an infernal fool you were, then!" exclaimed Jack vigorously. "What on earth did you want to do that for?"

"Well, I did it for a joke, but I was sorry for it afterwards. In fact, as far as the poor old lady was concerned, I've repented it ever since. However, there is no harm done as far as you are concerned," added Charlie, cheerfully.

"I'm not by any means sure of that," growled Jack. "I can't be lost for ever, and the matter must come to my aunt's ears. If you had written and hinted that there might be a mistake you would have done me a good turn. As it is, you've only made matters worse."

"We thought you would be in a furious stew when you heard the news, and wondered at your keeping so quiet," said Charlie. "I came down out of pure charity to ease your mind. You have had a lucky escape.

"The poor old lady is dead, so, as I said before, there is no harm done to your prospects."

Under the cricumstances, it is perhaps excusable that Jack's first sensation was a feeling of intense relief. A moment ago he was fairly horrified at learning the awkward position in which he was placed by the death of his namesake.

Considering that his future prospects depended entirely upon his aunt's goodwill, it seemed as though ruin stared him in the face. Exposure of the trick he had played upon her was apparently inevitable, and her forgiveness could scarcely have been hoped for.

Of course, he had known all along that he had run this risk, but he had never anticipated the sad event which upset all his calculations, and had considered himself tolerably secure from detection, whatever else happened.

The grief and remorse which lurked in Jack's bosom in consequence of his aunt's death were, therefore, at the moment overshadowed by mingled relief and excitement.

The vital importance of the sad event as regarded his private affairs not unnaturally preoccupied his mind. If, as he not unreasonably believed, he was the old lady's heir, he would be able to pay off his debts and make a fresh start under favourable conditions.

He hurried up to town without a moment's delay, and went straight to the office of his aunt's legal adviser.

He knew that this gentleman was her executor and had the management of her affairs, and he was anxious to put an end to the suspense and uncertainty regarding his future prospects. In his eagerness he forgot the surprise his sudden appearance was likely to cause, and consequently felt rather abashed when the lawyer started back on seeing him.

"What, Mr. Browne!" exclaimed the old gentleman, as soon as he could speak. "Why, I—I—and everybody else, thought you had died in Africa the other day."

"No. The fact is, it was all a mistake," said Jack, in a shame-faced manner.

"Oh! Then I suppose you never went there at all," said the lawyer, after a short pause, during which he fixed his sharp eyes on the young man's face.

"No, I did not," said Jack, overcome with confusion, "I—I am very sorry."

"Well, so you ought to be sir, for you killed your aunt. Ah! you did, indeed! I mean what I say," he added sharply. "When the news of your supposed death appeared in the papers she had a fit and never recovered the shock. But if she had not cared for you more than you did for her she would be alive at this moment.

"She blamed herself for being the cause of your death, and that intensified the shock. Had she followed her own inclination she would have made any pecuniary sacrifice to keep you out of danger. But she thought, for your own sake, you had better do a little campaigning; and, besides, she was inclined to suspect—rightly, as it now appears—that you did not really intend to go."

"I'm glad, at all events, that she never found me out," said Jack, wiping away the beads of perspiration that had gathered on his forehead. "She did not suspect what a brute I was in return for all her kindness."

"No," said the lawyer, fixing his keen glance upon Jack's face again. "Unfortunately for you, she never doubted you were dead."

"Why unfortunately?" inquired Jack absently.

"Because she sent for me at the last moment and made a fresh will, in which your name is not mentioned. Up till then you were her residuary legatee." Hal Evans.

THE PAPER A BOY CAN TAKE HOME IS "THE BOYS' LEADER."

Digitized by Google

THE COUNTRY COUSIN.

A Bachelor's Love Story.

JAMES RYDER was a confirmed bachelor, but not in the sense which people usually attach to that term. He had not the slightest inclination to marry, and not one of the many persons who knew him was under any delusion on that head. When a man still on the sunny side of fifty, good-looking, and possessed of independent means, declares solemnly that he will never marry, his friends generally smile (when out of sight) and remark that they have heard that kind of talk before; but no one did this in connection with James Ryder. He was not averse to the society of ladies; he lived alone, but he was always ready to accept an invitation to a party and was usually a favourite with the fair sex, yet it was quite understood that he was determined to remain a bachelor.

The majority of his numerous friends and acquaintances found this problem a perplexing one; it passed their comprehension. If the man had been crossed in love, he would have had his disposition soured and would have vented his ill-will on all the members of the opposite sex. James Ryder did nothing of the kind. He had actually helped one worthy young couple in the district to get married; the swain had been working hard to save enough money to purchase the home, but illness had overtaken him, lessening the amount of his savings, and further postponing the happy day. Ryder sent him away for a month, which restored him to robust health, and then gave him a handsome money present which obviated the necessity for further waiting. Ryder was asked to give away the bride and did so.

What ailed the man? A slight clue was obtained when Ryder once laughed at love at first sight. After that it was remembered that he had occasionally laughed when he heard that such or such a couple were in love, and asked the informant if the pair were really certain that they were in love. There was a trace of cynicism in his tone which made the listeners wonder. However, the real facts were a mystery till his nephew, a handsome young fellow of two-and-twenty, came to stay with him for a week, and, during that period, confessed that he was in love with the best and sweetest girl in Christendom and meant to propose. He had fallen in love with her the first moment he set eyes on her bewitching——

"Yes," said Uncle James drily. "I know all about that; I had an attack myself once on a time, when I was about your age. Oh, you need not protest, Bob! Love is a kind of madness; a man gets an attack of it and it blinds him for the time to the attractions of all other women. The question of suitability doesn't trouble him; he wants that girl and no other. Later, he will admit to himself that he did not choose as wisely as he might have done. And the girl will think the same respecting her own choice."

"You are wrong, uncle!" cried Bob emphatically.

"Perhaps I am," returned James Ryder equably. "Yet I think I am right in four cases out of five. A man often has the chance of obtaining a wife who would make him a splendid helpmate, yet he cannot see his opportunity. Love is a strange thing and a man—or a woman—ought to keep a level head when looking for a life partner!"

"Why, you would destroy all the romance of courtship!" declared Bob aghast.

"I wonder," asked Ryder musingly, "how many people can look back on their courtship and be satisfied with it, romantic as you say it is? Perhaps, if there were less romance at that time, there would be more of it after marriage! However, Bob, I do not wish to interfere with your love affairs, but I will tell you my own story and that will give you an idea of what a strange thing love is and how a man may be unaware of his own feelings. Different circumstances—— But let us get to the story! Light up a cigar and don't interrupt me!"

The two men settled themselves comfortably in the cosy chairs of the bright apartment which James Ryder called his "den." Bob listened while his uncle revealed his secret.

"I have already mentioned" (so ran James Ryder's story), "that I was about twenty-two. I had an aunt in an East Anglian village and that aunt had two daughters. She also had two sons, both of them were fellow students of mine at a medical college. I never completed my medical studies, I may say, by the way. The youngest of the four was Emily, and she and I became good friends. I did not fall in love with her at first sight, but she attracted me both by her pretty face and well-moulded figure and by her general goodness. That's the best word to describe her character and manners.

"The idea of becoming enamoured of a country cousin would have made me laugh before I went down, and probably this had its effect on me and prevented me from forming a proper opinion. As the time wore on, I found greater pleasure in her society, and I was really sorry when I had to go. I thought that she was sorry too.

"I became more sorry after my return to ordinary duties. It was not the mere reaction of going back to work after a holiday; I felt that I would like to see more of Emily, and I began to blame myself for not having given more evidence of my sentiments. I comforted myself with the reflection that I had once expressed my opinion, to her sister, that Emily was more attractive than I had expected to find her. Perhaps that would be reported to Emily, I thought; for sisters must have their confidences!

"So the time went on and winter arrived. I had by that time come to the conclusion that I would endeavour to spend a week in that village at Christmas time and ascertain whether I still liked her as I thought I did and whether she liked me.

"The winter promised to be very gay for us; there were balls and parties galore in prospective, and we anticipated a grand time. I danced with this girl and that girl, but, notwithstanding their great smartness from a Society point of view, I still looked back to the country cousin.

"I had heard very little of her from her brothers, who seemed reticent. I could not introduce the subject too often, as that would betray me. So very little was said on either side.

"Then came a night which I am not likely to forget. There was a masked ball with fancy dress to this extent—that we could dress in the costume of any European country at any period. I resolved to get myself up as a cavalier; I was rather partial to the Charles I. style of dress, and I fancied that I appeared rather fetching with the long curls and so forth. I was not quite pleased that it was to be a masked ball, because the domino hides the upper part of the face and spoils the effect, but it was a fad on the part of our hostess, Lady Mitcham.

Digitized by Google

"My two cousins went to the ball, but we did not drive there together as we usually did, because they had arranged to take a lady to whom the elder was engaged. I soon recognised them in their costumes, which were very ordinary and need not be mentioned.

"I was in grand form and had no lack of partners, for I was a good dancer. Very early in the evening my attention was drawn to a French peasant who looked very charming and whose eyes shone like — well, I was going to say 'like meteors,' because 'like stars' is such a hackneyed metaphor, but I'm not sure that all meteors do shine brilliantly. Anyhow, those eyes seemed to go through you, and it occurred to me that they were often fixed on me. I resolved to have a dance with that French peasant girl, so I waited my opportunity and, when a partner led her to a seat, I approached her and asked for the honour of a dance.

"I was fortunate enough to get the next dance, a delightful waltz. Ah! I cannot recall it, after all these years, without a thrill! She was a grand waltzer, and that dance was bliss.

"The waltz terminated, I was leading her back to her seat, asking her if I might have the next dance, when she interrupted me.

"'I am hot and rather tired!' she said softly. 'I would prefer to sit in the conservatory, where it is, at least, less warm, and you may leave me if you wish to join the next dance.'

"'Impossible! I cannot leave you alone! What would the next dance be without you!' I cried ecstatically. 'Only permit me to rest here with you!'

"She made no reply, but the face was turned from me. I bent forward in order to catch a glimpse of the eyes that had thrilled me, and it seemed to me that they were liquid—the fire had disappeared and moisture filled them. My heart felt as if it had been stabbed. I placed my hand on hers and asked her to tell me her trouble. I was positive that she was in trouble.

"I drew her closer, and once more tried to press my lips to hers. Again she gently put me off."

"However, just as I thought she was about to reply, my two cousins strolled through the conservatory. I suppose that Jack, the elder, had left his sweetheart dancing with someone, for the strains of the music flowed towards us, and that they had come here for a rest. They looked at me, and Jack said quizzically: 'I won't disturb you, old fellow!' and they passed on with a courtly bow to the lady.

"'Confound their impudence!' I muttered. 'I can talk to a girl if I wish, can't I?'

"And I did wish! I took her hand and spoke softly to her. I knew—or I imagined I knew!—that I had found my affinity. Why should I be so attracted to this stranger, if it were not that she were the one being in the world who could make me happy?

"I cannot tell you all I said. I besought her to confide in me and —— But there! As you are in love yourself, you understand very well what I said! It's much the same with every man!

"She told me that I reminded her of a man who had not proved worthy. He had paid her great attention and had gone away and left her. It was something of a shock to discover that she had cared for another, even if ever so little, but I soon got over it. I assured her that it was fate; that if it had not been so, I should not have been the lucky fellow I was that evening, and that she would have missed the one man who could and would make her life a path of roses. I ended by trying to clasp her in my arms, but she gently repulsed me.

"'Perhaps I am doing him an injustice!' she murmured. 'It may have been only my own foolish fancy! He never breathed a word that I could construe as a confession of love, but in other ways I was led to imagine that——' She sighed. 'Yet he was so noble! I cannot think that he intended to treat me as a mere toy! I do so wish to act justly towards him. Would you consider it—I mean——'

"She became confused.

"She was evidently anxious to learn whether or not I regarded it as wrong on the part of a man to flirt or to trifle with the affections of an innocent girl. I was on the point of declaring energetically that a man should not pay marked attentions to, or flirt with, any girl and then leave her with an aching heart, when a terrible thought struck me. It might be that Emily was thinking the very same about me at that moment!

Digitized by Google

"But I forced the thought out of my mind. Emily had been well enough in her way, but this French peasant by my side was a queen to her.

"I did not attempt to answer the question which she had tried to put to me. I leant over again, and drew her close to me and whispered words of love into her ear. She listened, half-unwillingly, as I could not help fancying, but I continued. Then I drew her closer and once more tried to press my lips to hers. And again she gently put me off!

"'Have you ever loved another woman?' she demanded suddenly. 'How can I be sure that you are sincere, after my former experience?'

"I was staggered, and not best pleased with this prosaic turn of things. Poetry is what you want when you have an attack of love fever, not matter-of-fact prose like that? Besides, it was an awkward inquiry, I might truthfully have said that I had never made love to a woman, but in my own heart I had to admit that I had experienced very tender sentiments for Emily lately! I hesitated. I imagined I detected a look of triumph in the eyes that were now gazing fully at me. She was distinctly agitated; I could see her breast heaving and her breathing was laboured. I remained silent.

"'I heard,' she said softly, 'that you were in love with a cousin in the country!'

"I could have uttered something uncomplimentary about my male cousins; they must know this girl and they had said something to her concerning my holiday!

"Then my coolness returned to me; I was able to reflect calmly. I sat with my eyes away from hers, boldly revolving the thing in my mind, and I decided against Emily. There was no haste about it, despite the circumstances. I decided deliberately in favour of the French peasant girl. I realised that the latter was waiting anxiously for my reply, and I felt a sentiment of triumph.

"'I am not in love with my country cousin!' I cried at length. 'I know who has told you that, but he is wrong, they are both wrong and I will pay them out for prejudicing you against me!'

"'Then you do not love her?' came the query in a trembling voice.

"'How could I, when I have you?' I answered hotly. 'She is as a common field-flower compared with a flower of rarest excellence—you are incomparable! Take off that mask and tell me your name, that I may know and possess you!' I added ardently.

"'Not now, not now!' she cried in agitation. Her voice appeared very different. 'You will know before long! I will make myself known to you! I must go!'

"And before I could grasp the fact, she had fled!

"I searched everywhere for my French peasant girl, but without avail. I should have recognised her at once naturally, even if there had been ten other French peasant girls at the ball instead of her being the only one; but she was gone!

"At supper we unmasked and there were some surprises, as usual, but I was not interested. I wanted to have a word or two with my cousins and give them a piece of my mind for telling tales out of school, but the younger was gone and the elder had his sweetheart with him, so I could do nothing.

"The next day, Tom—that was the younger of my cousins—came to me and asked me if I enjoyed the ball.

"'I needn't make that inquiry, though!' he cried, without giving me time to speak. 'You fell in love with a girl there, didn't you? You will be glad to learn her identity. That note will tell you!'

"He flung a note on my table and walked out with an expression of annoyance and contempt on his features. I had a good mind to call him back and administer a thrashing, but I refrained and tore open the note.

"It was from Emily. I remember what was in that note very well; every word is engraved on my memory; but I shall not repeat it. I will merely tell what had happened.

"Emily had been invited to spend a few days with an old friend of her mother; she had accepted the invitation gladly. Her brothers enjoined her to keep her arrival a secret and to go to the ball, where she would meet me. They believed that I was in love with their sister, and that a surprise meeting would be a happy event for me.

"She went, and her brothers contrived to draw my attention to the French peasant girl; they wondered if I should recognise her in her disguise. That disguise, aided by the domino, had been so good that it had deceived me.

"Emily herself had played a small part; she loved me dearly, but was in doubt about my feelings towards her. Unconsciously she had followed my movements with eyes of love, and this had helped to draw me nearer to her and had made those eyes shine more brightly. Have you never experienced the strange sensation of feeling that someone is looking fixedly at you, and have turned to discover that it is really so?

"I cannot explain why I fell in love with that peasant girl, and why, under the influence of that spell, I scorned Emily, for they were one and the same!

"Emily had thrown herself thoroughly into the part, so far as the make-up was concerned, having actually darkened her hair and otherwise disguised herself. I have no doubt that her original intention was to give me a surprise—a pleasant one, as she believed. Then probably, being only human, she thought to gain some idea of the state of my feelings. When I actually began to make love to her as the French peasant girl, she half believed that I knew quite well to whom I was talking, but she asked about the country cousin in order to make certain. And then she heard herself spoken of with derision!

"Did I tear up that letter? No, I did not; I kept it as a proof of man's peculiar construction. I despised and loved the same woman, according to circumstances! It was not as if she had done anything to make me despise her, mind you. It shows that love is a mystery beyond solution by mortals. Weeks afterwards, when I could meditate calmly, I recognised charms in Emily which I had not seen during my holiday, and I anathematised myself for my stupidity, and yet—I loved the French peasant girl also! If they had been distinct personalities, and I had married one, should I have been happy or should I have wished that I had married the other?"

"That's a curious experience!" cried Bob when James Ryder had ceased speaking. "But how lucky you would have been in the circumstances if you had married her!"

"H'm!" said his uncle doubtfully. "However, I didn't marry her; she wouldn't look at me after that, of course! I have lost track of her these many years, but I have never forgotten her!"

"You mean that you have never ceased to love her?" asserted Bob boldly.

"You rascal! Well, you are right! But my story may act as a warning against falling in love at first sight! It may be a lesson to you——"

"Ah, but Amy is the best of——" began Bob.

"It's all right, Bob!" laughed James Ryder. "No amount of experience on the part of one man will alter the course taken by another in matters of love! I congratulate you and wish you joy!"

J. Hubert.

Digitized by Google

Concludes in this Number.

THE "BRIDGE" OF RUIN.

Being the

CONFESSIONS OF A GIRL GAMBLER.

EPISODE TWENTY-THREE.

Ray to the Rescue Again.

"THERE, dear, drink this. It'll do you a world of good."

I looked up languidly, to see Mrs. Windsor bending over me. She held a glass of medicine to my lips, and after drinking it mechanically, I felt so much better that memory of recent events suddenly returned to me.

"Oh!" I shuddered, "however did you get me away from that horrible man?"

"It was Mr. Ray who did it," replied Mrs. Windsor. "He came here a little while after you had left. If you had gone the nearest way to the station you would have met him."

"Mr. Ray! Whatever could have brought him here!"

"You, of course! He wanted to know how you were getting on, and when I saw how concerned he was about having missed you, I told him everything I knew. My word, he was in a rage! I fancy he'll give more than one person a piece of his mind. But he didn't stop here long, for he wanted to find you before you got into your train. He was following the directions I had given him, and was walking quickly round the bend of the Spinney Lane, when he heard a faint cry ahead of him, and ran till he came up to where a man was bending over a prostrate body. The man thought the coast was clear, and didn't observe Mr. Ray till he was close upon him. But he felt the weight of his fist, and made off in a hurry, leaving Mr. Ray to get you home the best way he could. As luck would have it, the grocer's cart came along the lane soon afterwards, and the grocer's man helped Mr. Ray to bring you here, for you had fainted. And that's all!"

So I owed another deep debt of gratitude to the man who had already done so much for me! Of course, I could never repay him. Neither could I hope to retain his goodwill, or even his friendship, after the exposures which were now inevitable. Mr. Taskot's information about the artist's supposed engagement was, I felt convinced, a falsehood of his enemy's own invention. Nevertheless, it was hardly likely that a man who was so clever and distinguished would think with anything but tolerant pity of a girl who was everlastingly needing somebody to help her out of her troubles.

Still, it comforted me to know that I owed my rescue to the man who had already shown such zeal on my behalf, and I felt as if the solution of all my difficulties must now be close at hand. In this restful mood I fell asleep, and when I awoke, the effects of the attack upon me had quite disappeared. So I got up, put on a fresh frock, and went downstairs, much to the delight of Mrs. Windsor, who had been afraid of serious injury when I was brought home unconscious.

"And here comes the handsome gentleman back again!" she added. "I'll let him in, and I'll leave you to tell him how you are yourself."

Mrs. Windsor was as good as her word, though she would have saved me some embarrassment if she had stayed with me, for I was more than half afraid of meeting the reproaches which my conscience told me were deserved from Mr. Ray.

But he soon put me at my ease, for his manner was kindliness itself, and as soon as he became convinced that I was not much worse for the afternoon's alarming experience, he explained the cause of his presence in Essondon.

"For some time after I had, as I imagined, seen you safely ensconced at Mrs. Grainger's," he said, "I was very busy with the commission I told you of, and did nothing in the way of visiting. But I had no sooner finished the portrait than I set off to pay you a call. I met Mr. Bainbrig by the way, and he told me that there had been a terrific scene of some sort at Mrs. Grainger's, resulting in the hurried departure of yourself and Mr. Taskot."

"Mr. Taskot has been my evil genius," I murmured, flushing hotly at the recollection of the scene in the open four-wheeler.

"Yes, I know that," was the response—"perhaps even better than you know it yourself, for I am too well acquainted with him not to be fully aware of his capabilities. Still, I hardly thought he would go the length of trying to abduct you."

"Was that what he intended doing?"

"Undoubtedly."

"But why?"

"Well, thereby hangs a tale, which I will proceed to unfold. Milward Taskot poses as a rich man, with tremendous expectations to boot, and he is usually accepted in Society at his own valuation—until a scandal occurs. Then he is quickly sent to the rightabout, and seeks fresh fields to exploit. But he is not rich, nor is he ever likely to be rich. So he has tried various ways of earning a living without having to work over it. One of his methods, which has met with more or less success, is to fleece unwary cardplayers, and the Vernons made a huge mistake when they imagined they were going to relieve him of a lot of money, for he is as great a rogue as Vernon himself, which is saying much."

"But they did get a lot of money out of him."

"Yes, but I have compelled them to disgorge it, and I have given it back to Taskot, threatening to expose the whole of his disreputable history if he ventured to annoy you again. I also insisted upon the surrender of the snapshot negatives, so you need fear nothing more from them."

"The Vernons must be afraid of you."

"So they are, and I shall not give them much more rope. They will presently break the conditions I have imposed, and then they will have to leave the neighbourhood which they disgrace by their presence."

"But Vernon Towers is Harry Vernon's ancestral home. At least, Annabel told me so."

"That was only one of her little fibs. They took the place on a lease, and altered its name from Walmsley Towers to Vernon Towers. When they leave the house, as they will soon have to do, it will revert to its former name. But that doesn't explain why Taskot wanted to abduct you."

"No, and I cannot understand why he should, for he must have known I should always hate him."

"You are a 'quick study,' as theatrical people say, and he intended you to marry him under the impression that he was desperately and disinterestedly in love with you. By compromising you with all your friends, he thought to drive you to such despair that you would welcome even him as a means of proving your respectability. Once married, possibly under the coercive influence of a stupefying drug, he would have compelled you to earn money for him by cheating at cards. The fact that you refused him upset his calculations, of course, but he was bent upon subjugating you, somehow."

Digitized by Google

"What a dreadful man! But you must blame me for many things until you hear my explanations."

"No, there you are mistaken, Miss Beresford. I saw the scoundrel kiss you, and I walked away in a great rage, for appearances were certainly against you then. Later on, after I had had time to think things over, I interviewed the cabman, and learnt from him that the kisses were stolen without your consent, for the cabman has good ears and eyes, and had taken note of all that passed. At the station, too, I was able to piece various events together when I made inquiries, and I concluded that Milward Taskot had intended to compromise you by making it seem that you had travelled together. That was what made me decide to come and see how you were getting on, for I dreaded lest more mischief should befall you."

"Mrs. Windsor told you about the vicar calling here?"

"Yes, and I will speak to that charitable gentleman before I leave Essondon. By the time I have finished with him, I daresay he will wish he had possessed a little more charity. By-the-bye, there is an anonymous letter in his possession, is there not?"

"Yes; Mrs. Windsor does not know all the dreadful things that are in it. But she knows that it was the cause of my having to leave here."

"H'm! The reverend gentleman shall give me that letter, and I will tear it up. We must not allow it to crop up again at some unexpected moment."

"You are kinder to me than I deserve, and I shall never be able to thank you sufficiently."

"My dearest, I can never be kinder to you than you deserve! And as for thanks—what thanks does a man want for trying to work out his own happiness?"

This speech was accompanied by such ardent glances into my blushing face that I was filled with confusion, and rose with the intention of putting an end to it by asking Mrs. Windsor to send some tea in. But Mr. Ray, who always seemed to do exactly as he liked with everybody, laid his hand persuasively on mine, and—— Well, really, the things he said to me were such gross flatteries that I will not record them, for nobody but Maurice himself can ever indorse half of them.

"But it is just miraculous!" I stammered at last. "Only this very morning I was the most miserable girl on earth, and the most friendless. Now everything is changed, and if I am to believe my ears, you, who are a thousand times too good for me, actually want to marry me!"

"There is nothing wonderful in that, except that I am the most fortunate man alive to secure such a prize as you are. Why, the first minute I saw you, I knew that my fate was sealed either for happiness or misery!"

"I don't think I ought to accept you—I have been so foolish. And my enemies may continue to persecute me. In that case, there would be danger of disgracing you, and disgrace would ruin your professional career. No, no—you shall never be brought to poverty through me!"

I was quite sincere in resolving to sacrifice my own happiness rather than risk evil consequences to Maurice. But he carried the day in this, as in everything else, and, very much to my amazement, I was presently receiving the congratulations of Mrs. Windsor, who was so delighted at this sudden change in my fortunes that she almost cried her eyes out!

EPISODE TWENTY-FOUR, AND LAST.

The Downfall of the Vernons.

There was considerable sensation in and about Essondon after the grocer's assistant had noised it abroad that a young lady had been attacked in open daylight, and that she would have been abducted if he had not arrived on the spot just in time to vanquish her assailant. His story was slightly beside the mark, but that did not prevent people from regarding the Spinney Lane as too dangerous a place to frequent except in company.

"He was the biggest man I'd ever seen!" so said the grocer's man to Mrs. Windsor. "And his legs were the longest. No wonder he disappeared like the wind when me and the gentleman tackled him."

Probably my assailant did run off at his top speed. But he was no giant, and Maurice by no means despaired of finding him very soon. For he discovered incidentally that Mr. Smedley's guest had had a nasty fall on the kerbstone, after being out for a walk, and that he had broken his ankle.

"Our bird has caged himself," said Maurice. "So if you will, dearest, we will have a final interview with him."

"Do you think I ought to see him again?"

"Certainly! He has certain confessions and retractions to make, and we cannot get the matter settled too soon."

Thus it happened that Maurice and I called at Mrs. Smedley's, and were shown into the breakfast-room, where Mr. Taskot, surrounded by evidences of careful attention, was lying on a couch, with his ankle bound in splints.

The sight of Maurice and me together seemed to enrage him, and he snarled viciously: "To what am I to attribute the honour of a call from you?"

"To my determination to put an end to your persecution of Miss Beresford," was Maurice's instant response. "You met with an accident when returning from your foolish attempt to kidnap my intended wife."

"Your intended wife?"

"Yes, Olive has made me happy by promising to marry me."

"You will have plenty of time to rue marrying a girl who is already spoken of as a——"

"Dare to say the words, and I will choke you, in spite of your present helplessness."

Maurice's vehemence cowed Mr. Taskot at once, and he mumbled sulkily: "What do you want here, anyway?"

"I want the surrender of that set of snapshots you hold."

"You won't get them."

"Either you surrender them at once, or I disclose to our Uncle Walter Taskot all about a certain forgery on your part. There are also other disclosures which would probably cost you at least ten thousand pounds."

"Do you mean that the old fool has altered his will, and that I am only to have ten thousand pounds?"

"Precisely. And the ten thousand pounds will dwindle to a shilling if I am compelled to tell all I know."

I listened to this conversation in increasing wonder, for it explained Maurice's familiarity with Milward Taskot's doings. They were evidently cousins, and it would seem that Maurice was the very nephew whose chances of inheriting from the maligned Walter Taskot, Esq., of Malvern Lodge, were represented to me as so very remote. There was some furious muttering. But Maurice gained his point, and I thankfully saw the compromising snapshots given up by my enemy.

"And now that you have got them," he hissed, "you may be confronted by a fresh set any day."

"No, no," was the complacent answer. "I have secured and destroyed the negatives, together with some copies which the Vernons intended to use presently. Furthermore, I hold the sworn and signed confession of both Harry and Annabel Vernon that the charges against Olive Beresford were fictitious ones. It paid them better to concede to my demands than to risk the instant exposure I threatened, and I feel no compunction at having given them a certain amount of rope, for their swindling career is almost at an end."

"Well, Maurice Ray, I am not so much in love with you that I want to see more of you than I can help."

"Just so, my worthy cousin. I am going as soon as you have written and signed a confession to my dictation."

There were some more protestations and disclaimers. But before we left Milward Taskot's presence he had confessed to many things, Mrs. Smedley being called in to witness the signature to the document, the contents of which were not disclosed to her.

But it set forth that the anonymous letter received by the

Digitized by Google

Vicar of Essondon had been Milward Taskot's own concoction, and that none of its contents were justified by facts. In short, Maurice omitted nothing that could exonerate me completely in the eyes of the world, and our next visit was paid to Mr. Snaith, the vicar, who looked very haughtily at me until he was shown Milward Taskot's signed confession.

"I'm very sorry," he stammered, "that I placed a moment's credence in so vile a story, and I apologise most earnestly."

"What has become of the anonymous letter?" asked Maurice, who was none the less stern because the vicar was apologetic.

"I have it locked in my bureau," was the answer. "Nobody but myself has seen it since it came here."

"And nobody else must see it, sir. Kindly give it to me, so that I may tear it up."

This request was granted without hesitation, and it was a very happy girl who presently walked back to Mrs. Windsor's in company with the man who had undertaken to manage her affairs for the rest of her life.

On our arrival, Mrs. Windsor met us with a face so full of mystery and concern that we guessed at something serious.

"Whatever is the matter?" I asked, my hopes instantly dropping to zero, for my happiness was so recent, so unexpected, and so undeserved, that I instantly feared that it was about to vanish.

"Such strange things!" replied my old friend. "What a mercy it is, dear, that you are safe at home!"

"Olive has had rather an exciting time of it while we have been out," observed Maurice. "Suppose she sits down before she hears what you have to tell?"

"To be sure! Come along, dearie. The tea is just ready, so we can talk while we are having it."

I was shaking so much with nervousness that I was glad to sit down, and I looked on with dilating eyes while Maurice read something in a paper Mrs. Windsor handed to him.

"The afternoon edition came in just now," she said, while she busied herself with the tea-cups. "I always like to know what's going on in the world, so I sat down for a half hour's reading. But, my goodness, I did get a turn when I saw 'Vernon Towers' in a big heading."

"Now I can't wait another minute. Let me see what has happened."

"My dear girl," was Maurice's answer to this very natural demand of mine. "There is nothing whatever for you to be anxious about. But it's a terrible thing for Lord A. His son, it seems, formed part of the house-party at Vernon Towers last week. He went with a friend, the son of a well-known Member of Parliament. The local correspondent asserts that they were plied with drink, and that the greater part of their losses took place while they were incapable of playing intelligently. Their joint losses at Bridge amount to forty thousand pounds, only a small part of which, of course, was within their means of paying. The lord's son regarded himself as ruined for life; could not face his people; and shot himself this morning."

"What an awful thing!" I gasped.

"Thank Heaven, there is one comfort, though. Nothing can now save this gang from full exposure, and I expect the next news we hear will be either that they have absconded, to seek fresh fields of mischief, or that the police have arrested them for swindling. There will be no more house-parties held at the Towers."

Maurice was right. The next news we heard corroborated all his deductions. Unfortunately, the brace of swindlers, plus their accomplice, Mr. Dean Fisher, took the alarm directly the young viscount's death was discovered, and absconded with all the money in the house. They have not yet been caught. Milward Taskot also quitted England.

Maurice and I are married now. Mrs. Windsor lives with us, and manages my big house to perfection.

The Bainbrigs, too, are very great friends of ours. But they are like me in that they have sworn never again to have anything more to do with "The Bridge of Ruin."

THE END.

Your Editor Chats.

I SUPPOSE you are all looking forward in anticipation of next week's number to read the opening chapters of our new series. I can assure you that the realisation of it will be even better than the anticipation, for a more exciting opening instalment would be an impossibility. It tells how Sara Gillespie enters the employ of Messrs. Templeton & Co., general agents, as a lady typist. The head of the firm seems to take a very friendly interest in the girl, and also in her absent lover, Noel Masterman, who is at Nice. But it transpires that the assumed friendship of the firm is only a decoy used to enable them to make the girl a tool for their schemes against Noel, concerning whom they hold some documents of the utmost importance. Sara, however, overhears their plotting, and ascertaining that everything connected with Noel and her happiness in the future depends upon the fateful papers that they are discussing, she makes a bold effort for her lover's sake. The cover of next week's issue will depict a striking incident in the first instalment.

———

I MUST thank "C. W." for the very interesting letter he has sent me, and also for the compliments the missive contains. He has, however, an idea that I might with advantage publish a serial story dealing with the chivalrous and romantic times of old England, something after the style of "The Lovers of Yvonne," in preference to modern tales. Now, I quite agree with "C. W." that the old-world epochs afford plenty of scope for stirring stories of love and honour, but I have one great objection to using them at all regularly. "C. W.," who says that he has been an unfailing subscriber for a long time, must have noticed that all my serial stories and series of stories serve two objects; firstly, to amuse and entertain, and secondly, to point out present-day dangers to young men and women. Take, for instance, "The Bridge of Ruin," which concludes this week; and, "C. W.," you will quite see what I mean.

———

YOU will find on two of the earlier pages of this number a couple of sketches entitled "A Society Pair" and "The Coster Couple." These are the forerunners of a set of drawings which I am positive will bring forth your admiration. They are intended to depict the style and actions of lovers in various spheres of life, as well as of different nationalities. The artist who is executing these pictures not only has made a clever study of the faces and general demeanour of his subjects, but has also put a most pleasing finishing touch to his works by inclosing them in very dainty frames. In future issues I shall show, amongst others, types of Parisian, American, Irish, "Coon," Dutch, Russian, Italian, and Breton lovers. Will you let me know what you think of them?

———

I HAVE told you in my first paragraph about the new series in next week's number, and I am writing this to remind you that I have another pleasant surprise in store for you. In a week or so there will be starting in this paper a fine, thrilling serial story by Mr. George Griffith, who, as all of you are probably aware, has written many fine romances. It will be called "A Criminal Millionaire," and the plot is a decidedly original one, quite out of the ordinary running. It is graphically told, and is certain to hold the interest of every reader, as the excitement is sustained throughout.

———

YOU will find on page 467, an announcement regarding the "Juggled Letters" Competition. Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

The - - Maitland Millions.

Relating How a Girl Schemed for Wealth.

"If my grandson, Eric Maitland, should die before the age of twenty-one the estate shall revert to my nephew, Lionel Verner, and his heirs."

Sir Richard delivered the words with emphasis. In the quietness of the summer afternoon his voice carried far. Far enough, at all events, to reach his lady secretary. That young person paused half way up the staircase, then with some considerable care and agility retraced her steps, and took up her position—an indiscreet and uncomfortable one—at the key-hole of the library door. Inside Sir Richard was discussing the provisions of his will.

"It's no use, Paine," she heard the Baronet exclaim. "I've made up my mind. If anything happens to Eric, I should prefer that my sister's son should come after me, to the daughter of a scoundrel like Phillips. Yes, yes, I know what you're going to say," he interrupted testily, "that if Phillips was her father my poor daughter Triss was her mother. But her mother married against my will, and though both she and her scamp of a husband are dead, that's no reason why I should acknowledge their child. Once and for all, I will have nothing to do with her."

"Helen Phillips is entirely dependent on her own exertions," said the solicitor quietly.

"Well, put her down for a hundred pounds if you persist, and have done with the matter," Sir Richard replied impatiently.

The lawyer silently acquiesced, and the disposition of Sir Richard's property went on without further interruption.

Outside the door the private secretary was standing with flushed cheeks and eyes bright with excitement.

What she had heard was sufficient to make any girl excited!

She had just learnt that Lionel Verner, the man who for three years had been her persistent, if penniless, lover, was the nephew of a Baronet; and she had snubbed him unmercifully! Even kept from him the address of her present situation lest he should find courage—and the railway fare—to seek her out and renew his attentions.

To think that shabby young man should be the heir to a splendid place like Brayton Manor, and that he was head over ears in love with her. Why, it was the biggest piece of luck that could have happened. True, in their last interview she had forbidden Lionel to so much as think of her, but that was easily got over. A few soft words would bring him to her feet again, more enslaved than ever.

Already she saw herself mistress of Brayton Manor, with wealth and luxury at her command. Lionel's present poverty she ascribed to a difference of opinion with his uncle. Now she came to think of it, she remembered hearing Sir Richard allude to his nephew as "an ungrateful scamp."

Well, she must persuade Lionel to propitiate his uncle, and then——

Her daydreams were rudely interrupted.

"Miss Louis," said a childish voice, "I've been looking for you everywhere, will you take me for a walk?"

Eric looked eagerly up at her, and as Laura met his eyes all her castles toppled to the ground. She had forgotten—Lionel was only heir—"should my grandson die."

The words haunted her all the time she was dressing; they echoed in her ears. Her pen mechanically traced them on the paper when she tried to write, and it was only with a great effort that she put them out of her mind, and, giving all her faculties to the task, assured Lionel of her unalterable devotion, and her fixed determination to be true to him, in spite of poverty, for ever!

With a sigh she completed her preparations for the walk, picturing herself meanwhile in white satin, diamonds, and pearls, regretfully placing on her pretty head a sailor hat in lieu of the tiara, which in imagination she had fastened among her thick, dark braids.

It was a glorious afternoon, and, the letter safely posted, they turned towards the woods. Eric ran on in front to gather water lilies, and Laura returned to her visions of splendour and magnificence.

Hitherto her ambition had been set on charming the old Baronet into making her an offer of marriage. But at the best, she thought, the wife of a man of over seventy would be but another name for nurse; whereas married to Lionel, master of Brayton Manor, a very different future presented itself.

"Should my grandson die"—what was that scream, that cry that rang out shrill and piercing? Instinctively she hurried towards the lake where the child had been playing. He had stretched over the water to grasp a lily out of his reach, his foot had slipped, and now, his small hands clinging vainly to the branch of an overhanging tree, was in danger of sinking. Even as she looked the frail support gave way, and the child was struggling in the water.

There was no danger for a man or woman in the shallow pool, but Eric was under-sized for his age, and his feet did not nearly touch the bottom.

The girl took it all in with a flash of comprehension. The slender figure, the small, white face with its tremulous mouth and pleading eyes, the plaintive voice that called in an agony of childish wonderment—"Help me, oh, please help."

She saw it, understood it all. And stood motionless on the bank.

Another second and the child would not be there. Another second and Lionel, her lover, would inherit his uncle's wealth. And she could bid a long good-bye to the poverty and hardship that had soured her girlhood.

If only he would not look at her with such inquiring eyes. If only——

The child was young. He had no hold on life; it did not owe him years of happiness, she claimed.

And yet——

Would the child never drown?

Two small hands clutched wildly in the air, still grasping, poor little chap, the lilies that had cost him so dear.

The woman wavered, this last appeal touched even her hard heart. He should be saved.

Before she put her tardy resolution into practice, she was pushed roughly on one side. A young girl, flushed and panting, waded into the water, grasped the child, and carried him in safety to the bank.

"How could you stand there, letting him drown before your eyes?" she asked Laura indignantly. Then laying the boy upon the ground she commenced to chafe his hands.

"Are you a coward, or what?" she cried.

Digitized by Google

But Laura was too stunned to answer or offer a defence. She stood on one side until at last the boy opened his eyes and drew a long deep breath.

Then the instinct of self-preservation reasserted itself. Snatching Eric in her arms, she motioned the girl out of her way.

"It was you that frightened him with your screams," she said. "Well," as the girl stared, too astonished to reply, "are you waiting to be paid for what you've done? Call up at the Manor, and I daresay you'll be rewarded."

The listener's face flushed scarlet. Her pride was up in arms, but at the mention of the Manor she drew back, surprised almost—it seemed afraid.

"It is Eric Maitland?" she cried suddenly. "Oh, I must speak to him."

Would the child never drown!

Laura paid no attention to the words, however, but hastened on towards the Manor. The girl made no attempt to follow, but the recollection of the scorn, the accusation in her eyes, was hard for Laura Louis to endure. The child, already weighing down her arms, seemed to grow heavier at every step, and when at last she reached the house, in an uproar at Eric's absence, she was just able to put the boy in his uncle's arms, and then fell fainting on the floor.

She had no strength to suffer more.

"Is he any better, nurse?" Three times within the last half hour the poor old Baronet had made the same inquiry, and each time received the same sad answer, "No better."

It was three weeks since Eric's accident—for accident it was believed to be—and from then it had been a struggle between life and death for the boy, the issue now leaning to one side, now to the other.

Laura had taken to herself the credit of Eric's rescue, explaining that his foot had slipped, and that he had fallen into the water before she came to the spot. As the child was too ill to talk, her claim was undisputed, and she was regarded as his most devoted attendant.

When, therefore, in accordance with the doctor's directions, a trained nurse was sent for from the nearest town, Laura's indignation knew no bounds. "Could she not be trusted to nurse the child, whose life she had saved at the risk of her own?" she asked, and Sir Richard was hard put to it to quiet her.

She was prepared to treat the nurse as an interloper, and advanced to meet her with more than her usual air of insolence. But at the first sight of that fair, sweet face, at the sound of the rich, full voice, she started back frightened and amazed. In the quiet, self-possessed young girl who stood before her, she recognised the stranger who had saved Eric in the wood.

Perfectly polite, the nurse had behaved as if all recollection of their former meeting had vanished from her mind. What did she know—what did she suspect?

With the exception of the girl's reappearance, however, things were shaping themselves gradually to Laura's ends. Sir Richard had quite broken down since Eric was taken ill, and quietly acquiesced in Mr. Paine's suggestion that his nephew, Lionel Verner, should be sent for. And now Laura was waiting to receive him in the library, Sir Richard being unwilling to spare even a few moments from the child.

"How beautiful you are, my darling! how beautiful!" And Lionel bent to kiss the lovely face upturned to him.

But, the first joy of the meeting over, he grew quieter and more subdued, almost disturbed in his manner, and asked question after question about Eric, and Sir Richard, till Laura could have cried with vexation.

"Are you not pleased to see me?" she asked angrily.

He looked up, hurt and astonished. "You forget," he said coldly, "that little Eric is my cousin, and that I am anxious to know how he is."

And then, irritated by what she termed his stupidity, she made her first mistake. "You can't really want him to get better," she said, "for if Eric dies you will be Sir Richard's heir!"

She knew directly she had spoken that she had committed a grave error, and strove to banish the impression of her words by caresses and endearments; but he drew back from her touch and sternly asked her what she meant.

"How have you come by such a piece of information?" he said.

"Never mind!" she answered sullenly; "it is so, that's enough—if

Digitized by Google

"I am your grand-daughter, and my name is Helen Phillips."

Eric dies you will be master of Brayton Manor, and I shall be its mistress."

He moved away with a feeling of repulsion, almost disgust.

"It is true," she repeated. "Eric will die and you——"

"Miss Louis, Mr. Verner, Sir Richard wants you at once. Poor little Eric is very ill!" The nurse spoke hurriedly, but it seemed to Laura that even in her agitation there was a touch of scorn in her voice.

The child was sitting up in bed, smiling at his grandfather in his old wistful fashion. But when Laura entered the smile faded, his eyes grew wild with fear and terror.

"The water!" he shrieked. "Take her away! The water—oh, the water!" and, noting the terror in the childish face, Lionel pushed her gently from the room and closed the door.

By ten o'clock that night it was all over. The little life had ended—finished. Lionel stole quietly from the room. Sir Richard stood gloomily by the window hidden by the curtains. Thinking herself alone, the nurse knelt down by the bedside and kissed the small, white cheek.

"My poor little one!" she cried. "My dear, dear little cousin!"

"Cousin!" Sir Richard started. "Who are you?" he asked her. "What is your name?" Unshrinkingly she met his look.

"I am your grand-daughter," she answered; "and my name is Helen Phillips."

The old man dropped wearily into a chair. "Life's a strange tangle!" he said—"a strange tangle."

When at last she came to say "Good-night," Sir Richard kissed her gently on the forehead.

"God bless you, my child!" he said. "God bless you!"

* * * * *

In the morning they found the old man sitting by Eric's bed, his hand clasping the little wasted fingers, his grey head lying beside Eric's golden curls. For the world-worn, weary wanderer, and the little child, had set out together on life's last sad journey, to the land of Death!

It was the evening after the funeral and the members of the household were assembled in the library of Brayton Manor to listen to Sir Richard's will. Laura's heart beat fast, and her cheeks flushed as John Paine quietly unfolded the document, and prepared to make public the terms of the legacies.

"Before I commence," he said, "I have a duty to perform. Both of you have, I think, heard of Sir Richard's grandchild, the daughter of Beatrice Maitland who married Robert Phillips. In deference to this lady's wishes, I have kept silence up to the present, but the time has now arrived when I must introduce Miss Helen Phillips."

The young nurse bowed quietly. Lionel impulsively stepped forward and took her hand.

"We must be friends, cousin," he said kindly.

"Where are your proofs?" interrupted Laura. "What grounds have you for supposing this woman to be other than an impostor? Are you mad, Lionel, to take things so much for granted?"

"Sir Richard acknowledged this lady as his grand-daughter in my presence the night before he died," interposed the solicitor, "when he also made a new will."

"I leave all my property to my nephew, Lionel Verner, provided he marries my grand-daughter, Helen Phillips. If he declines the said Helen Phillips shall inherit in his stead; if, however, she is unwilling, then Lionel Verner shall take possession of the whole, with a deduction of £2,000 for her benefit."

Laura sprang to her feet. "Infamous!" she cried. "Infamous! Sir Richard knew that Lionel and I were engaged. How dare he offer me such an insult!"

"I don't think my uncle quite understood, Laura," said Lionel quietly, "or he would not have introduced such a proviso. You must not think me lacking in courtesy, Helen," he said, smiling at the fair, fresh face, which crimsoned under his steady gaze, "but the Fates have already provided me with a charming fiancée," and he took Laura's hand within his arm.

"You forget, Lionel," she interrupted impatiently—"you forget; it is for Miss Phillips to decline to marry you. Otherwise you will not have a penny."

"Miss Louis is quite correct," interposed the solicitor; "if Miss Phillips is willing to accept you for a husband, and you decline, the property is hers."

"It seems that I am not to be spared a rejection," he said, laughing; "so, speak on, Helen, and say that you'll have none of me."

The girl raised her eyes, the flush in her cheeks deepened, and then paled as suddenly.

"Why don't you speak?" said Laura sharply. "Are you waiting to be asked? Perhaps Miss Phillips is anxious for the experience of a proposal," she sneered; "you'd better make it in due form, Lionel!"

Helen's eyes filled, her lips quivered, and in pity for her evident distress Lionel decided to bring matters to a close. Taking her hand in his, he asked her, smiling: "Helen, will you be my wife?"

For a moment she looked up at him—his firm, yet tender mouth, the steadfast, kindly eyes. Then, with a little catch in her voice, she answered: "Yes!"

"What did you say?" shrieked Laura. "Do you know he is going to marry me? You are beside yourself. You shall not have Lionel or his money!"

At that Helen's wrath burst out.

"I do not want a penny of the money. I do not even lay claim to it."

Digitized by Google

"Are you so much in love with Lionel then?" sneered Laura.

"Take care," cried Helen—"take care, or you will try me too far! Ask your own heart, question your past, and you will find a key to this problem. Can you not guess?" she cried. "Can you not——"

"Helen!" cried Lionel quietly. "Helen!"

"Oh, forgive me!" she said, choking back her sobs—"forgive me! In time to come, cousin—in time to come—you may not think so strangely or so bitterly of me!"

"It's a vile conspiracy!" said Laura. "Can you say nothing, do nothing, Lionel?"

"There is nothing to be done," he answered sadly. "Come, darling!" he added, "we are young and strong, we can afford to brave poverty, my dearest, you and I."

"Poverty! I? I marry a man without a home—an income—nothing? You're a fool, Lionel, not to see through this minx! There's nothing left to do but to go to law and dispute the will."

"That I shall never do," he answered gravely. "Surely you cannot put the fear of poverty before the power of love? Think, dearest, but a little while ago you wrote to tell me nothing should ever part your heart from mine."

But she laughed derisively in answer. "Love!" she screamed; "it isn't in me! What should I, who have been fed upon poverty, know of love? It was money I wanted, not love. I have lied, stolen, cheated, heaped sin upon sin upon my soul, to gain that which I longed for, prayed for—wealth. And then, then, when the cup is at my lips, it is dashed upon the ground, and you—you talk of love!"

She was mad with rage and hate—mad to the point of murder. In her fury she seized a lighted lamp from a table standing near, seized it to throw at Helen. But passion blinded her eyes, clouded her judgment. The lamp fell crashing into splinters at her feet.

Her skirts aflame, her whole figure in a blaze, she dashed herself against the door, and before anyone could reach or touch her, rushed into the corridor. Faster and faster she sped down the passage, until her shrieks grew fainter, and then there was silence.

* * * * *

After Laura's awful death Lionel went abroad for over two years.

His return was unannounced and unexpected.

"I thought you'd made up your mind to settle out in Florida?" said John Paine, the solicitor. "What brings you back?"

"Curiosity," said Lionel. "I want to find out Helen's reason for acting as she did. Why did she say 'yes' to my offer of marriage? An offer made only in jest."

"Love—of money, perhaps," said the lawyer. "She did not want to lose the Maitland millions."

"Impossible! You tell me yourself she refuses to touch a penny of my uncle's money."

Paine glanced shrewdly at the young man.

"Why not ask her yourself?" he said.

"I can't. It would appear as if I reproached her for poor Laura's death."

The lawyer paused. Then he told him how Laura had heard of the will, and how she had contrived to let Eric drown Lionel, was thunderstruck.

Presently he roused himself and sent for his cousin. Love of Helen had drawn him back to England, love, and the hope that she returned it. Now the lawyer's story had destroyed much hope. It would be an insult to her to suggest it.

"I am leaving England, Helen," he said quickly, "but before I go I want to thank you for all you have done for me—how much I only knew to-day. I leave Brayton Manor in your hands, the property is yours."

Helen Phillips drew a little nearer and laid her hand upon her cousin's arm.

"Am I so very ugly?" she said, mischief in her eyes. "Oh, Lionel, Lionel, won't you take me and Brayton Manor too? I could not bear to lose you—or the Maitland millions."

But for answer Lionel kissed her.

John K. Prothero.

Juggled Letters Competition.

In this competition 139 competitors sent in absolutely correct lists, and in accordance with the conditions a further set of letters has been sent to them to decide in what order the prizes are to be awarded. The following is a list of the stations admitted as correct:—

1, Glasgow; 2, Belfast; 3, Oxford; 4, Liverpool; 5, Swansea; 6, Dublin; 7, Dover; 8, Portsmouth; 9, Leeds; 10, York; 11, Taplow; 12, Aberdeen; 13, Wigan; 14, Falkirk; 15, Mill Hill; 16, Perth; 17, Manchester; 18, Cwmbran; 19, Bradford; 20, Killarney; 21, Sheffield; 22, Holyhead; 23, Cork; 24, Yarmouth; 25, Exeter; 26, Brighton; 27, Norwich; 28, Carlisle; 29; Hereford; 30, Derby; 31, Leamington; 32, Killaloe; 33, Llandudno; 34, Inverness; 35, Salisbury; 36, Windermere; 37, Fenagh; 38, Bristol; 39, Margate; 40, Cynwyd; 41, Southampton; 42, Queenstown; 43, Arbroath; 44, Wakefield; 45, Glenfarg; 46, Richmond; 47, Balne; 48, Kildare; 49, Falmouth; 50, Tilbury; 51, Garngad; 52, Shrewsbury; 53, Paisley; 54, Limavady; 55, Morar, or Brora; 56, Leicester; 57, Greenock; 58, Cassillis; 59, Buncrana; 60, Sevenoaks; 61, Gretna; 62, Newport, Preston, or Prescot; 63, Hartlepool; 64, Brentor; 65, Salford; 66, Blantyre; 67. Hitchin; 68, Ventnor; 69, Eastbourne; 70, Ynysbwl, Wensley, or Swanley; 71, Dollar; 72, Tredegar; 73, Pembroke; 74, Farnham, Dearham, or Farcham; 75, Ballineen, Ebdon Lane, or Llandebie; 76, Manea; 77, Llanrhaiadr; 78, Holloway; 79, Croydon; 80, Stranraer; 81, Halewood, or Dawsholm; 82, Killybegs; 83, Walsall; 84, Uttoxeter; 85, Lairg, or Irlam; 86, Ystradowen; 87, Crook; 88, Friezland; 89, Achnasheen; 90, Brayton; 91, Smeaton, Stanhoe, Bentham, or Bensham; 92, Menheniot; 93, Hirwain; 94, Embsay, Seamer, or Ramsey; 95, Kirkcaldy; 96, Rhayader; 97, Lauder; 98, Eglwysbach; 99, Carrigans; 100, Balmoral; 101, Scrooby; 102, Hoghton; 103, Eskmeals 104, Belturbet; 105, Delgany; 106, Whauphill; 107, Findermore; 108, Yiewsley; 109, Whalley, Weyhill, or How Mill; 110, Invershin; 111, Pencoed, or Caledon; 112, Batley, Oakley, or Botley; 113, Treeton or Steeton; 114, Stalham, or Waltham; 115, Monikie; 116, Harrogate; 117, Gravesend; 118, Ystalyfera; 119, Carrowen; 120, Penzance; 121, Barlaston, or Darlaston; 122, Esplanade; 123, Rossington; 124, Delabole; 125, Aspatria; 126, Wenhaston; 127, Slateford; 128, Bullgill; 129, Golspie; 130, West Hoathly; 131, Flecknoe, Caerleon, or Greenock; 132, Muir of Ord; 133, Ulleskelf; 134, Ovoca; 135, Crianlarich; 136, Glossop; 137, Llanilar; 138, Warwick or Wickwar; 139, Kinaldie, Ilkeston, or Dinsdale; 140, Blackpool; 141, Healing, Cloghan, or Gilgach; 142, Loughrea, or Dolygaer; 143, Annaghilla; 144, Ferbane, Fencote, or Banteer.

THE ETIQUETTE OF ENGAGEMENT AND MARRIAGE.

Describing Modern Manners and Customs of Courtship and Marriage, and giving Full Details regarding the Wedding Ceremony and Arrangements.

By G. R. M. DEVEREUX.

Crown 8vo. Cloth. Price 1s.

Post free 1s. 2d.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "Etiquette of Engagement and Marriage," for which I inclose 1/2.

Name .....

Address .....

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

Digitized by Google

MYSTERIOUS MR. MARPOLE.

Relating how a Burglary Helped Two Lovers.

WOODLEIGH-UNDER-EDGE, in Gloucestershire, is famous for two things. One of these is its beauty, and the other is that it is the seat of Sir Herbert Wilcox, K.C.B.

"Neathwood" lies just off the main road to Bristol and is on an eminence commanding a magnificent view of the country round. Woodleigh Hill, on the side of which Woodleigh-under-Edge is perched, stands up at the end of a range of low hills, and on each side of it the beautiful undulating scenery can be seen for many miles.

Sir Herbert rejoiced in the possession of an exceedingly beautiful daughter of whom he was justly proud. Edith Wilcox was of medium height and a perfect figure. Great blue eyes shone beneath a white forehead in a shapely oval. Masses of curly brown hair which glinted golden in the sun surmounted her exquisite features. Small wonder is it that all the eligible young men in the countryside were in love with her.

But her love was already given, and her cousin, Charles Wilcox, son of Sir John Wilcox, of "Rattledown," in Wiltshire, was the fortunate possessor.

Sir Herbert Wilcox was, however, unaware of the state of affairs that existed between his nephew and his daughter. But the young people were quite decided, and had arranged everything, down to the pattern of the drawing-room carpet.

Charlie Wilcox spent half his time at "Neathwood," playing tennis, or boating on the river which runs through Kingswood. His father made him an ample allowance, besides which he had inherited a considerable sum from an uncle.

It was the evening before Edith's twenty-first birthday, and soon after that festival Charlie had made up his mind to speak to Sir Herbert, and to endeavour to get his consent to the engagement.

That evening Lady Bolton called in, full of the details of a burglary which had happened at her house some nights back.

"Yes," said this lady, "the men got in through the conservatory, and they've taken my diamond tiara, my diamond necklace, and a lot of things. I'm distracted, but the police say they've got a clue."

"What shall I do?" she rambled on. "The burglars ought to be hanged, indeed they ought."

Sir Herbert endeavoured to console her, but in a moment she had commenced again though this time on another tack.

"Oh, and what do you think? Why, a man has moved into Charford Hall, quite alone they say. I have found out his name is Marpole; but what can a single man want with that great place? I'm sure I don't know; he's something good-for-nothing, I'll be bound."

How often that is the case. When a man lives in seclusion and does not blare forth his doings and sayings to the world, they, whoever the estimable "they" may be, regard him with suspicious eyes.

Edith's twenty-first birthday dawned bright and sunny. As Charlie Wilcox looked out from his bedroom window over the fields to Woodleigh Hill (for he had stayed the night at "Neathwood."), he thanked the providence that had cast his life in such sunny places.

Suddenly he heard a commotion in the house, and looking down on to the terrace, he saw the butler, followed by two footmen, talking rapidly and gesticulating the while, emerge from the drawing-room door. They pointed to the ground and then went down the steps on to the lawn.

Leaning out of his window, Charlie called to them:

"Whatever is the matter?" he cried.

"Lor', Mr. Charles," the butler answered, "we've had burglars in during the night, and they've taken everything they could lay their hands on."

"One minute, and I'll be with you. You'd better call Sir Herbert, too."

Hastily completing his toilet, Charlie hurried downstairs, meeting Sir Herbert on the way.

It was easy to see where the thieves had got in, for the French window lock had been forced and the bolt filed through. The men had taken a lot of plate, a valuable picture had been cut from its frame, and various other articles were missing.

"The same gang that got into Lady Bolton's, I'll guarantee," said Sir Herbert.

They tried to trace which way the burglars had gone but found this beyond their powers. Eventually they gave up and Sir Herbert wired to Bristol for detectives. The Bristol force had already been endeavouring to trace the gang since the burglary at Lady Bolton's house.

"It's not the plate I mind so much, confound it," angrily said Sir Herbert. "It's the picture—it was an original Rubens. I'd give anything to get it back."

"You mean that, uncle?" said Charlie. The two men were alone in the great drawing-room which had been the scene of the burglary.

"Mean it? Why, of course I do," answered Sir Herbert, glancing curiously at Charlie.

"Well," said Charlie slowly, "let me strike a bargain with you. I love Edith, and she returns my love. I know you have views of her marrying Viscount Derwent, but I can assure you that Edith does not care a snap of the fingers for him. If I get back your picture will you give your consent to our engagement?"

Sir Herbert's brows contracted somewhat. It was true that he had thought otherwise for Edith, but if she cared for his nephew it would, no doubt, be as well to agree to Charlie's proposal.

"Very well," he said eventually; "it's a bargain."

The two men shook hands and then Sir Herbert went out of the room whilst Charlie sat and brought all his wits to bear on his self-imposed task.

For nearly an hour he sat thinking, and endeavouring to get out a plan of action. Suddenly he started to his feet.

"By Jove!" he muttered. "This mysterious man at

Digitized by Google

Charwood Hall. What did Lady Bolton call him? Marpole, yes, that was it."

"That's your man, Charlie," he went on, still speaking his thoughts aloud. "Discover what you can about him for your first move."

After breakfast he met Edith in a secluded portion of the grounds. It was hardly by accident, I am afraid I must say.

"I've spoken to uncle, Edie," was almost the first thing Charlie said. The thoughtful reader will appreciate the use of the word "almost."

"Yes, Charlie. What did he say?"

"Well, if I can get the picture back for him that was stolen last night, he'll consent to our engagement. It seems almost like putting a price on your head, doesn't it, dear? But I am of the private opinion that he would give his consent anyhow."

"Do you think you'll be able to do it, dear?" anxiously queried Edith. "It will be clever of you."

"Well, I am going to have a jolly good try," responded her lover, with a determined look on his handsome countenance.

He commenced his task almost immediately by going down to Charwood Hall and surveying it. Presently he plucked up courage and entered the grounds. There was not a soul to be seen, so he returned to "Neathwood" again to find out some means of getting to know the lonely inhabitant of Charwood Hall. His desire was very quickly gratified without any trouble on his part, for, as he passed through the little wood in front of "Neathwood," his gaze alighted on the object of his thoughts.

Mr. Marpole was a stoutish-built man of average height. He had white hair and wore blue spectacles, and was, in fact, as mild looking a man as you would meet in a day's march.

When Charlie saw him, however, he was on his knees intently surveying the ground before him. Immediately Charlie's suspicions were awakened, and he dropped to the ground behind a bush to watch unseen the movements of his prey.

"Are you a geologist, too?" came Mr. Marpole's voice after a moment or two.

"How the dickens did he see me?" muttered Charlie to himself. He was somewhat chagrined for he imagined he was on a hot trail, and working in quite a Sherlock Holmes style.

"I have a very fine specimen of strata here," went on Mr. Marpole as Charlie came up to him. And then he went off with a long scientific explanation on the strata of the neighbourhood.

"Nothing but an old bore of a geologist," disconsolately thought Charlie, and then aloud he made some suitable reply, for he had gone through a course of geology at Cambridge.

Mr. Marpole seemed delighted with his new-found acquaintance and insisted on Charlie going back to Charwood Hall with him to lunch.

At the end of the day Charlie was no nearer the solution he desired, and in a rather disconsolate frame of mind he retired for the night.

Before he turned in he went up the turret stairs on to the roof to smoke a cigarette. It was a lovely night, and, after finishing his cigarette, he put on a pipe. Presently he heard twelve o'clock strike, and then he resolved to seek his bed.

Suddenly a form emerged from the trees and cautiously came up on to the terrace. With bated breath Charlie hid behind the coping and watched. It was Mr. Marpole, and immediately Charlie's suspicions were again aroused. The midnight visitor did not wait about long, but retraced his steps after a few moments. Hurriedly Charlie went downstairs, and out on to the terrace, then into the wood. But all trace of Mr. Marpole had vanished. Once more he returned to his coign of vantage on the roof, and closely watched the grounds beneath him.

Charwood Hall is visible from the position Charlie occupied, and presently he was mortified to observe a light in the room which he knew to be Mr. Marpole's bedroom. He stayed and watched until he heard two o'clock strike, and then he gave in and went to bed, the light still burning.

Not a word of his suspicions did he vouchsafe to anybody. But to Edith he remarked that he had a clue, and hoped soon to have some important information to give.

He began to assiduously cultivate Mr. Marpole's acquaintance, until he thought the time was ripe for action. Each night he had gone to bed late with the light still burning at Charwood Hall, until traces of his short nights began to be apparent on his face.

Edith commenced to worry at Charlie looking so ill, and even Sir Herbert remonstrated with him.

"Let it go, my boy," he said, "I shall not stand in your way with Edith."

But Charlie was obdurate, more especially as he seemed to be so close on the trail of the thieves.

"No, uncle," he said. "We've made a bargain, and I'll do my best to carry out my part."

He had thought out a scheme whereby he hoped to learn a little more of this mysterious Mr. Marpole.

At "Neathwood" he had stated that he was going back to "Rattledown" that night, and apparently had cycled off in that direction after dinner. It was only a twenty mile ride, so that the lateness of his start escaped comment.

Certainly he did cycle in the direction of "Rattledown," but when he had got past Wickbattle, a village about a mile and a half away, he turned sharply off the main road, and took a direction which eventually brought him over the common to near Charwood Hall.

The hour was only half-past nine, and as he did not propose to commence work until twelve o'clock, he did not wish to be seen in the vicinity. He lifted his bicycle into a field, and then climbed over himself.

So he sat and waited; never had hours passed so slowly. But at last it turned a quarter to twelve, and then, with a sigh, he deliberately punctured his bicycle.

Slowly he wheeled his machine down the road and into the grounds of Charwood Hall. With a little grunt of satisfaction he observed that the light was still burning.

Charwood Hall had been built by a retired Indian colonel, and was of the bungalow type. Thus Mr. Marpole's sleeping apartment, where the light was burning, was on the ground floor.

Cautiously Charlie crept along, having left his bicycle by the front door. Suddenly his foot caught in something, and with a tremendous crash he fell to the ground. As he fell a bell jangled loudly inside the house, and at the same time he caught a glimpse of a face at the window. It was Mr. Marpole's, but without the blue spectacles, and in that telegraphic view Charlie observed the eyes, and saw, to all intents and purposes, that they were as good as his own. Then why the spectacles, unless as a disguise?

By this time Mr. Marpole was at the door, and a light was streaming out into the pathway.

"Hullo!" he cried. "Who's there?"

"It is I, Charlie Wilcox. My bicycle is punctured and as it was so late and I saw a light burning, I came to ask hospitality. I was going to tap at your window, when I fell over and made all that row."

"Come in, my dear fellow," cried Mr. Marpole heartily, as he returned a revolver to his pocket. "You fell into one of my little burglar traps; I have to be prepared for the gentry. I hope you did not hurt yourself?"

Digitized by Google

"Oh, no," hastily replied Charlie, who noticed that Mr. Marpole now had the blue glasses on again.

"Wheel your bicycle into the hall and come in. Have you dined?"

"Oh, yes, thank you. If you give me a bed it is all I want. I am very sorry to trouble you like this."

"Trouble?" cried Mr. Marpole. "Not at all, I'm only too delighted to have company."

He lit a lamp in a living room, and produced a box of cigars, but Charlie excused himself on the plea of fatigue.

His bedroom was in the same corridor as his host's room, and Charlie sat cudgelling his brains for some pretext of getting about the house, for he was convinced that Mr. Marpole was in some way connected with the burglars.

"Got it," he suddenly muttered, and then rapidly undressing, he donned the suit of pyjamas put out for him.

He waited for half an hour, and then undoing the door, he crept down the corridor to his host's room. He rapidly turned the handle and gazing striaght before him with a fixed, staring look in his eyes, as that of a somnambulist, he entered the room.

Before Mr. Marpole turned round Charlie caught sight of a diamond necklace, and then the hurried movement of his host caused him to return to his fixed stare.

Slowly he walked round the room, and stood gazing out of the window. His nerves were strained to their utmost, and he felt he could not keep it up much longer, and was half inclined to turn and grapple with Marpole. For some little time he stared out of the window and then, turning slowly, walked across the room, meeting the steely gaze of his host, who was fingering a revolver, without flinching.

The tension was tremendous, and now he was anxious to get away as quickly as possible from his trying situation.

"Mind that stool in your way," suddenly came the voice of Mr. Marpole.

Instinctively Charlie glanced to the floor, though only for a second, but that second was all sufficient.

"Exactly as I suspected, Mr. Wilcox," said Marpole, as he stood between his visitor and the door. "I know you have been spying on me. Do you think your overtures of friendship have blinded me? Do you think I did not see through your thin artifice to-night, first the puncture, and then the sleep-walking.

"Now, Mr. Wilcox, the game is up, so please sit down, and we'll talk over matters," continued Mr. Marpole, whilst he toyed suggestively with his revolver.

Charlie recognised that he was discovered, and, deeming it best to give into his captor, he sat down with a defiant expression on his face.

"You've been fairly clever, I admit, and I suppose you now imagine that you've run down the burglars in their haunt."

Charlie nodded.

"Well, I suppose nine hundred and ninety-nine people out of a thousand would come to the same conclusion. Just wait a moment, but don't try any fancy tricks whilst my back is turned as I can see you quite well in the mirror."

When he turned round again, Charlie gasped with astonishment. This was not Mr. Marpole; the white hair and glasses were gone, and the features entirely altered.

"What the dickens?" muttered Charlie.

"Permit me to introduce myself. John Hardcastle, at your service."

"What?" shrieked Charlie, "why, you're 'Smiling Jack.' Well, I'll be——" He relapsed into an astonished stare.

"I believe they do call me 'Smiling Jack.' I'm glad you recognise me or it might have been awkward," genially responded Marpole, or Hardcastle, to be correct.

John Hardcastle, known as "Smiling Jack," was the leading detective of the London force. His name and photo were often seen in the papers, for he had been responsible for many smart captures.

"But I thought——" began Charlie, in bewilderment.

"Exactly," said Hardcastle, cutting him short, "I thought you did. No, my friend, as you see my connection with the burglars is somewhat different."

"But Lady Bolton's diamonds?"

"Quite so—but confidence for confidence. Why are you so anxious to discover the thieves?"

"Why—er—because they've got away with uncle's picture and plate."

"Is that all?"

Charlie became a little embarrassed, and coughed slightly to give him time to think. Then he decided to make a clean breast of it all to the detective. When he had finished Hardcastle smiled encouragingly at him.

"Quite romantic, isn't it?"

"Think so?" muttered Charlie disconsolately. "But you will upset it all. Now I shall not have a chance to carry out my scheme."

"I don't see that exactly," said Hardcastle. "There's no reason why you shouldn't play a leading part in the discovery."

"What?" cried Charlie. "You mean you will help me? By Jove! you are a good chap."

Hardcastle smiled and looked at his watch.

"We've still half an hour before we start," he said.

"Half an hour before we start?" Charlie repeated in a mystified tone.

"Yes, my boy, now listen." Then "Smiling Jack" told Charlie how he had got on the track of the thieves. How he had discovered the hiding place for their loot preparatory to taking it to London. How, a few hours ago he had gone and transported it to Charwood Hall, and how he intended to capture the burglars that same morning at Lovell Court.

"They are quite a common or garden crowd," he said. "I had not the slightest difficulty in tracing them. At two o'clock this morning they are to break into Lovell Court, Lord John Lovell's place, and there they will fall into our hands. I've got the police ready, and you and I will have the credit of it."

"I?" cried Charlie. "But I've had nothing to do with it!"

"Well, my boy, you traced the stolen property, didn't you? Now you might as well finish off the job by helping to capture the burglars, see?"

Charlie saw, and was profuse in his thanks to John Hardcastle.

By seven o'clock the police with their prisoners were in the train bound for Bristol. Charlie stood on Charwood station to see them off.

"Good-bye," said "Smiling Jack" as they gripped hands. "You've got a pleasant morning before you." He referred to the picture which Charlie carried, and which by a special act of courtesy he was allowed to retain.

"Good-bye, Mr. Hardcastle. Thanks ever so much for all you have done for me. You'll come down and see me sometimes, won't you?"

"As a geologist, eh?" laughingly cried Mr. Hardcastle, "with a mirror which helps me to see out of my back?"

Charlie strolled into "Neathwood" as they were sitting down to breakfast. They were not surprised to see him again so soon, as he rode over at all hours.

"Morning, uncle, and everybody," he said. "By the way, uncle, you'd better get a man down to put the picture in." He spoke with a great air of sang froid, and handed the picture to his uncle in a nonchalant way.

"What!" almost screamed Sir Herbert Wilcox, whilst all present indulged in astonished exclamations.

"Come and shake hands, my boy, I'm proud of you. I've got an announcement to make," said Sir Herbert, "that is, these young people, my nephew and my daughter, have made up their minds to marry each other, and now await your congratulations."

Edith blushed vividly as Charlie turned and in front of them all deliberately kissed her.

E. Newton Bungey.

Digitized by Google

Engagement Not Announced.

LORD DUFFER: "You're a girl after my heart." Miss Price: "And you're a man after my money."

Would Come as a Shocker.

MISS THIRTYODD: "I want to give my fiancé a surprise on his birthday. Can't you suggest something?" Miss de Flypp: "Well, you might tell him your age."

Would Use Them as Object Lessons.

WIFE: "You haven't used any of those cigars I bought for you." Husband: "No, I am keeping them for Tommy when he wants to learn to smoke."

And They Struck!

HE: "I suppose you are aware of the tender feeling I have for you?" She: "No; I'm quite in the dark." He: "That being the case permit me to suggest that we strike a match."

Where They Are Similar.

FINNICK: "If you notice, the poets invariably refer to the earth as 'she.' Why should the earth be considered feminine, I'd like to know?" Sinnick: "Why not? Nobody knows just how old the earth is."

Insult to Injury.

"BRIDGET," said Mrs. Hyflyte, "your lady friend mustn't stay so late again. Her uproarious laughter woke me up at one o'clock this morning." "Yes, mum; I was tellin' her about how you tried to make a cake one day."

Farming Extraordinary.

MABEL: "There's Mr. Stubbs. He's the only farmer on record who has made his money out of weeds." George: "He surely didn't do that?" Mabel: "Yes, he did." George: "How, pray?" Mabel: "He married a widow."

Sweet Tempered Man!

WIFE: "You do not speak to me as affectionately as you used to, George. I think you have ceased to love me." Husband: "There you are again! Ceased to love you! Why, I love you better than my life. Now shut up and let me read my paper."

Hubby Suspected a Visitor.

MOTHER: "You say your husband no longer spends his evenings at the club." Daughter: "I soon broke him off that." Mother: "How did you manage?" Daughter: "Before going to bed I put two easy chairs close together by the parlour fire, and then held a match to a cigar until the room got a faint odour of smoke."

He Got Rather Muddled.

HE: "I trust you have forgiven me for not recalling your name the other evening, although I remembered your face perfectly." She: "Oh, yes; but my name is such a plain one I should think you would have remembered it quite as readily." He: "Not at all; your name isn't half as plain as—er—beg pardon; your face is much more aristocratic than your—I mean to say that your name is harder than——"

Unselfish Man.

THE BRIDE (on the honeymoon): "Why, you only bought one ticket, dear!" The Groom: "By Jove! I never thought of myself."

More Pierpont-Morganism.

"GRANDPA, what is a morganatic marriage?" "A morganatic marriage? H'm! That must be a marriage for money."

Sensation Extraordinary.

HUSBAND: "I am just in the mood for something sensational and startling—something that will make my hair stand on end." Wife: "Here is my last milliner's bill." His hair stood!

The Banns are Published.

ADA (pensively): "I hope you'll invite me to the wedding when you get married." Jack (boldly): "I'll invite you before I ask anyone else, and if you don't accept there won't be any wedding."

On the Instalment System.

MOTHER: "I am afraid Mr. Crisscross is not serious in his attentions." Daughter: "Oh, he's very bashful, you know; he's offering himself by pieces. Last night he wanted me to take his arm."

How They Do Things Now.

GLADYS: "If she doesn't love him, why does she encourage him?" Edith: "Well, she's hoping her father will suspect she loves him, and send her on a trip to the Continent to overcome her infatuation!"

She Did Not Study Astronomy.

SHE: "And you say you can tell by the stars if he loves you? Why, I didn't know that you ever scanned the skies." Belle: "I don't; but I scan his love letters. He is one of those fellows that marks a star for every kiss."

Nice and Roomy.

MRS DE STYLE: "Oh, John, please buy me that drum! I know you can get it cheap." Mr. de Style (dumfounded): "Gracious, what in the world do you want a bass drum for?" Mrs. de Style: "Why, it will make such a splendid box for my theatre hat."

Alas! Too True!

A LECTURER on optics, in explaining the mechanism of the organ of vision, remarked: "Let any man gaze closely into his wife's eye, and he will see himself looking so exceedingly small that——" Here the lecturer's voice was drowned by shouts of laughter.

And the Echo Answers "Why?"

FIRST COUSIN: "It is annoying that our names are the same. You often get my letters, and I often get yours." Second ditto (sweetly, but insinuatingly): "Well, why don't you ask your friends to put 'senior' after your name, when they address letters to you?"

Just Fancy!

SUE: "Blanche had an awfully embarrassing experience at the theatre last night. Her hair came down!" Nell: "How excessively annoying." Sue: "But that wasn't the worst of it. It rolled under the seats, and was only recovered after a good deal of trouble, and then you can fancy what a condition it was in."

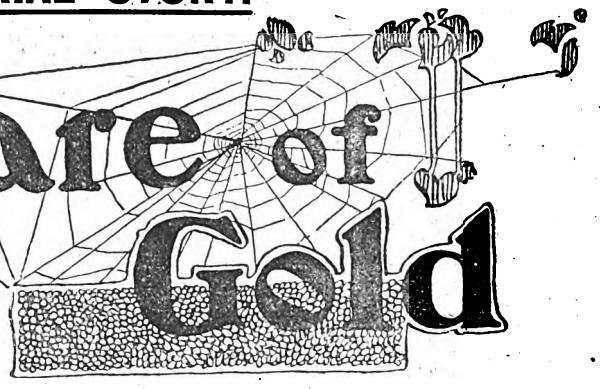
At His Own Expense.

MR. BLUFF: "Look here, young man, you're always going about with my daughter, and I want to know what your intentions are regarding her?" Young Man: "I really have no intentions, sir." Mr. Bluff (angrily): "Then what do you mean by amusing yourself at my daughter's expense?" Young Man: "I'm not amusing myself at your daughter's expense, sir, but at my own expense. I always pay for the theatre tickets and refreshments."

Digitized by Google

GRAND SERIAL STORY.

The Snare of Gold



A Tale of Love, Ambition, and Crime.

By

Henry T. Johnson.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS IN THIS SPLENDID STORY ARE:

George Geldart, a former prosperous City merchant, supposed to be dead, and now known as "Old Mystery."

Eric Geldart, his elder son, who conspired to kill his father, thereby coming into his property. He then enters Parliament, where he forms a new party.

Ronald Geldart, the younger son, who has been disinherited because he has been falsely accused of robbing his father.

Clare Armitage, the adopted sister of the two brothers, and who was betrothed to Eric, who now scorns her love.

Boanerges Blagdon, the traitorous partner of old Geldart, whom he has cheated in business, and who plots with Eric to murder him.

Sampson Scrimshaw, company promoter, who befriends "Old Mystery," by whose assistance he is successful in endeavouring to become an M.P.

Mr. Stanyer, an Australian financier, who gives "Old Mystery" the post of English agent for his business.

Madeleine Lorraine, daughter of Lord Lynton, who is beloved by Eric, but who loves "Harvey Bligh," the popular author, really Ronald Geldart.

Phyllis Daventry, typewriter to Scrimshaw, who takes a fancy to "Old Mystery." She is rescued from Hooligans by Ronald Geldart.

Jack Widdicombe, cousin to the brothers Geldart, and who occupies a responsible position on the Meteor.

TWENTY-THIRD CHAPTER.

Ronald Learns the Truth.

Hailing another cab, Clare drove to Little Turnstile, and there alighting, walked through into Lincoln's Inn Fields.

She was late and hurried along, fearing Ronald might not have waited, and in her haste and anxiety not observing through the falling mist that she was being followed.

She crossed the wide road and hurried along by the railings. Turning the corner of the square, she still further quickened her pace, for there on the opposite side of the road she made out through the murky vapour a tall, well-knit form, clad in a light ulster, pacing to and fro. Swiftly going over to him, and extending both hands, she exclaimed:

"Ronald, I was so afraid you would not wait. Fate seemed to be conspiring to prevent my getting here in time."

"Clare," he said compassionately, "you are white and trembling with cold."

"Not with cold, Ronald, with fear; my heart is full of a thousand fears."

"What is there to harm you?"

"I don't know, I can't tell. Most of all I was afraid something was going to happen to prevent my meeting you and saying what I have to say."

"Let us walk round to the hotel there, Clare, it is chilly for you here."

"No, no! I want to say what I must say here and now. Ronald, listen to me, but don't look at me, I couldn't bear your eyes upon me while I am telling you the awful, wicked truth."

And then, pacing to and fro along the pavement of the deserted square, along by the railings of the stone-paved courtyards to the quaint, gloomy old houses, once the mansions of nobility, now the storehouses of their title deeds and haunts of their legal advisers, Clare told Ronald Geldart the appalling story of her treachery towards him, how she had abstracted the notes and cheques from his father's desk and planted certain of them in his room in the pockets of one of his jackets, and how she had conspired with Eric, his traitor brother, to turn his father's heart against him, and fix upon his character and name a foul, unjust, indelible suspicion.

Ronald listened with horror in his heart, horror that a fellow creature, let alone his own blood brother, could so forget all ties of blood, could even dream of, let alone devise and carry out, a villainy so monstrous.

That Eric had lied about him to his father, had done all in his power to embitter that father's heart against him, he from the first had known, although he had no means of proving it, but even at his worst he had not deemed his brother quite so black as in the light of truth he proved to be.

As for the woman by his side, the ingrate whom he in other days had loved and reverenced as child companion, as friend, of his boyhood and his youth, almost as a sister, it passed all bounds of wonderment how she could have requited his belief in her, respect for her, by malice so envenomed. And she, pacing at his side with hands clasped and eyes cast down, seemed to read the workings of his heart, for she wailed in anguish.

"Ronald, Ronald, what have you to say to me? What are you thinking of me? You were always so gentle and so kind to me, my playmate as a child, my protector and defender in my girlhood, my almost brother, my more than brother. Oh, Ronald, when you are thinking the very, very worst of me, remember that it wasn't Clare, it was a poor, weak, hypnotised, resistless creature, helpless in his hands, resistless to his will. Oh, God! I could throw myself down here upon the stones and beg of you to trample me beneath your feet, to spurn me with your heel."

They walked along in silence, a silence broken only by her sobs. At last he stopped and turned.

"Good-bye, Clare, I will leave you now. I don't know what to say or what to think."

"But, Ronald, what is to be done to clear your name, to bring the guilty ones to justice?"

"I don't know—I don't know. Even now it seems to me you are speaking out the truth not so much to clear the right as to avenge yourself on the wrong-doer who has been false to you. Clare! Clare! let me put you into a cab and leave you, then I'll try and think out what is to be done. It's gone so far, the evil that you've done, that there's no knowing if it ever can be quite undone. You know the workings and the windings and the mischief of a lie. It is cast upon the air like an evil germ or like the breath of a disease. None know whither it may wend its evil way; it may be met and killed, or it may not, but who can call it back?"

Digitized by Google

"But, Ronald, you must meet the lion and kill it, and I will aid you. Oh, believe me, I do repent. I've been haunted by the memory of my sin by night and day. Oh, Ronald, Ronald!" she hushed her voice into a whisper, "believe me, at times I do believe your father's restless spirit has faced me to reproach me with my sin, for since he died I can almost swear that I have looked and met the gaze of his accusing eyes."

"But you must see," said Ronald, "that you have no simple task to right the wrong you wrought so easily. It must be palpable to you that, were you now to rally to my side and speak the truth to all the world, you must ere long be ranged before the world beside your partner and accessory in crime—your partner, I should say between your partners.

"Clare Armitage, to undo the evil you have done me would be to risk the standing in a prison dock beside my father's unctuous traitor partner, Blagdon, the smug, suave pillar of respectability, the bulwark of and the warden of his church—the man who, with his oily, treacherous smile, fat and sleek with evil gains, snug in the garnered harvest of his black and base rascality, tells little children that it is a sin to steal and lie, and that if they are good they will be happy, and bids the little innocents beware of the snare of gold. With that man on your right hand and on the other my brother Judas."

"Ronald! Ronald!" the anguished girl cried in a frenzy of contrition, despair, remorse, "all this, all this I will do, all this I will risk, all the penalties of the law that I deserve I will undergo if I can undo my sin." Then in a gentler voice and with a kindly hand upon her shoulder he said:

"Clare! Clare! you must think, we both must think what is best to be done—for both our sakes! I cannot let you sacrifice yourself altogether. I can understand that it was not the promptings of your heart that made you do these wicked things. The memory of the old days pleads for you in my heart. Go now, Clare, and perhaps there may be another way; perhaps you can write it all down and sign it before credible, reliable witnesses. Having done your best to undo the wrong, you may for a while withdraw beyond the pale of the laws that you have outraged. Now let us part to think things over."

"Ronald!" she wailed. "God bless you for speaking to me in that strain. Your kindness smites me harder than any words of anger or scorn. God bless you, Ronald. Good-bye, good-bye, until we meet again."

"Until we meet again," he said, hastening away, and little recking that ere they met again life for one of them would have merged into eternity, and the river would have met the ocean.

He disappeared in the gloom, and Clare retraced her steps, re-crossing the road towards the railings of the grassy, thickly-timbered square; something meantime whispering in her heart: "Don't go that way, you are alone"; and oppressed by this troublous sense of impending peril, she quickened her steps, and in her gathering panic almost ran along the greasy pavement.

And a cry broke in her throat as through the murky mist a form approached her, a hand was laid upon her arm.

"Who is it?" she cried. "Why—it's Eric! Oh, I was so frightened!" and all her alarm vanished. But alarm gave place to pain, so rough and ruthless was that grip upon her shoulder.

"Eric!" she pleaded, "don't—don't, you're hurting my arm. Eric, dear Eric, why are you looking at me like that?"

"You she-cat! You fiend! So you've kept your word, you've carried out your threat. You will have it—then take it!"

His right hand poised itself behind his head and fell with a heavy blow upon her heart.

"Oh, Eric, to think that you should strike me!" for she

(Continued overleaf.)

DISTRESSING FATNESS AND ITS CURE.

IT is an extraordinary fact that thousands of men and women go on month after month and year after year carrying a burden of superfluous fat, a burden often unsightly and always more or less distressing, without taking any whole-hearted measures to rid themselves once and for all of the incubus. Others, perhaps less excusable still, undergo all kinds of weakening methods involving semi-starvation, the excessive use of cathartics, dangerous drugging and other evils, without any permanent benefit in the way of destroying the tendency to get stout, but with, too frequently, a disastrous effect upon the constitution. In ninety-nine cases out of a hundred as soon as these health-destroying methods are dropped the fat forms again with redoubled persistence, notwithstanding the fact that the subject is obviously enfeebled in general health and vitality. The thousands of persons who have gone through any of these painful processes, and who have finally turned to the famous "Russell" treatment—the one scientific, rational, and permanent cure for excessive stoutness—are unanimous in their grateful acknowledgment of its marvellous effects, both as to radical cure of obesity and wonderful strength-giving powers. The "Russell" treatment not only eliminates from the system all superabundant fatty deposits, both internal and subcutaneous, but tones up the jaded system, promotes appetite, assists digestion and assimilation, and builds up health and nervous vigour and muscular strength by sheer force of increased nutrition. Its fat-eliminating powers are evident from the very first; for within twenty-four hours of adopting the treatment there is a decrease of weight varying from ½lb. to 2lb., according to the individual case. In cases of extreme obesity the decrease is considerably more, and sometimes approaches 4lbs. After the initial decrease indicated there is a consistent daily reduction while the treatment is followed, and with the ultimate certain attainment of normal proportions, the régime may be abandoned without fear of a relapse. The reduction is proportionate over the entire surface of the body, with the result that beautiful facial lines are as surely regained as correct abdominal girth. The muscles become firm, the skin clear, the complexion roseate, the bearing alert and graceful. After a complete course of "Russell" the patient is veritably a new being. The recipe of the principal preparation employed is given in "Corpulency and the Cure" (see note below), the standard work on the causes and the cure of corpulency. This compound is a harmless, pleasant-tasting liquid, of purely vegetable ingredients, and its grand tonic properties are such that it could have none but the best effects upon the most delicate constitution. A perusal of "Corpulency and the Cure," which contains information and advice of the highest value to stout persons, as well as a thousand extracts from letters of persons of both sexes who certify to the permanent beneficial effects of the "Russell" treatment, is most earnestly recommended. The address is given below.

STANDARD BOOK FREE.

On receipt of three penny stamps to defray postage under plain sealed envelope, &c., Mr. F. Cecil Russell, Woburn House, 27 Store Street, Bedford Square, London, W.C., will be pleased to forward to all readers of "Short Stories," a gratis copy of his authoritative work, "Corpulency and the Cure" (256 pages 8vo). It contains the most exhaustive information on the causes and cure of obesity, besides a thousand testimonials from the author's patients, and as many extracts from the Press.

All communications treated as strictly private.

Digitized by Google

only felt the dull pain and shame of the blow of his clenched hand—not the sting of what was in it—for a while.

But he raised that cruel hand again, gripped her throat within his elbow, forcing her backwards across his knee, and in the dim glimmer of a lamp above she saw that hand upraised again, a something glittering in it and daubed with a crimson splash.

"Eric! What are you doing! Oh, Eric, for—God's sake, don't stain your soul—not for my sake, but for yours, my dear. Don't—don't!"

But the red, remorseless hand came down again, a sob bubbled up in her throat, a sickly numbing faintness followed the shock of that twice murderous stab.

Heavy and inert she lay back in his arms. Brutal villain that he was, he let her fall upon the stones, looked close into her face, placed his cheek against the mouth he so often had kissed with lies of love eternal, this time to make sure she had ceased to breathe.

The teeth were clenched, the jaws were set and rigid, the eyes were closing.

"God—forgive!" With one heave of her lacerated bosom she sighed, a shudder thrilled her, her head fell back, leaving her chin, hard and cold as marble, upwards.

"She is quite safe now," he said. Swayed by a sudden impulse he kissed her—then left her.

Ere he had gone a dozen yards another form loomed through the mist.

"Eric! What have you done?" Blagdon, now a quaking jelly of a man, quavered. "Where is she? What has happened to her? Why have you left her so soon? What is she going to do? Eric! For God's sake, tell me, what have you done? You haven't—oh! you haven't——" He could not frame the word to clench his sentence—but he knew that Eric had.

Whining and whimpering, he hurried along beside him till they reached a fountain, and there the younger man, filling the cup, poured it over his hands, laved them, rinsed them again and again, washing away in that crystal spring the stain that not all the ocean could cleanse from his soul.

Wiping and drying his hands upon a handkerchief, he strode along towards Little Turnstile, his elder, but less desperate, villain comrade at his elbow.

As they neared the north side of the square a man crossed their path some yards ahead, and was lost in the deepening gloom, but ere the view of him was lost for a moment a glimmering ray fell on his face and the two ruffians clutched each other's arms.

"My God, Blagdon, did you see that face?"

"I thought I saw it, Eric, but it couldn't have been. My eyes were playing tricks. Oh, tell me, what was it that you saw?"

And Eric Geldart, M.P., thief, and murderer, replied:

"I saw the face and form of my dead father!"

TWENTY-FOURTH CHAPTER.

Springle Gets into Difficulties.

The topics at this particular period occupying most public attention were the fixtures for the opening football and the closing racing season, the latest play, and the doings of Sampson Scrimshaw, M.P.

Opening your morning paper you were met with interesting columns as to the plans of the "genial and able manager," the migration from Slagton to Stockham of Punter and the trial of the Cambridgeshire crack.

Turning to another sheet you would read something like this: GIGANTIC CITY DEAL. MAMMOTH TRANSACTION BY THE MULTI-MILLIONAIRE M.P.

For, although the world had not guessed the secret of the System so elaborately planned and manipulated, thought out by Old Mystery, and worked out by him in conjunction with Sampson Scrimshaw, the world could not help knowing, and Scrimshaw cared nothing that it knew, of the big deals he made as the outcome of that System, and the magnificent margin of profit resulting to him in connection therewith.

Scarcely a day passed without some startling movement in the financial field by this new Napoleon, who bought up at twenty-four hours' notice the enterprises and corporations of big firms, industrial and commercial, amalgamating some, separating and developing others, and in all operations displaying skilled insight and foresight, garnering in to his own credit tens of thousands, where others had despaired of even thousands. Newly-acquired enterprises flourished more vigorously than ever, and Scrimshaw's fortunes grew and grew.

"Mystery," said Scrimshaw, "we shall be worth more money than we know what to do with. If people only knew."

"But they don't know, they mustn't know, else our chance of going on piling it up is gone for ever."

"But why go on piling it up? I've enough to live in ducal style on for all my days, and you—what you're doing with it, goodness knows; hardly anybody knows even where you live. What do you do with all the money you're making?"

"Count it," said Old Mystery. "There's always that pleasure when you've money, when you've bought all you want to buy, and there's nothing you want to acquire, and nobody you want to bribe. You can count—count—count—it's like wine, to have a big total all your own."

Financier as he was to the tips of his fingers, Scrimshaw turned, oppressed by a creepy feeling, from this old man with the cavernous eyes, who, living the life of a nameless drudge, he knew to have amassed with him hundreds of thousands.

"But then the time will come for you to die, and who have you to leave it to? No kith or kin?"

"To wrangle over it?" returned Old Mystery; then in an altered tone: "How do you know?"

"I don't know; you're simply to me from beginning to end a mystery; a master of finance with more genius for money making than any man I've ever met—but you're a mystery. Well, by-bye. I'm going to dine at the Carlton; then I've a box at the Empire; ladies, Mystery, and real swagger ones too, one a marchioness and the other a Mrs., with a name as old as any title in the country, and they like the Empire best of all the shows, because they won't stand preaching and teaching; and then a supper at the Savoy to wind up with.

"My boy, I'm making my pile to spend it. I mean to live my life. You can go on counting—counting, if you like. But, by the bye, old man, its hardly safe to keep those notes and bonds in a crazy old hutch like this. Why not put them in the bank?"

"They're just as safe here," laughed the old man. "Mr. Bill Sykes might make a dash for the Cosmopolitan Trust; he wouldn't think of wasting time on poor Old Mystery's bare, furnished den. Good night."

Scrimshaw was already half-way down the stairs, and the man left alone, unlocking boxes and drawers, took out rolls of notes and gold and placed them upon the table in a heap, a gigantic heap, if measured by their intrinsic value.

And so he went through them, turning over the crisp notes, coupons, share certificates, and bonds, and adding them up in hundreds, thousands, tens of thousands, mere heaps and handfuls of paper, with no chink or glitter about them, only a low, sibilant rustle, as though the secret of their wealth was only to be spoken in a whisper, marked with quaint designs and intricacies of the engraver's art.

But light and flimsy as they were, they were deeds of title vesting in their holder interests in mighty enterprises near and far, unanswerable demands on wealthy corporations for their gold. And all the outcome of the System—that Eric, with his infernal supercilious airs, his affectation of superior intellect, which Blagdon, with his almost boastful disavowal of intellectual gifts, his arrogance of stupidity, had scoffed at.

There was the result, tangible, complete, an accomplished fact, and Eric and Blagdon themselves entangled in the toils of finance, enmeshed in Scrimshaw's Snare of Gold, the snare that, though they knew it not, he, Old Mystery himself, had helped to set and to manipulate.

Digitized by Google

Then he reflected on Scrimshaw's words. What was to be the end of it?

He had set himself to do this thing, had proved his System infallible, here was the proof; and now in his heart of hearts he was wearying of the double life, the sequel, as it were, to the life that had been; was longing to rehabilitate himself in his habit as he lived of old.

He had taught Eric a hard and bitter lesson, had proved Blagdon a blatant fraud. Now it was in his power to demand of Eric his brother's rehabilitation—then he would forgive. It was time now to lift from Ronald the burden of unjust suspicion, and face him out in the light of day, the soul of honour, tried and true as steel.

Someone else was staying late that night.

In the office downstairs Horace Springle pored over the cash account and the cash books, the contents of which evinced no more disposition to agree than oil and vinegar or two cats of the Kilkenny breed.

Horace Springle gazed with stolid despair at the column of figures in the cash book and at the total, and thence at the contents of the cash box, the gulf between which seemed every moment to divide.

How was that gulf to be bridged, for the day of reckoning was at hand. On the morrow he had to present for verification his periodical account, that account which showed so serious a balance against him—a balance that had increased with every effort to replace it.

For Horace in his way had gone the pace, and the luxury had proved an expensive one. Fast living had meant speedy insolvency, and in the hope of replenishing he had backed his fancy, and his fancy had broken its backer.

Then, "to get his own back," he had made that fatal and unhappily frequent error, had used the funds of others, the moneys entrusted to him by his employer, and, these having gone, in yet more frantic efforts, had staked still heavier sums, making still further deficits. And now he stood face to face with the alternative of flight or exposure.

What would they say at Bloomsbury Square? How Grimmage would sneer and how Mrs. Skimper would throw up her hands! And what would they say at the halls, the "boys," the old pals and the "duckies," to win whose boisterous regard he had first ventured into troubled waters?

What was there to be done? Only one thing seemed possible. A further slip down the slanting path, closer to the precipice beyond, a further inroad depletion. Yes, the absolute emptying of that cash-box—and then—flight, and trusting to luck!

Hark! With guilty start he clutched the cash-box convulsively. Listened. The sound was from upstairs. Old Mystery was still at work, for he heard the door close, though Scrimshaw's receding footsteps had sounded half an hour before.

What was the old man up to? There was some secret on the board betwixt him and the governor, perhaps, Springle charitably reasoned, some fraud or plant, public or private, and possibly connected with the governor's recent blossoming from a thriving man into a Crœsus.

If such a secret existed, the possession of it might lead to the repletion of that emptied cash-box. And Horace Springle, quietly slipping off his stool, stealthily glided through the corridors of the big office on the ground floor, crept upstairs past the offices of the Trust on the first floor, and so on tiptoe up the stairs towards Old Mystery's den.

Then he stooped, peered through the keyhole. There the old man sat, all alone, sorting and counting sheaves and piles of papers—papers which Springle, with indrawn breath, recognised as bank-notes, cheques, and bonds—heaps of

(Continued overleaf.)

Bovril's New Gravure.

"The Leopard Skin."

From the Painting, by I. SNOWMAN, at the Royal Academy, 1903.

(The above rough sketch necessarily gives but a poor idea of the beauty of the gravure.)

For particulars how to get one of these handsome pictures (size 29 by 18½ inches, besides mount), free, see leaflet and coupon with each bottle (1-oz. to 16-oz.) of BOVRIL.

Digitized by Google

them! Why, there was a fortune on that table.

The old man's back was towards him. He turned the handle of the door, pushed it ajar, peered into that room, bare of aught, except the accessories to the game of finance. Two thousand—three thousand—the old man was counting under his breath. Yes, ten—twenty—fifty—sixty thousand in clean, crisp notes of Mammon's high temple—the Bank of England! It made Springle's eyes blaze and his mouth water; it made his heart leap to see such wealth so near.

So near—so near! Yes, made it leap with a wild, dangerous impulse, born of that thought; it was so near.

The Snare of Gold was working hard, its tentacles were on the soul of this weak nature, and, weak as he was, those toils infused in him, like some magic magnet, an artificial strength, and nerved the coward fibre of his heart.

Hunger had him by the throat—the hunger of Greed, which has spelt murder in all ages since time immemorial.

He looked about him for a weapon. His eyes lit on a heavy office ruler just beyond one of those heaps of notes. He made a spring for it, the old man sprang up with a deep gasp of apprehension. The young one had his weapon and threw himself upon him, aimed a heavy blow at the silver head, numbed the forearm guarding it.

"Help! Help! You young murderer! You coward!"

Old Mystery seized the weapon of his adversary in a strenuous grasp. Old as he was, he was well knit and strong, had been an athlete in his early days, and the young one was hard put to it. But, besides his youth, he had two hands to struggle with, whereas one of Old Mystery's hung useless at his side; and as they wrestled and writhed, overturning chairs, stools, and table, the old man's breath came and went in deep, spasmodic gasps. A sudden turn, a slip, and he was down, with one relentless hand clenched at his throat, the other raised aloft.

"Mercy!" gasped the old man. "Take the money, leave me my life."

A moment his assailant hesitated; perhaps the white hair unnerved him, for he lowered that menacing hand. But then swift the thought of his own danger flashed across his brain.

"I'll make sure," he said, and poised his weapon for the murderous blow.

And suddenly the door was flung wide open and a man burst into the room and threw himself upon the would-be murderer. Only just in time. He gripped that uplifted wrist, and in another few seconds Old Mystery, breathless and dishevelled, was scrambling up.

Springle himself was cowering in a heap, his weapon wrenched from his grasp, the new-comer shaking him by the collar as a dog might shake a rat, meanwhile demanding: "What's this? It seems to me I'm only just in time!"

And Old Mystery, peering into his face, exclaimed: "Why, it's Fred Stanyer."

"Yes," said the other. "I thought I'd give you a surprise. By the Lord Harry, you've given me one. What was this scallywag's game? Robbery as well as murder?" And glancing at the table piled with notes, and opening his eyes as they caught the big figures, he exclaimed: "It seems he wasn't playing for nuts. But, I say, where does it all come from? It looks as if while I've been trafficking in wool down under you've been shearing the Golden Fleece."

"I'll tell you later," said Old Mystery. "Meantime, what's best to be done with this—thing?"

"That's what I was wondering," said Stanyer. "I suppose the proper course is to hand him to the policeman, eh?" And, spurning the "thing" with his foot, "What's to be done with you?"

"I don't know—I don't care!" answered the culprit sullenly, despairingly. "I was driven to it; it's prison for me any way, on another charge, if not on this. It was because I saw a way out of that, because the sight of the money turned my brain, that I did what I did. Do what you like with me, only make short work of it."

"It was the sight of it." Old Mystery, looking on the abject, pulseless creature, reflected how much misery besides this wretched existence the sight of wealth within reach was responsible for, and he thought of his own boys, almost of this fellow's age, and remembered how the glitter of gold had blinded one of those, his elder and his hope.

A something strange at his heart, a whisper in the ear of conscience, impelled him to stride across to where the hopeless lad lay crouched with the shadow of despair enveloping him.

"Sit up! Stand up!" he said. "So you were going to rob me, even murder me, to prevent it being found out that you'd robbed others. How much are you to the bad?"

"From beginning to end—two—hundred—pounds," said Springle, giving the words the weight the man he addressed would not have vouchsafed to thousands. "But, after all, there are only two sides to the pale of solvency, and he who is an inch beyond it is on the same side as the man a mile across."

Without a word Old Mystery took up three notes for a hundred pounds, fiddled with them in his fingers for a while; then, extending them towards the wondering Springle, said:

"There, if you've told the truth, and somehow for once I think you have, this will clear you, this will give you a fresh start. From the fresh start try to run straight, try to be a man."

Springle gazed at the notes lying in his hands. The Open Sesame to Freedom's door, the keys to Heaven almost it seemed. He tried to speak, but his voice broke in a sob, and, burying his head in his arms, he staggered out of Old Mystery's den, leaving that individual and the man from "down under" to exchange reports and explanations.

TWENTY-FIFTH CHAPTER.

The Crime Discovered.

The constable patrolling Lincoln's Inn Fields, turning the bend by the little fountain, observed a huddled-up Something lying across the pavement by the railings in the shadow of the trees.

Instinctively exclaiming, "Hullo, here! What are you doing?" he turned the flash of his lantern on to the huddled heap. Then he caught sight of a hand and the glitter of a bracelet at the wrist.

Stooping, he grasped and flung back the fold of a cloak, noticing how moist it was with the mist, not dreaming for the moment of aught else—till, the fold flung back, he looked with horror into a white, distorted face, a pair of glassy eyes, and, letting go the cloak, touched the cheek to find it stone cold—and then it was that upon his own hand told him that the cloak was moist with something else than mist.

"My God! There's been murder here!" he exclaimed. Then sharp, shrill, and clear, his whistle rang out, waking the silence of the precincts of the law.

Soon footsteps came along at a run from the right, from the left.

"What is it, mate?" shouted other constables, breathing deep.

"Something bad. Send for the ambulance, and is there a doctor near?"

"I am a doctor," said a sharp, quick voice, approaching. Dr. Macquoich, on his way from Lincoln's Inn Hall, where he had been dining with the Chancery Bar, pushed his way through the little knot which had already gathered by that magic which brings a crowd to any spot in the Metropolis at any hour, however deserted previously. "What is the matter?"

"It seems, sir, that something very terrible is the matter. She's been stabbed desperately, brutally, and I think more than once."

Macquoich knelt beside that pale, unconscious form

(Continued on page 478.)

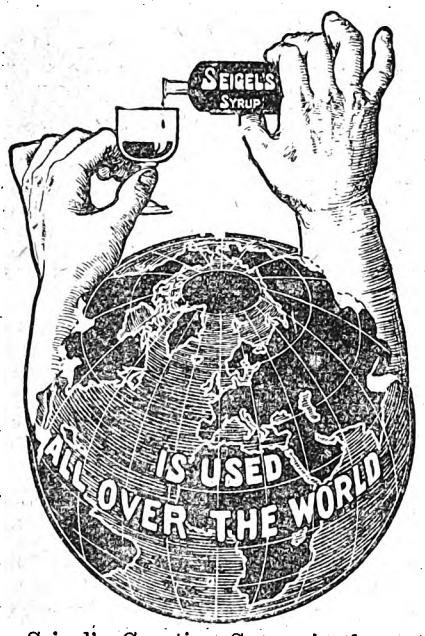
Digitized by Google

SEIGEL'S SYRUP

Indigestion means torturing pain, incessant weariness, wretched days, and wakeful nights. It means being "done up," "played out," "bowled over," "good-for-nothing" all the day and every day. It means starved blood, starved muscles, a starved body, and a starved brain—in short, it means shattered health and a broken constitution unless you root it out without delay.



Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup is the national remedy for indigestion in sixteen countries. Its unrivalled reputation is backed by thirty-three years' unbroken success in curing Indigestion. It has brought hope and health to countless thousands of half dead dyspeptics in every clime. It cured Mr. Charles Phillips. It will cure you. Read his testimony: "Five years ago I suffered terribly from Indigestion, constipation, and giddiness. My appetite was gone, and my nights were restless. Thanks to Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup all this was soon changed. Now I can digest my food readily.—1 Fernside, St. Andrew's Road, Deal, February 13th, 1902."

FOR INDIGESTION.

NEW SERIES NEW SERIES NEW SERIES NEW SERIES

Ready October 10th, 1903.

An Entirely New Series of

THE

LONDON READER

An Illustrated Magazine of Fiction.
(Under the management of T.P.'s WEEKLY.)

The first number of the NEW SERIES will contain amongst other interesting features, the Opening Chapters of

TWO EXCITING NEW SERIAL STORIES,

LINKED BY FATE,

By CHARLES GARVICE,
Author of "The Outcast of the Family."
Illustrated by M. Fitzgerald,
AND

MARGARET DENT,

By EFFIE ROWLANDS,
Author of "Mingery Daw."
Illustrated by Brinsley le Fanu.

Also the First Instalment of Hugh Conway's Famous Story:

CALLED BACK,

(Now First Published in Serial Form.)
Illustrated by A. D. MacCormick.

The Feature of the LONDON READER will be First Rate Fiction.

1d. On Sale Everywhere. 1d.

GENERAL OFFICES:
Mowbray House, Norfolk Street, W.C.

NEW SERIES NEW SERIES NEW SERIES NEW SERIES

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM

(CLOTTED); absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1s. 4d., 1lb. 2s. 4d.; 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free. Supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

GIVEN AWAY,

with this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 509)

A PAPER PATTERN of this

CHILD'S NIGHTDRESS

(4—6).

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

supported in the sergeant's arms, placed his ear to the breast, then, by the bull's-eye flash, peered intently into the marble face.

"She is dead, stone dead!" he gasped. Then his voice broke into a terrified cry as he exclaimed:

"My God, it's Clare Armitage!" And a thrill convulsed him, and his face, too, went ghastly white as he thus recognised and named her who was to have been his colleague in the sin which, though only of intent, still rested like a cloud upon his soul.

Just then the ambulance arrived and, followed by a straggling and increasing throng of the morbid and the curious, they bore that which had been Clare Armitage to the mortuary.

And the next morning's papers and the placards of next morning's papers bore in big red letters one gruesome line:

TERRIBLE MURDER!

And beneath it:

WOMAN STABBED IN LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS!

Eric Geldart, having exhausted the pile of letters beside his breakfast tray, glanced at the morning paper, read carefully the report of his last night's speech, reviled the Gallery Man, who had omitted "laughter" after Eric's smartest point and concluded his account with "hear, hear" instead of "loud cheering," scanned the Stock Exchange and Money Market columns, noting with an oath that the Kenilworths had slumped again, and then let his eye rove over the sheets in quest of that which he knew was there, but dreaded to find.

Ah! there it was!

GHASTLY DISCOVERY IN LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS!

A Woman Stabbed to Death.

Clue to the Assassin!

He flinched and trembled, the paper in his hand shaking like an aspen. Then he arose, went to the sideboard and mixed himself a stiffish brandy peg, and, returning to his arm-chair, he read on to the end the account of the finding of the body of a young lady identified as Miss Clare Armitage, of Belsize Gardens, together with this significant paragraph:

The police are, naturally, at this stage reticent as to the existence of a clue, but it is credibly asserted that they found in the dress-pocket of the dead lady a letter relating to the appointment she had evidently been keeping, and an important arrest is imminently expected.

A letter! Eric in all things putting self first bethought himself. Could it have been in his own writing? Then almost as swiftly he reflected with self-congratulation that he had not written her a line almost for years, had indeed been careful not to do so. And then, the appointment of last night—why, the letter fixing that was in his brother Ronald's hand, his own brother's!

Swiftly for a moment flashed across his brain the memory of earlier, happier days when as children they had played together, prayed together at their mother's knee, and callous as this man was, his heart twitched with a something like remorse.

But there was one whose interests silenced those of any other, whose needs outclamoured the necessities, the claims, the rights of all the world besides, one life was dearer than all the other lives that God had given—his own self stood between his own mind, soul, and the light, shrouding that soul in darkness.

Better even that his own brother should be suspected of this as of another crime, should be arrested, even go forth to the scaffold than that shame or even suspicion should rest upon his name or that one barrier should stretch between him and his goal!

He touched a bell, his secretary entered.

"Note these appointments in my diary," he said, pointing to certain of the letters he flung towards him.

The man nodded.

"By the bye," he said, "this request from Lord Maxmore to support him and address the meeting of the Society for the Propagation and Encouragement of High Ideals clashes with Lady Alastair's At Home."

"Oh, yes," replied the M.P., "ah, well, Society before societies, I'll go to Lady Alastair's."

And to Lady Alastair's that night he went. Not that he was particularly partial to her gatherings, because they consisted of clever rather than influential people, but Madeleine was to be there, and then and there he meant to gain her answer.

Since that encounter by the river at Taplow he had only met her once or twice, and then only for a few minutes, tantalising moments, for she had been so strangely cold.

And it was dawning on him that she was far from grateful for his denunciation of his brother, piqued with Ronald for what she might have deemed his deception, and momentarily shocked by learning of his identity with one upon whose name there rested the shadow of suspicion, as she might have been.

But Eric that night, when by her side he walked back with her to Lady Harwardine's, had noted with disquiet the heavings of her breast, the pain that twitched the perfect rosebud of her mouth, and the tears that glistened beneath the lashes of her eyes, the eyes that were "sometimes grey and sometimes blue" like the glistening dews of violets. Perhaps at the moment she had been angrier with Ronald than with him, but women are sometimes angriest with those whom they love best.

Therefore that night Lord Maxmore read amongst other letters of excuse and regret one from Eric Geldart, Esquire, M.P., regretting that the strain of public duties precluded his experiencing the deep gratification of attending the meeting of that society whose objects were so dear to his heart, and Lady Alastair, standing at the head of the staircase, felt honoured to see the brilliant young member for Little Claverton, for Lady Alastair was a very correct woman, with religious leanings, and all religious people look reverently towards the East—where the sun rises.

Many men and women, abler and older than Eric Geldart, would have been infinitely more gratified than he at being received with cordiality so marked in that house. Many, indeed, would have given much to have crossed its threshold, since to have done so was a passport to High Bohemia, for there were gathered the élite of the arts and sciences; the rabble of the "going to do" and the "expecteds" thronged elsewhere, harbouring the hope of reaching this Mecca at the end of a later pilgrimage, when the feet should be more hardened and the peas crushed into dust.

He entered the big drawing-room just on the moment of the hush preceding the ballad of the season rendered by a prima-donna of the halls of James and Albert.

He looked round in quest of Madeleine. There she was listening with heart as well as ears to the tender harmonies of voice and piano, for it was the composer himself who caressed the keyboard in accompaniment to the voice of gold. But there were fifty people whom Eric reviled, seated between him and the girl whom he watched with as rapt a gaze as she watched the singer.

And when the song was over he made his way in her direction. But many of the company rose and surged between them, and when he reached where she had sat she was no longer there.

For this was what had happened. At the close of the song Lady Alastair, touching Madeleine's elbow with her fan, had whispered, "Come with me, dear, I want so much to introduce you to a favourite of mine." And so the hostess led the fairest of her guests into another room of the spacious suite, then exclaiming: "Oh, here he is!" added, "Madeleine dear—Mr. Harvey Bligh."

Then, noting the rose flush that came and went and the undulation of the snow white bosom, it dawned on Lady Alastair that her introduction had been superfluous, but noting the gleam in the young author's eyes she guessed it was far from unwelcome.

(Another long instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

This Bale contains Pair Full-sized heavy Whitney Blankets, 1 quilt, red and white, blue and white; White Honeycomb Marcella or Red Twill your choice; Pair Full-size White Twill Sheets, 2 Pillow Cases, 1 Bolster Case, 5 Toilet Mats, 1 Toilet Cover, 2 Turkish Towels, Pair Fine Lace Curtains, 1 White Table Cloth, 1 Fringed Damask Table Cover, 6 Dusters, 2 Tea Cloths—28 Articles 49/6. How to pay. Send 6/- only, we send Bale, carriage paid for approval; balance can be paid in six monthly payments of 6/-, and one of 7/6. If you pay balance on receipt, send only 38/6, saving 5/-. Address below.

55 ARTICLES FOR 25/-
ON CREDIT.

Our Gigantic Parcel contains 6 Table Knives and Forks, 6 Dessert Knives and Forks, 12 Tea Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 1 pair Sugar Tongs, 2 Table Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, and 2 Salt Spoons. We send, carriage paid, on receipt of 3s.; ralance 1s. weekly.

PRUDENTIAL
FURNISHING STORES,
150-150L Seven Sisters Rd.,
Holloway, N.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

TOWLE'S PILLS

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors,

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

POST FREE, 6D.

SWEET and COOL.

COMBINATION PIPE,
For Fireside or Garden.

Makes long or short pipe. 6d. post free.

Agents wanted. Write for wholesale terms and sample, 6d.

GENUINE GOLD RINGS.

Set with various stones, all sizes. 3s. each, post free. Wonderful Bargain.

S. ROBERTS & CO., 255 AMHURST RD., LONDON, N.E.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

SULPHOLINE LOTION

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

YOUR FUTURE IS KNOWN.

For 1s. Mr. WILDE will send a Reading of the Stars W. T. STEAD, Esq., and many other prominent gentlemen have testified to the accuracy of their forecasts. Send the exact or approximate hour of your birth if possible, date, year, &c., together with P.O. 1s. and stamp. Satisfaction will be guaranteed.

THE RESULT WILL ASTONISH YOU.

SEND TO-DAY TO (DEPT. P.S.S.)

GEO. WILDE, 143 High Holborn. London, W.C.

DON'T COUGH for
KEATING'S LOZENGES
EASILY CURE
THE WORST COUGH,

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1¾d. tins everywhere.

PAWNBROKER'S SALE

Every article in new condition.

SPECIAL BARGAINS UNREDEEMED.

A full list sent post free on application.

SAVE £ d $

13/6 Gent's magnificent 18-ct. Gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch, jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper, 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable curb (pocket to pocket) double Albert same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; three together.

12/6 Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch, jewelled movement; exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed), elegant West-End pattern the two together.

14/9 Furs.—Magnificent Alexandra Dagmar necklet and muff; beautiful real Russian sable hair, worth 4 guineas, not been worn; sacrifice for 14/9; approval willingly.

19/6 Genuine Italian Mandoline, by Stridente, Naples; fine tone; 21 ribbed, real rosewood, pearl and tortoiseshell inlaid, in saddler-made case; approval.

8/9 Feather Boas; bankrupt stock; special bargains; real Ostrich Feather Boas, beautifully curly; perfectly new, in box; colours: grey and white, black and white, and natural.

10/6 Lustrous diamond and ruby Half-hoop Ring, set with 5 matchless doublet rubies and 8 real diamonds; solid gold, hall-marked.

7/6 Curb Chain Bracelet, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case.

6/9 Brooch; very handsome 18-carat rolled gold, 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls in case.

21/- Lady's solid gold Keyless Watch, jewelled in 10 rubies, beautifully engraved case, splendid time-keeper; 10 years' written warranty; week's free trial.

8/6 Fashionable Long Neck-chain; genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished; very choice design.

9/6 Organ Toned Melodeon; magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, and 4 acting stops, including Tremolo and Diapason action; rich powerful tone, perfect order.

9/6 Necklet with Heart Pendant, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise.

12/6 Magnificent 5-row Pearl Collarette; finest quality, mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case.

Any of the above articles sent on approval willingly.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

Ask your grocer for

EPPS'S

(The most nutritious)

COCOA

And take no other.

DAILY . . . EXPRESS.

ONE HALFPENNY.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page. Mrs. Conyers, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

Mrs. Conyers,
MORCHARD BISHOP, DEVON.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Lending Money to a Lover.

"My sweetheart is in money difficulties," writes "STELLA." "Through no fault of his some accounts got wrong at his office, and he has to make up the loss. He has no savings of his own, but I have several pounds in the bank. Would you advise me to offer them to him as a loan?"

* * * * *

If you think he is in serious difficulty, it would be a kind action on your part to offer the money. I suppose he would not borrow it from you unless he were quite confident of being able to repay you fully.

A Friend Not in Need.

"T. L. R." writes: "A girl friend of mine is engaged to a man whom I know gives way to certain bad habits, such as drinking and betting. I do not think she suspects it at all. Would it be my duty to warn her?"

* * * * *

I cannot encourage you to sow discord between the girl and her sweetheart. For all you know, the bad habits may quite disappear when the man finds himself mated to the one he loves. Single men's characters are not always free from blemish, but on marriage a great improvement often takes place. Certainly the girl ought to know everything really important about her husband's character, but it is not the business of a third party to circulate cruel reports. Lovers must be expected to find out each others' virtues and faults from their own observations of each other.

A Lukewarm Lover.

"FREDDIE" writes me a sarcastic letter, which, however, is not without interest. "Is there such a thing as love?" he asks. "I have been engaged five times, and have been very intimate with girls indeed, but in no case has it lasted more than three months, as I have either found the girls flirting with other fellows, or else I have found some other reason for disliking them. Perhaps I have never been in love, but if so, how am I to know when I am? Anyway, I should like to hear from you if a girl can be absolutely in love?"

* * * * *

I imagine you are the kind of man a girl looks upon as something to be trifled with. You admit you have never been sure as to your own feelings. Well, girls have great intuition. I suspect that, after a few weeks in your society, they have seen how the wind blows—that you care very little for them, and when another young man has turned up, have quite willingly fallen to his fascinations. Girls, of course, can love a fellow absolutely, but they generally like some kind of definite return from the other side. A lukewarm lover is generally unpopular, and often gets severely trifled with by the opposite sex.

A Worrying Husband.

"WHEN my husband comes home at night he is often in a very depressed mood. He complains of business worries and bad prospects. When I say I am sorry he seems irritated, and tells me that sympathy is no use. How should I act under such circumstances?"

* * * * *

He may pretend that your sympathy is no use, but in his heart I do not doubt he is very pleased to have it. It is always the lot of the sympathiser to imagine one's efforts apparently useless. But it is not generally justified. You might, though, add to your sympathy a little practical advice. When a man is baffled, I find that he usually prefers even bad advice to none at all.

A Silly Separation.

"My friend and I had two young ladies," writes "R. S." "We had been going out with them one Sunday, when my young lady said something which my friend did not like. He spoke sharply to her in reply, and my young lady then refused to go out with me any more. The other girl threw my friend up for the same reason. Don't you think it was very wrong of them?"

* * * * *

Yes, it seems a little sudden. I do not think either can have been very fond of you and your friend, or they would not allow such a stupid thing to cause a separation. Perhaps you are best rid of such an attachment. A girl who would throw up a fellow because someone else had offended her must be rather a peppery young person, and decidedly fickle.

How to Leave a Party.

No, "EVA," on leaving a private party where there are a great many guests, it is not necessary to shake hands with each and every acquaintance. If you just give a parting smile, and bow to those you know best, and shake hands with your hostess, you have done all that is expected of you. When leaving a party before proceedings are over, it is usual to retire as quietly as possible.

Too Much Good Nature.

"WHAT am I to do?" writes "BEATRICE." "I am in an awkward position simply as a result of good nature. Some time ago a rather depressing, gloomy young man made love to me. At first I thought him rather interesting, though very full of trouble. Out of good nature I allowed him to visit me often, and offered him advice in his grievances. Then, to my surprise, he protested that I was the only woman he ever loved. He said that if I did not return it, he would make away with himself. Now I had not got it in me to tell him outright that I did not love him, especially as he might really mean what he said. So I said simply that I was very fond of him. This was true in a way, for I did rather like him. Some months have passed, and he now talks as though we were to be married. I have no such intention, as there are others of whom I am much fonder. What had I better do?"

* * * * *

You have got yourself into a difficult position, "BEATRICE," and no doubt from very well-meant motives. It would have been better had you avoided from the first giving him the impression that you were unduly fond of him. To break the connection will be exceedingly difficult. It would be a good plan if you could go away for awhile, and try and cool relations off. It would be better that the parting should be gradual, seeing that you have a morbid person to deal with. After your return, try and treat him only on the basis of a friend, and avoid all intimate conversation and meetings.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

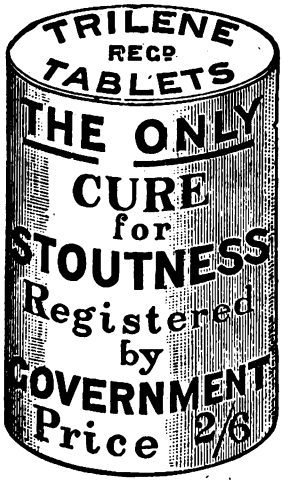
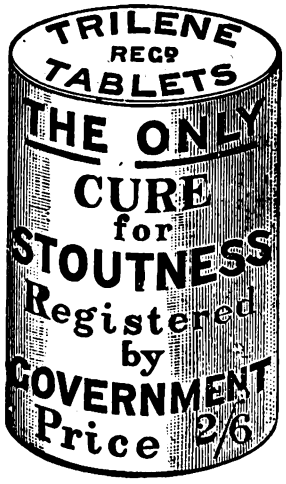
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."



Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"67 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.

Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.

"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."

"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Liatorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18lb. during the cure.

Mr. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st 3lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

Mrs. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagilit, Wales, writes Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1¼ stones."

Mrs. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9¼st. and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have done a world of good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Miss JANE CARTER of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest value. I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

Mr. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE TRILENE ASSOCIATION, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Indigestion,

FLATULENCE,

AND CONSTIPATION COMPLETELY CURED.

"I DO not think there is a woman in the country who has suffered more from indigestion and biliousness than I have," said Mrs. Bird, of 26 Sun Street, Rugby, in the course of an interview with a "Midland Times" reporter. "Added to these were flatulency and constipation, and so ill was I that even such light food as bread and butter caused me most intense suffering. It was impossible for me to obtain rest, for the pain was so great that I spent many sleepless nights. I tried all sorts of remedies, which did me no good whatever, and a local doctor, after examining me and prescribing his own medicines without any result, admitted he could do nothing for me. I had by this time often heard of Bile Beans, but never tried them. One day a pamphlet came into the house, and, reading of the cures of cases like mine, I was induced to send for a box. Most wonderful to me was the fact that I soon experienced some relief, and, continuing to take the medicine regularly, I found myself, in the course of a few weeks, completely cured. The pains grew less and less severe. I had no more sleepless nights. I found I could practically eat any kind of food. Of course, this result was brought about entirely by Bile Beans, and I can most conscientiously recommend them to everyone who suffers as I did. I always keep a box in the house, and tell everyone interested of the wonderful efficacy of the Beans." Mrs. Bird's sister, who was present at the interview, added her testimony, and said that she believed Bile Beans had saved her sister's life. In fact, they had completely changed her. At the conclusion of the interview Mrs. Bird remarked: "I hope you will publish this interview, and thus be the means of helping other sufferers to learn how they may regain their health."

Examined by a doctor.

BILE BEANS FOR BILIOUSNESS

Bile Beans for Biliousness promptly and permanently cure Headache, Constipation, Piles, Liver Troubles, Bad Breath, Indigestion, Flatulence, Dizziness, Buzzing in the Head, Colds, Liver Chill, Influenza, Debility, Anæmia, and all Female Ailments. Of all Medicine Vendors, 1/1½ and 2/9 per box. (Large Box contains three times quantity small size.)

FREE TEST FOR ALL.

The above cure of Mrs. Bird is no isolated instance, but only one of the many thousands of cases where perseverance with Bile Beans has resulted in the sufferer being permanently relieved, and the Proprietors of Bile Beans will forward a Sample Box Free and a Book on Liver and Digestive Ailments, if you send the accompanying coupon, your name and address, and 1d. stamp (to cover return postage), to BILE BEAN CO., GREEK STREET, LEEDS.

FREE SAMPLE COUPON.

"SHORT STORIES,"

10/10.03.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

No. 772.
Week ending
October 17,
1903.

SHORT STORIES

PRICE
1D.

"I SNATCHED THE DOCUMENT AND THE NOTES, AND, RUSHING ACROSS THE ROOM, SLAMMED THE DOOR, LOCKING IT BEHIND ME. THEN I FLED!"

(A Thrilling Incident from our New Series, which Begins To-day. See inside.)

Digitized by Google

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache and Neuralgia.

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Kaputine is not a single crude drug such as has been condemned as dangerous by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients, having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The SAFE Remedy.

Kaputine is the only preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries. Proof positive of its superior and sterling qualities.

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1½; Samples 1d. each.

Kindly mention this paper.

J. G. GRAVES'

J. G. Graves' Handsome Watch Catalogue, showing hundreds of designs, is sent Post Free. Ask for No. 1 Catalogue.

WATCHES

THE 'EXPRESS' (Reg.) English Lever, 50/-

BRITISH Manufacture throughout.

Keyless or Keywinding, is the finest value ever produced. Sent on receipt of a deposit of 5/- and your promise to complete the purchase in nine more monthly instalments of 5/-

Important Advantages offered to Cash Purchasers.

AGENTS WANTED. WRITE FOR TERMS.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., Sheffield.

BALDNESS.

A French Specialist who has devoted his life to the study of Hair Diseases, having cured thousands of almost hopeless cases, will send a FREE TRIAL PACKET of a genuine inexpensive treatment to all who write enclosing 2 stamps. New Hair grows in 4 to 10 Days.

Mr. C. R—— writes: "Your small sample has done me more good in a week than another much advertised remedy did in 6 months."

P. HENRI-FRANCIS, BRIXTON ROAD, LONDON.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

PAWNBROKER'S SALE

Every article in new condition.

SPECIAL BARGAINS UNREDEEMED.

A full list sent post free on application.

SAVE £ s d

13/6 Gent's magnificent 18-ct. Gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch, jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper, 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable curb (pocket to pocket) double Albert same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; three together.

12/6 Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch, jewelled movement; exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed) elegant West-End pattern the two together.

14/9 Furs.—Magnificent Alexandra Dagmar necklet and muff; beautiful real Russian sable hair, worth 4 guineas, not been worn; sacrifice for 14/9; approval willingly.

19/6 Genuine Italian Mandoline, by Stridente, Naples; fine tone; 21 ribbed, real rosewood, pearl and tortoiseshell inlaid, in saddler-made case; approval.

8/9 Feather Boas; bankrupt stock; special bargains: real Ostrich Feather Boas, beautifully curly; perfectly new, in box; colours: grey and white, black and white, and natural.

10/6 Lustrous diamond and ruby Half-hoop Ring, set with 5 matchless doublet rubies and 8 real diamonds; solid gold, hall-marked.

7/6 Curb Chain Bracelet, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case.

6/9 Brooch; very handsome 18-carat rolled gold, 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls in case.

21/- Lady's solid gold Keyless Watch, jewelled in 10 rubies, beautifully engraved case, splendid timekeeper; 10 years' written warranty; week's free trial.

8/6 Fashionable Long Neck-chain; genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished; very choice design.

9/6 Organ Toned Melodeon; magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, and 4 acting stops, including Tremolo and Dispason action; rich powerful tone, perfect order.

9/6 Necklet with Heart Pendant, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise.

12/6 Magnificent 5-row Pearl Collarette; finest quality, mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case.

Any of the above articles sent on approval willingly.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

PRUDENTIAL GIGANTIC SALE

49/6 BEDDING & DRAPERY

6/- DEPOSIT 1/6 WEEKLY

This Sale contains Pair Full-sized heavy Whitney Blankets, 1 quilt, red and white, blue and white; White Honeycomb Marcella or Red Twill your choice; Pair Full-size White Twill Sheets, 2 Pillow Cases, 1 Bolster Case, 5 Toilet Mats, 1 Toilet Cover, 2 Turkish Towels, Pair Fine Lace Curtains, 1 White Table Cloth, 1 Fringed Damask Table Cover, 6 Dusters, 2 Tea Cloths—23 Articles 49/6. How to pay. Send 6/- only, we send Sale, carriage paid for approval; balance can be paid in six monthly payments of 6/-, and one of 7/6. If you pay balance on receipt, send only 38/6, saving 5/-. Address below.

55 ARTICLES FOR 25/- ON CREDIT.

Our Gigantic Parcel contains 6 Table Knives and Forks, 6 Dessert Knives and Forks, 12 Tea Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 1 pair Sugar Tongs, 2 Table Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, and 2 Salt Spoons. We send, carriage paid, on receipt of 3s.; balance 1s. weekly.

PRUDENTIAL FURNISHING STORES, 150-150L Seven Sisters Rd., Holloway, N.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 772.] Week Ending October 17th, 1903. [One Penny.

Exciting, New Series. Starts To-day.

THE PURSUIT OF SARA

It was under very ordinary conditions that I, Sara Gillespie, entered the employ of Messrs. Templeton & Co., General Agents, of St. Helens, E.C. I broke off my connection with the firm under circumstances fraught with such menace to myself, such peril to the man I loved, that the recollection sends a chill to my heart, a shudder through my blood, recalls a vivid sense of danger.

The firm had advertised for an expert typine and shorthand writer at a good salary. I answered the advertisement, interviewed the senior partner, and secured the appointment. I had reason, I thought, to congratulate myself on my success. The hours were easy, the work light, and the salary £2 a week—larger than I had expected. I was earning very little at the time and caught eagerly at the chance of making more money. I had no one but myself to consult; my people were dead, my sweetheart, Noel Masterman, abroad. I had but my own judgment to rely on. That the judgment of nineteen is not infallible I discovered to my cost.

The office was a large and handsomely appointed one, with good, solid-looking furniture, the regulation Turkey carpet, massive desks, and a brand-new typewriter.

The firm, it appeared, were agents for all kinds of things, and all sorts of people, and their clients were to be found in every part of the world! Their correspondence was necessarily a heavy one, and the number of letters I had to type increased daily.

Mr. Templeton, the senior partner, before mentioned, instructed me in my duties. He was a middle-aged man with a fresh colour, a bald head, and neat-looking grey whiskers. He showed an unusually large expanse of shirt-front, which, with his carefully knotted tie, and handsome diamond pin, gave him an appearance of benevolent opulence that was most impressive.

He struck me as a very kind old gentleman indeed, the first day I saw him. I had reason later to alter my opinion.

I did not see much of the other members of the firm, Mr. Harrington Shackell and Rigby Starr respectively. As a rule they didn't turn up at the office until late in the afternoon, when the work was finished and it was time for me to go. Mr. Shackell was a broad-shouldered giant, square-jawed, steel-eyed, with a taciturn, at times morose, manner. He was a great contrast to the junior partner in more ways than one. Slight and fair, with a pink-and-white skin, blue eyes and curling lashes, Rigby Starr was invariably cheerful, and on the best of terms with himself and all the world.

Mr. Templeton, unlike the others, was very regular in his attendance. Punctually at half-past ten, with immaculate shirt-front and neatly brushed whiskers, he seated himself at his desk and proceeded to dictate the answers to his correspondence. The letters I had to type were not very interesting, they mostly consisted of price lists and quotations from the share market. We never seemed to get orders from our clients, their requirements seemed limited by the lists before mentioned.

Mr. Templeton appeared to take a kindly interest in me, and between whiles encouraged me to talk freely of my affairs. He was very sympathetic about Noel, and patted my shoulder in a fatherly sort of fashion when I told him my sweetheart was abroad. One afternoon he got quite confidential.

"He is a doctor, you say, Miss Gillespie? It ought not to be difficult for a promising young fellow like that to get an opening in England."

"He has no capital," I answered, sighing. "It's worse than useless for a doctor to start a practice without some hundreds to fall back upon."

"I don't think he should have left England all the same; it's not fair to you. Yes, I mean it, Miss Gillespie; he should have had more consideration."

"You mustn't blame him, Mr. Templeton," I said eagerly. "Noel couldn't help himself. He was brought up by his uncle, Sir Francis Masterman, who was awfully good to him. All his expenses at hospital were paid, and it was arranged that a practice should be purchased. When—when——" I paused, flushing under my employer's scrutiny—"Noel met me——" I said in a low voice.

"And fell desperately in love, eh? Quite understandable, Miss Gillespie. If I were twenty years younger I should do the same thing myself."

"But Sir Francis had other views for his nephew," I

Digitized by Google

continued. "He opposed the idea of our marriage bitterly, and at last gave Noel to understand that if he persisted in the engagement he must expect no further assistance."

"Whereon Noel promptly left his uncle's house, eh?" Mr. Templeton smiled, benevolently.

"Yes. Do you think it was wrong of him?"

"I think, my dear young lady," the senior partner spoke emphatically, "it was the wisest and the bravest thing he could have done."

"Thank you," I said, touched by his sympathy.

"And what is Mr. Noel doing now, if I may ask the question?"

"He's travelling with an old school friend who is in bad health."

"Medical companion, eh? Dear, dear, what a pity I didn't know of this before. I had a letter only the other day from a physician practising in the Midlands, who asked me to look out for an assistant. I should think Dr. Masterman would suit him exactly. You must bring him back to England, Miss Gillespie, and we'll find him something to do."

"It's most kind of you," I murmured; "thank you very much indeed."

"Not at all, not at all. I assure you it's a positive pleasure to me to help young people." He beamed refulgently, the very incarnation of middle-aged benevolence.

"It's an unfortunate thing for a young fellow to be obliged to quarrel with his family," he went on after a pause. "Does Dr. Masterman correspond with his cousins at all?"

"Sir Francis has only one son," I replied. "His name is Herbert; he and Noel are great friends; they still write to each other."

"Most comforting to you, my dear young lady, that it should be so. Sir Francis is a very wealthy man, I believe; failing his son, your sweetheart would, I suppose, inherit the property?"

"I suppose so," I returned surprised. "I never thought of that."

"Dear me, I daresay not. And now"—he turned suddenly to his desk—"we must get to work. There are some letters here which it is important should catch the country post. Please type them at once. You copy all your letters?" He glanced at me sharply, and, a little disconcerted at his change of manner, I murmured that I made a point of doing so.

I remembered the question later, and realised how completely I had been befooled. There was nothing in the routine of the office faintly suggestive of any but ordinary business proceedings; a steady-going, old-fashioned concern, I thought it, and regarded Mr. Templeton as a model of industry and perseverance.

That afternoon Rigby Starr and Mr. Shackell arrived about four o'clock. By this time I was aware of the reason for their absence from the office. The two partners, it appeared, were canvassing for orders during the morning, and called in to report progress of an afternoon!

I encountered the pair in the corridor. I was going out to post the letters, one of which I noted was addressed to the physician whom Mr. Templeton had mentioned. Doubtless the letter contained a reference to Noel; I felt very grateful to the firm of Templeton & Co., and returned Rigby's greeting with a pleasant smile.

It was a fine afternoon, and I felt tempted to prolong my absence from the office. I felt light-hearted and happy beyond expression at the thought that Noel and I might soon be re-united. What a fortunate thing it was that I had seen the firm's advertisement in the paper! What a lucky thing that Mr. Templeton had engaged me. Who would have thought that so ordinary an occurrence would have brought about such wonderful results? I was so busy planning out the future that I forgot to notice how the time was slipping by, and it gave me quite a shock when a neighbouring clock struck five.

For a moment I hesitated as to whether I should return to the office at all that afternoon. My work was practically over, and no one was likely to reproach me for my absence. I remembered, however, that I had left my coat behind, and that Noel's last letter was in the pocket. I hastened back at once eager to regain its possession. I opened the office door softly and stood somewhat timidly upon the threshold; for a moment I thought the room was empty. The sound of voices convinced me of my mistake. Behind the screen that stood between Mr. Templeton's desk and the door, the three partners were engaged in conversation. The screen was large and so arranged that the desk was hidden from view on that side of the room.

I did not wish to disturb their talk, so stepped quietly towards the cupboard where my coat was hanging and slipped it over my arm. I had regained the door and was about to close it behind me, when Shackell's voice, raised above its usual tone, arrested my attention.

"It will be the biggest thing on record if we pull it off," he said exultantly.

"There's no reason why we shouldn't," said the senior partner softly. "The scheme is beautifully simple. The old man can't last very long. Once he's dead the young one will return to England. As the nephew of the deceased gentleman he will inherit the property—failing the son. There will be, in effect, but one life between him and the money."

"And that," said Rigby slowly, "won't be a long life!" He laughed as he spoke, a curious sort of laugh that gave me an odd feeling of repulsion. I closed the door and hurried from the building vaguely disquieted. I pondered long as to what Rigby could have meant by that strange speech, but could arrive at no solution. My thoughts indeed were distracted from the problem by the discovery that Noel's letter was no longer in my pocket. I was absolutely certain that I had left it in my coat, and felt greatly concerned at its loss.

Next morning I found Mr. Templeton at the office when I arrived. He greeted me with a kindly smile, and asked if I had lost anything of value.

"There, there," I won't tease you," he said, "here's your letter, Miss Gillespie. I found it on the table by the typewriter. It's very pleasant to have such letters, I know, but you shouldn't read them in the office hours, it interferes with work."

I was much too abashed by the reproof to protest against the accusation. I never read Noel's letters in the office, they were much too precious. Neither, and of this I was sure, had I taken the epistle from my pocket. It must, I supposed, have dropped from my coat.

Later, I arrived at a different conclusion.

"So your sweetheart's at Nice," said Mr. Templeton, after a pause. "I couldn't help seeing the address, you know," he added, with a ponderous attempt at playfulness. "How does he like the place?"

"Very much, thank you," I said stiffly.

The senior partner made no further comment on the matter, but late that afternoon I noticed on his desk a letter addressed to a man of the name of Martin at the Poste Restante, Nice. It struck me at the time as peculiar he should have written that day to the very place where Noel was staying, but I look on it as a strange coincidence no more.

For the next week things went on as usual at St. Helens. Mr. Templeton did not again allude to an appointment for Noel, and the hope his hint had roused in me gradually died away. One afternoon I felt especially miserable. I sat at the table staring blankly at the typewriter. My heart was aching for my boy; it seemed as though we should be separated for ever. Even if he did return he might no longer care for me.

I remembered that one of the clerks at my last situation had summed me up as "a red-haired girl with a large mouth and green eyes." I had not minded the description at the time, now it appeared horribly truthful. I decided that I was too ugly for Noel to admire, and was tempted to shed a few tears for my lack of beauty, when the door opened and, yes, Noel himself appeared.

Somehow or other I avoided the typewriter and the tables that stood between us, and rushed, I confess it, rushed to his side. I forgot the office, the senior partner, my work, forgot everything but that my boy was with me, his arms about me, his dear face close to mine.

Digitized by Google

When I had regained possession of my faculties, I became conscious of Mr. Templeton's amused regard. He rose nobly to the occasion, however, and insisted I should take leave of absence for the remainder of the day. Noel took a fancy to him at once, and seemed very glad that I was working with such kindly people.

After we'd left the building he told me what had brought him so suddenly to England.

"I had a wire from my cousin Herbert," he explained. "Sir Francis has had a paralytic stroke and is not expected to live. I went straight to the house in Eaton Square, hoping he would see and recognise me, but I fear there is no chance of his regaining consciousness."

"You must not stay away from him for my sake, Noel. You ought to return to the house at once. Let us take a cab and drive there quickly."

"But when we reached the square we found it was too late. The Baronet was dead! And Herbert, his son, reigned in his place.

As I learnt the news, the words that I had overheard in the office came back to me.

"The old man can't last very long. When he's dead the young one will return to England. Between him and the property there's but one life. And that won't be a long one."

"Noel," I said impulsively, "Noel, is your cousin Eric delicate at all?"

"Very far from it," he answered. "Why do you ask?"

I murmured some excuse, and dropped the matter. It was absurd to suppose there could be any connection between Herbert and the man whom Rigby said would not live long.

After Sir Francis' death events came very quickly.

Mr. Templeton, in the course of business, had a doctor's practice offered him for sale. He spoke to Noel about it, and suggested he should try to make some arrangements for the purchase. A thousand pounds was the sum required. A large price, but my lover said none too much to pay as the doctor's connection was a large one. Close on the suggestion came the reading of the late Baronet's will, and, to our delight, we found that the old gentleman had relented at the last moment and left Noel a thousand pounds!

"I'm glad he thought kindly of me," said my lover. "I owe him very much."

"You'll be able to buy the practice, Noel?" I said excitedly. "It seems too good to come true."

That evening Noel took me round to Eaton Square to see Sir Herbert. I liked the latter immensely. He was a tall, fair man, with a very charming manner, and a great friendship for his cousin.

"I suppose you two will set up housekeeping directly," he said, laughing. "Are you going to start a practice, Noel?"

"I'm in treaty for one already," he answered. "Messrs. Templeton and Co., the firm where Sara is engaged as typine, have a splendid thing in view."

"You couldn't do better than follow their advice. If they recommend it, you may be sure it's a good thing. I've had some dealings with the firm myself. I found them very decent people. As a matter of fact, I was hard up about a year ago. I'd over-run the constable a bit, and I didn't care to ask my father for assistance. Templeton and Co. let me have an advance of five thousand, and only charged 3 per cent. for the transaction."

"Didn't they want any security?" asked Noel, surprised.

"A merely nominal one. I had to insure my life in their favour. I forget how much the policy was made out for, fifteen thousand, I think."

Impulsively I started to my feet

Sara jumped to her feet. "That valet is Harrington Shackell, my employer," she cried.

"Do you mean, Sir Herbert, that if you died Mr. Templeton would have fifteen thousand pounds?"

"Something like that," he answered, smiling. "You don't credit the firm with bloodthirsty designs, do you, Miss Gillespie?"

"N—no, of course not," I answered, ashamed of my interference. "It seemed a strange sort of transaction, that's why I asked."

"It's not unusual," he replied. "However, I'll call up to-morrow, redeem the debt, and consign my life policy to the flames. Does that reassure you?"

"I'm not really alarmed," I answered, laughing. All the same I felt a vague uneasiness; I was half-inclined to repeat that conversation I had overheard. And yet how foolish such conduct would appear! I really had no cause to distrust Templeton and Co.

Digitized by Google

We stayed quite late at Eaton Square. Herbert was delighted to have his cousin back again, and seemed as if he could not bear to part with him. Just as we were going, he remembered a certain pearl necklace belonging to his mother, which he said would just suit me.

"I'll ring for my valet, he knows where it is. I won't keep you waiting long, Miss Gillespie."

The valet at this juncture appeared, and was dispatched for the trinket. Some few minutes later he returned, a small casket in his hand.

He was a tall, square-shouldered man, with a grim, clean-shaven face. As he stood under the electric light his face seemed curiously familiar.

With a cry I started to my feet, and, pointing to him I cried:

"That man is Harrington Shackell, one of my employés!"

"My dear Sara, what are you thinking of?" said Noel. "Mr. Shackell has a moustache. It's merely a chance resemblance"—and he motioned to the valet's face, innocent of beard or moustache.

"How silly of me," I said, with a gasp. I looked the apology I was too nervous to make.

"Now you come to mention it, Watkins is rather like Shackell," said Herbert. "Capital man, Watkins," he added, "been with me over a year."

The valet signified his appreciation of the compliment with a profound bow, deposited the casket in my hands, and left the room.

The necklace was very exquisite, and in my enthusiasm for my pretty present, all thought of Watkins and his strange likeness to Mr. Templeton's partner left my mind.

Next morning I was at the office early. The arrangements for the purchase of the practice were to be concluded, and I was all excitement till the thing was settled.

Noel arrived looking very handsome, in his light tweed travelling suit.

"I've had bad news, my dear," he said. Then glancing round the office—Templeton had gone out—he slipped his arm about my waist.

"I'm obliged to leave England, dearest, now at once. I've had a wire from the hotel at Nice to say that my patient is dangerously ill. I can't leave him to the mercy of strangers; he's been a very good pal to me."

"But, Noel, what about the practice? To-day is the last moment. You must decide to-day. It would be a dreadful thing if it should slip through your fingers." I paused, a mist in my eyes. If the practise were secured it would mean that Noel and I could get married almost immediately. If not, there would be months, perhaps years of weary waiting, years in which he might get tired of a girl with red hair and green eyes.

"It's a most unfortunate thing that you should have to leave to-day, Mr. Masterman," said Templeton, when the case was explained. "Of course you're bound to go; still, it's unfortunate."

"Can't you conclude the purchase in my absence?" said Noel. "I can sign any papers that are necessary, giving you authority to act on my behalf. As for the money, I've arranged for that already. My cousin has given me a cheque for a thousand pounds pending the settlement of my uncle's property."

"It's hardly according to form," said Mr. Templeton, "I'd rather you signed the agreement yourself. Still, as the matter's urgent I'd better do as you request. The money is to be paid to-morrow morning, Mr. Masterman. You enter into possession of the house and practice any time within the next three months."

"Quite so, quite so," said Noel. "I'm quite satisfied that it's worth the money, and I shall be glad if you'll see the business through for me. Here is the cheque," he pushed the paper towards the senior partner. "If you'll give me a receipt for the amount and draw up the document that empowers you to act for me, I shall be obliged."

Slowly and carefully Mr. Templeton wrote out the receipt and handed it to Noel.

"There's a lawyer a few doors down the passage," he said. "If you don't mind, I'll engage him to draw up the paper. It's as well to do things according to rule and regulation."

The senior partner disappeared, returning with his friend the solicitor.

"If you'll put your name, Mr. Masterman, at the foot of this paper, I shall be able to act on your behalf."

Noel took the paper and carelessly scrawled his signature.

"Have you read it, sir?" asked Templeton.

My lover nodded.

"It's precious full of legal terms," he said, laughing, "any one would think I was a landed proprietor by the fashion in which you allude to my 'estate'."

"Mere phraseology," said Templeton, "a thousand pounds is not to be despised."

The solicitor, having witnessed the signing of the all-important document withdrew. Mr. Templeton considerately followed his example.

"Good-bye, sweetheart," said my dear one. "I shall be back again soon, and then we shall be together always."

A last kiss, a last pressure of the hand, and he was gone!

Before we met again many things, dark, strange and terrible had come to pass.

Shortly after Noel's departure, Mr. Templeton went out and I was left alone in the office.

"I may not be back till late in the afternoon, Miss Gillespie," he said. "Don't trouble to wait for me. You can leave as soon as you're through with those letters."

I thanked him and set to work with a will. My correspondence took longer than I had anticipated, however, and it was just on five before I had finished.

With a sigh of relief I covered up the typewriter and put on my hat and coat. At the last moment I remembered that I had left a book of Noel's in a small room opening out of the office. I call it a room, but in reality it was little more than a large cupboard. One could hardly turn round without knocking the walls, and it was impossible to move unless the door was closed. I had some trouble in finding the book; it had got stowed away on the top shelf. Just as I came across it, somebody entered the outer office. I glanced round the crack of the door and saw Mr. Templeton, followed by Rigby Starr.

"Well," said the latter in a quick, impatient voice, "how have things gone?"

"Up to the present perfectly. Look!" As he spoke the senior partner laid a packet on the table.

"Bank notes, eh?" said Rigby, seizing on the crisp bits of paper. "Two, four, six—why, you have got the whole thousand, Templeton?"

The other nodded.

"A thousand, aye, and twenty times that sum to come. The scheme has gone without a hitch. Noel Masterman called here this morning on his way to Nice. He was wired for by his friend."

"What a lucky thing the telegram arrived. Came in the nick of time."

The other nodded.

"Yes, it has saved us some trouble; as it is he'll be there safely out of the way for some weeks. He left me his cheque for the purchase of the practice, and what practically amounts to a power of attorney, authorising me to deal with his estate. Just imagine, Rigby—his estate!"

There was a triumph in his voice, a suggestion of evil in his laugh that alarmed me. My heart beat heavily, my breath came hard and short. I strained my ears to catch what followed.

"It's a great coup," said Rigby. "I suppose," he glanced half fearfully at Templeton. "I suppose matters will go smoothly to the finish?"

"That's all right, we can trust Shackell to finish the job." He laughed as he spoke, and for the first time I realised that his mouth was cruel. The thin lips curved away from the pointed yellow teeth, the eyes glistened. I crouched close to the door and listened ever with apprehension.

"At the moment, then," said Rigby, "we are waiting——"

Templeton raised his hand.

Digitized by Google

"Listen!" he said.

Down the long corridor there sounded footsteps, hurried, eager. Nearer and nearer came the tread, and as the feet approached, the fear that clutched my heart grew keener, stronger. All the vague dread, the apprehension of the last few weeks were centred in that instant, on the man that even now stood at the door—a messenger of evil tidings.

"Shackell!" cried Rigby with a start. The boyish face seemed suddenly grown old, the pink and white complexion changed to the leaden hue of fear. "What news?" he stammered.

"Sit down." The senior partner thrust his back into his chair. "Well, what has happened?" and he faced the tall, square-shouldered giant with resolution.

"I've done the job," said Shackell slowly.

"He's dead?" Rigby's eyes seemed starting from their sockets.

"As a door nail."

"You're quite sure?"

With an oath he turned upon the boy.

"Confound you, leave me alone," he snarled. "I tell you that Herbert Masterman is dead."

Herbert Masterman! For a moment my brain refused to grasp the news. Only last night I had seen him, spoken to him. I recalled his voice, his laugh, the words that he had said. It was not true, it could not be true. A darkness came before my eyes, a horrible tightness clutched my throat. If I could scream! Dear Heaven, if only I could scream!

"How did you do it?" Rigby's voice trembled, he was not such a hardened criminal as the other.

Shackell leant back and stretched his arms with a sigh of satisfaction.

"As we arranged," he answered. "Templeton and I discussed the thing last week. There's a well staircase at Eaton Square built of stone. The flight of stairs that leads to Sir Herbert's suite of rooms is a long one, some twenty stairs from top to bottom. It happened that the carpets were taken up to-day for cleaning purposes, so that the stone was left exposed. As usual I left the house at four o'clock this afternoon, returning by the back entrance some ten minutes later. Sir Herbert was still in his room. I fastened a wire across the stairs, slender and strong, and quite invisible to the baronet, who suffers from short sight. Then I retired into my bedroom, next to Sir Herbert's. I heard him cross the landing, run down the stairs, and then"—Harrington Shackell paused—"Sir Herbert caught his foot, stumbled and fell with a crash, the whole length of the stairs, striking his head against the stones. When they picked him up he was—done for."

"The wire?" said Rigby, moistening his dry lips, "did you remove the wire?"

"I'm not a fool," was the reply. "I'm not likely to risk my neck. I whipped the wire out of sight, slipped upstairs and out through the attic window on to the leads. From there I climbed into the next house, an empty one. I left there an hour ago, and came here by a devious route."

"I suppose there's no chance of your being recognised as Sir Herbert's valet?"

"Not the ghost of one. The only person who ever noticed the likeness was that red-haired fool of Templeton's. She'll have to be got out of the way very shortly," he added grimly.

"I'll look after that," said the senior partner. "She's been very useful up to the present."

"By Jove," cried Shackell suddenly, "the papers have got hold of it already. They're crying the news!"

Hastening across the room he flung the window open wide.

"Terrible death of a Baronet! Sir Herbert Masterman killed!" The harsh voice of the newsboy echoed through the place.

Terrible death of a Baronet—the words beat upon my brain. The horror that had filled me gave place to a sudden sense of personal danger. At any moment those men might discover my whereabouts. They might hear me, see me, and then—— I closed my eyes and tried vainly to regain my self-control. If they knew I was there—within a few feet of them, my fate was sealed.

I must have lost consciousness for a while for the next thing I remember hearing was my lover's name.

"From what you say then, Templeton, Noel Masterman—or to give him his right title, Sir Noel, is disposed of for some time?"

"Yes. His friend is seriously ill, too ill to be left. I shall wire him the news of his cousin's death to-night and offer to act in his absence. If he accepts my offer, well and good. If not——" The senior partner smiled. "Martin will see to him," he said softly.

The remembrance of the letter I had seen weeks back addressed to that same Martin flashed across my mind. There had been a plot—a vile plot against Noel from the first. And I—I had aided and abetted it!

"Meanwhile I shall commence operations at once. This document"—he touched the paper Noel had signed—"empowers me to deal with the estate. It is drawn up by a solicitor, who witnessed the signature, and will hold good in any court of law. The position, therefore, is this. Either by fair means or otherwise Masterman will be kept out of England for some time to come. When he returns"—his thin lips curved in a hideous smile—"he will find his fortune vanished and the firm of Templeton & Co. dissolved."

The words roused me from the apathy of terror, benumbing my faculties, deadening my brain. In a flash I realised the danger that threatened Noel. Templeton & Co. were scoundrels, criminals, who would stop at nothing to achieve their ends. They had used me as a tool, a cat's paw, taking advantage of my ignorance and inexperience, they had employed me to cloak their infamy. For a moment I thought I would rush out and raise an alarm, but reflection warned me of the uselessness of such a course. Who would believe my statement? To all appearance Messrs. Templeton & Co. were respectable traders. The charge of murder would be laughed at, the suggestion of conspiracy waived aside.

And yet something must be done at once with the paper, the fatal paper Noel had signed, for my lover's future was practically at their disposal. True, I might warn him, but, and there lay the difficulty, I must first leave the office. Even supposing I got away, they would still retain possession of the document and the bank notes. I might remain hidden safely until they left the office. Then I could ring the bell, the caretaker of the premises would release me, and I could take steps to protect my lover. But if I failed to prove the trio guilty Noel's fortune might disappear; Noel himself be murdered.

It came home to me that the one chance of defeating the gang lay in my taking the paper with me!

The very thought sent me sick and dizzy. It was useless and worse than useless to pit my puny strength against these three determined men. Suppose I made good my escape with the paper and the notes; by a wide stretch of fancy I fancied myself safely outside the door. Even then I should be hunted down and killed without mercy—like a rat. I could not appeal to the police—I should have to explain how the notes came into my possession. I could not hope to match Templeton & Co. in cunning.

Digitized by Google

And yet slowly but surely the conviction was borne in upon me that I must seize the paper from the table and make a sudden dash for the door. Once outside in the corridor I could make plans. Meantime I dare not let the opportunity escape.

I fought against the voice that told me that I must do the thing. I looked shudderingly through the crack towards the partners and read merciless brutality on the faces of all three.

Templeton, cunning and cold, had brains that would outmatch the cleverest. Shackell—I could not look at him. I saw in fancy the fair head, the kindly face of the man whom he had murdered.

Rigby, though the youngest of the band, I feared and loathed more than all. Under that soft smile, that winning face, there lay a desire for torture. The others swindled, murdered for gain. Rigby took pleasure in the pain that he inflicted—the pleasure of a coward.

For a while they chatted over the events of the day, apportioned the money the insurance company would have to pay as a result of Herbert's murder, discussed the arrangements for the future, divided beforehand Noel's fortune and estate. And I had to listen to them, had to quiet myself, keep back the scream of terror that choked me, the impulse to flee that beat against my resolution and my will.

At last Templeton rose, and lighting a cigar suggested they should adjourn. Now, if ever, was my chance to seize the papers, now if ever was the opportunity to thwart their cruel design. Shackell and Starr seated at the table, had their backs towards me. Templeton on the other side, leaning over to them, did not observe the gradual opening of the door—the door that was between them and the "red-haired fool!" The papers—the bank notes for a thousand pounds and the document that gave the senior partner power over Noel's estate—lay at the corner of the table, at Templeton's right. If I could creep across the room and reach the table unobserved I might—— Shackell broke into a laugh at some murmured joke of Rigby's. I crouched back shivering behind the door. I could not do it, I could not run the risk!

And yet with Noel's fortune, perhaps his life at stake, I dared not hesitate. With the desperation of despair I crept out of my hiding-place and made my way across the room. Nearer and nearer to the table, so close that I hear Shackell's heavy breath, feel the vibration of his laugh.

If he should turn round, if Templeton should look up—I felt in fancy cruel fingers at my throat, strangling my breath, choking my very life.

Closer, by slow degrees, past Shackell, by the back of Rigby's chair, until the papers, the precious papers, came within touch of my hands, within reach of my fingers.

I dare not consider, I dare not hesitate. Blindly I put out my hand, snatched the notes, clutched the document.

An oath from Templeton, a shriek from me, and then, throwing over chairs and table in my mad flight, I rushed across the room, the panting breath of my pursuers close behind.

A stick deftly thrown struck my head and blinded my eyes with pain. Another second and they would be upon me. Would the door never open, the handle never turn? A last convulsive effort and I had opened the door, banged it in the enemy's face, locked it on the other side.

And then, clasping the papers to my heart, down the long corridor I rushed, and out into the street—a fugitive!

(Next week tells of how Sara leaves London to avoid her pursuers, and hides in Bedford, see "Your Editor Chats," on page 495.)

"The Gamble of Life,"
Arthur Applin's Powerful
New Serial Story, starts in FRIDAY'S "PEARSON'S WEEKLY."
ONE PENNY. EVERYWHERE.

THE POWER OF HEREDITY.

Showing What Can be Done by Love.

Archie was a clerk on £100 a year. He was a good sort, but weak, and his major weakness was a habit of putting money on the wrong horse, a dangerous amusement on £100 a year.

Archie was an orphan. He had been brought up by a maiden aunt, who, on Sundays, with a Bible in her lap, would frequently relate to him the story of his father's ruin, terminating her lecture with a homily on the evils of gambling, and a quotation on the power of heredity. These sermons were both bitter and narrow-minded.

When Archie earned sufficient to exist, he rebelled, and, flying from his aunt and her lectures, sought refuge at lodgings of his own, in a back alley, where Sunday papers were in order, and there he spent his day of rest in gleaning sporting tips.

Now Archie, like the majority of his confrères, got a yearly holiday, when he went to the seaside, but the wrong horse ran away with the money, until a year came when the holiday was perforce curtailed to a week-end. An eventful week-end, however, which ruled the fate of Archie.

It was a glorious, windy day, typical of the watering-place. The beach buzzed with excited trippers, great waves pounded and crunched the shingle, niggers howled coon songs and tummed on their banjos, children with spades and buckets chirped and chattered, the silly nursemaid giggled at the donkey boy, modest spinsters wrestled with their skirts, the ice-cream man shouted down the Punch-and-Judy show, and dogs and gulls joined in the general hubbub, to the droning accompaniment of "Nice day for a sail, sir; Nice boat, good lady." Archie was bored, he flopped on a seat by the sands.

The noise jarred on his nerves. The wind whirled dirty papers past. They reminded him of bills. He threw a pebble at a stout and well-fed dog, which rushed vaguely into a stouter and better fed woman, and upset her.

Archie smiled, then he moralised: "A fellow can't help his weakness, any more than that dog could help charging that woman. It sounds very grand to say 'Fight 'em,' a fellow simply can't, especially when that weakness is his dad's only legacy. I agree with this philosophy 'Heredity is stronger than any influence.' Yes, that sounds like a copy-book; in fact, it's good enough for Huxley or Darwin, or that sort of clever Johnny. The world at large ought to hear it. By Jove! I'll write it in the sand with my stick."

He did so, then went back to the boarding house for tea.

On the way to the house, where the by-street joins the High Street, he saw a crowd collecting, and that vice which bubbles in all women and most men bubbled in Archie, so he became inquisitive.

An old man had swooned, a dirty, unkempt old creature, with a beer-flushed visage. The kind crowd had taken it for a fit, and with typical forethought formed a ring round him to exclude the air. Archie always prided himself on his power of resource, he loved emergencies, and at once became the man of the moment. He elbowed his way through the onlookers, and called loudly for breathing space and brandy. A flask was forthcoming and the effect was electrical. The old man opened his eyes, and seeing the flask, grabbed it. He readily drank the contents; then was assisted to his feet. Archie lingered when the others had dispersed. He gave the old man twopence, which he pocketed with thanks and a hiccough.

After tea, Archie was still bored, but returned to the seat by the sands. There was someone else sitting there, so he took the other end.

Digitized by Google

The tide had risen; the trippers seemed less noisy, their mouths, no doubt, too full of shrimps to admit of loud conversation.

Archie looked seawards, successive hoots from an excursion steamer attracted him, the steamer looked so angry, and the little fishing boats ahead, so unconcerned.

He watched the steamer manœuvre between them, then looked down at his epigram in the sand, "Heredity is stronger than any influence save"—he never wrote "save"—"save love." He repeated it aloud. "How on earth—" but a rippling laugh interrupted him from the end of the seat, and he turned to see a dainty little girl in a white muslin dress, hat in lap, and fair hair waving in the wind.

"Bless my soul," ejaculated Archie, then they both blushed and turned away.

The moment was awkward. A stronger and bolder man would have seized the opportunity, but Archie made full-stops with his stick in the sand. He had made an oblate spheroid of full stops round his boot, before Providence came to his rescue. A puff of wind, decreed by the Fates, gently lifted the hat from the girl's lap, and away it went, whisked and trundled, over and over the sands, with dogs, children, and Archie in hot pursuit. The girl smiled—knowingly, perhaps.

Archie raced the black retriever, and beat him on the post, but the black retriever had slobbered on the bow, so Archie returned, a hero, indeed, wiping it with his handkerchief.

It was only a cheap hat, 1s. 11¾d. at a recent sale, a hat of the shape that contorts to suit the fashion and a woman's will, but Archie returned with it in safety, carrying it with a care that did credit to a Bond Street milliner, or a mother with her darling mite.

"Thanks," said the girl, as she pushed the pins in, "it nearly went into the sea."

Archie felt more comfortable. He almost wished it in the sea, for he was a good swimmer. Then he sat down, closer than before, and they discussed the place, the weather, and many mundane things, and finally they laughed at the epigram in the sand.

It was dusk when Archie said "Good-night," and by then he had told the whole story of heredity, and she had listened without laughter. They left the epigram in the sand, but neither forgot it.

Next morning he returned to the same seat, a happy, eager, Archie. It was very early, and the gulls and the sun welcomed him, possibly they took his presence for granted. There was the epigram untouched, so Archie sat down, and re-read it twenty times, dwelling more and more on the last two words.

But what was that! A piece of crumpled paper stuck in the letter "e"—a bill, ugh! He had forgotten bills, how dare paper trespass on his holy ground. He picked it up, it was crisp, with a familiar, and yet unfamiliar crispness. Ye gods and little fishes! It was a five pound note.

Archie felt like a thief in the night, nevertheless thrust it into his pocket. Someone was hailing, so with a shamefaced look he turned to find the old man who had had a fit the day before.

"Hullo, joker! Looking for diamonds; found any?"

"Ha! no—er, not exactly. How are you?"

"Tidy enough, thankee, tidy enough for Ascot and the Gold Cup."

"You are a sporting man—a bookie, perhaps," said Archie.

"Aye, I was once, and as 'cute and as straight as the Turf breeds, but I'm poor now, with a big drag on my purse-strings."

"Big family; eh?"

"Bless you, sonnie, no; nothing so troublesome."

"What then?"

"A thirst; a very expensive thirst."

Archie smiled. The old man was proud of his thirst.

"Well, lad, I like you," he continued, "you gave me tuppence yestercen, give me another and I'll return you a billionfold."

Archie smiled again, and gave it to him. The old man's voice came low but more raspy, he moved close to Archie and bent over his ear.

"Got any money?"

"Er—a very little."

"Then pawn your clothes, your life, your soul, my son, and put it all on Rosemary for the Gold Cup. It's a straight 'un!" cried the old man, and with a slow emphasis he added, as he tapped Archie's shoulder and hobbled off, "from a straight chap."

Archie stood in a dream. The old man moved slowly on, jingling his coppers. Then Archie shook himself, and called:

"Can't stop," came the reply, "must get to Ascot."

Archie stared at the sand, the letters there were rising and hitting him. "Go to Ascot," he cried, sinking back on the seat, "Rosemary or the other; I suppose I must choose now and for ever."

An hour later he was walking on the esplanade, the five-pound note felt less crisp, the battle had waned, only muffled and irregular firing drummed in his ear. A white muslin dress turned the corner.

Ah, what would that money buy, a Bond Street hat, a necklace, brooch, or any other glittering gem dear to woman's eyes. "Let Rosemary go hang!" said Archie, as he strode boldly forth to meet the dress.

He returned to hard work on the Monday, leaving a glad heart and a promise behind him. He had told the girl of his lucky find, had sworn that it was hers to spend, but she was immovable. "No," she had said, "you are to keep it, and not until I tell you, are you to spend it. One year from to-day we will meet at this very seat, and until then, Archie, you will not hear from me."

* * * *

The year had passed, Archie was returning to the seaside. How sweet the world looked, the birds so happy, the trees so green, even the train drummed contentedly as it bore him nearer, nearer. How hard it had been, and yet in the end, how easy. No bills, no worries, and the same crisp five-pound note.

He turned to the esplanade, his lips were dry and refused to whistle, his heart throbbed like a dynamo.

"I wonder if she really meant it," how many thousand times had he said that in the last year. The answer came back "yes." A white muslin dress by the old seat, and laughing eyes, dimmed, perhaps, with tears. It was she!

"So you have really come," she said softly. He was no longer bashful, he took her up in his arms with an honest hug. The niggers' lullaby died with a gasp, the five-pound note got terribly crushed, but Archie did not heed.

"God bless you, little woman," he said huskily, "I have kept my promise."

They sat on the old seat and gazed at the sea.

"Archie," she whispered, "I have other five-pound notes, but they are yours now, dear, ours, Archie. God grant, like this one, they may bring blessings."

And only then did he understand.

"But how on earth," he exclaimed a little later, "did you think that I should find it in the sand?"

She laughed merrily. "Ah, Mr. Philosopher, that needs no telling, when a woman's instinct knows that heredity is weaker than love."

Lucy Phair.

Digitized by Google

'Twixt the Cup and the Lip.

The Romance of a Fisherman's Bride.

"One more day, darling, and then the union I have so long desired will be effected, and you will be my wife."

The speaker was a tall, bronzed, brown-bearded fisherman, with clear, frank, blue eyes, and a brow that bore evidence of greater intellectuality than the majority of his class. Yet he was but a fisherman, for, though his capabilities were above his station, he loved the sea and the simple life of the fisher-folk, and was contented. The girl whom he addressed was as sweet a type of innocent maidenhood as could be seen on all the broad coast of Sussex—with sunny curls that seemed to court disorder and broke away from the fetters which bound them, with deep, dark violet eyes, that looked into one's own with all the shy fearlessness of innocence, and ripe red lips, to whose sweetness the man at her side could have testified. For he had won her, and, when the golden sun had risen and set and risen again, she was to be his wife. It was dark now, and they sat together on the green slope of a great cliff that overlooked the dark-blue sea.

"The night seems born for happiness," he said, taking the girl's hand in his. "But the weather may change—the waves may rise and the wind roar—but happiness—our happiness—the happiness that comes of perfect love—cannot change."

Muriel Warne looked radiantly up into her lover's face.

"I hope not, dear," she said softly. "But life is not without its cares. Sometimes it seems to me we are in danger of becoming too placid, and need something to wake us up. Trouble is not an unqualified bane. If it teaches us nothing more, the lesson of patience is at least worth learning. And I am not patient. If anything goes wrong, it irritates me, and I generally do something on impulse, which later reason tells me is foolish."

Norman Hurst smiled.

"That is the way we all learn," he said gently. "Experience is the best teacher man ever had, but her lessons are generally the most stern and unrelenting."

"And therefore the longer remembered," replied Muriel.

"Quite so," he said gravely. "But I hope neither you nor I may be judged to be deserving of such lessons."

"I don't know," said Muriel thoughtfully. "I think I am. I am proud and impulsive, and have never known what it is to be thwarted in my life. I could not bear humiliation of any kind—even the humiliation of injury."

"Surely," said the man fondly, "there is none who would injure you! Evil is not a stranger to men's hearts, but evil cannot harm you, for innocence is its own safeguard."

"Innocence—yes," replied the girl. "But not when self-will, impatience, and pride of heart distort the judgment, and make one do the things which simple innocence would condemn.

Norman laughed.

"We are becoming quite morbid!" he said. "Let us take a walk along the cliff. The moon is rising and the night is gloriously beautiful."

He leapt to his feet as he spoke and proffered his hand to the girl. Together they went along the margin of the dark cliff, and the darkness soon swallowed them up.

As they disappeared, a man lifted himself from behind a great rock close to where the two had sat. His face was dark, and a scowl made it appear almost malevolent.

"So I am to be the Angel of Destiny, and teach these people patience and fortitude and humility," he said with a sneer. "Quite a new character for me. Not such a bad one either, since the reward will be mine too. So that is how you feel, my lady—'even the humiliation of injury,' eh?—well, so much the better for me! I think I can see my way through this business, and, if the lesson be hard to learn, it will, as you say, be the longer remembered."

He looked once in the direction which the lovers had taken, and then strode rapidly away.

* * * * *

Another night had fallen on the little south-coast fishing village, and the lights twinkled in the many casement windows of the pretty cottages of its inhabitants. But Norman Hurst's assertion that the weather might change had been already verified. The day had been unusually hot, and a storm was even now gathering far out over the sea. Great black clouds were scudding across the murky sky, through which the vivid flash of lightning could be seen by the watchers on the beach. The sea, too, was rising fast, and great, white-crested billows were breaking on the strand. The fishing-boats were hurrying into the bay for shelter from the storm, and the night grew darker and darker.

Within the cottage where she lived, Muriel Warne sat, with her hands folded in her lap, happily thinking of the morrow. She had not seen her lover since the morning, for he had, so he had told her, many things to do in the preparation of their future home. So she would not see him before she met him at the altar.

There was a knock at the door, and she went herself to open it. A tall man stood outside, and he lifted his cap respectfully.

"May I come in?" he said. "There's going to be a storm."

For a moment the girl hesitated. But it would be rude to refuse.

"Yes," she said, as she stepped aside to allow him to enter. "The night looks very threatening, and you will be caught in the rain before you reach home."

Digitized by Google

He came in, and Muriel, shutting the door, preceded him into the room, where she had been sitting. A coldly, critical physiognomist would have pronounced Ernest Malcolm a handsome man. Yet, at first sight, few would have shared that opinion. Flawless as were his features, there was an unpleasant shiftiness about the dark eyes and a cruel compressing of the thin lips that repelled one, and stamped the man as untrustworthy. Yet his manner, to Muriel Warne, at any rate, left nothing to be desired. Courteous and polite to a degree, he had so far conquered the instinctive dislike which the girl felt towards him, that she had even come to regard him, in some measure, as her friend. To-night, however, she would have preferred to be alone—alone, to think of the morrow. Once Ernest Malcolm had asked her to be his wife. Her refusal had taken him by surprise, and he had demanded to know its cause. And then she had told him that she loved Norman Hurst and had promised to be his wife, and the man had almost frightened her, so livid and distorted was his face as he heard the news. And then he had turned and gone away without a word.

"How dreadful he looked!" she had said to herself. But the knowledge that she is loved is sweet to a woman, even though she cannot reciprocate it, and Muriel felt sorry for the man and was kinder to him than before.

And now he sat in the little room, with the bright light of the lamp between them, and talked to her with his low, well-modulated voice, until, in spite of her previous preoccupation, she grew interested and talked too. Presently he rose and held out his hand.

"I have come to say good-bye to Miss Warne," he said quietly.

The girl rose also.

"You are not going away?" she asked in surprise.

The man hesitated and gave vent to a little forced laugh.

"I don't know," he said. "I may do, but I am not sure yet. At any rate, it is, I believe, the last time I may address you as Miss Warne."

A deep flush overspread the girl's cheeks as she bowed her head in shy assent. The man's face darkened at the sight, but his voice never changed.

"I trust," he said, with an appearance of deep earnestness, "that the life which is before you may bring you all the happiness you deserve."

The girl's eyes filled with sudden tears.

"That is very kind of you," she said, looking up. "And—and generous," she added, with a blush, as she remembered his defeat.

He took her hand in his, and for a moment was silent. Then there came a loud knocking at the outer door, and the girl started back.

"Who can it be?" she said, and went out into the hall.

A boy was standing outside, and the rain was beginning to fall.

"Is Mr. Malcolm here?" he asked. "I've been looking for him everywhere. I'm to give him this letter." And he held it out to Muriel and looked questioningly up into her face. "Aren't you Miss Warne?" he asked, a sudden light coming into his eyes.

Muriel nodded.

"Then there's a letter for you, too. The same gentleman gave me them both." And he handed the girl the second letter. "Good night, miss. It's terrible wet." And he ran off into the darkness and rain.

Muriel went back into the little room and silently handed her visitor the letter addressed to him. It seemed very strange. Both the envelopes bore the handwriting of her lover, Norman Hurst, and some indefinable fear came into the girl's heart. Simultaneously they tore open their envelopes, and, a moment later, an exclamation burst from Ernest Malcolm's lips. Looking across at Muriel, he saw that her face had become deathly white, while her eyes seemed riveted to the letter she held in her hand. For this is what she read:

"DEAR MISS WARNE,—I know only too well how greatly surprised, and even indignant, you will be when you get this letter. The truth is, I have been living a double life of late—pretending to be what I am not, and never can be, an honest man—for the sake of winning you. But the utter wickedness of the thing has come home to me before it is too late, and I have determined—cost what it will—to relinquish that which is now within my grasp, and go away. For three years I have been an inveterate gambler, and ruin has only been averted by the help of a friend who has many a time stood between me and exposure. Nor is this all, for there are other things which I cannot even mention. Try to forget me. I am not worthy of you, and, did you but know all, you would recoil from me with loathing, and realise, even more than you now do, the degradation to which my kisses—the kisses of a gambler and a libertine—have subjected you. Finally, then, good-bye. You will never see my face again.—Yours regretfully,

"NORMAN HURST."

She was recalled to herself by the voice of Ernest Malcolm.

"Miss Warne," he said, in a strangely broken voice. "I am afraid my visit to-night has been ill-timed. At least,

"Go through with it," he said. "You never needed a husband more than you do now. Try me, Muriel."

Digitized by Google

you will do me the justice of believing that this"—he touched the letter he held in his hand—"was not foreseen. May God comfort you in this, your first great trouble." And he held out his hand.

"Oh, I can't believe it," said Muriel, with a little catch in her throat. "There must be some horrible mistake. And yet——"

"I wish I could support you in that belief," said the man. "But——" And he paused and drew a deep breath.

Presently Muriel lifted her eyes. The look in her face was changing from grief to indignation. The humiliation of her position was asserting herself, and anger blazed up in her cheeks.

"It is his own handwriting," she said resentfully. "There's seems no question about it. Oh, how could he so liumiliate me!"

There was a long pause. Then the man said:

"What are you going to do—about—to-morrow?"

Muriel started.

"To-morrow?" she said. "Oh, I had forgotten that!"

"Your invitations are out and everything is arranged for the wedding," reminded the man in a low, concentrated voice, while he watched the girl's face attentively. "You will have to explain."

"Oh, I can't!" said Muriel vehemently. "Everyone would laugh at me. I can't, and I won't!" And the violet eyes flashed with angry determination.

"Then go through with it," said the man, coolly.

Muriel looked up in amazement.

"Go through with it?" she repeated, in bewilderment.

Ernest Malcolm took a step towards her and caught both her hands in his.

"Yes," he said firmly. "Go through with it. Show the world that, if one man holds your love so lightly—if one man jilts you and casts you off—there is another, who will count himself honoured and ennobled by a union with you. Do not look so frightened, dear. You never needed a husband more than you do at this moment. And I will see to it that no breath of slander is whispered against you. Try me. Muriel!" And he tried to draw her towards him. But she held back.

"Wait," she said. "Let me think."

For fully ten minutes they stood thus, and then the girl lifted her head.

"I will," she said, with sudden resolution. "But you must get a special license, before twelve o'clock to-morrow."

"I will see to that," said the man. "Now I will bid you good-night, for I know you would prefer to be alone. To-morrow then, at twelve. Remember, you have promised!" And he went out of the house and into the darkness.

A little way off he stopped, heedless of the storm that bellowed overhead, and uttered a low, mirthless laugh.

"Beautiful!" he said. "I am qualifying for an actor or—— But we must get the ceremony over first." And he resumed his walk through the driving rain and returned to his home.

* * * * *

About an hour before the storm broke over the sea, Norman Hurst, who was walking along the beach, was accosted by the self-same boy who, later on, was the bearer of the two letters to Muriel and Ernest Malcolm. Touching his cap, the boy put a letter into his hand and vanished. Norman tore open the envelope, and, by the light of a ship's lantern hanging to one of the luggers on the beach, read the following epistle:

"DEAREST NORMAN,—A very extraordinary thing has happened to-day, and I must see you at once. There are reasons, however, why you should not come to the house—reasons which I will presently explain. Please meet me under the last eastern groyne. The spot is lonely, and we shall be free from observation. You will find me there already. Will explain all later. Almost—your true wife, "MURIEL."

Norman Hurst turned the letter over. He looked puzzled and bewildered.

"It seems very queer," he muttered to himself. "But it is Muriel's handwriting, safe enough. What can she want?"

The concluding phrase caught his eye, and a smile of wondrous tenderness crept into his handsome face.

"Ah," he said softly—"almost! Yes, it is not far off now. But I must be off, or she will grow tired of waiting." A great gust of wind swept fiercely over the sea, and he looked alarmedly up at the darkening sky. "By Jove," he muttered, "it is going to be a wild sort of night!"

Pulling his hat down over his eyes, he started, and, within a quarter of an hour, was within hail of the last groyne. The spot was very dark and lonely, and he marvelled within himself that Muriel should have chosen such a place. But he plodded on over the rough shingle, and turned down under the lee of the great black groyne. Down he went, almost to the margin of the sea, but he could discern nothing of Muriel. A boat lay beached close to the groyne, but it appeared empty, and he turned away, intending to retrace his way along the sheltered side of the great sea barrier.

But at that instant he felt his arms caught in a powerful grip from behind, and, before he could collect himself, he was thrown violently to the ground and pinioned, hand and foot, with stout, strong cords. Dazed and bewildered without even the chance to fight for his liberty, he was dragged into the boat, and his adversaries, who were two in number dipped their oars in the rising water and pulled vigorously out to sea. Then, for the first time, Norman Hurst saw that he was in a trap, and vaguely realised that the attack upon himself was in some mysterious way connected with Muriel Warne, and he began to struggle with all the strength that was in his muscular frame. He tore at his bonds with the ferocity of a tiger, but not a strand relaxed. His adversaries had done their work well. Then he turned to the men.

"What is the meaning of this?" he demanded sternly. "And who, and what, are you? Are you so ashamed of your faces that you hide them beneath your mufflers?"

The men laughed.

"You'll know us soon enough," said one. "The Merry Trawler lies out in the 'roads' yonder, and you have got to keep us company for a little while—only a matter of four-and-twenty hours though, so there isn't much to grumble about."

"The Merry Trawler!" said Norman, sitting upright in the boat in unfeigned astonishment. "Ernest Malcolm's boat! Then you are——"

"We're his crew," replied the man, "We've left the boy aboard, and, by the look of the weather, we shall have to hurry, or he'll go down with the lugger before we can lower the sails."

"But what is the meaning of it all?" persisted Norman, knitting his brows in sheer bewilderment.

"Well," said the man thoughtfully, "Cap'n didn't tell us to keep our mouths shut, and you can't upset his plans now. The fact is, he's got a kind o' hankering arter Miss Warne—Skipper Warne's daughter—and, as he can't get her the straight way, he's trying a roundabout one. He's been learnin' your handwritings lately, and he's no fool at it, I can tell ye. So, to-night, he writes you a letter in Miss Warne's handwritin', and Miss Warne another in your'n, and so——"

Digitized by Google

"Wrote Miss Warne a letter in my handwriting!" said Norman in amazement. "But what purpose would that answer?"

The men laughed and looked at him humorously.

"Well, we don't know exactly what he said in it," resumed the man who had spoken hitherto. "Something about drinkin' and gamblin' and other things that's worse, and tellin' her you was mad with remorse and had run away."

Norman Hurst uttered a cry of rage and tore anew at the cords which bound him. But all his efforts were in vain, and he sank down exhausted into the bottom of the boat. Presently he lifted his head.

"And where is Malcolm?" he asked.

The man grinned and nudged his companion.

"Havin' a nice little chat with the lady, o' course," he said.

Norman groaned and lapsed into silence. And, the next instant, they ran alongside the fishing-lugger, and his two gaolers helped him on board.

They were not a moment too soon. Even as it was, the rigging snapped and the sails split, and the long timbers creaked and groaned in the hull of the straining lugger. And then the cable that held them at anchor broke under the strain, and the boat lifted her head high in the water and went tearing along with the wind behind her. Flash after flash of vivid light blazed out in the dark heavens, and peal upon peal of deafening thunder roared over the angry sea. Escape was useless now, and the crew, well knowing this, and needing all their energies to keep the boat from foundering, released his bonds and begged him to lend a hand.

Norman Hurst burst into their midst. With a glad cry, Muriel leapt into his arms.

Norman Hurst was known, all along that coast, as a cool and wise commander of such a craft as this, and, as the storm increased in violence, they implored him to take control of the boat. This he willingly and even gladly did, for he saw that the men, however capable as a crew, were powerless to navigate the lugger in such a sea. And he hoped, too, that he might be able to put the boat into port before they had run far along the coast. But, try as he might, he found this task hopeless. The great cliffs towered up along the shore, and he knew he dared not go too near. So port after port was passed, and all he could do was to keep the violently-pitching lugger above water, and hope for the morrow. Sea after sea dashed upon their decks, and the wind shrieked madly through the spars and the remaining rigging. Fear was in the faces of the two men, and, regarding the storm as a punishment for their share in the plot of their captain, they came, like the curs they were, to ask Norman's forgiveness. But he bade them sternly go back to their posts. So passed all that night, and death was very near them.

And then the morning dawned. But the sea still ran high, and it was not until nine o'clock that Norman, worn out with fatigue and hardship, ran the almost water-logged lugger into a little harbour, some forty miles from home.

* * * * *

It was twelve o'clock, and the streets of the little fishing village were unusually gay. Animated groups stood at the street corners and round the old wooden capstans on the beach, and conversed excitedly together. And there was some reason for their excitement. For the past six months they had understood that Captain Warne's daughter was going to be married to the stalwart handsome, young fisherman. Norman Hurst. And now, on the very dawn of her wedding-day, a rumour had reached them that she had quarrelled with her lover, had sent him about his business, and was determined to go through with the ceremony, substituting in his place the man they all admired but nobody trusted—Ernest Malcolm.

There was quite a crowd round the porch of the little church where the wedding was to be solemnised. Eager faces peered in at the open doors and down the road in expectation of the carriages. And soon they came in sight. But the cheer which they had intended for the bride of Norman Hurst found no place on their lips now. Muriel, dressed very prettily in veil and wreath, alighted from the carriage and went into the church, which was already thronged with curious onlookers. She was very pale, and leant on the arm of her father, as if for support. She seemed to reel as she neared the altar, and, as Ernest Malcolm had not yet arrived, the officiating priest placed the vestry at her disposal. This offer she gladly accepted, and sank into a chair as soon as it was reached.

No notice had as yet been given to the priest that Ernest Malcolm was to be the bridegroom. He had heard the general rumour, but paid no heed to it. The banns had been thrice read out for Norman Hurst and Muriel Warne, and for that ceremony he was prepared. And the girl waited—waited almost in dread—vaguely hoping that Ernest Malcolm would not come, or, if he came, that he would bring the news of his failure to procure the special license which was to take the place of the one now in the priest's hands and make her his wife. All night long she had lain awake, thinking over the step she was about to take. And the more she thought, the more did she regret that rash promise, given in her pride of heart and against her better judgment. And all because she had confessedly been too great a coward to face the curious eyes of a multitude. But she had promised now, and to her a promise, even such an one as this, seemed sacred and binding.

Digitized by Google

Presently there was a stir in the body of the church, and the clergyman opened the door of the vestry. Ernest Malcolm stepped briskly inside and handed the priest a special license. The latter examined it gravely and turned to Muriel.

"Am I to understand," he said slowly, "that this is your will? Remember, there is no retreat when once you have taken your stand."

The girl looked dully up in his face.

"I have promised," she said.

"That is nothing to me," he said quietly. "It is to me you have to answer now—and—to a Higher Power!"

Muriel started.

"To a Higher Power! To God!" she said. "Then I cannot—I dare not do this thing! I was wicked—wicked, ever to have promised. Better a thousand times that I should endure to be humbled, than that I should give my heart, my love, to one man, and myself to another! Oh, set me free from this promise, I entreat you!" And she turned appealingly to Malcolm, who stood, with his arms folded, eyeing her disdainfully.

"And I?" he said mockingly. "It would seem that my humiliation occupies no place in your calculations. A convenient conscience, surely!"

The girl winced, and cowered before the cruel light that had come into his dark eyes. At that instant, a horse's hoofs were heard galloping outside, and the face of Ernest Malcolm turned pale. A moment later, and they heard a stir in the church and the voices of men and women in eager and excited conversation. The priest again opened the door of the vestry, and Norman Hurst, pale and dishevelled from exposure to wind and storm, burst into their midst. With a little glad cry, Muriel leaped into his arms.

"Oh, tell me," she said wildly—"tell me it is all a mistake!"

"Could you ever have doubted me?" he said reproachfully.

"But the letter?" pleaded the girl.

"Yes, I know," said Norman soothingly. "We have been the victims of a foul and dastardly plot."

Remembering the man to whom he owed a heavy and terrible reckoning, he turned suddenly. But Ernest Malcolm had vanished.

"Well," said Norman, "let him go. He will not trouble us more."

And then he turned to the mystified priest and good old Captain Warne, and explained to them all that had happened the preceding night. The congregation assembled in the little church grew very impatient at the delay. But at last the little group filed out of the vestry and approached the altar. Seeing their old favourite in the place of Ernest Malcolm, and momentarily forgetful of the sacredness of the place, they gave vent to a loud cheer. The worthy old priest raised his hand, and silence fell on all present. And then he read the words that bound Norman Hurst and Muriel Warne together for all time, and, though the years have sped by since then, no shadow has ever come to cloud their happiness or diminish the love they bear, the one to the other. And Ernest Malcolm, whose dark face was never again seen in the little fishing-village, experienced the truth of that old adage:

"There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip!"

Walter Mowbray.

A Girl to be Proud of.

Telling of the Rivalry between a Conceited Cad and a True Lover.

"I MEAN to marry a girl I can be proud of!"

Charlie Annesley looked at the speaker with a half twinkle in his eye.

"That sounds a bit priggish," said he.

"I don't know what the word means," said John Talbot-Winterson. He was very insistent upon the double name, and there were two things that invariably upset his dignity. One was to call him Jack, and the other was to omit the hyphen. But he was a very dignified person indeed.

"Mabel Masters is all very well," he went on to say, lighting a fresh cigarette carelessly.

"Mabel is the best girl I ever knew," exclaimed his friend, flaming up, "and you're not good enough to tie her shoe-lace."

John Talbot-Winterson smiled superciliously.

"I always thought," he said, "that you were love-sick in that quarter, Charlie. Now I know it."

"Bosh!" ejaculated his friend; but he coloured a little all the same.

"What can she do? She doesn't paint, ride, golf, play, or sing. She's an absolute nonentity."

"If you were not such an impossible man to pick a quarrel with," said Charlie, "I should certainly do so. I often feel, old man, that it would give me the greatest pleasure in life to kick you!"

Mr. Winterson smiled imperturbably. He might, or perhaps he might not, have known that there were many others who would have been delighted to kick him for his insufferable conceit.

"My dear Charlie," he remarked placidly, "life is too short to quarrel with any but one's enemies, and I don't believe I have one in the world. And I don't mind telling you that Mabel would accept me to-morrow, if I proposed to her."

"Do you think so?"

"I do. But I don't intend to."

"A month ago you were madly in love with her."

"Dear boy, a month to a man of my age is a very long time."

Charlie Annesley clenched his fists and ground his teeth. Often and often he wondered why he still both called and considered this man his friend. They had not a single taste in common, beyond that of—a month ago—admiring the same girl. But even in this matter their method of showing their admiration differed as widely as the Poles. John Talbot-Winterson patronised her, while Annesley, even more than he would admit, perhaps more than he knew, loved and worshipped her. He saw qualities in her that Winterson, with all his knowledge of the world, was absolutely blind to.

"She is rich," he remarked.

"Her father is," said Charlie curtly. There was a curious twinge at his heart as he spoke. Perhaps it was jealousy, for

Digitized by Google

Talbot-Winterson was handsome and well connected, and he himself was plain and a nobody. Winterson was what is known as an accomplished man. He did a lot of things indifferently well, but in a manner calculated to, and which did, win him the admiration of the fairer sex. Charlie Annesley could do nothing. And he knew that in the world in which Mabel Masters moved Winterson was a fixed planet, while he was a very minor star indeed.

He had heard Miss Masters speak of Winterson. To her, no doubt, his conceit would appear cleverness, his priggish affectation the result of birth and good breeding. He knew she admired him, for she had told him so, in feminine unconsciousness that the words had been as so many daggers in poor Annesley's heart. What chance had he against so bright and shining a light as his friend? He was not exactly jealous of him, but there was that twinge of pain there all the same.

"Rather nice," said Winterson, with a languid air. "I half think I shall change my mind."

Annesley grunted. Some men would have sneered, but Charlie was not of that kind. He was almost too easy in disposition, especially where Mr. Talbot-Winterson was concerned. "Once a friend, always a friend," was his motto. A man with a little more determination would have kicked such a "friend" as Winterson long ago, and have resolved to have nothing more to do with him, and would have kept his resolve into the bargain.

When Winterson went, Charlie Annesley went back to his studio and began to paint furiously. But after a time he threw down palette and brush and lit another pipe in disgust.

"What right have I to think of her?" he said to himself, savagely, "a poor nobody of an artist in a shabby velvet coat and slippers down at heel. There's Winterson—beg his pardon, Talbot-Winterson—with his two thousand a year. And he says she is not a girl to be proud of! Oh, he's an ass—a full-blooded, concert-pitch, consummate ass! On his own showing, he knows everything, and yet he cannot see that she is a girl that even a duke could be proud of! She would make a most delicious duchess, and if I were a duke I'd make her one. If she'd have me!" said Charlie ruefully.

"I won't smoke any more. I'll go round, and—and get those sketches I left there last week!"

It was the moth and the candle, of course. Poor Charlie Annesley could no more keep away from the Masters' house in Westbourne Square than the foolish fluttering insect can avoid the glare of the light. He had only known Mabel Masters a little while, so was scarcely aware as yet of his own folly. But it was beginning to dawn upon him that she was dangerously attractive, and there was that twinge of the heart too. So Charlie Annesley went blindly on to his fate.

Miss Masters was at home, said the maidservant, and in a few moments she swept into the room, a tall, dark girl, with a shapely head well set on her shoulders, and a graceful carriage. She held out her hand unaffectedly to Annesley with a charming smile of welcome.

"Oh, what roses!" she exclaimed, at the sight of those to bring which Charlie had spent the price of a dinner at Frascati's. The very fact of his being tempted to do so ought to have told him of his danger.

"How good of you," she said simply, as she took them from him, with a smile that dazzled him. "I shall wear some of them to-night. We are going to the theatre with Mr. Talbot-Winterson."

Again that twinge of the heart.

"I hope you will enjoy yourself," he said; but he could not help thinking that it was hard lines that the girl he loved should wear his roses to a theatre with his rival beside her. The sting of this thought made him shorten his visit considerably. He felt he wanted to go away alone and think. Was he jealous of John Talbot-Winterson? He began to think he was.

Presently other visitors were announced, and he slipped quietly away with an adieu to Miss Masters. Mabel had fastened one of his roses at her throat, where her rounded chin just touched it, and this gave him a strange thrill of delight, and told him more of his own heart than he had known before.

"A girl to be proud of! Why," as Charlie Annesley said to himself as he walked down the street, "I am proud that she should wear my rose. I am proud of her!"

Then he suddenly stood stock still in the middle of the pavement, much to the astonishment of a passing small boy.

"I believe," he said, "I am falling in love with her!"

The thought troubled him. What chance would he have against his friend Winterson? Not the ghost of one. That lucky possessor of all the talents was rich, and Mabel was a woman who could never marry a poor man. Oh, the thing was an utter impossibility! But the discovery that he loved her troubled him as much as anything in the thirty odd years of his life had ever done, and he could not help thinking every now and again that evening of Mabel and—his roses.

* * * * *

It was just a month later when Talbot-Winterson dashed—so far as such a very refined and well-bred person could be said to dash—into Annesley's studio. There was, for a wonder, animation on his usually stolid face.

"Congratulate me, Charles," he said. It was, perhaps, typical of the speaker that he was the one man in London who ever called him Charles.

"Upon what?"

"My engagement."

"To——"

The name faltered upon Annesley's lips, but the other never noticed the slight hesitation.

"Yes. To Mabel. She is charming, and I really believe she loves me."

This was more than bearable. Annesley turned upon the speaker fiercely.

"You conceited ass!" he exclaimed, with more vehemence than he had ever shown in his life, "That's not the question! Do you love her?"

He almost demanded the reply, in the tone of an old-time highwayman asking for "your money or your life!" Even the usually imperturbable Talbot-Winterson was taken aback.

"My dear Charles——" he began.

"Do you love her?" his friend said once more. "A month ago you avowed her to be uninteresting, you asserted in this very room that she was not a girl you could be proud of."

"A month ago," said Talbot-Winterson, "was—well—was a month ago."

If ever Charlie Annesley came near to kicking, to say nothing of more seriously assaulting a man who professed to be his friend, it was at this identical moment, but he recovered his self-control with a great effort.

"I congratulate you," he said. That there happened to be an accent, almost so slight as to be imperceptible, on the "you," entirely escaped the notice of Mr. Talbot-Winterson. He simply smiled.

"Thanks," he said languidly. "I think we shall be awfully happy. I feel I deserve her after the unbounded attentions I have paid her during the last month or so."

"You conceited ass!" said Charlie. But it did not ruffle Mr. Talbot-Winterson one atom. His skin was too thick to notice the personality. Annesley picked up his brush and went on working with a furious feeling at his heart which only work could appease. His friend came to look over his shoulder, after he had in his affected, dilettante fashion, lit a fresh cigarette.

"By Jove," he exclaimed, as he saw the picture upon the easel, "it is Mabel!"

"Well!" said Charlie, as he turned, brush in hand.

"Have you—ah—her permission?"

"Yes, I have."

"And don't you think that under the—ah—present circumstances, you—ah—require mine?"

Nothing would have given Charlie Annesley greater pleasure than to have knocked the speaker down. He would have been sorry for it a minute after, but it would have done him so much good.

"Why?" was all he said

Digitized by Google

"Well, of course you know. But all the same, I shall buy the picture."

"Will you?" said Annesley.

"I must. What do you want for it when finished—to my satisfaction, of course."

"To your satisfaction! Yours! What do you know about painting, you——"

"My dear Charles, don't get angry. I know nothing about painting, but I intend to purchase that picture when finished."

Charlie Annesley tore the canvas from the easel, and picking up a palette knife, slashed it into unrecognisable strips. He flung them in the grate. "There," he ejaculated, "it never will be finished."

For once in his life John Talbot-Winterson betrayed astonishment. Had he been less wrapped up in his self-conceit it might have occurred to him that Annesley, too, might admire—even be in love with the girl to whom he was engaged. But such a thing never came into his head.

"I must say," he began in his most dignified style. Annesley interrupted him.

"That will do!" he said. "If you say more we shall quarrel. There is the way out. You know it. You had better go."

And Mr. John Talbot-Winterson went.

* * * * *

When he had gone, and Annesley heard the front door close behind him, the painter threw down palette and brush, and sank into the nearest chair.

"That!" he murmured, with his head in his hands. "That! To think of—to imagine that having the right to kiss her dear hand when I, who worship her, should be afraid to put my lips to the hem of her gown. They are engaged, and he has the right to kiss her hand, perhaps her gracious lips—and I——"

It was probably the most bitter hour that had ever come into Charlie Annesley's life. Draw the veil over it. For even though one may love hopelessly, one never is quite without some faint lingering spark of hope. And poor Annesley was praying that he might never again see the face of the girl he had learnt to love so well.

In less than a week he had packed up, and had left London on a two months' sketching tour which he had had for some time in contemplation. It was the wisest thing to do. Something told him that if he met Mabel again he might say that which he might regret. So he left London and his love.

Wandering about the country he tried to forget the girl he could have been so proud of. Winterson had won her, he said to himself—pray that he, too, would be proud of her in the years to come.

Of set purpose he selected the wildest and most inaccessible regions he could find, places where London dailies less than a fortnight old were a rarity, and post offices unknown. He grew brown and was comparatively happy. But he did not forget. He filled page after page with sketches, tramped mile after mile over moor and wold. But he did not forget.

Happening to bivouac, so to speak, at a somewhat larger village than usual one night, he came across an old copy of a daily paper. Idly glancing through it a paragraph he came upon struck him like a blow.

"The suicide of Mr. John Masters. This particularly distressing event, which took place last week, was, it has transpired, caused by financial embarrassment. It will be remembered that Mr. Masters' dead body, shot through the brain, was found on Hampstead Heath. All rumours of foul play have now been proved erroneous."

Mabel's father! Charlie Annesley looked at the date. It was a fortnight ago. Then he had been dead three weeks. Oh, how his heart ached for the girl he loved. But then he remembered that she had Winterson to comfort her, only somehow he could not quite picture John Talbot-Winterson in the rôle of comforter. The part was one for which he would be totally unfitted.

The paragraph had the effect of shortening Annesley's tour considerably. In some vague way he thought that he might be of use to the widow and daughter. Anyhow, it would be a comfort to himself to be in London where they were, and he could learn more particulars of the affair from Winterson. Wherefore he turned his face to civilisation and the Metropolis once more.

Almost the first thing he did on arriving was to go to the Masters' house in Westbourne Square. Here he met with rebuff number one. It was empty, and a board announced its immediate sale by auction. Annesley made a note of the solicitors, and went to see them at once.

Rebuff number two. The solicitors only told him they were acting on behalf of the creditors, to whom Mrs. Masters had made over everything she possessed, except an annuity of fifty pounds a year which had been settled upon herself. Her address? Yes, they knew it, but at Mrs. Masters' express desire, it was not to be given to anyone.

"Not even to a friend?" said Annesley.

"To no one," was the reply.

This was a cul-de-sac indeed. There was nothing to be done but turn back. Then he bethought himself of Talbot-Winterson, and hurried off to his chambers. Rebuff number three—Winterson was away for a week. Annesley turned away disheartened. The enforced inaction irritated him. Of course Winterson would know where the Masters' were, thought he.

Fifty pounds a year! From luxury to poverty. And Mabel, with her queenly figure, her grace and beauty—how would she bear it? Bravely, Annesley knew, and with pride; and then he smiled, because he again recollected that she had Winterson.

"She won't want me or my sympathy!" he thought, bitterly. He tried to remember some mutual friends who might know of their whereabouts, but it was early autumn, and everyone was out of town. There was nothing to do but wait.

Slowly though it passed, that week came to an end at length, and Annesley again presented himself at Winterson's chambers. That gentleman, languid and affected as ever, received him with a sort of supercilious cordiality that annoyed Annesley. Something—love of Mabel Masters, perhaps—had opened his easy-going eyes, and he was beginning to see through the veneer that only partially covered his friend's character.

"Thought you were lost!" drawled Winterson.

"No, I'm all right. But what about the Masters'? Where are they? What a dreadful thing to happen!"

"Very! I don't know where they are."

"You don't?"

"Of course not. How should I?"

"But you were engaged to her?"

"I was."

"Are you not now?"

"Hardly. How could you expect a man of my position to marry the penniless daughter of a bankrupt suicide?"

"Then you broke it off?"

"I did," said Winterson. "Most decidedly."

"Then," exclaimed Charlie Annesley, "you are not only a coward but a blackguard! I've done with you. Don't speak to me; you're no longer a friend of mine. You're not even an acquaintance; we are strangers. I don't know why we were ever friends or how I have borne with you so long!"

"Very well," said Winterson coolly.

"I'll find her," cried Annesley, with a look of supreme contempt for the man before him. "I'll find her, and if she'll accept me, I will marry her to-morrow. You—you call yourself a man! You're a thing! I never want to see your face again. No, thanks. My hands are fairly clean. Anyway, I have too much respect for them, and too much contempt for you to touch yours!"

And Charlie Annesley flung himself out of the room furiously. When he contrived to cool down sufficiently to reason with himself, he realised that Talbot-Winterson had after all acted only after his lights. Had he—Annesley—only thought, he would have known that what Winterson had done was the very thing he would do. But Charlie Annesley had been too loyal to his friend—now friend no longer—to believe or think for a moment that he could behave so despicably.

Digitized by Google

He dismissed him from his thoughts and set to work to find Mabel Masters. He tried to think what she would be most likely to do. Would she try and earn her own living? But how? Charlie could not picture her as a clerk in the City; a typine. Even the stage, that refuge for so many suddenly plunged into poverty he could not bring himself to think of. He thought of almost everything; and nothing in his most wild flight of imagination came anywhere near the truth!

Before long old friends of the Masters came back to town, but none of them knew anything about them. It seemed to Annesley they had apparently disappeared from off the face of the earth. But, as he reasoned, it was only probable that Mrs. Masters had changed her name, and the chance of his happening to meet them in busy London was a very remote one. Still, he took to wandering about London suburbs in the vague hope that he might be favoured by luck. He was often deceived by a fancied resemblance, but up to one day in Spring, after a lapse of over six months, luck was not on his side.

That day in his life Annesley will never forget. He had wandered rather aimlessly to High Street, Kensington, thinking of Mabel Masters. Suddenly his heart stood still. His dreams had taken to themselves visible shape! There she was, as bright and beautiful as ever. Before he had time to realise that he had found her at last she had disappeared, swallowed up by the doorway of a pretty-looking milliner's shop. Annesley noted the name over the door. It was "Madame Vera." So he waited, with a beating heart. Five minutes, ten minutes, quarter of an hour. Then he summoned up his courage and entered. The shop was empty.

"The lady who entered a quarter of an hour ago?" said the attendant; "but there has been no customer in for longer than that."

Charlie explained.

"The lady was in black? Ah, but, no—that was not a customer. It was only Madame!"

"Madame?" echoed Annesley, not a gleam of the truth dawning on him.

"Surely—Madame Vera."

"Ask her if she will see me!" he exclaimed excitedly. But hearing a voice, Madame Vera had come out of the showroom and came forward to speak to him. It was Mabel Masters.

"So I have found you at last!" he said, in a voice tense with joy.

"I almost wish you had not," she murmured.

"But I have been seeking for you all over London, and I find you here!"

"Yes; this is mine. Let me tell you. When the crash came we—my mother and I—were left with only a little capital settled upon her. I could do nothing, I thought. But I hit upon one thing. I, even when rich, had always been able to make my own hats. It was a hobby, an amusement. Why not, I thought, turn a hobby to profitable account? But it was a struggle at first. Still, I have turned the corner."

"I honour you more than I can say," said Charlie, in a voice full of deep emotion; "and I thank God for letting me find you. May I come and see you?"

"My mother will be pleased, I know."

"And you?"

But Madame Vera disregarded this direct question.

"We have a tiny villa at Chiswick," she said softly. "Does it not surprise you to find me a working woman, after my butterfly life of a year ago! I am very happy, though," with a little catch in her voice, "and I can keep my dear mother in comfort."

"I can only feel two things," said Annesley; "that you are a girl to be proud of, and—that I love you!"

He bent over her outstretched hand, then lifting his eyes and read her reply shining in hers. Then he went out into the crowded High Street with a tumult of hope and joy surging through his heart

Clifton Bingham.

Your Editor Chats.

You have in your hands now, my dear readers, the number containing the beginning of our new series, "The Pursuit of Sara." Most probably you will have read every line of the absorbing instalment before you peruse these words, and that being the case, I feel confident that you are eager to ascertain what our heroine does after she leaves the offices of Messrs. Templeton and Co. Of course you cannot expect me to let you into the secret too much, so I will simply say that she makes haste to leave the turmoil of the Metropolis behind her, and, taking with her the precious documents which she is so pluckily guarding, flees to Bedford. Thence her pursuers, furious at being temporarily baffled by a girl, follow her, and——. But I am letting my enthusiasm run away with me, and if I am not careful, shall be telling you the whole of her adventures straight off. Therefore, all I can do is to advise you to possess your souls in patience, and to warn you not to forget to order next week's issue from your newsagent. In it you will find, graphically described, the story of her doings at Bedford.

Ere you have read many instalments of this vivid narrative you are bound to come to the conclusion that Sara is a girl of uncommon pluck, possessing a great quantity of that superb commodity, "British grit." You will, naturally, give me credit for inducing the young lady to publish her revelations, but I must own, that I, in my turn, am indebted to another. In the many years of my editorial career, I do not think that I have "discovered" a heroine in quite so romantic a way as I did Miss Gillespie, as she elects to be called during the progress of her story. Briefly, the facts are these. In the late summer I paid a visit to Bristol, and on my return occupied a carriage alone with a handsome, young gentleman. As a matter of course and sociability, we struck up a conversation, and presently exchanged confidences. I mentioned that I was an editor of a paper devoted to stories of love, and with a knowing smile, he said, "Love? There is nothing like the love of a true woman." I concurred with him, and he went on, "No, and no love romance has yet been written to compare with the one I know!" "What do you mean?" I asked, immediately interested. "I relate to the love romance of the best woman in the world, the woman who is now my wife!" And that's how first I came to learn of Miss Sara Gillespie who was; afterwards I got the gentleman to introduce me, and—the rest is apparent.

"The Snare of Gold," which has turned out to be one of the most popular serials we have ever had, comes to a dramatic termination next week. The interest in the plot has been sustained from start to finish, and I understand that many of my readers will regret its necessary conclusion. However, it will make way for a successor that will appeal to all of you who have a taste for exciting, as distinct from sensational, literature. The story will be entitled "A Criminal Millionaire," and is sufficient to show you that good things may be confidently expected. Mr. George Griffith, who is the author of this work, is another guarantee that the tale will be a strong one.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

THE GIRL FROM LEON'S.

How a Pretty Waitress Found a Husband.

FIND me the city clerk, male or female, who does not know Leon's, the great refreshment contractors. Their restaurants abound in almost every part of London, and during the mid-day hours of twelve and two, are generally full to overflowing.

There you will see the young gentleman who that same evening will speak in languid tones of Prince's or Frascati's. There it is that you sit and study the remarkable list of Leon's restaurants, whilst you patiently wait for the Goddess in the Cap to finish her tête-à-tête with the young man with freckles and pince-nez. Should you endeavour to hurry her by ringing a bell or tapping on the table, you will doubtless regret it. She will favour you with a sublimely indifferent glance, whilst the young man will stare at you in an injured manner. Then you become conscious that this must be Mr. Leon, and the young lady, perhaps, Miss Leon; and, with a very red face, you ignominiously retire behind a newspaper.

Such is not always the case though, and if it had been, this story might not have been written. Why, I can point out scores of instances where people have been served in les than ten minutes from the time of giving their order.

Stuart Wray was in the habit of visiting the Leon's restaurant in the Strand every day, about two o'clock in the afternoon. After having dined elsewhere he would visit this particular restaurant for a cigarette and a cup of coffee, and to meet various acquaintances.

Naturally he came to know the waitresses, and would occasionally chat with them; for there were not many customers between the hours of 2.15 and four o'clock, when the tea rush starts.

It is the custom of this estimable firm of caterers to change their waitresses periodically; they do not, however, extend this plan to their bill of fare. Thus Stuart found that as soon as a girl got accustomed to bringing his coffee and particular brand of cigarette without being asked for it, she was moved to another branch. But this regrettable state of affairs did not deter him from his visits to the restaurant.

One of the men who accompanied him to Leon's of an afternoon was Guy Harding, his own particular chum.

"By Jingo, Guy!" said Stuart Wray, as they entered the smoking-room one afternoon. "What a fine girl that new waitress is."

He intimated an exceedingly pretty girl, of slender build, who was at that moment carrying a tray of crockery to be consigned to the rear regions.

"Where's our waitress?" he went on, as they sat waiting at a table.

"Shifted, I expect," grumbled Guy Harding. "Just when she knew my cigarette."

They waited for some moments until presently the aforesaid pretty waitress hurried up, her face very red. A more experienced girl had pointed out the two men patiently waiting at one of her tables.

"I am really awfully sorry," she began. "I did not see you waiting. Can I get you anything?"

Stuart glanced up in surprise, for the sweetness of her voice quite matched the beauty of her face. They gave their orders and the girl left them

"I say, Stuart, she's a lady," said Guy Harding.

"So I perceived, but still there is no reason why a waitress should not be a lady, is there?"

"I suppose not."

"Did you see her hands?" went on Stuart. "I should not think they have seen any rough work before. I wonder what made her become a waitress."

Here the object of their conversation brought the coffee and cigarettes. She paused, as though wishful to say something, and then, in a burst of confidence, she turned to Stuart, and said:

"I do not know how to do this; would you tell me if you pay for the cigarettes now, or whether I put them on the bill?"

The question somewhat surprised Stuart, and a momentary smile flitted across his face.

"You need not laugh at me," she pouted.

"Really, I was not laughing at you," Stuart hastened to assure her. "Yes, we pay for the cigarettes now."

"And double if you kiss them," broke in Frank Verden, who had come down since.

The girl flushed to the roots of her hair, and throwing an indignant glance at the speaker, went off without another word.

"Confound it all, Verden, that's a trifle too thick; you ought to apologise."

A roar of laughter greeted Stuart's remark, causing the other customers to glance round. Amongst those who looked at them was their waitress, and she flashed a look of thanks to Stuart, for it was easy for her to divine the cause of his angry expression and the shout of laughter.

He stayed down there a trifle longer than the others, for his office was within a few yards of the restaurant.

Suddenly he was conscious of the waitress clearing away the dirty cups from the table.

"It was awfully good of you," she said, with a smile, "to stick up for me against your friend."

"How did you know?" he replied, almost at a loss what to say.

"It was very easy to see. There are not many men down here who make rude remarks, are there?" she asked naively.

The quaintness of the question once more caused him to try to conceal a smile.

"Why, you are always laughing at me," she said in a disconsolate tone. "Am I so very funny?"

"Please forgive me," he cried. "I expect you will find a few of that sort down here."

"I suppose there are black sheep in every flock," she answered with a sigh.

"Oh, come," he said, as he rose to go. "You can hardly call them black sheep."

She ushered him out as though she were a hostess.

His thoughts were full of her for the rest of the day. She was strangely well educated for a waitress, and her manner was that of a well-bred girl. Clearly she had not long been in her present position. But he gave up puzzling over the matter from sheer lack of knowledge wherewith to conjecture.

Digitized by Google

Some time went by, but this waitress was not changed as was the usual custom. Gladys, as the other waitresses called her, seemed a fixture, and Stuart Wray had quite come to look forward to the few minutes chat which they generally managed to have after his friends had departed.

* * * * * *

It was an evening in May. The weather had quite belied its ordinary reputation by being particularly fine.

Twilight had set in as Stuart Wray slowly strolled down one of the secluded paths of Hyde Park. He had been working rather late at the office, and a desire for a walk through the Park, before he left town, had seized him.

Presently he sat down, and filled his pipe. There was a strange sense of peace in his surroundings. The dark trees rustling in the cool breeze; the distant hum of the City with its weird glare in the sky; the waters of the Serpentine glistening in the moonlight.

Occasionally lovers passed down that quiet way, and a number of people gazed curiously at that solitary figure keeping a lonely tryst; for there are many who cannot understand the silent communion with Nature which a highly-strung organisation can hold.

Suddenly Stuart Wray sprang to his feet, and gazed after the retreating form of a girl.

"Great Scott!" he muttered. "It's Gladys!"

Then almost before he knew what he was doing, he found himself hurrying after her.

He touched her on the shoulder. Quickly she swung round, and faced him who accosted her.

"Why," she cried, with a glad little smile. "It's you."

They shook hands, and moved slowly along side by side.

"Supposing your friends saw you," she suddenly said.

"Well, supposing?" was his reply.

"Do you not mind being seen with a waitress?"

"Why should I?" he questioned. "If she does not mind."

"But then our positions in life are somewhat different."

"Maybe," he replied. "But Fortune is to blame for that. She is a fickle Goddess, and many that deserve never receive."

"That is a pretty way of paying a compliment."

"I never pay compliments," he said. "I only speak the truth."

There was silence for some time. The matter still seemed to trouble her, and presently she said:

"But what would people say, who knew you, if they saw you with a waitress?"

He gazed down into her face for a moment, and then indicating the masses of cloud that continually obscured the moon, he cried:

"There is your public opinion illustrated; always on the move, always shifty. Bah! I care no more for what people say than——" He paused, unable to find anything sufficiently contemptible to express his opinion.

"I wish I were a man," his companion interposed.

"Why?" he questioned abruptly.

"Because that is how I feel. But I am a woman, and I must bow before the decree of Society."

"Society," he echoed, in a scornful tone.

Together they strolled on, always talking; each finding the other more interesting as the time went on, until suddenly Stuart glanced at his watch.

"Why," he cried. "It's gone eleven."

His companion glanced up in dismay.

"Eleven o'clock! Good gracious! What will they think?"

It was on his tongue to ask who "they" were, but he wisely refrained. They hurried out of the park, and at the corner she insisted on him leaving her. In vain he protested, she was obdurate, and at last he boarded an omnibus for King's Cross.

Her name he had learnt was Gladys Tremlyn. It occurred to him that her education was almost equal to his own. More than ever, then, did he wonder what had brought her to take up the position of a waitress in Leon's.

"Are you not surprised to see me?" she said.

He haunted Hyde Park for some nights after this, but did not see her again. He hardly liked to ask her outright to meet him, until about a week after, when events forced him to.

"I am leaving here to-morrow," she said to him, as they stood chatting in Leon's.

"You are really?" he said.

"Yes, really."

"Going to another branch?"

"No," she answered. "I am leaving Leon's altogether."

There was a queer, tight grip at his heart, and a quick throbbing of his nerves, but he mastered himself in a moment."

"I am sorry to hear that," was his reply, and then suddenly becoming bold, he said: "I may see you in the park occasionally?"

"Well, it is a public place, isn't it?" she answered, but noticing the pained expression on his face, she became compassionate, and said: "I shall be in Hyde Park this evening."

"Will you really?" he cried, and his face became bright again.

"Hush! You will have all the people looking at us if you speak so loudly."

"I am so sorry!" he whispered.

"Yes, I will be admiring the statue of Achilles at eight p.m.

"A very laudable occupation," he said gravely. "I, too, will admire Achilles at eight o'clock this evening."

That was the first of several walks they had in the vicinity of Hyde Park at eventime. He remembered how he trembled on one occasion when she caught his arm as a drunken man passed. It would have been a sorry thing for the morality of London had his subsequent wish been granted, for he devoutly hoped that each passer-by would be the worse for liquor.

All this time he had learnt very little of her life. He knew she had gone to live with an aunt at Chiswick, but she would never let him come to see her home. True it was that she had spoken once of having been well off, but he knew very little about her otherwise. But, as he told himself, that did not matter. He knew that he loved her, and knew her sufficiently well to be certain that nothing but good could appertain to her.

Digitized by Google

Then came one Saturday, a red-letter day in every sense of the idiom. He took her to Maidenhead, and they spent the day on the river. Several times the passionate words of love rushed to his lips, but he resisted the impulse to speak.

"She cannot be averse to me," he argued, "or she would not come out with me as she does. But then again, there is a deal of difference between liking a man as a friend and loving him." Then he would contemplate the bowl of his pipe with much gravity, and assure himself that it was a very serious matter.

This sort of thing occurred very often, until Gladys came to notice the effect it had upon him, and to comment on how bad he was looking. Never once, though, did she associate his worried appearance with herself.

Then the climax came, as it will come to all things. And, naturally, it is just on that climax that this story turns.

Mrs. Vane Woodbeigh had a very nice house standing in its own grounds at Hampstead. Mr. Vane Woodbeigh worked very hard to earn money, and Mrs. Vane Woodbeigh worked equally hard to spend it.

It had occurred to her that a "perfectly cha-arming" idea would be to have an open-air evening fête and concert in her grounds to which all the nobility and gentry that she was acquainted with were to be asked.

One of the chief guests was the Hon. George Kevill, a member of Parliament for a portion of Hampstead. It will be useless for you to look up a Parliamentary list, for I have carefully disguised his name.

To do Mrs. Vane Woodbeigh credit, or, more probably, the gardener, I must say that the grounds did look "cha-arming." Festoons of fairy lamps and illuminated lanterns hung everywhere, transforming the grounds into a miniature fairyland.

Stuart Wray's father and mother were amongst the guests, and he had accompanied them. To his intense astonishment almost the first person he saw in the grounds was none other than Gladys Tremlyn.

He caught his breath and let it whistle out between his lips in abject amazement. Whatever could she be doing there? She was very tastefully dressed, too. Ah! she had come down to sing. That must be it. She had mentioned to him once that she sang a great deal.

Quitting his parents' side with a hasty excuse he hurried after her. She was walking rather quickly towards a very unfrequented part of the grounds. Presently he caught her up in a sort of grove where none of the other visitors were. Suddenly she turned and faced him.

"I thought you would follow me," she said. "That is why I came here. Are you not surprised to see me?"

"Surprised hardly expresses it," he answered. "I suppose you have come down to sing?"

"Yes, that is it!" she cried eagerly. "Of course they do not know here that I have been a waitress at Leon's, and you——"

"No, I will not mention it," he broke in. "Why should I?"

As a matter of fact she was going to say: "And that was your father and mother that I saw you with, I suppose," but she accepted his interpretation of her remark with a little grimace unseen by him.

"You know I am glad to see you here," he went on. "I was not looking forward to this affair very much."

"Why, there are plenty of nice girls here," she replied, as she gazed up right into his eyes.

That smile maddened him for the moment, and his very soul was fired within him. Then, in the deep shade of the dark elms, and with her sweet face to inspire him, he put his hand on her shoulder and whispered:

"Gladys, I love you, dear!"

That was all he said. There seemed a lot more word somewhere but they would not come. All he could do was to repeat those words, in a passionate tone, again, and again:

"Gladys, I love you, dear."

There was no reply, but she slightly moved so that his arm incircled her neck, and then she shyly reached her hand up and pulled his head towards her. Their lips met, and they forgot all else in the ecstasy of their love.

"Gladys, are you here?" a voice suddenly cried.

Hastily they sprang apart, but the deep gloom of the trees prevented prying eyes from unnecessary observation.

"They want me—I must go!" she whispered hurriedly, and then aloud she cried:

"Yes; I am coming now."

"They are waiting for your song," came the answer.

And she went.

When he had assured himself that he was fully awake and quite sane, Stuart followed. He reached the lawn just as Gladys commenced the first words of "The Garden of Sleep."

He hung on every word of that delicious melody, sympathetically and beautifully rendered by Gladys' exquisite voice, till suddenly his shoulder was touched by someone. Turning, he beheld his father.

"Know who that is, Stuart?"

He gave a guilty start, and did not reply. Taking his silence as a negative answer, his father went on:

"That is Gladys Dewhurst, the great novelist. Is she not young to have achieved so much?"

"What!" Stuart almost screamed the word. Someone said "Hush!" and then Stuart drew his father away from observation.

"That Gladys Dewhurst?" he said. "Gladys Tremlyn is her name. What do you mean?"

"Oh, Tremlyn is her other name, is it? I knew it was Gladys T. Dewhurst."

"Good Heavens!"

Mr. Wray gazed at his son in astonishment. What had he said to produce this effect? Stuart was quite pale, and a strange light burnt in his eyes.

"Are you sure?" he said huskily.

"Yes, quite. She is a niece of the Hon. George Kevill, the M.P."

Muttering some excuse, Stuart hastily left his father, and walked blindly on with his thoughts all in a maze. Presently he found himself in that self-same arbour from which he had so happily emerged but a few minutes before.

"Gladys!" he muttered aloud. "Gladys!"

"Yes, Stuart?" a soft voice replied.

He turned and found her facing him. She started at the strange look on his face.

"Why did you not tell me?" he said.

"Then you know," she replied, her eyes downcast. "I was just going to tell you when they came for me."

"It's all over now!" he groaned.

"Stuart!" she cried, taking his hand as she spoke. "Stuart, why are you so upset? It does not matter at all; I saw you liked me a long time ago, and I—er—I liked you. Then I thought I would prove you by remaining as you had first known me to see if you would keep true. And you came out of the fire scathless."

He was still silent, and a troubled, anxious expression was on his face.

"I was at Leon's to write a series of articles on the life of a waitress, Stuart. Ah, dear, forgive me for my deception."

She placed her arms around his neck, and pulled his face towards her. He kissed her, and then put her gently away from him.

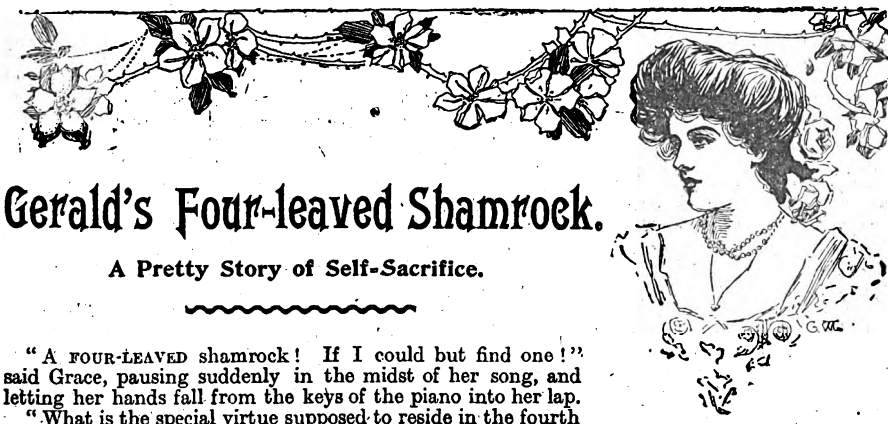
"I cannot marry you now, dear," he said. "You are fitted for a more brilliant life than I can offer you."

"I could have no more brilliant prospect in life," she replied, speaking slowly and tenderly, "than my life as Mrs. Stuart Wray. I love you, Stuart, and will never release you from your promise."

He gazed at her eagerly, the light in her eyes conquered him, and he took her in his arms.

E. Newton Bungey.

Digitized by Google



Gerald's Four-leaved Shamrock.

A Pretty Story of Self-Sacrifice.

"A FOUR-LEAVED shamrock! If I could but find one!" said Grace, pausing suddenly in the midst of her song, and letting her hands fall from the keys of the piano into her lap.

"What is the special virtue supposed to reside in the fourth leaflet of a shamrock?"

"Do you not know that a four-leaved shamrock is a fairy talisman, giving its possessor an influence for good over all with whom he comes in contact? He can heal feuds, re-unite parted friends—in fact, be everyone's good genius. I think I shall look for one, Laurence."

"To what use would you apply your magic powers?"

"I would make your uncle relent, of course."

"I am afraid that nothing short of a fairy spell will accomplish that, Grace; reason has no effect whatsoever upon him."

"Have you been administering much of that article lately?"

"I spent more than an hour this morning in trying to make him see that after five years of hard work I have a right to a fixed salary, be it much or little. (We would be content with a little, would we not, Grace?) He will not admit my right to anything, but says that if I marry to please him, he will take me into partnership at once. As I do not, however, intend to gratify him in this respect, his liberal offers are not of much use."

"Did he name any particular person whom he wished you to marry?"

"Yes; Miss Blake, of Killora. It seems that he and old Blake have been talking the matter over after the manners of the farmers, and have come to an understanding concerning the number of cows and pigs, or their equivalents, to be contributed on each side."

"Alice Blake is a pretty girl and a nice girl, Laurence."

"She is almost the prettiest girl I know, but for all that I don't mean to marry her. Nor do I think the arrangement would suit her much better than it does me. If I am not much mistaken, she, too, has plans of her own. But while my uncle has the notion in his head, we sha'n't be able to make him look at things from our point of view. Try to find the four-leaved shamrock, Grace, and conjure up a little commonsense for my uncle. A very little would do. I must go now; will you come as far as the gate with me?"

And the two lovers sauntered out into the twilight and reiterated their last words at the garden-gate, leaving the pretty little drawing-room to its sole other occupant, Grace's cousin Gerald, a slender, fair-haired lad of about fourteen, who was lying listlessly on a low couch in the bow window.

Grace and Laurence had been playfellows for so many years that no one but the uncle of the latter felt any surprise when they appeared in the character of lovers.

Mr. Latouche, however, was thunderstruck at the announcement of his nephew's attachment to Grace Neville, and declared, in language of which he afterwards felt somewhat ashamed, that should Laurence persist in his determination to marry the daughter of a beggarly half-pay captain, he might bid farewell to his present home and future prospects at Glenallan Mills.

Laurence was quite dependent on his uncle, with whom he had lived from childhood; he had always been treated as a son of the house, and on his return from school, had begun to assist his uncle in the management of his flax mills.

He was resolved to marry Grace, and he had already begun to make inquiries as to the probability of his being able to utilise the experience gained at Glenallan Mills in obtaining a salaried post in some similar concern.

While Grace and Laurence were loitering in the garden Gerald was pondering over the only portion of the foregoing conversation intelligible to himself—Grace's jesting wish for the four-leaved shamrock.

Poor Gerald was but half-witted; his brain had been injured by a fall in babyhood, and had never properly developed. He was still a child in mind, with all a child's belief in the marvellous—a belief which Grace was chary of discouraging, from an instinctive feeling that his imagination was his highest gift, which, once weakened or destroyed, would never be replaced by reasoning powers.

She was very fond of him, and devoted much time and trouble to the work of training him, and drawing out what little intellect he possessed; while he, on his part, repaid her care with a passionate devotion, obeying her slightest wish, and following her about like a shadow.

He was also fond of Laurence, a ride on whose horse constituted his greatest pleasure; and, though quite unconscious of the reason, he understood, in his own dim way, that Laurence's uncle was angry, and that Grace was grieved.

Anger was a terrible thing to poor Gerald, who dreaded stern looks and harsh words as other lads dread blows.

Why, he wondered, did Grace want the four-leaved shamrock. An unwonted fit of shy reserve prevented his asking for an explanation when Grace returned, but he puzzled over the question at intervals during the night, and the wish for a solution of the difficulty guided his wandering steps the next morning to his old nurse's cabin, which stood on a green hillside, some three miles from his home.

The old woman was sitting on her door-step knitting, and basking in the sunshine. She looked up joyfully as Gerald approached.

"Master Gerald, wherever have you been?"

"I don't know, nurse," answered Gerald. "I must have been busy, I think."

"Busy," said old Joan; "poor lamb, sure it's you that'll never know what being busy means; all the better for you, maybe. Sit down there, an' I'll get you a drink of milk."

Gerald stretched himself at full length upon the grass, and began to drink the milk which Joan brought him in a little china mug sacred to his own use.

"How is Miss Grace?" asked Joan.

"I don't know," answered Gerald; "she is unhappy, I think. Her eyes were full of tears when she came in from the garden last night. She thought I did not see them, but I did. Nurse, what is a four-leaved shamrock?"

"A four-leaved shamrock, alanna? Why, a shamrock that has four little leaves instead of three."

"I know that. I mean, what is the use of it?"

"Well, people say it's a fairy charm that brings luck to the owner. Who was talking to you about it, Master Gerald?"

"Grace was singing about it last night, and she said that she wished she could find one. It had something to do with Laurence's uncle, I think."

"Ah, yes," said Joan. "I suppose Miss Grace thinks that if she had one, she could make things up between Master Laurence an' his uncle."

"And could she?"

"Who knows but she might? By all accounts there is wonderful power in a four-leaved shamrock."

Digitized by Google

"I wonder if I could find one," said Gerald.

"Perhaps you might. Sure it's to the likes of you that the good people often send their gifts. Look for it anyway, alanna. 'Tis a pity to have Miss Grace fretting."

Henceforth poor Gerald's one dream was to find the four-leaved shamrock, which was to avert the anger of Laurence's terrible uncle and make Grace happy.

Accordingly he wandered about, day after day, telling no one of his purpose, haunting every meadow and every copse where shamrocks grew, seeking the magic quatrefoil destined to work such spells.

Such freaks of nature, however, though they do occur, are very rare, and Gerald's quest was for long a fruitless one. He had at first avoided the neighbourhood of Glenallan Mills from an unconquerable dread of meeting the terrible Mr. Latouche, whose stern face and iron-grey hair appeared to poor Gerald the embodiment of all that was aweful.

At length, after days and weeks of patient search in other places, he so far overcame his repugnance as to go—in the early morning—to a large meadow through which the mill-stream flowed, and where the most luxuriant tufts of shamrock in all the country round were said to grow.

It was too early yet for the mill to be at work. The immense wheel was at rest, and a slender thread of rippling water flowed quietly on, giving no token of the force pent in by the sluices, and only awaiting a liberating hand to come rushing down and give life and motion to the slumbering mill.

As he neared the stream, which had steep, grassy banks, gay with many flowers, the great bell commenced ringing, and the workmen were trooping into the courtyard. He should abandon his search for that morning, since he would not risk a meeting with Mr. Latouche.

He was turning reluctantly away, when he perceived the object of his search—a leaf actually composed of four divisions, at the end of a long, trailing stem.

He lay flat down on the grass above, and grasping the herbage firmly with one hand, he stretched the other towards the prize. As he did so, the sudden barking of a dog, accompanied by a loud shout, startled him, and, losing his hold, he slipped down the steep bank into the stream below.

At the same moment the gates of the mill-dam were opened, and the pent-up waters, released from their prison, came seething and foaming down, seizing on poor Gerald's helpless form, and bearing him swiftly towards the certain destruction of the pitiless wheel.

The shout which had scared him was Laurence's, and the bark that of the latter's Newfoundland dog, Carlo. As the boy disappeared from view, Laurence ran forward, urging on his dog with voice and gesture, so that when he reached the bank he found Carlo already struggling with the stream.

To take off his coat and plunge in was the work of a moment. The dog's efforts had somewhat retarded poor Gerald's fate, and Laurence was thus enabled to seize him just as he was being drawn under the wheel.

A few long moments of desperate struggle, and Laurence found himself once more upon the bank, beside the apparently lifeless form of the lad whom he had saved, and whom he now, for the first time, recognised.

A little crowd of men had by this time gathered round him, one of whom, under his directions, carried poor Gerald into the house, and laid him on a sofa in the dining-room.

Mr. Latouche and his sister were summoned, and every effort was made to restore the boy to consciousness. When, after a long time, he opened his eyes, his first word was—

"Grace!"

"Do you want her, Gerald?" asked Laurence, bending over him.

"Yes," said Gerald. "I have found it for her at last."

"Found what?"

"The four-leaved shamrock."

And, opening his hand, he showed the little leaf which he had all through managed to keep safely inclosed within his palm.

"The four-leaved shamrock?"

"Don't you remember? Grace wanted it. She said that if she had one she could make your uncle forgive you."

"I remember," said Laurence, with a pang at his heart.

"What does he mean?" asked Mr. Latouche.

"I am afraid he must have overheard some jesting nonsense of ours about a four-leaved shamrock. You know it is said to be a talisman. May I bring Grace here, sir?"

"Certainly, if the poor child wishes for her. Take the pony-carriage."

Laurence hurried away, and in a little time the doctor, who had been sent for, came. He said that Gerald had received some injury, causing internal hemorrhage, and that his life was a question of minutes rather than of hours.

After a little time he opened his eyes and asked again for Grace.

"She will be here very soon now," answered Mr. Latouche.

He was standing a little behind the sofa, and Gerald was quite unconscious that the gentle tones to which he now listened were those of Laurence's terrible uncle.

"I am so afraid of being asleep when she comes," said Gerald. "I want to give her the four-leaved shamrock. She will be so glad to get it; she need not be afraid of Laurence's cross uncle any more."

"Does Laurence say that his uncle is cross?" asked Mr. Latouche, his face changing.

"No," said Gerald; "Laurence is very fond of him, and Grace says that he is good and that it is foolish of me to be so much afraid of him; but I think she is afraid herself, for she never will walk near the mills for fear of meeting him."

The sound of wheels was now heard, and a moment later Grace entered with Laurence.

She went straight over to the sofa and knelt beside it. When Gerald saw her, his whole face lighted up with joy.

"See, Gracie," he whispered, showing his prize, "I have found the four-leaved shamrock!"

"Oh, Gerald!" sobbed Grace, "I shall never forgive myself if my foolish talk has led to this."

"Don't cry about me," said Gerald. "I am not really hurt. Put your arm round me—so. Now I can go to sleep comfortably. You need not be afraid of Laurence's uncle any more."

"I would rather never have seen Laurence again than this should have happened," she cried passionately.

"Right," said Mr. Latouche, in answer to Laurence's look of dismay; "she is all the better worth winning for not being ready to fling old ties to the winds for the sake of her lover. How fond of her that poor boy seems!"

When Gerald next opened his eyes, Mr. Latouche, moved by a sudden impulse, bent over him.

"Gerald," he said, "I can promise you that your cousin need never again be afraid of Laurence's uncle."

"I know," said Gerald dreamily, "she will always be happy now."

"As happy as Laurence and I can make her."

Gerald smiled and closed his eyes.

After a time, Laurence, seeing how it was, took him from Grace's arms, and laid him back upon the sofa.

"It is best as it is, Grace," he whispered; "his life as he grew older could scarcely have been a happy one. Up to this you have made it so."

* * * * *

The four-leaved shamrock, inclosed within a golden circlet of Gerald's hair, hangs in a locket from Grace's watch-chain. Either by means of this, or of some other talisman in her possession, she has cast such a spell over Mr. Latouche, that not even Laurence himself is more devoted to her than is the stern uncle, to propitiate whom poor Gerald lost his life.

Rose Clifford.

Digitized by Google

Compulsory.

CLARENCE: "How did Charley come to say he loved you?" Bessie: "Father asked him if he did?"

Brotherly Love.

TOM: "Do you think my cousin Julia would marry me if I asked her?" Jack: "Well, I have always considered her a sensible sort of girl—still, she might."

Thought He Was at Home.

"I TOLD George's uncle to consider himself at home in our house." "Well?" "Well, it wasn't five minutes afterwards that he began to grumble about the cooking."

Another Awful Catch.

"I READ an account of how a girl fell over forty feet without killing herself." "Good gracious! How did she do it?" "Tried to get out of a tramcar with exactly twenty men in it.'

Better Left Unsaid.

HE: "What a lovely fan you have, Edith." She: "Yes, my papa gave it me. It came from Paris, and is hand-painted." He: "Indeed? And how nicely it matches your complexion!"

Love Will Find an Excuse.

BERTHA: "I fancy it's going to be a match between Maude and Arthur." Constance: "You don't say so!" Bertha: "Yes, Maude to-day spoke of his stuttering as a slight hesitancy in the enunciation of words."

She Had Her Hopes.

MISS ASCUM: "Wasn't that Mr. Bonds I saw you walking with last evening?" Miss Coy: "Yes." Miss Ascum: "He's a landed freeholder of the county, isn't he?" Miss Coy (blushing): "Well—er—he isn't quite landed yet."

She Saved Him Joyfully.

GLADYS: "That rich young Foodledum said if I didn't marry him he should die." Ethel: "Of course you accepted him?" Gladys: "Of course. I couldn't bear to think of the poor fellow dying like that; it's such a disgrace to die rich nowadays, you know."

A Jealous Maiden.

SHE: "Harry, you said something last evening that made me feel so bad." He: "What was it, dearest?" She: "You said I was one of the sweetest girls in all the world." He: "And aren't you, darling?" She: "You said 'one of the sweetest.' Oh, Harry, to think that I should live to know that I have to share your love with another!"

A Woman's Bargain.

MRS. ENPECK: "I think, Henry, that our daughter has made a very satisfactory marriage, and that she will succeed very well in the management of her husband." Henry Enpeck: "Why do you think so?" Mrs. Enpeck: "I overheard her talking to him this morning, and she got him to agree to a proposition like this: 'If you will do as I want, I promise to do the same.'"

Johnny Was a Flirt.

SCHOOLMISTRESS (in grammar lesson): "'I didn't have no fun at the seaside.' How would you correct this, Johnny?" Johnny: "Get a sweetheart."

Easily Satisfied.

MISS YOUNGUN: "What kind of a man would you like for a husband?" Miss Oldun: "Oh, either a bachelor or a widower. I'm not particular which."

Perhaps He Was Glad.

MOTHER (at a ball); "Are you enjoying yourself, dear?" Daughter: "I'm not." "What is the matter?" "I've refused George six dances running, and he does not seem a bit miserable."

Tit For Tat.

ELDERLY LADY: "All right, sir, I shall sue you for breach of promise." Young Man: "You'd better not attempt it. If you do I'll bring an action for slander against you for saying I proposed to you."

The Pursuit of Knowledge.

MRS. GOLIGHTLY: "Have you seen anything of Harry?" Major Golightly: "I heard him say something about going in pursuit of knowledge." Mrs. Golightly: "Ah, that means he is looking for the governess!"

That Terrible Boy Again.

"I DECLARE," said Bella sweetly, "your thoughts run exactly in unison with mine, Augustus. I had those very words in my mouth." "Yes, and I saw him put 'em there, too," said little Tommy, who had seen the kissing going on.

What Could She Expect?

MRS. HIRAM OFTEN: "Here, Bridget, see how dusty it is under the bed." Bridget: "Yes'm." "Haven't I impressed upon you that you must sweep under the beds?" "Av course, ma'am, an' how could the dust get there if I hadn't swept it under?"

Father Was Stern and Mabel Was Wild.

"MABEL," said little Jennie to her big sister at breakfast, "did you tell papa?" "Tell papa what?" asked Jennie. "Why you told Mr. Buster last night if he did it again you'd tell papa—and he did it again. I saw him!" And then papa looked at Mabel over his glasses.

Tricks of the Trade.

EMPLOYER: "You are having a decided flirtation with the girl who has charge of our telephone wire?" Truthful Clerk (with cold chills running up and down his spine, and with visions of instant dismissal): "Y-e-e-s, sir; but please, sir——" Employer: "Well, keep it up. She will give more attention to our calls if you do."

A Change in the Title.

MAUD (smilingly): "So you saw the profound bow I got from handsome Harry Brown? He's just graduated from an agricultural college with high honours as a veterinary surgeon." Ethel: "Yes, so Gladys told me. It's a secret, but she's engaged to be married to him." Maud (with sudden asperity): "Pooh! A cow doctor!"

Bread From a Stone.

"OH, we had the loveliest arrangement at our church bazaar last week! Every woman contributed to the missionary cause five shillings which she earned herself by hard work." "How did you get yours?" "From my husband." "I shouldn't call that earning it yourself by hard work." "You don't know my husband."

He Was Not Poetical.

"ALGERNON is very interesting," said the stockbroker's daughter. "What does he talk about?" inquired her father. "Why, he's ever so well posted in Shakespearian quotations." "Young woman," said the financier sternly, "don't you let him deceive you. Don't you let him make sport of your ignorance. There isn't any such stock on the market. I ought to know, for I've been on the Exchange long enough."

Digitized by Google

..THE..

SUCCESS OF FIORNELLA.

A Tale of Magnificent Love.

"Oh, is it you, Arnold? Come in. This is such a happy day for me! Think; the play is finished!"

"But you, Roland, how is it with you? Is it one of your good days? But why do I ask? You are looking as if you had never known what illness was. Your cheek is red, your eyes sparkle. What has wrought this transformation? Finishing this play of yours? Oh, to feel an ecstasy like that!"

It was a small room in a quiet part of the town. There were flower pots in the windows, and the odour of the blossoms mingled faintly with the vague heaviness of a sick-room atmosphere. The furniture was neat; there were adornments of the sort that told of a feminine hand.

The sun sent a straggling ray of light through the white curtains, lighting up the face that looked out from the depths of the pillows. It was a boyish face, with a strangely beautiful mouth and curling lashes, veiling the eyes that were now so lit with ecstasy. Roland Stamford had lain upon that sick-bed for nine months, full of pain and hopelessness, yet now much of that anguish was forgotten, swallowed up in this beautiful joy, this complete, heavenly thrill.

Remember he had just completed his lifework! His play was written.

As for the visitor, whose name was Arnold Dilston, he was as unlike Roland as possible. He was in evident good health; prosperity shone from him everywhere; his good looks were marred by nothing of care or disease. His step was light, his voice cheery. He brought an atmosphere of youth and vigour into the dull atmosphere of this drooping life. When one is twenty-five, has perfect health, and an income that is large enough to allow a life of idleness, with only oneself to care for in the world, happiness is a near companion.

Arnold had taken a chair by the bed. He was watching the queer tricks of the sunlight across the white counterpane. A light breeze was coming in at the window, swaying the curtains gently.

"And now," he said—"and now that your play is finished, you will, will you not, tell us something of it?"

"Oh, yes. I would not speak before, you see, because I might never have completed it, and then what use would the hope have been! But now that it is done!" He said this last as if the words were very sweet to him.

"What is it, then, this play of yours? A comedy, a new School for Scandal? A——"

"No, no, Arnold, this is a tragedy. And such a plot! Oh, it is really beautiful. You cannot fancy; you must read it; surely you will read it?"

"Of course, Roland. But—a tragedy! To-day at the very end, in the twentieth century! It is quite hopeless!"

"If it had only been a comedy. They are all gone, you know, the people who look to the theatre for poetry, for inspiring words, and mental profit. We go only to be amused. Why have you forgotten this?"

"I do not seem to have thought of anything like that at all. I knew only one thing; this glorious thing was in me, and I had to deliver it to the world. And now what is the next thing. It must go to a manager and be read, I suppose——"

"Or not read." Arnold only whispered this in his thoughts. His lips said: "Yes, the managerial eye must scan these lines, and then—Well, I hope for the best. What is the best? Why, acceptance, and the announcement of the play's being put in rehearsal for early performance. And then; the test of publicity. Success. Wealth. But—it is a tragedy."

"Why do you say that so sadly? If you knew the stuff this tragedy is made of——! Besides, there is Jermayne."

"Yes, there is Jermayne. Have you written a part for her?"

"Not a part merely; it is the whole play. She is to be the all in all, the predominant character! Oh, my beautiful sister; how gloriously, how sweetly you will play this part. It will bring you fame! Oh, Jermayne has read the play. She loves her part already; she realises it."

"But her present contract? She is so successful at the Trafalgar Theatre."

"Her present contract expires soon; then—ah, yes, then—she shall play Fiornella. It is true that she has a delightful position in Weekman's Company; and yet—there is but little fortune for her. Whereas—as Fiornella! Oh, think! There will be nothing sweeter in all the world than Jermayne as Fiornella! If I can only live until that day!"

He closed his eyes in a transport of imagery. Then he went on:

"And you, Arnold, will you take this precious child of mine, this "Fiornella," and take it to the managerial eye? You know some of those people, do you not? You will do this for me? Besides—there is Jermayne."

"Yes," said Arnold, as he took the neatly-wrapped sheets of manuscript, and got up, pushing his chair back gently, "I will do my best, my very best. I hope for the pleasantest things."

"Besides—there is Jermayne——"

Arnold's eyes grew very tender; and he bade good-bye.

* * * * *

"And so they have all refused it?" It was Jermayne speaking; Jermayne, the beloved sister of Fiornella's author. She looked at Arnold wistfully, hoping that he might acknowledge that there was someone still untried, some channel open.

Arnold nodded, with pain in his eyes.

"All, all. There is no one else, absolutely no one."

"Oh, it will kill him! It will kill him! My poor brother, poor Roland!"

Her eyes grew dim and she looked into space.

"Is there no way at all, no other way?"

"Yes, there is another way. And Roland shall live, if it depends on Fiornella. You see, if the expenses are all guaranteed—almost any manager will take the piece. He risks nothing. The backer risks all that. Well—I will back it. I have a thousand pounds. That will put the piece on the boards. After that—who knows? It may be a great epoch-making triumph. I may," he spoke as if he really believed it, "make a fortune. And you—a splendid fame. And Roland—why, the mere joy of it will be enough for him."

"Oh, but you must not do this. Think, your fortune cast upon one die. If the piece fails——"

"I am a beggar." Arnold smiled as if that prospect were sweetly pleasant. "No, no, it is a very commonplace matter. It is just as if I were buying railway stocks. I may win, or I may not. No one knows. To-morrow I might have speculated it all away on stocks and shares. Instead, I shall stage Fiornella."

Digitized by Google

He spoke, this splendid young man, as if he had always had the Stock Exchange fever in his bones. Whereas he had never——But what would a young man not do for a girl like Jermayne?

"Yes," he went on eagerly, "Roland shall get well from very joy. You shall play Fiornella, and Fiornella shall succeed! See, I stake my word upon it. Now, go and tell Roland that Weekman has decided to put Fiornella in rehearsal, and that he agrees to the stipulation about you playing the title-rôle. It is a lie that the angels will forgive you. Good-bye, Fiornella."

Jermayne's eyes got very dim.

"Oh," she said chokingly, "how shall we ever——"

But Arnold lightly kissed her fingers and left her.

* * * * *

The curtain went down on the closing scene of Fiornella, but the tumult of applause would not down. It never lulled at all, until Jermayne, flushed still from her great finale, appeared and bowed, looking like a sweet and gracious queen. And then the storm broke out anew, and there were cries, mingling finally into one compact call, of "Author, author!"

Has there ever been a more touching scene, I wonder, than that of Roland Stamford, lying at full-length in an invalid's chair, being wheeled to the centre of the stage by that beautiful Fiornella? The crimson on his cheeks was very sharply defined against his whiteness, and he looked beautiful—beautiful as Death. He spoke at last, and the silence out in front was almost an agony.

"You are very kind," he said; "I thank you. This—is what I have lived for."

Then his head sank down, and faintness came upon him. Fiornella was a success! A magnificent triumph! Who, with that thunderous applause still ringing in his ears, could doubt it. And yet, as each auditor went away, he looked at the other, guiltily, and as if he were ashamed.

As for Roland, when he was safe in his home again, he held quite a reception about his little bed. There were many great men there, men whose names we read of in the personal columns of the papers. And, of course, Weekman was there, and Arnold, and Jermayne. Roland looked, oh, so happy! He talked brightly, brilliantly; the young genius was at his best. The others listened and laughed, and made the boy forget his illness and everything but success. Only, from time to time, they exchanged furtive glances. And when they went away, each, as he shook hands with Roland, and then with Arnold, looked as if he had done something unworthy.

"Oh," said Roland, when he was alone with Jermayne and Arnold, "this is beautiful! Life, how glorious you are. Oh, you doubters! Did I not tell you of this, long ago? And see—it has come to pass!" He turned, smiling, to his pillows, and passed into slumber.

The doubters looked at each other, and the laughter died away from their faces.

* * * * *

It was ten days after the night of Fiornella's success. In Roland's little room it was quite still. Outside the sun was going down in salmon-hued splendour. In the outer room were Arnold and Jermayne, and sadness was upon both their faces.

The door of Roland's room opened gently and the doctor issued.

"Well?" said Jermayne.

"Can he live?" asked Arnold.

"He cannot live two hours." The doctor spoke softly, fearing to wound. But there was no hope in his decision. He left nothing, nothing to cling to. "I have done my best," he went on, "but he is ebbing away. There is nothing to be done." He passed out, leaving Jermayne and Arnold to their sadness.

And so it had all availed nothing! Every day the reports from the theatre had been brought to the invalid's couch, the criticisms had been read to him. The doctor had told them that the only hope was in keeping him cheerful and happy. Well, they had done that, at all cost, and now——

Arnold thought a little bitterly of the uselessness of it all. What a magnificent effort it had been! How well the mockery had been kept up! Only to keep Roland in happy content with success, that had been the end of all; that had succeeded, but——

"As literature," Arnold was reflecting, "Fiornella was beautiful, majestic. As a drama it was impossible, because of its very beauty and strength. We can't stand genius on the stage; we are grown domestic, even in art, and we worship the commonplace. Fiornella was anything but commonplace, and, therefore, predestined to fail. But there are ways and means known to the wily men of the "profession" by which a failure may appear, for a little while, to be a success. The magic wand is composed of bank-notes. Judicious 'paper,' a clever press agent, and a potent wand; these will keep any play afloat for awhile. It is so easy to get a 'house' on a first night! And newspaper columns may be bought at no unattainable figures. Critics are amenable to good wine. But—it certainly takes money. It—has—taken money."

Still musing in bitterness, Arnold went into the next room. Jermayne was there before him, at Roland's side. Roland was already growing unconscious. How beautiful he looked. His eyes rested upon Jermayne and Arnold.

"Ah," he murmured," "you must bid me good-bye, you two, I am going—away. But I am quite happy to go, now that Fiornella is making a name for me. Oh, the sweetness of that success. Yes, I think, up above, I shall have a theatre, and they shall always play Fiornella. Though, of course, we must wait until you come, Jermayne. And I hope that will be a long way off. I can wait a very long time for you. Well, I must say good-bye. I hear the call-boy.

"It will soon be my—cue, and I will have to—go on—up above. Give me your hands—both of you. So." He laid Jermayne's right within Arnold's right, and smiled up at them both. "It is so, is it not? I have always wanted that, also, and I have got it. How good God is! I have everything—everything to make me the most happy creature. And now—will you—both—kiss me?"

They stooped down and touched their lips lightly to his. Then, in another instant, a slight trembling came over Roland's form, a faint sigh came from between his lips, and—it was the end. But there remained upon his face such a smile, such a look of perfect peace and happiness, as made you feel that death was very gentle with him and loved him, as all had always done.

All the bitterness had gone from Arnold.

"To have seen that perfect happiness," he said, half to himself, half to Jermayne, "was worth twice as much."

Jermayne looked up through her tears.

"Is it all—gone?" she asked, very softly, as if the dead might yet hear.

"Every penny of it."

He spoke cheerfully, as if he were rid of that paltry wealth.

"And you are a beggar?"

"H'm—yes. But——"

"Well?"

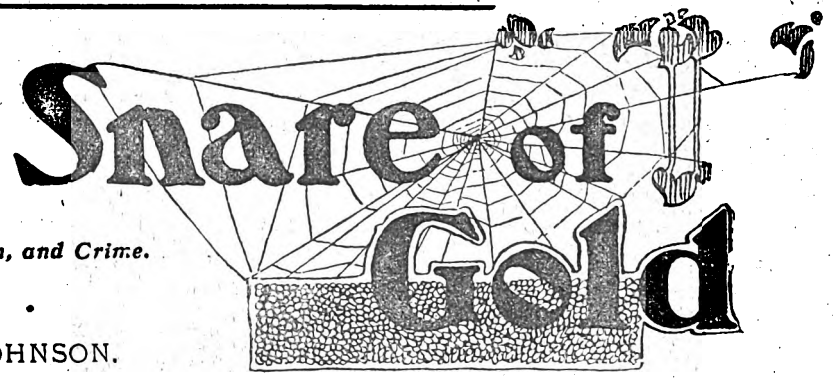
"I have you." He drew her to him, and kissed her tear-wet eyes. "Besides," he went on proudly, "we are both young. We have youth and love, and happiness is with us." His eyes rested upon Roland's smile.

Percival Pollard.

Digitized by Google

GRAND SERIAL STORY.

The Snare of Gold



A Tale of Love, Ambition, and Crime.

• • By • •
HENRY T. JOHNSON.

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS IN THIS SPLENDID STORY ARE:

GEORGE GELDART, a former prosperous City merchant, supposed to be dead, and now known as "Old Mystery."

ERIC GELDART, his elder son, who conspired to kill his father, thereby coming into his property. He then enters Parliament, where he forms a new party.

RONALD GELDART, the younger son, who has been disinherited because he has been falsely accused of robbing his father.

CLARE ARMITAGE, the adopted sister of the two brothers, and who was betrothed to Eric, who now scorns her love.

BOANERGES BLAGDON, the traitorous partner of old Geldart, whom he has cheated in business, and who plots with Eric to murder him.

SAMPSON SCRIMSHAW, company promoter, who befriends "Old Mystery," by whose assistance he is successful in endeavouring to become an M.P.

MR. STANYER, an Australian financier, who gives "Old Mystery" the post of English agent for his business.

MADELEINE LORRAINE, daughter of Lord Lynton, who is beloved by Eric, but who loves "Harvey Bligh," the popular author, really Ronald Geldart.

PHYLLIS DAVENTRY, typewriter to Scrimshaw, who takes a fancy to "Old Mystery." She is rescued from Hooligans by Ronald Geldart.

JACK WIDDICOMBE, cousin to the brothers Geldart, and who occupies a responsible position on the Meteor.

TWENTY-FIFTH CHAPTER.
Ronald is Arrested.

"I SEE you've met before," Lady Alastair said in a delighted tone, for she was the essence of amiability. "I am so glad, I'll leave you together," and so saying, she sailed away to bring other interesting young men in touch with other interesting young women.

"You are not vexed with Lady Alastair?" said Ronald, "Because she did not know, and, of course, if you would rather not speak to me I will leave you without another word."

She looked up piteously into his eyes.

"No, no!" she said, "only I should like to speak to you alone," and she looked around as though in despair at the smiling, chattering throng near them.

He led her to the marble staircase and across a domed, mosaic-paved staircase head towards one of the conservatories, where mostly pink and white azaleas bloomed. And she seated herself in a wicker chair in the ambush of branching palms and greenery.

"I want to tell you," she said, as he seated himself beside her, "how sorry I was, how angry with myself for leaving you without a word. It seemed so unjust because, whether your brother was right or wrong in what he said, you had always been so brave and kind to me, and——" she looked down at the jewels on her wrist, "we had always been such friends."

"I am glad you have said what you have said, because it gives me the opportunity and the right to speak," he replied. "The accusation of that man—I never more will call him brother—was a foul, false slander. It is true that prior to my father's death an unjust and cruel suspicion fell upon me. Only yesterday I discovered his machinations.

"Madeleine, my good name and fame are dear to me. I dropped the name that is mine by birth until such time as I could clear it. For a time I had no means to clear it, for I could not believe, still less prove that any man, let alone my own blood brother, could contrive a scheme so diabolical and dastardly as that which Eric Geldart laid against me."

"Brother against brother," murmured Madeleine, horror in her eyes.

"Yes, brother against brother. He plotted my ruin for the one reason that he might shield himself and his own offences behind the rampart of suspicion that he heaped on me. That and one other motive swayed him; the lust for gold, the hunger for my birthright as well as his own, and the mad, hateful design of gaining all my father's fortune, banishing me from that father's confidence, from his heart—ah! at the cost of breaking that heart, or, as it proved, of sacrificing that useful, honourable life."

"Harvey! Harvey!" she cried, calling him by the name she had known and loved him by.

"It is true, true what I have told you. Soon it will be proved. But I have something more to say, Madeleine. Even in my darkest hour, when there seemed no rift in the black cloud of suspicion that loomed over me, one dread was worst of all, one yearning most intense—the dread that you should hear and think me guilty, the hope, the soul-felt hope, that you should know me and declare me to be true."

"Then," she cried, "God grant that you may rend asunder and destroy the mantle of suspicion that has shrouded you, but whether you succeed in that or no, this from my heart I do declare: 'I believe you innocent, and I—I—I love you!'"

He caught her in his arms, rained kisses on her face. Locked in each other's embrace they were oblivious to all the world, oblivious to an approaching form, oblivious to the presence of one who stood regarding them like a Mephistopheles raging at the bliss in which he had no part.

And Eric Geldart, seeing what he saw, hearing what he heard, banished from his black heart all semblance of pity or remorse, all thought of ties of blood or kindred, forgot that once the brother there and he had slept, infants in their cot, folded in each other's arms, the same mother's kiss upon their brow, the same mother's prayer murmured over them, remembered only that the man there stood between him and his heart's desire, and that he might win the love he craved and keep the gold he craved and the fame and reputation which were as the breath of his nostrils. The man there must be crushed and broken, once for all.

Turning from their rapturous embrace, the lovers faced him, but this time intensifying not relaxing their clasp of each other's arms, and with scorn and defiance in their eyes.

Digitized by Google

"I must apologise," Eric sneered. "for interrupting a scene so charming and so interesting; a rehearsal, I presume, for Lady Alastair's forthcoming amateur theatricals—Romeo and Juliet, or Paolo and Francesca?"

"I care no more, sir, for your sneers than for your slanders," said Ronald sternly, "your presence is an intrusion!"

And Madeleine echoed simply: "Yes, an unwelcome intrusion!"

"An intrusion—yes!" he hissed between his set teeth, while his eyes flashed like lightning under the thunder of his brows; "but there may be other intrusions than mine, and they, too, may be unwelcomed. Yes! yes! this way—this way!" and as he turned he called to two stern-looking men who were peering to right and left, followed by the affrighted Lady Alastair and a handful of her guests wide-eyed.

They strode hastily to the conservatory.

"Who is this?" said one close black-bearded man; then indicating Eric, "Is this the man?"

And Lady Alastair said:

"Oh! no! no! no! I am sure it is all a terrible mistake; you have no right to come here, no reason to come here—that is Mr. Eric Geldart—not Mr. Ronald Geldart!"

"But, my lady, the other?"

"Why that," she cried with triumphant indignation—"that is Mr. Harvey Bligh, the novelist; is it not so, Mr. Geldart?"

And Eric answered, hurling an accusing hand towards his brother and speaking to the stern, strong executants of the law:

"That is my brother, Ronald Harvey Geldart, author, poet, whatsoever else he may be, my brother and—a thief!"

A murmur rose from the trembling and now augmented throng, who looked on thrilled and petrified with horror.

"A thief!" whispered one. And another in a whisper answered: "Yes, and something else!"

And he of the black beard, advancing, said:

"Are you Ronald Harvey Geldart?"

"I am," was the unflinching answer.

"And I am Inspector Donnelly of Scotland Yard, and it it my duty, Mr. Ronald Geldart, to arrest you on the charge of the wilful murder of Clare Armitage, and I have to warn you that anything you may say is liable to be used in evidence against you." And in another moment Ronald Geldart stood between the two stern officers of the law, who, each with a hand upon his wrist, led him from out those marble halls, speechless himself with horror and amidst a silent horror of all who saw and heard.

TWENTY-SIXTH CHAPTER.

Jack is Made Happy.

"Good morning, Miss Phyllis!" and Mr. Scrimshaw's Remington promptly ceased its chatter as was its way when Mr. Scrimshaw's typine was about to commence hers.

It was Mr. Widdicombe who interrupted the operations of the young lady operator, in fact these interruptions had of late become frequent owing to various causes.

The Meteor was increasing in circulation and importance, and there was more urgent and frequent need for its business manager to confer with its actual, though unsuspected, proprietor.

Again, the attendance of that proprietor in Crosby Square had of late been more urgently and continuously required. Not by the exigencies of the Cosmopolitan Trust and Exchange, the affairs of which indeed Mr. Scrimshaw delegated more and more to his cashiers and managers, devoting a daily, increasing portion of his time and energy to conferences with the strange old man in the dreary office upstairs, and the bustling, hurry-scurry of various dealings, transactions and operations following such conferences.

The staff of the Cosmopolitan were mystified. They knew that business, important and lucrative, appertained to the association of their handsomely-furnished and appointed offices and the somewhat squalid and dreary floor above, knew that it was not for nothing that huge budgets of accounts, almost cabalistic in form and contents, were sent down to them to be copied, and that in other cases balance-sheets relating to the most ordinary operations were directed to be filed upstairs.

Clearly the governor was working a big scheme, and Old Mystery, whom daily the staff of the Cosmopolitan treated with more respect and deference, was in the swim.

Certainly Mr. Widdicombe made these frequent visits to Crosby Square without complaint, and when occasionally Scrimshaw incidentally excused himself, on the ground of pressure of business, from attendance at the Meteor offices, the business director of that paper would remark cheerfully:

"Don't mention it, Scrimshaw, we're getting along much better without you—we'd rather not be troubled, I mean to say we'd rather not trouble you, knowing the demands upon your time made by your Parliamentary duties, to say nothing of the necessity of your being here in the City with all this alternate boom and panic in the air."

There was another reason, one that Mr. Widdicombe never mentioned. Fortune had of late smiled on him more consistently than ever he remembered.

His emoluments from the Meteor made the hard times of the past seem like a dream. In addition, Scrimshaw, from time to time, had, in his off-handed manner, given Cousin Jack, his old-time befriender, hints and tips of which the latter had availed himself to his substantial benefit.

And yet, strange to say, Jack Widdicombe of late felt lonelier than ever. Indeed, he dated that sense of loneliness back to the moment when he first set eyes on Phyllis Daventry, and strove in a manner, strangely shy and off-handed for a man of the world, to impress the fact upon her.

Did Phyllis catch his meaning? It is difficult to say; certainly she more and more affected not to, which inclines me from observation to believe she did.

Idylls are not all dependent on environment. Of what avail the flowing meads, the rippling streams, the summer zephyrs and the skipping lambs without a Chloe and a Strophon?

But set you down your Strephon and your Chloe in the very vortex of the City's maelstrom, with nothing more pastoral near than the bulls and bears and stags of the Stock Exchange, no verdure closer than in Drapers' Gardens, the Fountain Court of the Bank of England, or the plane tree in Cheapside; rob your Strephon of his crook, replace the silk stockings and the satin-bow-tied breeches he wears in China ornaments by a frock coat and chimney-pot silk hat, give him a silk umbrella for a crook and let your Chloe's curls be crowned, not by a garland of wild flowers, but by a picture hat, and for a smock array her in a blouse and skirt, yet shall Strephon whisper the oldest and the dearest of all stories, and all shall be Arcadian.

"Don't you get tired of type-writing?" asked Jack incidentally.

"Oh, no!" said Phyllis, "it's my work, and it's better than governessing or envelope-addressing or sewing-machining, and I'm not clever, you know, like girls who write or girls who go on the stage."

"Aren't you, by Jove!" said Jack stubbornly, and gazing angrily at a hand mirror which happened to be present, there being a daughter of Eve within the radius of a hundred yards, and which insultingly threw back at him the reflection of streaks, mocking streaks, of white above his temples. "I'd sooner listen to you than I'd read or hear any of them."

"Oh, Mr. Widdicombe, and what message did you say for Mr. Scrimshaw? I'm rather afraid it isn't much use your waiting."

"And why?"

"I doubt if he'll be back this afternoon."

"I don't see that that matters much, if I may only wait."

"If it isn't wasting your valuable time, Mr. Widdicombe," said Phyllis demurely.

"I don't think my time could be better employed; certainly not more enjoyably. Allow me," for a sheet of paper fluttered from Misss Daventry's table; and gallant Jack Widdicombe stooped to restore it, then he stared at it, ejaculating, "By Jove! that's strange!"

Digitized by Google

"What, Mr. Widdicombe?"

"That handwriting. May I look, I don't want to read the contents."

"Oh, certainly, if you like, it doesn't matter; they're Greek and Chinese combined to everybody except Mr. Scrimshaw and the gentleman who wrote them. I can't understand their interesting you."

"They don't, the contents, but the hand, it's as like the writing of a man I once knew as if it were his own—the same quaint tails to the g's and y's and the same twiddley little s's."

"How strange; perhaps it is."

"That can't be; the man I mean is dead."

"Then they are not the same," said Phyllis, "for this one is very much alive."

"What's his name?"

"Strange to say, I don't know, but he's a dear old gentleman and I like him very much. He belongs to the office upstairs with the Taga-Taga Wool Agency on the door. We call him Old—I mean Mr. Mystery, and Mr. Scrimshaw gives him odd jobs to do now and then—little matters that he wishes to keep outside the office, though, as a matter of fact, of late he has kept him quite busy. He seems to have quite taken to him."

"So do you," said Mr. Widdicombe in an injured tone. And Phyllis answered:

"Oh, certainly, he's such a dear old gentleman."

"I'm glad he's old," said Jack, "though, for the matter of that, I'm not getting younger," and he passed his hands ruefully through the iron grey hair thinning so rapidly at the temples.

"Oh, Mr. Widdicome, you're in the prime of life!" and the delighted Jack replied:

"Do you think so? Well, really, when you come to think of it you're not far out." For it is noticeable that men, as a rule, go on considering themselves in the prime of life from thirty-five to sixty. "But, ah!" he sighed, "I'm a great deal older than you."

"Yes," said Phyllis, going on tapping, "but then men are much younger in their ways than women all the way through."

"Do you think so? It has often occurred to me. For instance, for a man of thirty a girl of twenty would be the most natural thing in the world, and lots of men at forty marry girls of twenty."

"Oh, yes!" said Phyllis, typing furiously.

"By-the-bye, if it isn't a rude question, how old are you, Miss Phyllis?"

"I'm twenty-five," said Phyllis, blushing.

"Really, you don't look it," said Cousin Jack, who would have said that whatever she had said. "Well, I say, Miss Phyllis, if a man of thirty is young and a man of forty is not too old for a girl of twenty, why—why——" He paused, the better to elaborate his rule of three sum, "for a young lady of twenty-five a man of forty-five would be just about the age.

"What age?" asked Phyllis, with amazing innocence, and Jack exclaimed:

"The age to ask you, Miss Phyllis, if—if—you'll save a poor fellow from developing into what he's on the verge of—a lonely, dreary, weary, selfish old bachelor. I know I'm not much to look at. I'm neither clever nor rich, also I'm past my prime, and there are dozens of smarter men, younger men, who'd give the world for a smile from such a pretty girl as you, but I love you very, very dearly, and I'll be good and true to you all my days."

He seized her hand—he was seated beside her. Her lips trembled, and her eyes filled with tears.

A hundred thoughts flashed through her mind, she thought of herself as she was, happy in herself, happy in her work, but fatherless, motherless, without brother or sister, and at times feeling very, very lonely, thought of herself as she pictured what she was to be, a prim little old maid going home to a prim little sitting-room of an evening, with the prim tabby cat singing on the prim hearthrug, and the spring-time coming and going and the autumn bringing more dead leaves.

And then—and then—there flitted for a moment in her mental vision a handsome, grave face, a well-set figure, a voice that woke music in her heart, and then—and then, she put that picture by—for ever. And there in the City's heart the little idyll was enacted, and Cousin Jack, somewhat late in life, plucked and laid upon his heart the flower of womanhood that was to make his whole life fragrant.

And through the open window there floated from below a harmony of strings—a harp, a violin, a 'cello. Bustling City men paused just a moment, and a few drones there in the City hive loitered awhile to listen to the wandering minstrels who played on and on, little deeming they were furnishing the incidental music to a real life drama that had reached its happiest situation.

Cousin Jack, with a light heart and the footstep of a schoolboy, all but cannonned with his patron when descending the stairs.

"Do you want to see me?"

"Yes."

"Well, out with it."

"Only just to ask if you can spare your typewriting young lady.'"

"What for, and for how long?"

"Permanently."

"No, you be hanged! the Meteor office is quite distinct from the Cosmopolitan Trust, and mustn't steal its staff."

"But she isn't for the Meteor, and I don't want her to typewrite any more; I want her for a semi-detached villa in the neighbourhood of Streatham, and I want her for my wife."

"By Jove!" said Scrimshaw, "who'd have thought it? This sort of thing disorganises business. Tut! Tut! I expect those accounts she's copying will be chock full of errors. Well, never mind, old chap, give us your hand, I couldn't wish her or you a better bit of luck. By-the-bye, Jack, I'll give you a tip that will set you up in housekeeping; put a hundred in Esperanza Reefs."

"What are they?" said Cousin Jack, opening his paper.

"Not quite sure; here, you fellow, give me the Times."

Mr. Springle obeyed. Cousin Jack opened the paper, took note of the last quotation of the stock in question, was refolding it casually, his eye caught the leaded line, TERRIBLE DISCOVERY IN LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS. A WOMAN MURDERED. And then a name—a familiar name—"Clare Armitage of Belsize Gardens! Good God!" he cried. "Scrimshaw, read!"

"Yes," said the other, "ghastly affair, wasn't it? Did you know her?"

"Yes, yes! Knew her parents too; they died when she was quite a child. My cousin, old George Geldart, who's dead too, now, brought her up in his household. I think she thought young Eric meant to marry her, and I expect he, as was his way with most people, treated her very badly. But, poor soul, who can have done this awful deed?"

TWENTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER.
Phyllis Finds her Father.

On the morning following Frederick Stanyer's return, he and his agent sat in the little room on the second floor in Crosby Square, again conferring.

The conversation mainly turned on market matters, and, not unnaturally, drifted on to liars.

"Talking of liars," said Stanyer, "I met about the biggest specimen just after my arrival out. They were talking about a man of your name, the youngster who made a hit in Parliament, and there was a man in the club just out from home who made himself out to be a sort of walking guide to the Peerage and the County Families, and

(Continued on page 509.)

Digitized by Google

Asthma, Bronchitis and Consumption.

Astounding and Generous Offer by a World-Famed Specialist.

£1,000 at Stake!

In connection with the recent statistics published relating to the appalling increase of tuberculosis (lung diseases of all descriptions), consumption, and asthma, Professor Richard Haynel, Director of the Weidhaas Hygienic Institute, Burgess Hill, near Brighton, recently waited upon us and gave us some interesting and wonderful information with regard to his treatment for the above-mentioned diseases. The Professor has asked us to inform our readers that he will forward any sufferer mentioning our paper, full and minute details of how "To Cure Yourself," and a copy of his great work on the subject, which deals exhaustively with the Weidhaas Home Treatment, absolutely free of charge. The book sets forth in a very simple language the easiest, most rational, and really marvellous methods for effecting a cure, no matter how long the dreaded disease may have been running its evil way.

Professor Haynel has devoted over twenty-five years consistent study to the question of securing and restoring health to sufferers from consumption, asthma, chest and stomachic complaints. The treatment he advocates has been thoroughly tested during that period, and the number of cases in which it has proved to be remarkably efficacious runs into many thousands. The Professor gave us several instances of remarkable cures, vouched for by letters received from patients, and the following genuine testimonial shown to us, amongst others, is only one record out of hundreds of similar cases of asthma cured to stay cured.

"To the Director of the Weidhaas Institute.—Dear Sir,—It is with grateful and sincere thanks that I testify to the remarkable success of your treatment. For the last seventeen years I have suffered very severely with my chest, and during the winter of '98 I was so ill and weak that I had no hopes of recovery. My cough and expectoration were incessant, and many a night I could not lie down. I was short of breath. My shoulders were bent, and my voice was almost a whisper, whilst I had a severe pain under the shoulder blades. I tried many remedies, so-called, but none cured until I went in for a course of your treatment. Now the pain is all gone, I can walk without feeling tired, and I am never prostrated. In fact, I am in excellent health. I shall do my best to recommend your treatment.—Yours gratefully, Caroline Sadler, Perth, N.B. (Full address on application.)"

At this season of the year, when Bronchitis finds its way into nearly every family in the land, the experience of Mrs. Smith, of Tewkesbury, will be of great interest to our readers, It proves conclusively the undoubted value of a scientific application of hygienic methods in curing disease, "I suffered from chronic bronchitis, and did nothing but cough day and night, with a good deal of phlegm. My lungs were weak and I gradually got worse in spite of the efforts of a doctor. I often had to be assisted up and down stairs, had to struggle for breath and could eat nothing. Attacks would sometimes come on three times a day, and often lasted three weeks. I could never lie down, and dreaded night to come. I was becoming quite a skeleton, and then I decided to try your treatment. In about eleven months I felt quite a new person. Now my breathing is quite perfect, and I am able to do my ordinary housework, including washing, After three long weary years of such helplessness, I feel more than grateful."

Another wonderful cure effected in a long-standing case of consumption, is a further evidence of the efficacy of the Weidhaas Home Treatment. Mrs. Arnold, of Polegate (whose full name and address can be had on application to the Director of the Weidhaas Institute), writes: "'I have suffered several years from consumption, and the doctors gave me up. I was so ill that I was confined to bed, and I lost a half-pint of blood a day. I also suffered from a dry cough and night sweats, and whenever I attempted to do anything I had a fearful pain in my left side. In September, 1897, I was given up as incurable. I suffered dreadfully from bleeding of the lungs, and I could scarcely eat anything. I heard of your cure and made up my mind to try it just at the time when I was at my worst, for I had given up all hopes of ever being cured. After trying your treatment, in a few weeks I began to improve, my cough ceased and I did not suffer from the night sweats or bleeding of the lungs. I can now walk a considerable distance without feeling the least fatigue. I owe my entire cure to your marvellous treatment."

The Professor is quite prepared to back his own opinions and those of his patients to the extent of £1,000, and will pay this sum to any charitable institution we may name, if one testimonial published by the Weidhaas Hygienic Institute can be proved otherwise than genuine. We cannot impress upon our readers who suffer themselves (or whose friends are in distress through these terrible diseases) too much the importance of immediately putting themselves or their friends into communication with the Director of the Institute. You should at once write in full, giving such particulars as you feel justified in stating as to your symptoms and complaints, and you may rest assured that your case, no matter how complicated or serious, will have the prompt personal and individual attention of Professor Haynel.

Address in full, mentioning that we advised you to write—The Weidhaas Hygienic Institute, 80, Burgess Hill, near Brighton.

If you wish to SLEEP WELL

—TAKE—

BEECHAM'S PILLS

You will SLEEP WELL,

because BEECHAM'S PILLS gently calm irritation of the Nervous system, while by their stimulative and cleansing action upon the Liver and Kidneys, Digestion proceeds with normal regularity, so that at night the tranquillised mind and body are prepared for "Nature's sweet restorer"— peaceful slumber. Should one feel restless after an exciting or convivial evening a dose of BEECHAM'S PILLS will quickly induce refreshing sleep.

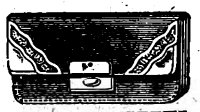
Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills), and 2/9 (168 Pills).

Digitized by Google

SALE OF GENUINE LEATHER GOODS.

SOME SPECIAL LINES AT THROW-AWAY PRICES.



STRONG USEFUL PURSE, Three divisions, prettily mounted, 1/1 each.

No. XIII "HALF-GUINEA" REAL SEAL PURSE, beautifully designed Silver art corners, leather throughout, best finish, 4½in. long, 5/- each; 4¾in. long, 5/6 each; 5 1-8in. long, 6/- each. Black only.

No. XI. Our "PRESENTATION GUINEA" PURSE, with massive Real Silver mount and lock, lovely shades in colours.

Morocco, Green, Brown, or Tan	7/6 each
Russia, Green	7/6 "
Seal Dark Green, Dark Brown, or Tan	8/- "
Crocodile, Dark Green, or Brown	10/6 "

No. V. VERY PRETTY MOROCCO CHATELAINE BAG, with heavy Plated mount, latest novelty, 2/3 each.

No. VI. BRACELET WRIST BAG, In Steel or Black, very pretty pattern, nicely fitted with good Purse and dainty Mirror, 3/6 The latest and most fashionable bag.

No. IV. MOROCCO BAG, neat shape and size, fitted with Purse and Scent Bottle, Black, 4/- each. Wonderful value. Better qualities: 5/-, 6/-, 7/-, 8/- each.

No. II. SMART STEEL-BEADED CHATELAINE, Beautiful finish, dainty catch to attach to Belt, 1/7; usual price, 3/6.

No. IX. LADY'S HANDSOME MOROCCO CASE, Padded leather, lined watered Silk, plated fittings, first quality Hair and Cloth's Brushes, Comb, bevelled Mirror, Scissors, Curling Tongs and Spirit Stove for same, 13/6 each. A wonderful bargain. In Diced Persian leather, 1/6 extra.

No. VIII. GENTLEMAN'S MOROCCO CASE, fitted with Soap Box, Razor, Shaving Brush, Hair Brush, Strop, Mirror, and Comb, 13/- each. Other lines: 18/-, 20/-, 23/-, 30/-.

ALL WHO WRITE NEED THE ST. PAUL'S FOUNTAIN PEN.

With Guaranteed 14ct. Gold Nib, only 3/6 Post Free.

When ordering please state if Fine, Medium, or Broad Point is required.

The St. Paul's Fountain Pen is the latest in Fountain Pens and is of English manufacture. The only 3/6 Fountain Pen with Guaranteed 14ct. Gold Nib of everlasting wear, in box with filler, 3/6; post free.

All Goods Post Free. Money returned if not approved. Complete Bargain List Post Free.

P. BLOSSOM & CO., 61 Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

Digitized by Google

'Who's Who' rolled into one, and amongst others he professed to know this Eric Geldart, M.P.

"I happened incidentally to mention that I as a lad was in the same office with a man of that name at Berridge and Smilax's in Mincing Lane, and this know-all answered like a shot, 'That's the man; that was Eric Geldart's father.' 'Well,' I said, 'it was very creditable in a young fellow to push his way right through to the front, having regard to his home circumstances,' and, by Jove! the man was down my throat in an instant.

"What was I referring to? Geldart's environment was just about as good a send-off as an ambitious man wanted. Well, I intimated that the man I knew had been rather unfortunate, and when last I met him he was considerably below his bottom dollar. 'Why, man,' says this talking encyclopædia, 'George Geldart was one of the warmest men on the Produce Market!' Said I, 'He may have been, though I should be very surprised to learn it, but when I met him two months ago he was on bed rock, as clean broke as any man could wish to be, and cleaner than most would care to be.'

"This chap curled up his lip and sneered visibly. 'I knew George Geldart very well indeed, dined very many times with him at his house in Bryanston Square, in fact, was there a day or two before he died.' 'Before he what?' said I. 'Died,' says he, and I answered, 'The man I mean is as alive as I am, or anyway he was an hour ago,' for a cablegram from you had been handed me half an hour previously. 'Then,' I added, 'I expect we're talking of different men, the one I mean was the son of Gabriel Geldart, the City alderman, who was in his time Lord Mayor.'

"'Exactly,' my informant replied, 'that was the Geldart I mean; his father articled him with Berridge and Smilax in Mincing Lane before he took him into his own firm. He was at Charterhouse with my own brother. I knew him well; also his two sons, one of whom went to the bad, and was cut adrift, the other is the present M.P. for Little Claverton. Why, I sent flowers to his funeral. My cousin, Dick Farningham, was one of his executors.'

"Well, I held my breath and let him ramble on. Like a good many professional liars, he got hold of one or two facts to weave in the woof of his invention. He described you fairly well, except that he made you out as a kind of type of sleek prosperity, the sort of man you might have been if you'd struck oil before I met you last time I was over here, instead of after.

"Man, he made you out a monument of sleek, snug prosperity and respectability, philanthropist, big donor to all the funds, a governor of this and a director of that, and, observing the direction of my eyes, he suddenly broke off and asked: 'What's the matter with the chandelier?' I said 'Nothing, it was the ceiling I was looking at, expecting it to fall in,' and I waltzed out on the balcony, for that man's lies absorbed all the atmosphere of that room. Hullo! Who's this?" For just then Phyllis Daventry entered the room with a bundle of papers and their typed transcription.

Stanyer followed her with a curious, wistful look in his eyes, then he whispered to Geldart, "Make her talk."

"I think you'll find those all in order," said Phyllis. "Mr. Scrimshaw is late, so I thought I'd bring them straight up to you."

"You're always very good and thoughtful," said Old Mystery. "By-the-bye, Scrimshaw tells me you are going to leave him."

"Yes," said Phyllis, blushing.

"Going to get an easier place?"

"No, Mr. Mystery, that is—well, I hope so, I mean to say," and Phyllis blushed violently. "I'm not going to another post at all, I'm—I'm going to be married and live at Upper Tooting."

"Are you really?" said Old Mystery. "Lucky Upper Tooting, how grey this dreary den will seem without your occasional visits. But who's the happy man?"

"It's Mr. Widdicombe, the Meteor manager," said Phyllis, a happier look than ever in her eyes.

Meantime the other man's eyes were fixed with a dilated gaze upon her hand.

"Jack Widdicombe!" exclaimed the old man. "Why my little lassie, he's nearly old enough to be your father. But that's no matter. Love laughs at years as well as locksmiths, and he'll be good and kind."

"Then you know him? I'm so glad! You must come and see us sometimes."

"I don't know, Miss Phyllis."

Stanyer clutched the table.

"But one thing I will do. See here," and he took from his pocket-book a bank-note for £500. "Money may be the root of evil, but sometimes out of evil cometh good. Even gold sometimes brings brightness, and perhaps an old man's gift may make a young woman's home a little happier. I'd like you to buy with this just what you like, and keep it to remember one who always found you gracious, and to whom your gentle words and winning ways brought peace and joy in sad and lonely days."

"Oh, Mr. Mystery!" said Phyllis, "how good you are, but this is quite a fortune, it takes away my breath! I almost wonder if I ought to accept it! It's more money than I ever thought to possess all my whole life; I don't know what to say."

"Tell me, what is your name, little girl, tell me your other name, Phyllis, and say where you got that ring!"

She turned, startled, almost alarmed by the excited tone of the stranger.

"Why, sir," she said, "this ring was my dear dead mother's. Oh! what's the matter?" for the man seemed all of a sudden turned to stone, his eyes dilated, his breath came and went in deep long spasms; he looked upon her like one transfixed.

"Your dear dead mother! Dead—dead!" he faltered; then, strong man as he was he let his head fall on his folded arms and gave way to his grief.

And in answer to the girl's inquiring gaze, Old Mystery said gently:

"This, Phyllis, is my real employer, and my friend, Mr. Frederick Stanyer."

"Stanyer!" exclaimed the girl. "Frederick Stanyer! Why—why that was my father's name!"

"Yes! yes!" said the stricken man, rising to his feet and throwing wide his arms. "Phyllis! Phyllis, at last, my dear, I've found you, come to my heart. I am your father!"

Old Mystery silently stole out of the room, leaving the reunited child and father locked in each other's arms.

He stood a moment irresolute on the staircase. How narrow as well as wide the world was! And then he heard hasty footsteps ascending the stairs and Scrimshaw, with a wild look in his face, bounded up to the landing, a newspaper in his hand.

"Old Mystery!" he cried, "look here, look here!"

And the old man, taking the paper in his trembling hand, read the headline:

THE LINCOLN'S INN FIELDS MURDER!
SENSATIONAL ARREST!

And his eye, roving down the column, caught the name of Clare Armitage.

Clare Armitage, and two other names—those of his own sons.

TWENTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER.

Madeleine Pleads with her Father.

It is doubtful if Eric Geldart, callous and remorseless as we know him to have been, would have been nerved to playing quite the desperate game he pursued but for one consideration, his infatuation for Madeleine Lorraine. And the fever of his passion increased with her coldnesss towards him.

Attractive and delightful as she was, there were plenty in both respects her equal whom the smart, already distinguished young politician might have won for the asking. But for these he had no eyes; it was his way, his heart once set upon an object that was hard to obtain, the more he desired it.

Digitized by Google

Had Clare Armitage, whom at one time he thought he loved, been less easy to win he would have prized her more. She, loving him madly and blindly, had thrown herself into his arms, her swift surrender had killed his passion; and, when she stood between the man she loved so dearly and his ends, he took the life that he had blighted without remorse.

But his desire for Madeleine Lorraine had become the ruling passion of his life, therefore a double motive impelled him to his desperate course; the fearful charge against his brother not only tended to his own security, but removed a rival.

Not unnaturally an immense amount of sympathy was accorded him from all sides; even his political opponents deplored the hardships of a young man of such brilliant attainments and promise being subject to a reflected slur.

And when twelve good men and true were summoned by His Majesty's coroner to inquire into the matters touching the death of Clare Armitage, spinster, Eric Geldart, faultless in attire and appearance as his partisans declared him to be in character, faced those twelve good men and true and identified the victim without a trace of emotion.

Not even when he had looked upon that clear, cold, white, set face had he flinched. He looked upon his work, silent and unmoved, touched lightly the ice-cold brow, untroubled.

Yes! even when all of a sudden those around him noted what had not caught their eye before—a stain in the white cerements above the shoulder just where the first cruel blow had fallen. And those who saw marvelled it had not caught their eyes before, while others said the crimson was so vivid it might have been quite new.

The coroner accorded the distinguished witness all the courtesy and respect his position demanded, and the member for Little Claverton gave his evidence, seated beside the representative of the Crown.

Questioned as to whether the deceased to his knowledge had any enemies, he expressed a reluctance to answer that question. But the coroner pressed.

"Mr. Geldart," he said firmly though kindly, "I desire as far as possible in every way to spare your feelings, but in a matter of such serious import as this it is necessary to have, not only the truth and nothing but the truth, but the whole truth."

Then Eric answered that he could only call to mind one person with whom the deceased had been at variance, and when asked who that person was, a thrill of sensation and sympathy followed his reply: "It was my brother, Ronald Geldart."

And he told how when that brother had been charged by their late father with the misappropriation of a large sum of money, the testimony of the deceased had been the most damning against him; told, too, in examination how that brother had disappeared out of his family and social circle, had cut off his environment, and, when next encountered, was bearing an assumed name.

And meantime that brother, a police custodian on either side, watched every movement of Eric's face, listened to his every word. And then the coroner, addressing that self-same brother, asked:

"Ronald Harvey Geldart, you may, if you choose, give evidence concerning the matters touching this inquiry, only it is my duty to warn you that what you say may be used against you elsewhere."

"I have this to say," Ronald answered. "I met the deceased upon the night in question and I left her alive and well. So far from there being any animus between us she had that night made to me a confession of the share she had taken in as foul a conspiracy against me as ever was laid against a man." Here he faced his brother with a challenge in his eye, but even then there was no flinch in Eric's eyes.

"The story of that conspiracy," said Ronald, "is told in half a dozen words. She, herself under the persuasion, or rather, the coercion of that man—her betrayer—robbed my father, and lied, fixing the crime on me!"

And Eric Geldart, folding his arms, met the accusing gaze with one fully as defiant in its stony impassivity.

As with dogs, it sometimes is with men—give them a bad name you may almost as well hang them. And the jury in this respect did their best by, without leaving the box, returning a verdict of Wilful Murder against Ronald Harvey Geldart.

* * * * *

Lord Lynton lost all patience with his daughter.

"Why, bless my soul, girl!" he rasped out, "you've the chance of a thousand, the man's going up the ladder by leaps and bounds." And then, when the sensational news of the arrest of Harvey Bligh for the Lincoln's Inn Fields murder and the establishment of his identity with Ronald Geldart came out, Viscount Lynton pooh-poohed the idea of the matter affecting Eric.

"The world is too enlightened nowadays," he said, "to let a man suffer for the misdeeds or misfortunes of his kith or kin. Eric Geldart will maintain his position in Society, and his political career will be unchecked, even though his wretched brother goes to the scaffold."

"Oh, no! no! no!" answered Madeleine with a shudder. "They cannot bring this terrible charge home to him."

"That remains to be seen," said her father. "Certainly, as far as circumstantial evidence goes, many a man has been hanged on less."

"But," Madeleine persisted, "Ronald could never strike a woman, still less deal her that dastardly, murderous blow; his nature forbids even such a thought."

The Viscount scanned her curiously, startled at her fervour in the cause of the man accused.

"How do you know?" he asked. "I know that you were present at the arrest, unfortunately, and were, in fact, talking to the wretched fellow when the police arrived; though, happily, so far your name has been kept out of the papers. I was not aware that you were so very intimately acquainted with him, or indeed, that you had ever met him before. Eh?"

Madeleine hung her head.

"Come! Come, tell me, had you ever met him before, and when and where?" He tapped his foot impatiently.

"I have met Ronald Geldart very many times," she answered, now calmly looking him fairly in the face. "Twice he saved my life; once when the horses bolted——"

"What! Was he the fellow who stopped them and was knocked down by them for his pains. I thought that man disappeared without leaving a trace as to his identity."

"So he did; but we met again on the river." And then she told the story of the capsizing of her canoe and her rescue by Ronald.

"But why has all this been kept secret from me?" asked the Viscount, angrily and suspiciously. "Did you ever meet again between that time and the night of the arrest?"

"Yes, very many times."

"Unknown to me?"

"Yes, father. I should have told you, but you and I have lived our lives so very much apart that I hardly thought the matter would interest you."

"Whether it interested me or not, one thing is certain; it would concern me to learn that my daughter was driving and boating with a casual acquaintance of whom she knew little or nothing."

"Oh, but as Harvey Bligh, everybody knew him, answered Madeleine quickly.

"Anyway, I don't consider a scribbling fellow, even though he has acquired a certain kind of mushroom celebrity, a proper acquaintance, certainly not a proper companion for my daughter, and whatever reputation the fellow may have won under an assumed name, he's lost such as he had under the name that was his birthright; his father disinherited him for a thief."

"No! No!" cried Madeleine passionately, "that was a cruel, unjust suspicion, a foul slander it was the work of his life to refute, for he is truth itself."

(To be concluded next week.)

Digitized by Google

SEAWEED AS A MEDICINE

Its Marvellous Effect upon the

STOMACH, LIVER, KIDNEYS AND BLOOD

Seaweed possesses a natural strengthening, healing, and purifying power, infinitely greater than ordinary medicines. This is now regarded as conclusive by eminent authorities, who recommend it daily, since Veno's Seaweed Tonic was first introduced.

A pure palatable extract of Seaweed is one of the principal ingredients of Veno's Seaweed Tonic. This remedy excels in the cure of Indigestion, Wind, Headache, Nervous Complaints, Kidney Troubles, Weak and Painful Back, Torpid Liver, Female Troubles, Poorness of Blood, and "Habitual Constipation." Its most brilliant effect is produced in Stomach, Liver, and Kidney Troubles. The remarkable cures Veno's Seaweed Tonic effects even in the worst cases is positive proof of its great therapeutic value.

Ask for Veno's Seaweed Tonic, 1/1½ and 2/9 per bottle, at Chemists and Drug Stores.

FREE TRIAL BOTTLES. A free trial bottle of either Veno's Seaweed Tonic or Veno's Lightning Cough Cure, and a free copy of "The People's Medical Instructor," an indispensable treatise on diseases for the household, a complete family doctor in itself, will be sent to any address on receipt of 3d. for postage from

THE VENO DRUG CO., Hulme, Manchester, Eng.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY!

TESTIMONIAL—Oaksey Manor, Malmesbury, 19/5/03. —Lady Fairbairn writes: "Received the Skirt with which she was greatly pleased, and hopes to order more soon."

To Readers of Short Stories. 17/10/1903.

SALE PRICE 3/6 Postage 4d. extra. Free Gifts. Sizes: 38, 40, 42

F. Hodgson and Sons, City of Leeds, will forward, carriage paid, on following conditions—namely, on receipt of postal order for 3/6, with postage (4d. extra), a Lady's Beautiful Tailor Made Cloth Serge Dress Skirt, in Navy or Black, smartly trimmed, with mercerised satinette strapping (as illustration), also good linenette pocket. We shall include FREE with each Skirt a pretty Open-hemmed Lawn HANDKERCHIEF.

Money willingly returned if not approved.

Sale Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Skirts, Curtains, &c., post free. Address—

F. HODGSON & SONS, (Dept. S.H.T.)
Manufacturers and Merchants,
Woodsley Road, Leeds.

Guaranteed Genuine Bargains.

This phenomenal offer is made to the readers of "Short Stories," 17/10/1903, only. On receipt of Postal Order for 5/-, or 62 stamps, we will forward, Direct from our Looms to your address, one of our 0/6 genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in 20 different patterns, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for our goods below the actual Cost of Production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms th s saving the purchasers all middle profits.

With every Carpet we shall ABSOLUTELY GIVE AWAY a very handsome Rug to match, or we will send Two Carpets and Two Rugs for 9/6. Money willingly returned if not approved. Thousands of Unsolicited Testimonials Received.

BRUSSELETTE CARPETS

REGD.

"Prudential" Brusselette HEARTHRUGS, 6ft. by 3ft., 1/6 ea., postage 6d. ex. 3 for 4/3, 6 for 8/-.

Woven and Reversible, rich Brussels and Turkey Patterns and Colourings, superior quality, with handsome Border to match. A marvel of Excellence and Beauty. These Carpets are superb imitations of real Brussels, and, except by the closest scrutiny, the difference cannot be detected.

REDUCED SALE PRICE.

Size.	Each.	Size.	Each.	Size.	Each.	Size.	Each.
6ft. by 6ft.	2/11	9ft. by 9ft.	7/6	9ft. by 15ft.	12/6	12ft. by 15ft.	15/9
6ft. by 7½ft.	3/1	9ft. by 10½ft.	8/6	12ft. by 12ft.	12/9	12ft. by 18ft.	19/6
6ft. by 9ft.	4/9	9ft. by 12ft.	9 6	12ft. by 13½ft.	14/6	12ft. by 21ft.	22/6
7 ft. by 9ft.	5 11	10½ft. by 12ft.	11/6

Illustrated Bargains, Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Table Linen, Curtains, &c., post free, if mentioning "Short Stories" (17/10/1903), while writing. Cheques and P.O.'s payable to

F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Beauty.

ICILMA FLUOR CREAM is unrivalled for the Complexion, Bust, and Hands. Preserves the Skin from the effects of hard water, sunburn, or cold winds, keeping it soft and clean. Price 1s. Send 2d. stamps for two samples (different scents). Icilma (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Rd., Lond., W.C.

HYPNOTISM

Learn at home. Startle your friends. Also strong personal magnetic influence. Wonderful nerve power. Scientific. Great advantage. Illustrated book sent free. Published by Psychic Research Co. (Dept. 437), Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, E.C. (1d. stamp).

POST FREE, 6D.

SWEET and COOL.

COMBINATION PIPE,
For Fireside or Garden.

Makes long or short pipe. 6d. post free. Agents wanted. Write for wholesale terms and sample, 6d.

GENUINE GOLD RINGS.
Set with various stones, all sizes. 3s. each, post free. Wonderful Bargain.

S. ROBERTS & CO., 255 AMHURST RD., LONDON, N.E.

TRIUMPH Cycles

£10 10 to £19 19
or by Deferred Payment System.
"The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce"
CATALOGUES GRATIS.
TRIUMPH CYCLE CO. Ltd., COVENTRY.
4 and 5, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.
30 Deansgate Arcade, Manchester. 4 King Edward St., Leeds

YOUR FUTURE IS KNOWN.

For 1s. Mr. WILDE will send a Reading of the Stars W. T. STEAD, Esq., and many other prominent gentlemen have testified to the accuracy of their forecasts. Send the exact or approximate hour of your birth, if possible, date, year, &c., together with P.O. 1s. and stamp. Satisfaction will be guaranteed.

THE RESULT WILL ASTONISH YOU.

SEND TO-DAY TO (DEPT. P.S.S.)

GEO. WILDE, 143 High Holborn, London, W.C

J. G. GRAVES'

TOOLS & MACHINERY.

Send for No. 2 Illustrated Catalogue of TOOLS FOR ALL TRADES; also, Machinery of every description. Approval before purchase. Terms to suit customers' own convenience.

Profitable Agencies offered to persons in regular employment

Write for Terms and Particulars.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., Sheffield.

PROTECT YOUR CHILD'S HEARING.

A plea on behalf of deaf children is an interesting item of the last issue of the

REVIEW OF EAR, NOSE, AND THROAT DISEASES.

Anyone who has a child afflicted by defective hearing can obtain a free copy of this Medical Journal by addressing The Editor, 10 Marble Arch, London, W.

THE DAILY EXPRESS 1D. ½

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A One Sided Love Affair.

"H. S." is acquainted with a girl who is very fond of him. He feels that he cannot return her love, as he is not fond enough of her. On several occasions she has been quite indifferent to him. The girl herself made the first advances in the acquaintance. How can "H. S." explain his position without causing trouble?

* * * * *

"H. S." should gradually drop his meetings with the girl, and try to cause her to forget him. As long as he continues seeing her, he will exercise a fascination which is difficult to drive away. Above all, he should avoid giving her the impression that he returns her love, as that way lies a broken heart.

Free Trade in Flirtations.

"LAST year," writes "G. S.," "I made the acquaintance of a nice boy, who showed me a good deal of attention. I have been for several walks with him, but am told he keeps up the acquaintance of other girls. Shall I speak to him about it, or let the matter drop?"

* * * * *

You must wait until he makes some kind of declaration of love for you, "G. S." before you can dictate to him as to what other girls he sees. He may be merely cultivating your friendship, and can scarcely be expected to drop his other friends on that account. It is not right for a girl to expect a young man, whom she only knows so slightly, to give himself entirely to her.

A Case of Cooling Off.

"A YEAR ago I made the acquaintance of a young lady," writes "CHANGEABLE," "of whom I grew very fond. She returned my affection. About two months after our meeting I grew cool to her, and lost my love. Later on I asked her to break off our friendship, which she agreed to do, without being very sorry. I was told, however, that she seemed very cut up about it. She also said she would be always willing to 'make it up again,' but that she could never love me as before. As I still have a certain liking for her would you advise me to attempt a reconciliation?"

* * * * *

I always advise reconciliations between parted friends, and do so in the case of "CHANGEABLE." As to whether or not you resume your intimate relations, must depend on how things turn out after your fresh meetings. If you find that you remain cool to each other, then you should agree that the intimacy had better stop. I suppose a man can be on friendly terms with a girl without committing himself to an engagement.

Is It Trespassing?

"R. A. W." writes: "I am in love with a young girl, but, unfortunately, she is already keeping company with a young fellow. As she does not see much of him, I am very often with her, and believe she would certainly go with me if it were not for him. Is it right for me to meet her in the present circumstances? If not, could you advise me what to do?"

* * * * *

Ask the girl herself whether the course is clear for you to meet her, and tell her you do not wish to do anything to disturb her relations with the other fellow. She should be the judge. If she is not actually engaged to him, she must have the right to say whether or not she prefers your society to his.

A Sweetheart's Family.

"GUSSIE'S" sweetheart belongs to a large family. He finds it very difficult to visit her home and to get a few words in private with her. There is always some younger sister or brother to talk to, and her father persists in boring "GUSSIE" with politics or stocks. How can he act under such circumstances?

* * * * *

It is pretty clear that "GUSSIE" is not going the right way to work to make a good impression on his sweetheart's family. It is a great blunder in courtship to make out that the girl alone is the only person in the family worthy of notice. This inclines the other members to put the couple down as tedious young turtle-doves. If "GUSSIE" wishes to be on good terms with the family he should be as nice as possible to young brothers and sisters. They are very good friends in need, as many a young man has found before now. He might, too, talk politics for awhile with her father without doing himself any harm. Fathers, above all, like to think their daughters are engaged to intelligent young men. Besides, "GUSSIE" should remember that any neglect or slight offered by him to his sweetheart's people would be very galling to her. When a girl has to choose between her sweetheart and her family, it is not always the former that wins the victory.

A Bloodthirsty Sweetheart.

"F. E. W. S." writes: "I am engaged to a girl, but she knows somebody else. When we have any little squabble, she throws the other fellow's name in my face. The other day I told her I should not pay any more money into her club, and that she must pay for her own dresses. She turned on me, punched me in the mouth and chest, and left scratches and bruises on my arm. Her father seems to have no control over her. I have asked her to return my engagement ring, but she refuses to do so until she has found someone more 'suitable.' Can I claim the ring back and break off the engagement without being sued for breach of promise?"

* * * * *

You seem to have got hold of a woman who could not possibly make a desirable wife. As you are engaged to her I cannot advise you to break off the match without her consent. But you can let the engagement slide, and drop all communications with her. As to her returning your ring, you cannot compel that, but it is to be hoped that, when she sees that you have done with her, she will do so. In the event of breach of promise proceedings, I do not think the girl would have a case, if what you tell me about her conduct is true. I hope she will succeed in finding someone more "suitable" for her gentle affections.

Cynthia.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Better than Money in the Savings Bank.

THE working man to-day gives more attention to the food he has to eat than his forefathers gave, as he realises that his health—his bank—depends very largely upon the properties of what he eats and drinks.

It follows, then, that the popular article of food is that which is easy to digest; but more popular still are preparations which are found to aid and strengthen the digestive organs, and also to act as an energiser for the whole system.

Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa is such a food.

It places a means in the hands of everyone to build up and maintain a sound constitution, which enables its possessor to travel his life's journey without the aches and pains which are in many cases preventable. Thus we come round again to sound common sense based on experience.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1¾d. tins everywhere.

PINK'S MARMALADE IS PURE.

TRY IT.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Stores, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ross Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

BREVITY IS THE SOUL OF WIT.

Be brief and witty and correspond on Pictorial Post Cards. Our 1s. assortment comprises 25 cards of the highest class in colour and photogravure usually sold 1d. and 2d. each, including actors and actresses, views, art studies, Japanese effects, topical and amusing sketches, &c. Thousands of selections. Buy direct by sending 13d. stamps to THE PICTORIAL PUBLISHING CO., PARSONAGE, MANCHESTER.

An admirable Food of the

EPPS'S

Finest quality and flavour.

COCOA

Nutritious and Economical.

Our Readers will Please Remember that

TUESDAY, 3rd NOVEMBER,

IS

KING EDWARD'S HOSPITAL FUND

SHOPPING DAY,

and that a large number of shops in London will be displaying a notice in their windows that they are giving a percentage of their takings on that day to the London hospitals.

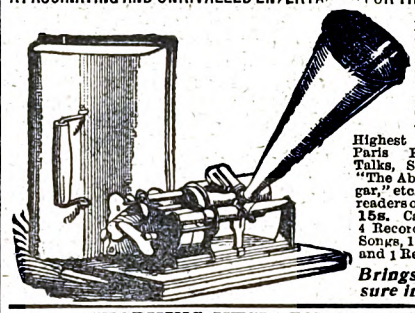
We hope, therefore, they will make a point of making some purchase, anticipating some requirements on this particular day, viz., TUESDAY, 3RD NOVEMBER. Most shops joining the scheme will be offering some special cheap lines, and reducing their prices to make a good day for the Hospitals. Boots and bonnets, furniture and eatables, all and everything, little and great, help the scheme.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."

CAMPBELL'S GRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price. A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

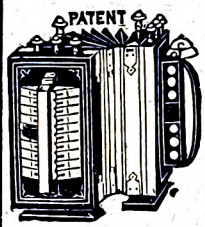


CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation.

Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.

CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories

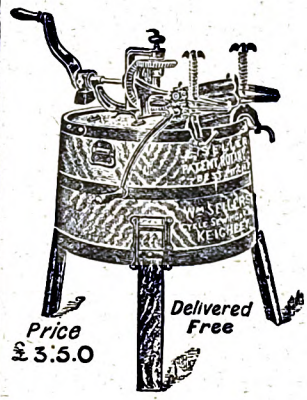
Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, " 10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, " 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, " 16/6

Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount. Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1901-2, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW. Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

ROB WASHING DAY OF ITS GRINDING TOIL

BY USING -



Price £3.5.0

Delivered Free

SELLERS' LABOUR-SAVING WASHERS

Write for copies of letters received from users of these machines.

AGENTS WANTED.

Patentees :

W. SELLERS & SONS, KEIGHLEY, YORK.

MATCH "MATCHLESS"?

YOU COULDN'T DO IT.

Guaranteed free from Acid.

Produces quickly a lasting brilliancy.

There's no METAL POLISH equal to it.

Manufacturers:

THE "MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH CO. LTD., LIVERPOOL.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

THE NURSE'S BONNET HAD FALLEN BACK AND

No. 773

Digitized by Google

SEAWEED AS A MEDICINE

Its Marvellous Effect upon the

STOMACH, LIVER, KIDNEYS AND BLOOD

Seaweed possesses a natural strengthening, healing, and purifying power, infinitely greater than ordinary medicines. This is now regarded as conclusive by eminent authorities, who recommend it daily, since Veno's Seaweed Tonic was first introduced.

A pure palatable extract of Seaweed is one of the principal ingredients of Veno's Seaweed Tonic. This remedy excels in the cure of Indigestion, Wind, Headache, Nervous Complaints, Kidney Troubles, Weak and Painful Back, Torpid Liver, Female Troubles, Poorness of Blood, and "Habitual Constipation." Its most brilliant effect is produced in Stomach, Liver, and Kidney Troubles. The remarkable cures Veno's Seaweed Tonic effects even in the worst cases is positive proof of its great therapeutic value.

Ask for Veno's Seaweed Tonic, 1/1½ and 2/9 per bottle, at Chemists and Drug Stores.

FREE TRIAL BOTTLES. A free trial bottle of either Veno's Seaweed Tonic or Veno's Lightning Cough Cure, and a free copy of "The People's Medical Instructor," an indispensable treatise on diseases for the household, a complete family doctor in itself, will be sent to any address on receipt of 3d. for postage from

THE VENO DRUG CO., Hulme, Manchester, Eng.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache and Neuralgia.

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Kaputine is not a single crude drug such as has been condemned as dangerous by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients, having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The SAFE Remedy.

Kaputine is the only preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and infirmaries. Proof positive of its superior and sterling qualities.

Write to Kaputine, Huddersfield, for Samples Free.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1½;

Samples 1d. each.

Kindly mention this paper.

£1,000,000

My Total Annual Turnover amounts in round figures to One Million Sterling; it has taken me seventeen years of constant steady progress to build up this business, and I have built it on principles which are calculated to ensure success. Every order is executed subject to seven days approval. If not entirely satisfied you return the goods and the transaction is closed.

From November to June I received 18,111 Testimonial Letters.

All accounts may be paid by Easy Monthly Payments, or, if you prefer to pay Cash you are entitled to Important Bonus Advantages.

"I PROVIDE EVERYTHING."

Any Departmental Catalogue sent Post Free on application.

MENTION THE NUMBER OF THE CATALOGUE YOU REQUIRE.

1. Watches. All my well-known Watch Specialities fully illustrated and described. My Watch Department is the Largest Watch-Sales Concern in the World.
2. Tools and Machinery. Thousands of Illustrations. Every known Tool and Machine is supplied on Easy Terms of Payment.
3. Furniture. Every Furnishing requirement is illustrated. My System of Furnishing by Easy Instalments is fully explained. From £5 to £500 Special Arrangements.
4. Mantles & Costumes. A beautiful Album of the Fashions of the Season.
5. Gent's Tailoring. This Stylish Department is splendidly equipped, and is probably the Largest Clothing Business in Great Britain.
6. Boots and Shoes. Beautifully Illustrated. A Splendid Choice of the Newest Ideas in Foot Wear. Contractors to His Majesty's Government.
7. Bookselling Department. Catalogue describes a vast assortment of Standard and Current Literature.
8. Sheffield Cutlery and Plate. The produce of my own Factories illustrated and fully described. Hotel and Shipping Orders a Speciality.
9. Glass, China, Lamps and Stoves. Dinner and Tea Services, Toilet and Bedroom Ware, Lamps, Stoves, etc.
10. Clocks. Every known style and make supplied on Easy Terms of Payment.
11. General Draperies, etc. Dress Goods, Blankets, Sheets, Furs, Ladies' Outfitting, Babies' and Children's Clothing, etc.
12. Gold Jewellery and Diamonds. Engagement and Wedding Rings, Bracelets, Brooches, and all kinds of Gold Ornaments, fully illustrated and described.
13. General Fancy Goods. Bags, Umbrellas, Albums, every kind of Leather Goods for Wedding Presents and Home Use.
14. Cameras and Optical Goods. Hundreds of Designs by the most reliable makers.
15. Bicycles and Domestic Machinery. Cycles of all kinds, Mail Carts, Perambulators, Washing and Wringing Machines, Sewing and Knitting Machines, Knife Cleaning Machines, etc.
16. Musical Department. Pianos, Organs, and every known Musical Instrument supplied on Easy Payment Terms.
17. Army and Navy. A Catalogue containing Watches, Jewellery, Cutlery, Plate, Clothing, &c., specially compiled to meet the requirements of all grades of the services.
18. Colonial Department. A comprehensive volume (944 pages). Thousands of illustrations and prices of Goods in every Department. The finest work of reference published for Foreign and Colonial Trade. Special Cash Discount for Shipping Orders.
19. Harness and Vehicles of every description.

An Agency for my Firm is a very remunerative way of using spare time to advantage. Write for particulars.

J. G. Graves 69 DIVISION STREET, SHEFFIELD.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 773.] Week Ending October 24th, 1903. [One Penny.

Fascinating New Series. Start To-day.

THE PURSUIT OF SARA

For New Readers.

Miss Sara Gillespie, who is the relater of these experiences, found employment as a typine in the firm of Messrs. Templeton and Co., General Agents. The partners in the firm were Mr. Templeton, Mr. Harrington Shackell, and Mr. Rigby Starr. They treated Sara most courteously, especially the senior partner, who, before very long, induced her to tell him all about her absent lover, Noel Masterman. The latter was by profession a doctor, but as he lacked the capital to start a practice in England, he had accepted the post of medical attendant to an old school friend, who was travelling on the Continent for the benefit of his health, and was at present in Nice. Noel had been brought up by his uncle, Sir Francis Masterman, and had excellent prospects, but he incurred the displeasure of the Baronet when he fell in love with Miss Gillespie, and Sir Francis refused to have anything more to do with him. Mr. Templeton assured Sara that he thought Noel had been very hardly treated, and suggested that the best thing for him to do would be to return; and he would see whether he could not obtain a practice for him.

Then one day Noel entered the office unexpectedly, and told his love he had had a wire from his cousin Herbert, saying that Sir Francis was not expected to live long. He had hastened from Nice in order to get his uncle's forgiveness before his death. Sara and he then drove straight to the Baronet's house, only to find that he had already passed away, and that Herbert was now holder of the title. In his will Noel's uncle had bequeathed him a thousand pounds, and with this he intended to buy a practice to which Mr. Templeton had recommended him. One evening Noel and Sara paid a visit to Sir Herbert, and learnt from him that he had insured his life in favour of Templeton and Co. for fifteen thousand pounds. Just as they were leaving Sir Herbert's valet entered, and, with a cry of amazement, Sara asserted that he was Harrington Shackell, one of her employers.

The two men ridiculed the idea, and assured her that the likeness could be but a chance one; they explained that Shackell had a moustache, whereas the valet was clean shaven.

All rights reserved.]

With this explanation Miss Gillespie had to remain content. The following day Noel received a telegram summoning him back to Nice, and in order that he should be able to buy the practice in question, he gave the thousand pounds to Mr. Templeton, and signed a document authorising the firm to deal for him. By a piece of trickery, the senior partner converted this document into one authorising the firm to deal with his whole estate.

In the afternoon Sara overheard Templeton and Rigby Starr talking, and their words aroused her suspicions. She understands that Noel is heir to the Baronetcy, in the event of Sir Herbert having no children, and realises that, should Sir Herbert die, the firm has sole control of her lover's estate.

Just then Harrington Shackell entered, and she was shocked to hear him announce that Sir Herbert Masterman was dead—murdered by him, his valet! So, after all, her suspicion had been only too well grounded! Then, little by little, she heard the diabolical plot against her lover unfolded, and also the hint that she herself was in danger, as she was the only one the murderers had to fear, and they intended that they should run no risks whatever.

Then she resolved on a bold scheme—to get possession of the notes and the document.

She crouched back behind the door.

The three plotters were all too engrossed in their schemes to notice her, so she crept carefully and slowly out of her hiding place, and across the room.

Gradually she came within reach of the precious papers.

She dared not hesitate.

Blindly she snatched the notes, clutched the document.

Then, when too late, the men espied her. With a shriek she rushed across the room, turning over chairs and tables in her flight. One of the villains threw a stick at her, and struck her.

In the nick of time she reaches the door and slams it in the face of her pursuers, locking it on the outside.

Then she fled. Down the long corridor she tore, and into the street.

You will read of what befell her at Bedford in the following pages.

Week by week Miss Gillespie will continue her narrative.

Digitized by Google

THIS WEEK'S EPISODE.

In Peril at Bedford.

I HAVE no clear recollection of leaving the building in which the offices of Templeton & Co. were situated. I was so shaken by the suspense, the terror, of the last half hour, that I was able to obey one instinct only—that of flight. A hurried rush down crowded streets, jostled by the throng that filled the pavements pushed now to one side, now to another, I found myself at length at the Bank of England, one of a stream of pedestrians waiting for a 'bus.

As yet I had formed no plans of what to do, where to go, to avoid pursuit. My mind was concentrated on the packet of bank notes clutched firmly in my hand, together with the paper which gave Templeton the power to use my lover's fortune as he pleased. One thing was certain. I dared not return to my lodgings. That would be the first place likely to be searched and the last in which I must be found. I must seek out a spot remote from London, with people of whom I had not spoken at the office.

At this moment an omnibus for The Angel, Islington, drew up. My lodgings were in Brixton, it would, therefore, be quite safe to journey in the opposite direction, to the north of London. I scrambled to the top and secured a seat close to the driver. Then, but not till then, I found some measure of quiet and self-control. Rapidly I ran over a list of acquaintances likely to help me. I must secure a hiding-place where I could remain in safety until Noel should return to England. I racked my brain in vain for some long time until there flashed across my mind the recollection of a girl whom I had known at school. She was my senior by some years, and had secured an appointment as a teacher in the High School at Bedford. Her name was Ellen Hartley. As I remembered her she was a person of decided character and with plenty of commonsense. She would appreciate the difficulties of my position and assist me to remain in hiding till Noel returned.

I decided to start for Bedford that same night. To that end I changed my omnibus at The Angel for one going in the direction of St. Pancras Station. It was just on eight o'clock when I reached the Midland Terminus. The next train to Bedford did not start till 8.40. I had over half an hour to wait. Rapidly glancing round to see if I were followed, I made my way to the station telegraph office, and sent a wire to Noel at his hotel at Nice to this effect: "Imperative you return to England at once—most urgent. Reply to Bedford Post Office.—SARA."

This done I went to the refreshment room and forced myself to eat some excessively dry sandwiches for support upon my journey. I waited there until the last moment, hurrying through the barrier just as the train was going to start. A last look up the platform as we steamed out of the station revealed a tall figure running towards the gate waving a frantic appeal after the retreating train. For an awful moment I thought that it was Shackleton, and fell back into my seat sick with fear. If they should stop the train! I saw myself hauled out of the carriage, conveyed to the nearest police station charged with theft! I clutched the bank notes tightly and crouched back into my corner. Thank Heaven we were off. The platform out of sight, London fast receding, Templeton & Co.—behind.

The carriage was empty for nearly the whole way. At Luton, however, an old man and his daughter got in. They addressed some casual would-be friendly remarks to me, but I was too nervous to respond, and murmured some incoherent reply that must have conveyed the impression I was mentally deficient. There were no further stoppages until we arrived at Bedford. The train was late, it was past ten by the time we reached our destination.

I was worn out with stress of emotion, and felt terribly cold and wretched as I stumbled on to the platform. It was too late to attempt to find Ellen Hartley that night; I must defer my search for her until the next morning. Meanwhile I must obtain a lodging for the night. I was afraid to ask the porters if they could tell me of a hotel, for I wished to leave no clue by which I could be traced. I left the station and wandered through the ill-lit streets round about until I found myself in the Midland Road. The County Theatre, brightly illuminated, revealed the burly form of a policeman.

Taking heart of grace, I asked for the principal thoroughfare of the town.

"Keep straight on, and you'll come to the High Street," was the reply, so to the High Street I turned my steps.

It is a picturesque thoroughfare leading to the river at one end and a fine avenue of trees the other, but I had no opportunity of admiring its beauties that night. The shops for the most part were closed, but a confectioner, of the name of Norman, still showed a glimmer of gas in the window. I ventured inside the door.

"Could you recommend me a nice quiet hotel?" I faltered, and seemed to feel the girl's sharp eyes go through me.

"There's The Swan," she began, "but," she paused, her glance took in my pale face and drooping figure, noted my absence of luggage, and grew suspicious.

"Thanks very much," I murmured, and bolted back into the street. I found The Swan without much difficulty. A tall square building fronting the High Street, its side windows looked on the embankment of the river Ouse. The hall looked bright and cheery through the swing doors and spoke of comfort within. It was a large place and I felt doubtful as to the wisdom of staying there. And yet, what else could I do? Past ten o'clock in a strange town, beset by fears, tired in body and in mind, I felt I must at all costs secure a good night's rest.

I made my way down the long hall to the office. A pleasant-looking woman attended to my request for a room, and anticipating her inquiry for my luggage, I boldly stated that my bag had been left behind!

"The porter forgot to put it in the carriage," I said without blushing. "It will be sent after me to-morrow."

No further demur was made, and having registered my name as "Brown," the chambermaid led the way up several flights of stairs and along a corridor to room No. 29. I ordered some supper, and, drawing a comfortable chair before the open window, gazed out into the night.

There was a bright moon, and in the soft light the river, which the room overlooked, shone like silver. The tiny waves lapped the shore with a swish-swish infinitely soothing. The trees rustled gently in the wind; over the water, across the straggling branches was borne the echo of the church clock chiming some sweet, old-fashioned melody to mark the hour. It was "The Blue Bells of Scotland," and the refrain brought an ache to my heart, called up an unutterable longing for my boy. "It was oh in my heart that I wished him safe at home"!

Bedford Post Office, at which the reply to Sara's telegram was called for by one of her pursuers.

Digitized by Google

I ate the cold beef brought for my refreshment, and then having locked the door and bolted the window, took the packet of bank notes from my dress, and sat down to consider what was best to do with them—and the all-important paper Noel had signed.

I had of my own money some five pounds in my purse, ample, as I then thought, to keep me until Noel came back. If I had known all that was to happen—the weary time that I should have to wait, the risk that I should have to run—before he came, I doubt if I should have had the courage to fight on. As it was I comforted myself with the belief that at most I should not have to wait longer than two days—perhaps a week, no more. And then a step down the corridor sent the blood rushing from my heart, and brought me shuddering to the door. Had they found me, was it the police come to arrest me as a thief, a thief who had stolen notes to the value of £1,000?

The steps passed on. I drew a sigh of relief, and once more bent my mind to the task in hand. It was folly to carry the notes about with me. If I were captured by one of the firm the prize would be ready to their hand. And yet, where could I deposit such an amount in safety? I dare not open a banking account, in all probability the numbers of the missing notes would be circulated throughout the country by the next day. I, and I alone could guard them. I decided to cut the notes in halves, keep ten halves myself, and deposit the remaining ten next morning in the cloak-room of the railway station. By this means if the enemy secured me they would still be at a loss for the money. The paper which Noel had signed—the power of attorney as Templeton had called it—was a different matter.

For a moment I considered the advisability of tearing it up. Without the paper, the firm would do nothing injurious to Noel, but then I remembered the document was the sole proof of my innocence. Without it I should stand condemned as a thief, who had stolen the notes in a most audacious manner. The possession of the paper justified my action and my flight. At all costs I must keep it. I slept with the previous document under my pillow and next morning stitched it in the bodice of my dress. Come what would it should not be taken from me while I lived.

I fell asleep towards the morning, and woke to find the sunshine streaming across my face. It was an exquisite day, and, when after a comfortable breakfast I went out into the town, I felt, despite the forebodings of the previous night, despite the fears that even now assailed me, that in the end all would come right. The High Street looked its best that bright September morning. The shops with their air of quiet prosperity, the old-world atmosphere, that clings like a perfume to the quaint town—which even the electric light cannot bring up to date—combined to raise my spirits.

I found my way to the station and deposited the little packet of notes, or rather half notes, at the cloak-room, and gave the man implicit instructions not to deliver it to anyone but myself even if they produced the necessary ticket. From the station I retraced my steps to a shop in Silver Street that combined a sale of chemicals with that of bags and fancy goods.

I purchased a small portmanteau, and crossing the road, completed my shopping at "Dust's" in High Street, and had the bag and its contents sent to my hotel.

By this time it was close on ten o'clock. It would be too early, I decided, to go to the post-office and inquire for Noel's telegram. It was better not to call there until I felt certain the wire had arrived. If Templeton and Co. had traced me to Bedford, the post-office would be one of the first places at which they would inquire. Unfortunately my red hair would make my identification an easy matter. If I had only known my over-caution was to prove my ruin. With the trick in my hands I gave the game away!

It came upon me as a shock when I arrived at the High School to find it closed. I had forgotten it was the vacation, though unconsciously I had noted the absence of the troops of the bright-faced boys and girls which Ellen had declared were always to be seen about the town. The playground was deserted, the big iron gates locked; silence reigned supreme.

Bunyan's Statue, Bedford, where Sara first saw the nurse who deceived her.

As I turned to leave, the name and address of the caretaker caught my attention:

GEORGE FRYATT,
Rosslyn,
Hartingdon Street.

As an official of the establishment he would doubtless know the address of the teachers, and he could tell me where Ellen would be found. With some difficulty I found Hartingdon Street, and after a long search among two-storeyed dwellings of small size but pretentious names, unearthed Rosslyn. Mr. Fryatt was a broad-shouldered, easy-tempered person, with a heavy moustache, not nearly so high and mighty as the name of his habitation. He could give me no information, moreover, as to Ellen's whereabouts. Miss Hartley was no longer at the High School, and so far as he knew, not in Bedford. The news came upon me as a thunderclap; dazed and despairing, I turned towards the High Street once again. I glanced at the shops, butcher, baker, grocer—surely some of them must know the name of Hartley. Ellen had lived some time in Bedford, with her mother, the widow of an officer. It was impossible all trace of her could be lost. Nevertheless, I pursued my questions in vain, and cross-examined stationers, boot-makers, and milliners, to no purpose, until with a flash of inspiration I entered the stores at the corner of Dame Alice Street, rejoicing in the name of Dudeney and Johnston.

"They had served Miss Hartley and her mother for some time, in fact up to the end of June. Their house was at the top of De Pary's Avenue, on the left-hand side going to the park. One of the prettiest houses in the row, with carefully kept flower-garden, impossible to mistake it."

Thanking the assistant for his information I hastened to follow his direction. As I came out of the stores, the sun, shining on the Avenue, lit up the statue of John Bunyan with a sudden radiance. Preoccupied as I was, the beauty of the figure against its background of leafy trees came home to me. With face upturned to the sky the great Pilgrim stood, "pleading with men," urging with eyes and hand.

I wondered as I gazed if Bunyan had ever felt so much afraid and perplexed as I. The powers and principalities of Darkness arrayed against me could never have seemed so terrible to him. And yet he had been to gaol, here in this town. And at the thought and all that it suggested, I shivered, despite the sunshine.

Others beside me seemed attracted by the statue that morning. A young fair-haired woman, dressed as a hospital nurse, was reading the inscription on the pedestal. At her side stood a slim, dark fellow with a good-looking, eager face.

Digitized by Google

I fancied they were lovers, and remembered Noel, with a thrill of envy. The next minute the pretty smiling face had darkened, something her companion said seemed to distress her, she flushed, then put her handkerchief to her eyes, and moved into the shadow.

Poor girl! I thought, and took an instinctive dislike to the young man for vexing her. Later I changed my opinion.

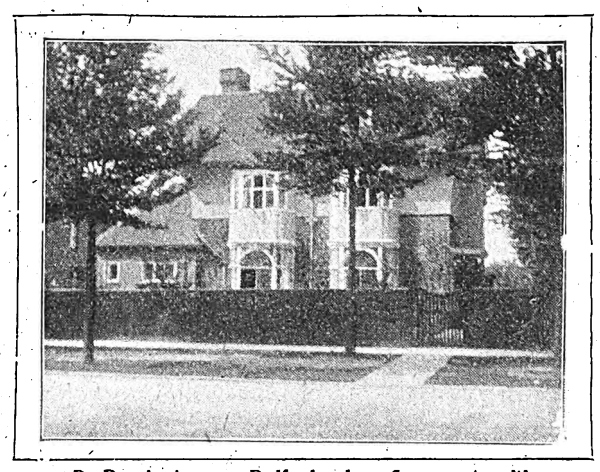
My mind was full of Noel as I walked up the Avenue, and I seemed to reach the house, described to me as Ellen's, very quickly. The garden was bright with flowers, the windows daintily curtained. It was a pleasant place, and my pulse quickened at the thought that I might find in it a haven.

Up the broad, gravelled path to a prettily-porched door where a maid-servant answered my summons.

"Miss Hartley? She left here some months ago. I couldn't tell you her address at all, I did hear she'd gone abroad."

That and that alone was all the information she could give me! The friend on whom I had relied for help was gone. The refuge I had hoped to gain was lost. I loathed the sunshine; as I walked down the garden path the roses were hateful to me, the brightness of the morning hurt me.

For the first time I realised how hopeless was the struggle on which I had embarked. How could I, a young, inexperienced girl, hope to defeat three of the boldest and most unscrupulous criminals of the day? If only Noel would wire to me—I glanced wistfully down the Avenue towards the post-office. No, it was still too early to inquire for the telegram. It was not yet half-past ten, he would only just have arrived in Nice. I must wait a little longer.



De Pary's Avenue, Bedford, where Sara meets with a bitter disappointment.

From the Avenue I found my way into the Park. The gates stood invitingly open, I caught a glimpse of cool, green trees, and longing for a place in which to sit and rest I crossed the Park and walked over the grass, to where, against a leafy clump of crab-apple a seat was placed invitingly. The shouts of the boys and girls sounded in the distance, the cries of the children at play faded to a pleasant hum. I leant back and closed my eyes, and for a little while I must have slept.

When I awoke, someone was sitting beside me. It was the nurse whom I had seen by Bunyan's statue. She was even prettier than I had thought, with dainty pink and white complexion, and soft, fair hair, parted on a low broad brow. She was no longer crying, but there was a wistful look on her face, and the sensitive lips quivered.

"Is anything the matter?" I asked impulsively. "I mean, can I do anything to help you? You must forgive my asking, but——"

"It's very good of you to care," she answered in a husky sort of voice, "and I'm grateful to you for speaking. You see"—she turned towards me with a sudden appeal—"it's dreadful to be all alone when one's in trouble. I don't know a soul in this place. There's not a person here to care whether I live or die. I'm nursing a cross-grained old woman, who grudges me a moment away from her bedside. And, and"—here the handkerchief came into requisition and the pretty face was distorted with sobs. "I've had dreadful news," she, gasped, "my sweetheart's ill, and I can't go to him. My brother told me this morning. He came over from Elstow to let me know."

"Where is your sweetheart?" I asked, full of sympathy.

"In London, he's down with diphtheria. The people he's living with wired to my brother who came to tell me. You see, I'm so poor I daren't throw up my nursing engagement, and Dick is as badly off as I am."

It seemed a sorry story, and such comfort as I could give unavailing. However, I recounted all the instances I could recall of people who had recovered from the complaint, and my stories seemed to have a reviving effect. She talked more brightly, her cheeks grew pink, her eyes sparkled, and once or twice she laughed in a quick, excited sort of fashion, that struck me as peculiar.

"It's done me good to see you," she said at last, "I feel ever so much more hopeful about Dick. You don't look very well yourself, dear, are you in pain? I notice you keep pressing your hand to your heart."

I flushed crimson and wished my new-found friend had not been so observant. The notes were concealed in my bodice and in nervous apprehension at their loss my hand stole now and again to my side to reassure myself of their safety.

"It's nothing much, thank you," I answered, and rose to take my departure.

"Sha'n't I see you again, dear?" she asked. "I'm off duty this evening; I wish you'd meet me and go for a walk. It's beautiful by the river. I'll be at the Suspension Bridge some time between eight and nine. I shall hope to see you. Anyway," she pressed my hand warmly, "I sha'n't forget your kindness. Good-bye."

I left her on the seat, her slim figure outlined against the green of the crab-apple trees behind. The echo of her laugh came after me; mocking, scornful, it reminded me of somebody, though whom I could not think. It gave me a creepy sensation to hear her. There was something—unpleasant, almost evil in the sound. And yet who could associate evil with so pretty a creature? She was so simple, so innocent. She had not asked my name nor displayed any curiosity concerning me; only that one question, why did I press my hand to my heart? And that was surely explained by the fact of her profession.

From the park I went to the post-office.

I arrived in Dame Alice Street flushed and out of breath. Trembling with agitation I could hardly control my voice as I put the all important question:

"Is there a telegram addressed to 'Gillespie'?"

The clerk, a short, clean-shaven man with a sharp face and peering eyes glanced at me suspiciously.

"Who are you?" he asked abruptly.

"My name is Gillespie—Sara Gillespie," I answered.

"Have you any proof of that?"

"Proof?" I gazed at him, it was so foolish, so ridiculous a thing to be asked for a proof that I was—myself.

"Come," he said brusquely, "I've no time to waste. Have you any letters or documents to show you are the person you state yourself to be?"

The blood rushed to my cheeks.

"I only came here last night," I stammered, "but—but—I can tell you from whom the telegram is coming. It is from Nice, from a gentleman named Noel Masterman. It is of the utmost importance. It is life and death. I swear that I am Sara Gillespie. For Heaven's sake give me the telegram." And I stretched out my hand imploringly.

At the very moment when I had uttered my name, a woman standing at my side uttered an exclamation. I turned and recognised her as the manageress of The Swan.

Digitized by Google

"I thought you said your name was Brown," she said coldly. "You registered it as Brown, at all events."

"I thought as much," said the clerk. "Look here," he leant across the counter, bringing his face level with my own, "I don't want to get you into trouble, but unless you are careful, I sha'n't be able to avoid it. The telegram you speak of was given to a young lady some half hour ago. She told me that another person was likely to call and claim it, and that I was to be careful not to give that person any information. To be plain, she said you were an impostor, and——" He glanced at the woman next to me, "it's pretty clear you are. The lady gave proof she was the rightful owner of the telegram, that she was the Gillespie referred to in the address. Now," he motioned towards the door, "you'd better go before you make matters any worse. Make haste, Miss—Brown," and he laughed derisively.

For a moment the full significance of what he said did not come home to me. I stared at him stupidly, blankly. Then, as the hideousness of what had happened became clear, I broke into pleading, protestations, threats. I clambered wildly for my rights, sobbed out Heaven knows what prayers, what revilings, until, worn out with emotion and realising at last the futility of all requests, I left the office and wandered weeping and half distraught about the town.

How they stared at me, the people in the High Street! Elderly gentlemen with the unmistakable air of Army officers surveyed me sternly, pretty young girls, gazing in the fascinating hat and bonnet shops, regarded me askance. I did not heed them, I paid no regard to looks and comments, but hurried on, my brain surging with hate, my blood on fire for revenge.

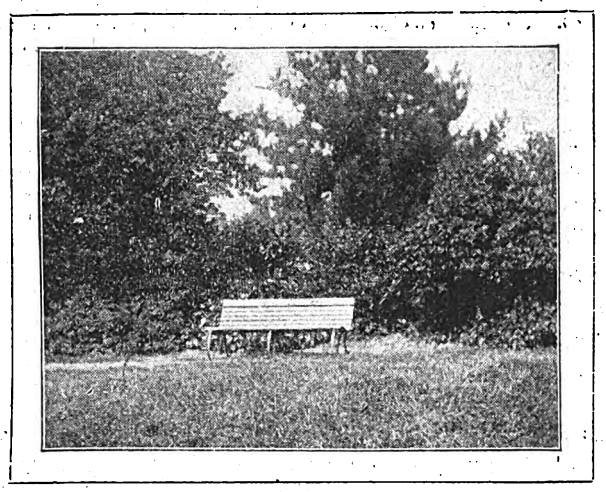
What could I do, what was there left for me to do? Templeton & Co. had outwitted me.

I lost a precious hour before reason suggested the only possible method of repairing a mistake The firm had obtained possession of Noel's wire and had doubtless replied to it. There was a bare chance that by sending another telegram I might counteract the effect of the bogus one already dispatched. Buoyed up with fresh hope, I hastened to the Midland Station, and dispatched a message to my lover from the railway office. I urged him to take no notice of any other wires he might receive, but to come back at once. The address I furnished this time was that of a stationer in the Midland Road, named Sawyer. I had already interviewed him and obtained his promise to receive all communications addressed to "Sara" at the cost of a penny each.

This done I felt a little calmer, and by the time I had been for a long tramp, my nerves were once more under control. I felt weak and hungry, and remembering a certain Oriental café I had noticed by the post office, I made for Dame Alice Street, and passed through its hospitable portals.

A large pleasant room with Japanese screens and curtains which formed convenient alcoves for small tea parties of three and four, the place was crammed with people. The food was dainty, and the waitress, a pretty, dark-haired damsel with bright eyes and shining teeth, soft footed, and tactful. She moved my table into a quiet corner, and asked me nicely if I were tired. Just a few words, but in my soreness of heart and bitterness of spirit, they comforted me. I shall always think of the dark-haired waitress at the Oriental café with kindness.

High Street, Bedford. The Swan Hotel, where Sara stayed, is on the right.



The seat in the park where Sara slept, worn out with fatigue and worry.

Tea over, I hastened back to Sawyers, and inquired if my anxiously expected wire had come.

"Not yet," was the answer, and the same reply greeted my further application an hour later.

Tired to death I felt unable longer to keep up. My limbs would not support me, I felt that if I did not rest I should utterly collapse. With the courage of despair I went back to The Swan, though after the scene at the post office, I half-feared they would demur. Nothing was said, however, and I went up to my room and flung myself on the bed, craving for rest.

Here at least I was safe, the door was locked, the key in my hand. Templeton and Co. could not break in upon me. The next time I went down the street, one of the firm might capture me, but for the present I was secure. And yet the apprehension that even now one of them might be watching The Swan on my account prevented me from rest. The feeling was so strong upon me that I started to my feet, and, opening the window, looked down on the embankment.

The river lay cool and pleasant in the fading light of the afternoon. There were a few loiterers upon the landing-stage watching the boats come in, and a trap drawn by a powerful-looking grey was drawn up just opposite my window. The driver bending down was speaking to someone in the street. Then a stout man in a black suit clambered into the vehicle. There was something familiar about the cut of his frock coat, and I caught a gleam of shirt front that sent my heart into my throat.

The next moment fear became certainty. The man turned in his seat and glanced towards the window—glanced at me! And in that glance I recognised the senior partner, Richard Templeton. I drew back from the window and half fainting fell on my knees upon the floor.

He had seen me, I felt sure of that. Was he going to take me now, send for the police at once to arrest me? Or would he wait awhile? Sooner or later he would put out his smooth, white hand and clutch me in its cruel grasp. When? That was the question. How long before—before? My lips moved convulsively.

"He shall not take me!" I murmured, "he shall not take me."

Digitized by Google

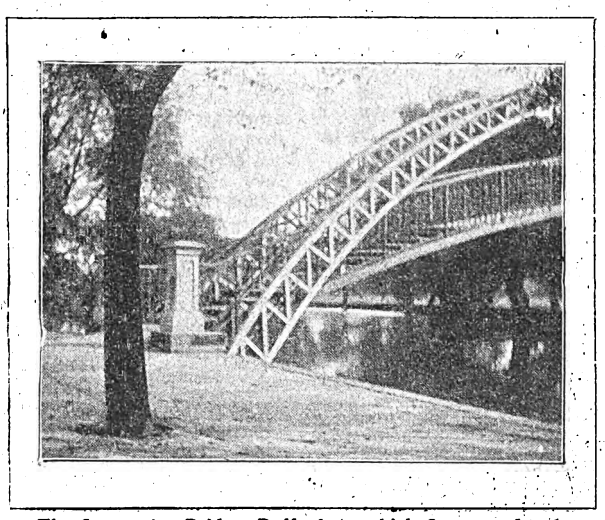
I rose to my feet and gazed from the window. Had Templeton been there, God knows what rash and awful thing I might have done. I was mad at the moment, and with terror and suspense. But I searched the river front in vain for his portly figure. He had gone—for the moment I was saved.

But only for the moment. He might return at any instant and find me in The Swan. The instinct of flight was strong upon me. I would leave Bedford, and take refuge in one of the big Midland cities. I would go now, at once. Even as I reached the door I remembered that I dare not go until I had an answer to my telegram. I must know where Noel was, what he meant to do. It was time now to call again at the shop in the Midland Road and ask for the wire. I glanced up and down the corridor, craned my head over the broad staircase. The sound of voices, the jingle of plates and glasses, rose from the hall. It was the dinner hour. At that moment perhaps my enemies were in the dining-room waiting for me.

I cautiously descended the stairs, pausing in the middle of the flight. A tall, broad-shouldered figure standing with his back towards me at the bar, filled me with fresh fear. It was Templeton himself!

For a moment I stood irresolute. If he turned and saw me—the game was up. If I retraced my steps and sought again the refuge of my room, it did but delay the evil hour. Some time or other I must leave my shelter, and fall into his hands. My brain worked quickly. I saw and seized the one chance of escape.

With a quick drawn breath, I sped lightly down the few remaining stairs, and slowly, cautiously walked down the long hall to the swing doors which led to liberty. I did not hurry, the least sign of haste I felt would betray me. The lights of the town twinkled in the distance. It seemed as though I never should reach those two glass doors. The last few steps my courage failed. I ran the short distance yet remaining, ran from the place, and never stopped until I reached the Midland Road.



The Suspension Bridge, Bedford, to which Sara was lured.

"No wire?" I asked, my voice trembling with agitation. "Are you sure, please look again, you may have made a mistake? It is so—so terribly important."

"There's no telegram or letter either," said the man, "perhaps it will come later."

Perhaps! If not, what was there left for me to do? I had escaped Templeton once, but I might never have such luck again. My only hope of avoiding capture at his hands was to leave Bedford then and there, and yet by doing this, I cut off all communication with Noel. I could not leave until I had heard from him. If I could find a safe place in which to hide, I would run the risk of remaining for a little while at least. Yet where could I find a refuge? In this strange town I was helpless, not a creature would stretch out a hand to my assistance.

Unless it was the nurse I'd met that morning. I recalled her pretty face and gentle manner. She had thanked me for my sympathy, perhaps if I told her something of my troubles she would try to help me, give me a hiding-place for to-night at least. It was a slender chance, but I was desperate and ready to pluck at straws.

It wanted but a few minutes to eight when I reached the Suspension Bridge. The embankment was deserted, the river lay cold and grey under a sullen sky, across the water came the rushing of the weir. It was a lonely spot, at that hour, on a dull night like this not a soul was to be seen. The promenade, with its leafy trees, thronged with pleasure-seekers on a summer evening, was desolate and still. The lights from the houses standing back from the road were the only sign of human presence. And the houses seemed very far away. I crossed the bridge, and, standing in the middle, on the apex of the arch, searched either shore for a sign of the fair-haired nurse.

The water rushed over the weir, the wind sighed among the branches. I shivered, and as St. Paul's chimed the half-hour, and still she had not come, the greyness of the river crept into my soul.

Fearful of turning back, afraid to go on, I leant against the column at the foot of the bridge and waited in the silence of the night.

It might have been half an hour later when I heard a soft footfall across the path. A low, curious laugh sounded close beside me, a hand was laid on my arm.

"You dear thing," said a voice—the nurse's voice, "have you waited for me all this time, how good of you!"

She looked very fresh, altogether charming in her neat costume of brown, and the slight feeling of uneasiness that had inspired me that morning vanished as her big blue eyes met mine.

"You are tired and cold," she said caressingly, "and I believe you are in trouble. You comforted me this morning, it's my turn to play consoler now. You must tell me what's worrying you. Let's find a quiet spot where we can talk undisturbed."

It struck me that the place where we were standing was as quiet, not to say remote, as could be desired. But I yielded to the suggestion, and linking her arm in mine, the nurse and I turned in the direction of Newnham Bridge.

The silence grew denser, the darkness more profound. The rushing of the weir, which alone broke the stillness of the night, sounded ominous.

"Let us stay here," I said, pointing to a seat, "I don't care to go any farther. If I'm to tell you my troubles I'd better begin at once. Otherwise you may not have time to hear my tale."

"I haven't to go back for another hour," she answered, "let us go a little farther, dear, and we shall be quite undisturbed. Oh, I know it looks quiet enough here, but there are always a lot of loiterers on the embankment. I prefer to talk where I'm sure of not being overheard."

She laughed as she spoke, and the sound sent a shudder through me. I felt a sudden fear of this fair-haired, sweet-faced woman, and was half-inclined to return and run the risk of meeting Templeton. Even as the thought crossed my mind, she tightened her hold upon my arm and hurried me along the narrow path. The water here seemed very deep; the river, cold and clear beneath the sullen sky, must hold many a strange, dark secret in its keeping. Overhead the trees bent their boughs shivering in the night wind.

The nurse and I were quite alone!

By this time we had reached the end of the embankment and arrived at Newnham Bridge. Lonely and most romantic of spots, the scene of lovers' meetings, vows, farewells! Here, at this tree that overhangs the water, if legend is to be believed, long, long ago, a sister from a neighbouring convent kept a fatal tryst with a cavalier, who stole her heart away. There, so the story goes, the mother abbess traced them and, rather than brave the church's ban, the unhappy sister jumped into the river and found quiet in its cold depths.

Digitized by Google

Lonely it was, aye, very lonely. Strange whispers came from the trees, faint murmurs rose from the water.

"One moment, dear," said the nurse. "I've dropped my handkerchief. I must run back and find it."

I watched her down the path until she disappeared among the trees. Then, fascinated with the quiet of the place, the strangeness of the scene, I dropped upon the grass that grows right to the river's brink, and, leaning my head upon my hand, rested against the trunk of the wide-spreading tree that stands within a few yards of the bridge.

The rushing of the weir made music in the distance. Strange how the sound fascinated me. The water was deep, deep at my feet—how terrible a death to drown in that limpid stream.

I recalled with a shudder the tale that I had heard, how only a few days back, playing with his little girl in the recreation ground across the bridge, a man had tripped and fallen into the river. And so deep the water was, so treacherous its current, that he was borne away out of sight, out of the ken of those he loved. The band had been playing, the people had been laughing as he fell—and no one knew.

It was a terrible death to die. I shivered nervously, and watched anxiously for the figure of my new found friend.

The mist rising from the water enveloped me, I could not distinguish a yard before my hand. I scrambled to my feet and called.

"Where are you, nurse? Nurse, where are you?"

No answer, only a faint rustle in the bushes, no answer. Dear Heaven, what is it?

A hand at my throat, a grip of iron round my waist.

"Help! Help!" I shriek. But the shriek dies into a moan as the relentless fingers tighten. A rift in the clouds above casts a gleam of light upon the path.

"The nurse!" I gasp. "The nurse!" And then the truth breaks in upon me. With cloak streaming in the wind, bonnet thrown aside, I see the face, the figure of my assailant. Not the nurse, not the sweet-voiced, fair-faced woman, but Rigby Starr. Starr, the most cunning, the most unscrupulous of the partners.

I cannot call, my voice is strangled in my throat. Closer he grips and closer, urging me nearer to the water's edge.

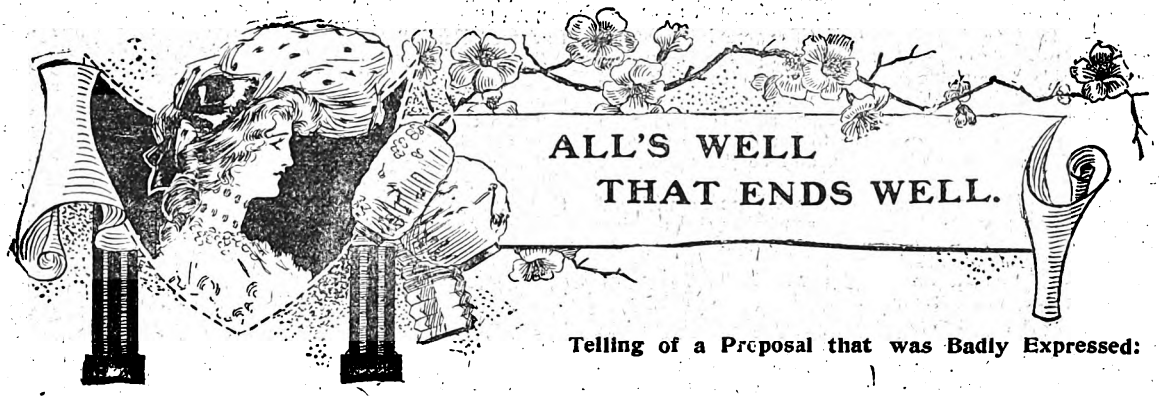
The river and the sky meet in a grey infinity; the swaying branches stretch into mocking fingers, pointing to my doom. I feel his hand upon my heart.

"The papers," he hisses, tearing at my bodice, "the papers—or——"

The ground slips from beneath my feet, the cruel waters hunger to lap my face. I strive with all the strength, the desperation of despair to keep him off, but I am helpless in his hands. Slowly but surely he forces me back. A wild desire for life, for love battles within me. I fight desperately, vainly against death.

The river closes over me, I am falling—drowning—lost!

(Another Episode next week.)



Telling of a Proposal that was Badly Expressed:

Roy Manville and Daphne Ellesmere sat together in Lady Cazenove's conservatory. The murmur of fountains was in the air, and each little spray rose from its white marble basin like a quivering column of mother-of-pearl, rose-tinted by the soft-shaded, ruby lamps that hung above. Tall, broad palms spread their cool, green leaves, gracefully drooping at the tips, from sap-scented stems that rose up out of the moist mould in which they were bedded. The scent of orchids was wafted between the leaves of fern and palm, and the singing of birds in an invisible aviary made music more harmonious than even the brilliant orchestra in the distant ball-room.

Beauty such as this—soft, subdued, harmonious—is perhaps the most subtle and ravishing of all. Giving wing to one's imagination, it might have been just such a spot as this where, in the first beginning of all things, Romance had been cradled and nurtured, and Love had breathed the first breath of her undying life. And Roy Manville sat side by side with Daphne Ellesmere and looked, not at the blended beauties with which he was environed, but covertly and disturbedly at the girl beside him. Thus is the witching loveliness of nature dominated by a woman's smile!

"Miss Ellesmere," he said, after a pause, "I have asked you to accompany me here in order to prefer a request that has long occupied my thoughts."

A soft, pink blush tinted the whiteness of Daphne Ellesmere's cheeks, and a light, veiled in an instant, shone in her blue eyes. But of these things, too, Roy Manville was unconscious.

"The truth is," he went on hurriedly, "I love you very dearly, and have been bold enough to hope that you will consent to become my wife. I am not a poor man." He remembered, with some misgivings, that young Lord Seagrave had paid her marked attention of late, and though but a courtesy title, the holder of it was well known to be immensely rich. This had been the rift in Roy's lute for a long while, and he hastened to expatiate on his own fortunes. Love is not always clear-sighted.

Digitized by Google

"I am not a poor man," he went on. "My income amounts to as much as two thousand a year, and I have other prospects upon which I may count with a tolerably good show of certainty. It is true, I have no title to bestow on you, but the lineage of my family is as unimpeachable as any that is represented to-night under Lady Cazenove's roof. Sir Cedric Manville fought side by side with William the Conqueror, and my ancestors have many times been chosen by their sovereigns for the bestowal of royal favours for services rendered both at court and in the field."

For an instant the light flashed again in Daphne's eyes. But it was not so soft and dreamy on this occasion. The flush, too, was this time more like the faintest indication of anger than of pleasure. But she made no reply, and Roy, regarding this as an unfavourable sign, went on as before.

"I know," he said, with slight embarrassment, "that there have been and still are many suitors for your hand, whose worldly position and prospects compare in many respects to mine with undeniable advantage. But if I admit this, I am at least conscious that, though in these respects you would be the loser, there are yet others where the advantages are upon my side."

Still Daphne Ellesmere maintained an uncompromising silence. There was now the very faintest indication of a curl at the corner of her ripe red lips. Was this Roy Manville, the very whisper of whose name had for more than a year sent a flush to her cheek and a sweet, shy longing into her young heart? Was this the love she had dreamt of as once to be hers—hoped for, in the secrecy of her own heart, as the glorious fulfilment of her life? Her spirit rose in revolt at this mercenary proposal, in which love but played the part of an auctioneer's hand-bell, calling the attention to bargains within. Even with herself, Daphne Ellesmere was honest, and she knew she had loved this man as she would love none other. But she had always believed he loved her. Even now a feeling that it was so lingered in her heart and would not be gainsaid. But if this were indeed true, why did he not say so honestly? Position, prospects, lineage, unimpeachable honour, comparison with other suitors—anything, everything but love! She was growing angry. But Roy suspected it not. Her silence seemed to indicate an under-current of hesitancy due to her doubts as to the indisputability of his qualifications, and he grew resentful at the thought.

Poor Roy! He loved this Daphne Ellesmere with all his honest young heart. She was his morning and evening star, the lodestone of his life, and the love he gave her was little short of absolute worship—the worship of a true man to a good, pure woman, whom he almost believes to partake of some higher gifts of spirituality not vouchsafed to other women. But he had long been troubled in mind. Life is full of strange and inexplicable contradictions. And here was one. His very humility made him boastful. He knew his own position was inferior to that of Lord Seagrave, whose admiration of Daphne Ellesmere could have but one termination. Comparatively speaking, he, Roy Manville, was a poor man beside this wealthy magnate. And the consciousness of this, accentuated by his innate humility, troubled him and made him doubtful of his own chances. And so he had crossed Lord Seagrave's Martini-Henri with his own little toy-pistol and tried to carry off the situation with advantage to himself. How much better would it have been had he gone unharmed!

"Miss Ellesmere," he said, his hands nervously pressed together on his knee, "this is a very serious matter with me. Will you honour me with your answer?"

This was a little better. But Daphne's spirit had been roused.

"I think," she said calmly, "that, under the circumstances, the proposal is one which, however it honours me, admits of but one answer. The position you have defined so accurately is one that holds no attraction for me. I am heartily glad to hear that your prospects are so promising. The other circumstances I knew before, and they are therefore no news to me. I think we had better drop the subject. Will you be so good as to escort me back to the ball-room?"

She rose as she spoke, and Roy, grinding his teeth in impotent anger and wretchedness, offered her his arm.

* * * * *

It was a week later. Roy Manville sat moodily in the easiest of easy-chairs in his well-lighted sitting-room, and thought long and bitterly of his defeat. The real cause of that defeat, and the way in which he had himself hastened it, never for one moment occurred to him. Yet he was not a fool, but a thorough-going, good-principled, and, in all other respects, clear-sighted, young man. He was handsome, too, with short, crisp, curly-brown hair, and earnest hazel eyes, that looked fearlessly out upon all mankind.

Why had he been so blind? In his ignorant conceit, he had imagined that Daphne Ellesmere loved him, and now—well, it was all over now, and the fool's paradise in which he lived had vanished like any other figment of the imagination. He was very miserable about it all. Life would have been so bright with Daphne as his wife. And now—well, she would marry Lord Seagrave, and he—he would look on and hide his sorrow from the eyes of the curious.

A footman entered, bearing a card. Roy knitted his brows as he read the name inscribed thereon.

"All right," he said. "Show Mr. Ellesmere in."

The man retreated, and, a moment later, the visitor entered the room. He was a fair, boyish-looking young man of some two-and-twenty summers. Normally the face was frank and open, but to-day an expression of nervousness and embarrassment made this less noticeable. Roy looked up as he came in.

"Well, Bert," he said, "what on earth brings you here? I thought you were still cramming at Oxford."

Bertie Ellesmere shook his head.

"I'm supposed to be," he said dolefully. "But the truth is, I'm in a dickens of a mess."

"Ah!" said Roy understandingly. "Same old game, I suppose, Bert?"

Bertie nodded.

"How much is it this time?" inquired Roy, after a short pause.

"Two thousand," was the astounding reply.

Roy started, and he looked gravely over at his visitor.

"You're surely joking!" he said.

"Wish I was," responded Bertie, with a sigh. "I thought the thing was a dead cert. this time."

"You generally do," Roy observed quietly.

"Yes, I know," replied Bertie shamefacedly. "But I got regular inside information this time. Even the jockey had his money on her."

"Merely a blind, my boy," interrupted Roy.

The "boy" ignored the remark.

"I put every fraction I could rake together on the brute," he went on hopelessly. "Borrowed a bit more to make it a bigger thing still, and the bounder came in a bad fifth."

Again there was a long pause. Presently Roy asked:

"What are you going to do about it, Bert?"

Bertie shifted uneasily in his chair.

"God knows!" he said irreverently. "The governor would kick me out of the house if I told him. He said he would last time. That way is quite impossible. The mater hasn't got a hundred pounds in cash all told just now, so she can't help me. There's only one way out of it that I can see."

"What's that?" Roy asked quietly.

"Slope," was the brief reply.

Roy shook his head.

"Not a man's trick," he said decisively. "Surely an Ellesmere is not afraid to face the music, particularly when it is he himself who is responsible for it?"

Bertie coloured.

"Don't be hard on a chap," he said humbly. "I know I've been a fool, and if only I get can clear of this mess, the remembrance of it will be a lasting lesson to me."

Roy was silent. His thoughts flew back to Daphne. How her heart would ache if she knew of her brother's disgrace. He knew how dearly she loved this brother of hers, how she had screened and excused him on former occasions, how rejoiced she had been of late at his apparent studiousness and freedom from debt. And now he was in a worse plight than ever. The ruin he had up to this time averted was now inevitable. Then another thought occurred to him and his heart hardened.

Digitized by Google

"From one or two things that have come under my notice during the past week," he said, a little nervously, "I am inclined to think your sister Daphne has come to some understanding with Lord Seagrave. If this be so, it is more than probable that gentleman would not hesitate to help you out of the present difficulty. Particularly," he added, "if the matter was laid before him by the person most likely to influence his decision."

Even as he uttered the words, Roy hated himself for the thought which had inspired them. Bertie looked at him in wonderment.

"I think you're making a mistake, old fellow," he said. "But as it seems to me I have over-estimated your fund of sympathy for one so badly placed as myself, I will not intrude further."

He rose as he spoke, but Roy motioned him to the chair he had left.

"I beg your pardon, Bert," he said. "It was beastly of me. But you don't know all. I don't know what I'm talking about sometimes."

Bertie looked quickly into Roy's face, and a gleam of understanding came into his eyes.

"Ah!" he murmured inwardly. "So it's as bad as all that! Well, I should never have thought Daphne would have refused him."

"Bertie," said Roy, looking earnestly into his face, "does your sister know of this?"

"Yes," replied Bertie.

Roy sighed. Poor girl! He wished he could have spared her that.

"Well," he said, "will you give me your word of honour as a gentleman that you will never repeat this performance? You are a man now, Bert, old fellow, and you must recognise that the many and bitter humiliations which you are compelled to endure as a result of this reckless spirit of gambling are draining your moral character of all its manhood and sense of honour. The sum is a large one, even for me, but if you will give me your sacred promise to avoid such pitfalls in the future, I will make you out a cheque for the amount."

A flush—half of gladness, half of bewilderment—came into Bertie Ellesmere's face. For a moment he was almost dumfounded.

"Roy," he said, "do you really mean it? Why, the most I hoped of you was that you might be able in some way to show me how I could raise the money." His face shadowed a little. "I say, Roy," he added doubtfully, "I don't know how long it may be before I can hope to cancel the debt."

He tenderly folded her in his arms, and she laid her head on his breast.

Roy smiled.

"That will not be necessary," he said. "If you are not too proud to accept it, you shall have it freely. Only, I must have your promise."

Bertie's lip quivered.

"Oh, Roy," he said, "you are too good! Of course I promise. On my word of honour, this shall be the last time I give way to the temptation to gamble. I shall always remember how near ruin and disgrace I have been, and the memory shall make me strong."

Roy grasped him by the hand and shook it.

"One thing more," he said, and looked straight into the other's eyes.

"What is it?" asked Bertie.

"Don't—tell—Daphne!"

For a moment there was silence in the room. Then Bertie nodded his head.

"She's a good girl," he said warmly. "I once thought—but that was a mistake, I suppose."

Roy Manville felt the warm blood mantling his cheeks, but he paid no heed to the other's words. Drawing out his cheque-book he filled in and signed a cheque for £2,000, and handed it across to Bertie Ellesmere.

"God keep you straight from now on!" he said earnestly. And, half an hour later, the two men separated.

* * * * *

Another week had slipped—or rather dragged—by, a week of alternate depression and short-lived resolve for Roy Manville. There seemed no help for it all. Daphne's cold refusal of his love was as bitter to the taste as upon the night when it was uttered. What to do next had been his chief thought since, and at last he had made up his mind. He would go abroad.

The sunlight streamed in through the open windows of his room, and trunks, portmanteaux, valises, gun-cases, and other indispensable accessories to travel were strewn about the floor. He made it a rule to superintend his own packing, and to-day the occupation afforded him partial forgetfulness. He was trying to forget. But the attempt was a failure, and he admitted it to himself, though he still went on trying.

There was a tap at the door, and Bertie Ellesmere burst in upon him.

"Hullo, Roy," he exclaimed in surprise. "What the—where the—— I say, old chap, what's the meaning of all this? Not going away, are you?"

Roy nodded.

"Yes," he said, a trifle embarrassed by the interruption. "London's too beastly cold and wet for my liking. I'm going abroad."

"Where to?" asked Bertie.

"Oh, I don't know," was the somewhat vague reply. "I sha'n't touch the overdone continental resorts. Think I'll do a bit of big game hunting in Africa and South America. Anything for a change, you know."

Bertie Ellesmere regarded him quizzically. He thought he comprehended the meaning of this unexpected, and, to his mind, rather irrational exodus.

Digitized by Google

"Rather sudden, isn't it?" he asked, as he took a seat and watched the proceedings.

"Well, yes—that is, no. I've had it in mind for some time. I say, Bert, how did you get on about the other affair?"

Bertie Ellesmere's face flushed.

"Ah!" he said earnestly. "You were just in time to save me, Roy. I can't tell you how grateful I am to you."

Roy stopped him.

"Oh, that's all right," he said. "Glad to hear it's all square. Now I am going to forget all about it. It must always remain a secret between us, Bert."

"I sha'n't tell many people about it, as you can well believe," responded Bertie grimly. "It's scarcely the sort of thing one would care to advertise."

Roy nodded.

"Just so," he said—"all the better for me."

For fully five minutes there was silence. Then Bertie said:

"I say, Roy, don't think me impertinent, but have you and my sister quarrelled of late?"

Roy bent his head over a portmanteau.

"Oh, no," he said thickly. "We are the best of friends. What made you think of such a thing?"

"Don't know," said Bertie laconically. "I wondered, that's all."

He sat still for a while, and then got up to go. There was a twinkle in his eye as he held out his hand to bid Roy good-bye.

"Well," he said, "I must be going. Good luck, old fellow. I hope your big game will be bigger than you anticipate."

Roy grasped his hand warmly.

"Thanks," he said cordially. "Good-bye, Bert. Oh, I say. Er—you needn't allude at home to the fact that I'm—er—going away. Not that it matters much, but I'd rather you didn't."

Bertie Ellesmere maintained a stolid composure and lack of comprehension that did him credit.

"All right," he said. And with a farewell nod, he took his departure.

"What the dickens made him turn up?" grumbled Roy to himself as he tugged viciously at the straps of a too-distended trunk. "I was forgetting all about them. Just my luck. Well, I shall be out of the way by midnight, and then——" He broke off abruptly and applied himself energetically to the task before him. For nearly two hours he packed and ordered and grumbled and praised, and then, the work ended, he dismissed his assistants and sat down on a chair to consider what was to be done next. He looked very handsome as he sat there, with the glow of healthy exertion on his expressive face. And yet there was an indescribable air of melancholy about him that, in the eyes of some, might have added to rather than have detracted from his unquestionable attractiveness.

A slight noise roused him from his reflections. Turning, he saw the figure of Bertie Ellesmere, with the handle of the door in his hand, holding it open for someone to enter. The lad's face was expressionless, and he paid little or no heed to the astonished man within. A lady stepped into the room, and Bertie prepared to retire.

"Beg pardon, old chap," he said shamelessly. "But really, you know, the thing was impossible. Ta-ta! See you later." And he closed the door behind him.

With an effort Roy recovered his self-possession and offered his visitor a chair. She accepted it, and, seating herself, looked round on the evidences of coming departure.

"You are going away," she said reproachfully. "You might have told us of your intention, Mr. Manville."

Roy was nonplussed.

"I did not think you would care," he said simply.

Daphne looked up at him in protest.

"Well," she said, "we will let that pass. You were going away, however, without giving us the opportunity to thank you for a deed of generosity which we can never repay."

Roy coloured. He inwardly anathematised Bertie for his garrulity.

"That is of small consequence," he said shamefacedly. "And I fancy Bert has a curious notion of gratitude, since he has already violated one of the conditions imposed upon him."

Daphne smiled. It was a very sweet smile, and Roy trembled to the finger-tips as he met it.

"It is a violation of which I approve," she said. "He told me the very day you gave him your help so unreservedly. Every day since then I have been expecting you to call. You used to visit us at one time, Mr. Manville."

Roy was growing desperate. It seemed the best thing to face the matter boldly.

"How could I?" he said warmly. "How could I lightly forget the way in which you met my addresses a fortnight ago? I knew then, and know now even more thoroughly, that I am unworthy of you. You showed me that truth all too plainly. How could our relations remain unaltered after an experience so humiliating?"

Daphne Ellesmere studied the pattern on the carpet.

"Are you quite sure you were not somewhat to blame?" she asked.

Roy looked down at her in puzzled surprise.

"I—to blame?" he repeated in bewilderment. "Miss Ellesmere—Daphne—was I to blame because, loving you with my whole heart, I dared to hope that the wish of my life might be realised?"

"Pardon me," replied Daphne, still with her eyes on the carpet, "but, if my memory serves me right, you scarcely mentioned such a thing as love in your catalogue of matrimonial inducements. I have a dim idea that your rather highly-varnished account of your present position, future prospects, and past lineage precluded any such sentimental admission on your part."

Roy stood quite still as he listened to the words. And then he saw it all—the mistake he had made—the too-important place he had given to worldly considerations, the too-trivial one to love. She wanted bread, and he had offered her a stone. And his jealousy of Lord Seagrave had done it all. Love was uppermost now, and he gave it the secondary place no longer.

"Daphne," he said tenderly, "is there any hope for me yet? I was a fool to speak thus to you. But I knew Lord Seagrave meant to ask you to be his wife, and I could think of nothing but the advantages he possessed over me. I was terribly afraid you would influence your choice by those advantages, and that made me expatiate on my own poor position. I forgot that, to a woman such as you, there is an inducement higher than all such as these—love. So I made my love subservient to my position. It was hard even to do this, for even as I enlarged on my prospects, my heart cried out for utterance. But I was afraid. Oh, Daphne, tell me, dear, is there one small chance for me even yet? I do love you, darling—love you with an intensity of devotion that swallows up every other thought. Say there is yet hope."

She held out both her hands to him, and he tenderly lifted her from the chair upon which she sat. Then he folded her in his arms and she laid her head upon his shoulder.

"Oh, why didn't you come?" she pouted. "I waited for you so impatiently."

"I was a fool," he said in self-condemnation. "But why did you come?" he asked her in return.

Daphne laughed.

"It was a case of Mahomet and the Mountain," she said archly.

At that instant Bertie Ellesmere put his head in at the door. He gave utterance to a prolonged whistle, and, in deference to what he beheld, closed the door once more.

Roy laughed, and said:

"That was the cheapest two thousand pounds' worth I ever had in my life. But the boy is a rascal nevertheless."

Walter J. Mowbray.

Digitized by Google

JUDGED IN HASTE.

Showing how Easily Troubles Pass Away.

"It is a shame, a burning shame," cried Kittie Wayne, as she looked up from the letter in her hand, and dashed away the indignant tears which had gathered thickly on her long, dark lashes.

"What is a shame?" asked a soft, languid voice, and a tall, handsome young man, with dark blue eyes and a fair moustache, came out from under the shade of the elm trees which bordered the road, and leant carelessly over the garden-gate near which Kittie stood.

"Oh, Leslie!" exclaimed Kittie, with a quick blush, and smiling through her tears. "I didn't know you were there! When did you come?"

"Just a moment ago," answered Leslie Earl, "and when I saw you coming down the walk, reading that letter, I concluded to wait here for you. I prefer to interview you here," with a wave of his hand that took in rose-bushes, elms, and circular beds of heliotrope and verbenas, "to stifling in that abominable, stuffy little parlour."

Kittie laughed, then grew sober instantly.

"Tell me what troubles you, Kittie?" said Leslie. "I have a right to know your every thought now."

"I am not so sure about that," said Kittie; "but of course I will tell you this, for it may affect our future very materially. I may not be able to marry you, after all, Leslie, for mother may need me to work for her."

"I will work for your mother if anything of the sort is necessary," said Leslie. "I certainly sha'n't give you up, no matter what happens. But I understood from you that your mother was comfortably situated on a farm somewhere."

"But she is to lose the farm," said Kittie. "I was wondering why I did not hear from her, for she usually writes me a letter twice a week, but I never imagined anything was wrong. And now, after waiting ten days, I get the worst kind of answer. My cousin Asa, with whom my mother and two sisters have had a home for twelve years, died a week ago, after an illness of only a few hours, and he has left the farm, live-stock, and all his money, to Ebenezer Cranch, the son of his only sister. Mother is to have only the furniture of the house. Isn't it a shame? How could he be so cruel! And what is mother to do?"

"One question at a time, please," said Leslie, "and give me some explanation. I don't exactly understand. Why should this Ebenezer Cranch—beautiful name, I must say—have the property? What was the nature of his claim on your cousin?"

"He had none at all save his relationship," said Kittie emphatically. "More than twenty years ago—before I was born—he lived with my cousin Asa at the farm for a time. But his father was a worthless, wretched creature, who would never stay long in one place, and he soon took his wife and boy away, and Asa never saw them afterwards. When father died, my cousin sent for mother, and gave us all a home. He was very old, and she gave him the most devoted care, and now he has left everything to that Ebenezer Cranch. Why, he didn't even know where he lived! He left directions with a lawyer to find him!"

"It is a shame," said Leslie slowly. "I don't blame you for feeling badly, Kittie. But perhaps it will all come out right in the end. Don't worry."

"How can it come right?" cried Kittie. "Oh, that hateful Ebenezer Cranch!"

"Now, that isn't just," said Leslie. "He isn't to blame for his uncle's whim, you know, and he may be a very good sort of fellow."

"I doubt it," said Kittie. "Probably a gawky, ugly, disagreeable fellow, who will make himself hated at Merrifield. And of course he won't have ambition or brains enough to manage the farm. It will all run to decay."

Leslie laughed

'Come, now, Kittie," he said; "let me make a prophecy. You'll throw me over and save the farm for your mother yet by marrying that very Ebenezer Cranch."

"I wouldn't have him if he was covered with diamonds," said Kittie. "And you know, Leslie, that I wouldn't give you up for any other man living."

"Dear love," said Leslie, kissing her, "I know how true you are. But still," with a teasing laugh, "I do feel a little shaky when I think of the fascinating Ebenezer."

"You may be sure I sha'n't sleep a wink to-night for thinking of him," said Kittie. "Of course he will turn mother out, and where is she to go?"

"Come in and sing to me," said Leslie, "and forget all about Ebenezer."

So arm-in-arm they walked up the tree-bordered path, and entered the house, where Kittie tried to coax some melody from the wheezy little piano which Mrs. Smith had bought in her girlhood.

Kittie was the teacher of the district school, of which the Rev. Mr. Smith was a trustee, and Leslie was a lawyer in the large town of Castlebury, two miles distant. He had an excellent practice, and was well able to support a wife; so when he fell in love with pretty Kittie Wayne, there were no difficulties in the way of an early marriage. The wedding had been fixed for the last week in June, for Kittie's school closed on the 15th, and she had intended to be married from her cousin's home in Merrifield. But now death had changed her plans very materially; and after Leslie had listened to all the ballads with which Kittie was familiar, he easily persuaded her to promise to be married quietly from the good clergyman's at the time appointed.

"It is unlucky to postpone a wedding," said he, as he argued the question, "and, of course, you can do a great deal more for your mother when you are my wife. Who knows we may outwit that Ebenezer Cranch yet."

"No such good luck," said Kittie. "There's no chance for a law case, is there?"

Of course Kittie waited very anxiously for her next letter from Merrifield, and when it came she read it with tears of thanksgiving, for Ebenezer Cranch's lawyers had written to say that Mrs. Wayne and her daughters need not move immediately from the farm, as possession would not be taken for several weeks.

Digitized by Google

"So, you see, the ugly Ebenezer is not as hateful as you imagined," said Leslie, when Kittie read him her mother's letter.

"He's only making a convenience of mother," said Kittie, who was too prejudiced to be just. "Of course, if he couldn't take the farm at once he didn't want it deserted."

"He's a bold, bad man," said Leslie. "There's no doubt of it. I suppose you wouldn't let even Hannah look on him favourably."

"Never!" said Kittie, tossing her curls. "Hannah is far too good for such a wretch."

"But she might keep the farm if——"

"Not at such a sacrifice," interrupted Kittie. "Please don't talk about the man, Leslie; you know how I hate him."

The day before her wedding Kittie received another letter from Merrifield. Mrs. Wayne sorrowed over her inability to be present on the great occasion, and wished her daughter every happiness. She concluded by saying that Ebenezer Cranch's lawyer had written to say that his client and wife would be at Merrifield a week or two later, but requesting that Mrs. Wayne would remain in the house until their arrival.

"Poor Hannah's last chance is gone," said Leslie, when Kittie told him what her mother had written. "She can't save the farm by marrying her foe, it seems, as he has a wife already."

"To think that any girl should have been willing to marry him!" said Kittie.

The wedding came off with due pomp and ceremony; for Mrs. Smith had insisted on giving a substantial breakfast to the guests, and the vicar had taken pains to invite every one for miles around. There was much feasting and merry-making, and Mr. and Mrs. Leslie Earl left Castlebury 'mid a shower of rice and old slippers. They were to take a honeymoon tour for a fortnight, and then return home by way of Merrifield, for Kittie was very anxious to see her mother and sisters.

"And if you desire it, Kittie," said Leslie, indulgently, "we will carry mother, Hannah and little Margie back with us to our own home."

"I don't see anything else to be done just at present," said Kittie; "but I don't like to burden you with the support of so many, Leslie. Oh, that hateful Ebenezer Cranch! If he had never existed, mother would have had the farm for her own."

* * * * *

It was a warm day in the middle of July when the newly-married couple reached Merrifield. Kittie had written to Hannah to meet them at the railway station and that worthy spinster, who was a dozen years older than the bride, was duly there with a horse and trap.

"Oh, Hannah, I am so glad to see you!" cried Kittie, as she rushed to embrace her sister.

"But didn't the Cranches come?" asked Hannah.

"The Cranches?" repeated Kittie wonderingly.

"Yes, they were to come to-day," said Hannah. "I received a letter from the lawyer last night."

"How unfortunate," said poor Kittie. "I hoped to escape them. I know I sha'n't be able to treat them with common civility."

"But they haven't come," said Hannah, as the train steamed away, leaving only an old man and a dog on the platform. "I suppose they changed their minds."

"I am glad they did," said Kittie, as she climbed into the trap. "I hope it may never be my lot to look upon the face of that hateful Ebenezer Cranch."

The farmhouse was soon reached, and the tears sprang to Kittie's eyes as she noted the beauty of the fertile field stretching away on either side of it, and the luxuriance of the shrubbery in the garden. For she thought how soon the place was to pass into the hands of strangers

A well-spread table, loaded with everything in the way of eating that the farm could afford, awaited the hungry travellers in the great cool kitchen, where the large windows were shaded by fragrant honeysuckle vines and the door screened from the sun by stately elms nearly a century old.

But Kittie's brow contracted as she saw that there were plates laid for seven.

"You see, we fully expected Ebenezer Cranch and his wife," said Mrs. Wayne.

"I am not anxious to see the woman who could marry Ebenezer Cranch," said Kittie. "The man and the name combined would be the death of any ordinary mortal."

When supper was over, Leslie went out into the garden to smoke a cigar, leaving his wife to talk to her mother and sister. And Kittie had plenty to talk about, for it had been almost a year since she had left home to take charge of the district school near Castlebury. She was in the midst of an account of her wedding when Leslie came suddenly in at the kitchen-door.

"The Cranches have come," he said abruptly.

"The Cranches!" repeated four feminine voices in different tones of surprise.

"Yes; come into the parlour and see them," said he.

"Are they in the parlour? Did you let them in?" asked Hannah. "I wonder how they happened to come at this time. I know there is no train after five o'clock, and it is nearly seven now."

"Oh, Leslie, what are they like?" asked Kittie.

"The wife is a very pretty little woman," answered Leslie. "But Ebenezer is a great, ugly, awkward, fellow," laughing.

"I knew it," cried Kittie. "I had an intuition that he would be like that. You know I always said so, Leslie."

"You'd better come into the parlour," said Leslie. "It isn't polite to leave them alone so long," and he led the way through the hall, followed by the four women.

"Where are they?" asked Kittie, as they entered the parlour; for the room was empty. "Oh, Leslie, how could you hoax us so!"

He slipped his arm round his wife's waist, and drew her before a large mirror which hung between the two front windows.

"That is Ebenezer Cranch's wife," he said, nodding toward Kittie's reflection. "Don't you think her a pretty little woman? Bow to her and tell her you're ashamed of having abused her so."

"Leslie, what on earth do you mean?" cried Kittie. "Have you gone crazy?"

"Not in the least," said Leslie. "Sit down and I will explain matters to your entire satisfaction, I trust."

When they were all seated about him, he said:

"My father's name was Stephen Earl, and I was named Ebenezer Leslie, after some revered ancestor, I suppose. When I was only a year old my mother married Samuel Cranch, and very naturally I was called by the name of my stepfather as I grew up. We lived for several years on this farm with my uncle, and then my step-father moved to Sussex. There he deserted my mother, who died a year later. I was old enough then to appreciate the wrongs she had suffered, and I promptly dropped the name of the man I had learnt to despise and hate, and took my own. I never had liked the name of Ebenezer, so I thought I might as well drop that too. So I began again as Leslie Earl, and have been called so ever since. It was a great surprise to me to hear that my uncle had left me his property, and a still greater surprise to learn that the young lady to whom I was engaged to be married was my uncle's second cousin. And when I heard her abuse poor Ebenezer Cranch so fiercely I determined to play a practical joke on her. Tell me, Kittie, do you think I succeeded? And how do you like the appearance of 'the hateful Ebenezer'?"

In spite of her chagrin at having been so completely hoaxed, Kittie felt that she could afford to be teased, for the termination of her troubles was as happy as thee lose of a fairy tale.

Florence Hallowell.

Digitized by Google

LOVED and ACQUITTED.

Telling How a Girl Saved Her Sweetheart.

"Oh, dry up, Oswald, for everybody's sake. You are for ever on that old subject of yours."

"Well, Frank, the danger was never greater that it is at the present day. Everywhere women are taking positions at small salaries to the detriment of men who have families to keep."

"Can't you find some fresh arguments, Oswald. Yours are getting a bit stale now."

Then Frank Becher made a frantic rush to escape the heavy, chastening hand of Oswald Gray, his future brother-in-law.

Oswald enjoyed the reputation of being a first-rate fellow, but a bit of a crank on the subject of women working in positions that men had once occupied. He was engaged to be married to Lilian Becher, to whom he was passionately attached.

The Becher family only consisted of three—Mrs. Becher, her daughter Lilian, aged twenty-one years, and her son Frank, aged nineteen. Mr. Becher had died many years before, and Mrs. Becher lived on the dividends which his invested wealth yielded.

When Frank Becher left school Oswald Gray had obtained for him a position in Messrs. Pole, Mannering & Co., where he himself was accountant.

Oswald and Lilian had been engaged nearly two years but they did not contemplate marriage until Frank was in a fair position so that Lilian would have no qualms in leaving her mother.

As Frank left the room somewhat hastily to avoid being assisted by Oswald, he almost ran into his sister who was entering the room. Oswald came forward to greet her.

"Why, Lilian," he said, "how pale you look, whatever is the matter?"

"I am afraid I shall upset you if I tell you, Oswald."

"But I would rather hear it, dear. Tell me."

Lilian's face became even more pale, but a determined look shone in her eyes as she said:

"I have accepted a berth as typine with Messrs. T. Austin & Co., the india-rubber merchants." She glanced up almost defiantly as she spoke. He saw the look, but did not put it down to nervousness, which would have been correct, but interpreted it as a defiance of his opinions.

"Why have you done this? You know how much I dislike it," he asked in an angry tone. It was the wrong attitude to adopt, and immediately she was on her mettle.

"My dear Oswald, I am surely at liberty to do as I please to some extent."

"Particularly if it is against my wishes, I suppose?" was his bitter retort.

"Oh, Oswald, how ridiculous you are!" she cried, stamping her foot in vexation.

"Very likely," he responded, now quite angry. "But you will either choose to do as I wish or our ways must part."

She started to her feet and confronted him with flashing eyes.

"Then I will choose," she cried, her anger at his unreasonableness quite carrying her away. She snatched off his ring, he took it, bowed slightly, and then the door slammed and he was gone.

The noise of the door seemed to wake up her senses. "Oswald, Oswald," she cried, and then covered her face in an agony of grief. Whilst he, in a blind rage, stalked on and on, regardless of direction.

So Oswald Gray and Lilian Becher parted, and pride kept them apart, whilst their hearts ached and they craved for one another.

At Pole, Mannering & Co's., Frank Becher treated his senior with silent contempt, for he felt that the quarrel was a family one. A sensible youth would have been the means of patching it up, but Frank apparently was not sensible.

As accountant to his firm, who were furniture manufacturers in a large way, Oswald had a great deal of money constantly passing through his hands, and his work was of a most responsible nature.

He dragged through the days after his quarrel with Lilian, wishing that each of them might be the last.

It was on the fourth day after the parting that Oswald received a message to go to the principal's room. He found that the manager of the bank was with Mr. Mannering when he arrived. The head of the firm was a tall, slightly built man, with very dark hair and eyes, always giving one the impression that he was in need of shaving.

"Can you explain that, Mr. Gray?" he said, placing a drawn cheque in front of him.

Oswald glanced at it and saw that the cheque was drawn to "bearer," and that the amount was £200.

"No," he said as he handed it back, "I have no recollection of drawing it."

"Neither have I any recollection of signing it."

Oswald glanced in surprise at Mr. Mannering and then examined the cheque again. It was signed "Harry Mannering" and apparently was in the handwriting of Mr. Mannering.

"What do you take it to be, Mr. Gray?"

"It looks like a private cheque of your own, sir."

"Examine it more carefully."

"Why," exclaimed Gray after a minute or two, "this does not appear to be your own writing, but it is a remarkably fine imitation!"

"Exactly what we think," drily assented Mr. Mannering. "But then I did not sign the cheque, neither was I here on Monday when the cheque was apparently drawn and cashed, and you and I are the only persons who could get at the cheque book. If you will look, you will see that the counter-foil has been taken completely out."

Digitized by Google

"You surely do not mean to insinuate ——" cried Oswald, and then he stopped, glancing from one to the other.

"I do not see any other course," said Mr. Mannering. The matter has been in the hands of a private detective since yesterday morning and he has stated that everything points to——" Mr. Mannering paused and shrugged his shoulders.

"But it's absurd," cried Oswald, trying to laugh but making a ghastly failure. "You surely do not believe it?"

"But, Mr. Gray, the case is a very simple one. Two persons have access to a cheque book, a private one only occasionally used. A cheque is drawn and cashed. You and I are the two persons, and it is out of the question that I should forge my own name, isn't it?"

"Now, Gray," he went on, "own up to it. It will be better in the long run."

"But I haven't anything to own up to," protested Gray. "Won't you believe me—I did not take the money."

"Well," said Mr. Mannering, "I was prepared to help you out—if you still persist, I have only one course open. I cannot afford to throw £200 away."

As he spoke, the door opened, and the plain-clothes officer from Scotland Yard entered.

"I arrest you, Oswald Gray," he said, "on a charge of forging the name of your employer."

"Great Heaven! But I am quite innocent. Mr. Mannering, you do not think me guilty?" cried Gray.

"I do not know what to think, but the evidence is very strong."

So they led Oswald Gray away.

As a matter of fact the bank manager who had discovered the forgery had practically been the means of Oswald's arrest. There had existed a bitter animosity between the two men for many years, and the manager was not slow to take advantage of this opportunity. He knew he could easily persuade Mr. Mannering, and so the most decisive steps were taken.

Lilian was prostrate at the news, and refused to believe that Oswald was guilty; whilst her brother openly jeered at him, and complimented Lilian on being well rid of a scoundrel.

But now she yearned for Oswald more than ever. Now that he had met adversity she longed to be by his side to comfort him, but still that pride prevented her. And Oswald, well, Oswald began to despair of everything. First Lilian and then this cruel blow—both seeming so unjust to him. He would have given much to have had Lilian beside him in this time of trouble; but as with her, his pride would not submit.

Once the law had got Oswald Gray in its grip, Mr. Mannering began to regret his hastiness. Gray had been in his employ for fourteen years with never a suspicion against his fair name. But it was too late to retract, the law must take its course.

At last the day of the trial came round. The court was fairly full of people, for the continuation of a much-tried case was to follow the trial of Oswald Gray.

Frederick Furrian had been engaged on behalf of the prisoner, whilst Lionel Lincoln was the prosecuting counsel.

From the first everything seemed to go against Oswald Gray. From the fact that he alone besides Mr. Mannering had access to the safe, down to the fact that the particular character in the signature which had caused the forgery to be discovered very much resembled the identical character in the prisoner's handwriting. In the correct signature the two letters "N" occurring together in "Mannering" were exactly similar, whereas in the counterfeit the second "N" differed somewhat.

Lincoln made out a very strong case against Oswald Gray, whilst Furrian's defence, although it was clever and well delivered, lacked material. Consequently in the judge's summing up it was clear that his opinion had gone right against Oswald.

Presently the jury retired but were only absent for about five minutes.

"We find the prisoner guil——"

"Stop!"

It was the defending counsel's voice; he was waving a paper in his hand.

"My lord," he cried, "I regret this irregularity, but the most important evidence has just been handed to me."

There was some commotion in the court, but presently everyone had settled down, and then Furrian commenced:

"My Lord and Gentlemen of the Jury. On the purely circumstantial evidence put forward by the most learned counsel for the prosecution, we were within an ace of committing a great error of justice.

"My lord, I hold in my hand the written confession of the real culprit, but, as it is the desire of all parties concerned that his name should be suppressed, I will pass it to your lordship to read."

The judge read the confession as did the jury. It was a perfectly legal document, sworn before witnesses, and setting forth the details of how the robbery and subsequently the forgery was committed.

Thus Oswald Gray was discharged without a stain on his character, although he was bound over to appear if called upon at some future date.

Oswald could hardly believe the truth until he read the signature of the man who had committed the forgery. But he did not seem particularly astonished, his solicitor thought, only sad. But as soon as he was free from the necessary legalities, he hurried home to think.

At home that evening he found a letter from Mr. Mannering, who had been in the court. In it he suggested that Oswald took a month's leave of absence, whilst he trusted that the inclosed would help him further to enjoy it—"the inclosed" consisted of a cheque for £50. Mr. Mannering further went on to say how bitterly he regretted the step he had taken, and apparently his sorrow was quite sincere.

On the following day there came over Oswald an intense longing to see Lilian again. To gaze into her blue eyes and read the love message there. To feel her heart beating against his. Pride was conquered now, and he hurried with all speed to the Becher's home. The door was opened by Mrs. Becher.

"Oswald!" she cried. "You?"

"Yes, Mrs. Becher, I've come to beg pardon from Lilian."

"She is not home yet from business."

The words caused Oswald a momentary pang, but he took the thrust smilingly.

"You'll come in, won't you, Oswald?"

"Do you think she will see me?"

"Oh, yes, she will only be too glad of some comfort."

"Ah, I was forgetting your trouble in my own cares. How is Frank, where is he, do you know?"

"The last we heard of him was that he was on his way to Buenos Ayres. My poor misguided boy, and to think that you nearly paid the penalty of his crime."

"But how was he found out?"

"Lilian discovered it. He came home with the story of your arrest, and his effusive liking for you immediately turned the other way, just like his father used to be. Two or three days afterwards Lilian entered his room rather suddenly and surprised him locking up a desk, and she was sure she caught the glint of gold; he flushed very much, and went on at her for going about so silently.

"Next day Lilian lifted the desk and found it much heavier than usual, she shook it, but he had foreseen such a contingency, though he anticipated an accidental one only, and had put in paper to prevent the rattle.

Digitized by Google

"He bought some new clothes and a diamond pin for his tie, besides various other things, until Lilian could restrain herself no longer, and next day she forced open his desk and found almost one hundred and eighty pounds in gold and notes. When he came home she accused him, he blustered and protested, but eventually confessed.

"The following morning she made him sign his confession, but immediately afterwards fainted away. While she was unconscious Frank slipped away with the money, and this morning we got a letter from him to say that he was on board a tramp steamer bound for Buenos Ayres.

"Directly Lilian recovered, she hurried to the court with the confession and the rest you know. What with your quarrel and Frank's behaviour, the girl is quite wearing herself out."

Oswald's expression grew more doleful with each sentence of this explanation, and at the finish he was calling himself every name he could think of.

Mrs. Becher had gone upstairs to lie down, and Oswald paced up and down the dining-room like a caged panther.

"Will she never come?" he cried. He consulted his watch on an average every minute and a half. She was not due in till six o'clock, and it still wanted a quarter of an hour till then.

At last he heard the latchkey in the front door, and heard Lilian coming down the passage to the dining-room.

She opened the door, and started at seeing a man's form before her. She stared for a moment as though she could not believe her eyes, but only for a moment. Then with a glad little cry she was in his strong embrace.

"Oh, Oswald," she cried, "my Oswald; I've wanted you so much." But the reaction had been too much, and her tears began to flow. Tenderly he soothed her, and kissed her tear-bedewed eyes.

"Oswald," she said presently, "I have something to tell you. It is why I went against your wishes and accepted Mr. Austin's offer of employment.

"You know mother's money was invested in the Lode Star Diamond Mines, well, the company were in low water at the last meeting, and were unable to declare a dividend. Consequently, the regular income which mother received stopped, and it was thought that the company would have to go into liquidation, then I thought it time to put my hand to the mill."

"My poor dear Lil, how I misjudged you," he cried remorsefully. "But our marriage must take place at once, my income is quite large enough for all three of us."

"Impetuous boy," she laughingly said. "You haven't heard all yet. Last week a very rich find was made, and mother's solicitor sold all the shares at an immense profit, and reinvested them in Government stock. He sent a cheque, too, for £200 to Mr. Mannering yesterday, and I leave business next Saturday week, dear."

"Anyhow," he cried, "I cannot wait about any longer for you, love. More things will be happening if I do. How will next month do?"

"Of all the ridiculous old things, next year, you mean," she retorted.

But eventually they brought it down to September which was four months ahead. Thus once again that truest of all sayings proved itself—"The course of true love never runs smooth."

But a very pretty wedding took place early in September, and a radiantly happy pair left London en route for Jersey.

One thing more and my story is finished. From the first Oswald Gray suspected Frank Becher. He had lent him his keys, including the key of the safe, to open a drawer with. He had noticed that Frank was some time gone, but excused himself by saying that the key would not work properly at first. Oswald thought nothing more of it until his interview with Mr. Mannering, and then he remembered it, but for Lilian's sake he kept silent, and would have suffered for another in order to spare her ignominy and shame. But she never knew of it, and I only relate it now with the idea of dispelling the rather adverse opinion which I am afraid my lady readers may have formed of Oswald Gray. E. Newton Bungey.

I AM very glad to find that my new features, and especially the development in the pictorial covers, are so popular among my readers, and very many have written me congratulatory messages concerning them.

One of my numerous correspondents is "J. G. R," Streatham, who in the course of a long epistle, says, "I have been greatly interested in 'The Bridge of Ruin,' and am sorry that it is now completed. It is a story which should warn all inclined to gamble. I was much amused, however, at one part of the story, i.e., the taking of the snapshots. I presume the games were played in a room, and in the evening." He then goes on to say that this is impossible from a photographic point of view. His assumption that the snapshots were taken in the evening is wrong, for in the number in which the episode is related, that of August 22nd, it distinctly states that they were playing in the afternoon. However, I thank "J. G. R." for his well-meaning criticism, and I feel sure that if he turns up that issue he will agree with me that he is under a misapprehension.

YOU will all, no doubt, appreciate this week's instalment of "The Pursuit of Sara." A great feature is the reproduction of photographs showing the actual places where the principal incidents occurred, and these, although, of course, of special interest to readers in and around Bedford, will be interesting to all readers. I am pursuing the same course in respect to Northampton, the next town in which Sara undergoes many exciting experiences, which she relates in next week's number. On the cover of this issue is depicted the scene at Newnham Bridge, where Rigby Starr makes so cowardly an assault upon Sara. There will be an equally striking picture on the cover next week. I anticipate that there will be a big demand for "SHORT STORIES" in Northampton and environs next week, so regular readers there had better ask their newsagents to reserve them a copy, so as to prevent the disappointment of hearing them say "Sold out."

BESIDES the thrilling relations of "The Pursuit of Sara," a splendid new attraction starts in our next. This is Mr. George Griffith's serial "A Criminal Millionaire," which is bound to create much interest. Very little need be said in recommending this to readers, because the author is so well known as a writer of stirring stories. "Good wine needs no bush," is an apt quotation, and hence I need not dissertate on the merits of our coming serial. You might, however, do your friends a good turn by mentioning what I have in hand for them, and thereby oblige me too.

A GOOD many correspondents have written me inquiring whether any more "Love Problems" will appear. They intimate that they would be sorry to see this feature dropped, but I can calm their fears by announcing that shortly some more of these interesting problems will be published. In reply to "Perplexed," the number containing "Should a Husband Discuss His Business Affairs With His Wife?" was the one dated September 12th of this year.

OWING to a printer's error one of the admitted solutions to No. 141 in the Juggled Letters Competition was given as Gilgach; this should have been Gilfach. I hope to be able to announce the names of the prizewinners shortly.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

The Story of an Attempt at Matchmaking and its Result.

"Yes, I like the look of the young fellow very much," said Mr. James Reece frankly. "Then we may take it as a compact, Will, that the young people marry. You've seen my daughter, and you think that she would make a suitable wife for Charlie?"

"I think that the marriage should prove an ideal one!" cried Mr. William Crewe in a tone of conviction. "It would be very pleasant to both of us if the young people were to make a match of it. There are the two estates side by side; they would make a capital whole, if under one master. I cannot claim that my family has lived on my estate for ever so many generations, because I haven't had it two years, but that doesn't make any difference. Well, we will each do his best to bring it about, but it must be quite a question of free will. No coercion!"

"I wouldn't coerce Lucy for anything!" declared Mr. Reece emphatically. "Still, we can do a great deal to bring about the desired end. We can throw them together; we can make judicious remarks, and so on. Oh, I think it will come about, Will. You know, it is association that has a great deal to do with falling in love! If a man never sees a certain woman, he doesn't fall in love with her—how on earth can he? And, on the other hand, if he constantly sees a certain woman, it's about three dozen to one that he will fall in love with her. That sort of thing happens every day, under conditions that seem to preclude the possibility of marriage. Therefore, the chances are greater when the two parties are—well, attractive."

"Precisely!" agreed the other parent.

The matter dropped at that point, so far as actual discussion went, but both fathers set to work to accomplish the object in view. Reece and Crewe were friends. They had been to school together and had kept more or less in touch with one another during the succeeding years, although they had been separated for the greater portion of them.

Reece had spent a considerable time in various Colonies, in the Government service, while Crewe had devoted himself to business in the mother country. The Reece estate had been kept in hand by his sister during his sojourn abroad, but her death had had something to do with his return and his decision to settle down and take matters easily.

Reece was delighted when he discovered that the adjoining property had been acquired by his friend, and it was not long before the two men began to think of matrimonial plans for their offspring.

However, the respective son and daughter did not view the matter in the same light, for it was not long before the young people saw the drift of certain broad hints, and perceived the object of sundry excursions and invitations. If the hints had not been so broad, Charles Crewe and Lucy Reece might have fallen in love as a matter of course, but when they discovered that they were being thrust on one another, as Lucy mentally termed it, their independent spirits rebelled against the plan and they deliberately made up their minds that they were not going to be disposed of like so much furniture. The natural result was that there was no progress in the direction of matrimony and the fathers looked at each other in dismay.

"They don't seem to take to one another, do they?" observed Mr. Crewe dolefully. "It's rather disquieting, isn't it?"

"It's very disappointing," emphasised Mr. Reece. 'Yet," he added, brightening a little, "it's not altogether a bad sign, you know! They have guessed our plans and it has ruffled them a bit, probably! That will wear off, and they will fall in love as deeply as—as——"

Mr. Reece could not find a simile, so he lamely desisted.

Then they hit on a plan for throwing the young people more together for a time. Crewe intended to have various extensive alterations carried out in his house; this work necessitated that father and son should go away from the house for a time, and take up their abode at a hotel. Reece invited the Crewes to stay with him and his daughter during the progress of the work. Charlie Crewe, who had taken over the active management of his father's office in Manchester, an hour's ride from home, would find himself just as conveniently situated as in his father's house.

Thus it came about that Charlie and Lucy, already somewhat antagonistic, found themselves in closer proximity, which tended to increase their antagonism. To make matters worse, although he thought that it was doing quite the opposite, Mr. Crewe said that Charlie needn't go up more than three days a week as business was always flat at that time of the year, and they could all have a good time.

It was the third day after the Crewes had installed themselves in the home of the Reeces. Lucy entered the library to get a book on geology and she found Charlie lazily reclining in an armchair, reading the latest novel and smoking a cigar. He was the picture of indolence.

"Can I get it for you, Miss Reece?" he inquired, rising slowly and speaking in the tone of a man who hoped that a negative reply would be given. He received the negative answer but with an addition which he did not expect.

"No, thank you, Mr. Crewe! I should not like to cause you any undue exertion! Pray remain seated!"

"You are so dreadfully energetic, Miss Reece!" he drawled, sinking back into the comfortable chair. "I suppose that, and the fondness for fossils, come from living in the Colonies! I admire your energy and your studious disposition, but I cannot imitate them, I regret to say!" Then, lowering his eyes so that the malicious twinkle in them should not be seen, he added: "Are you going to keep me company by sitting here to study?"

"I should not like to disturb the profundity of your reading, Mr. Crewe!" she retorted, flushing. She bowed and passed out of the room.

"By Jove!" muttered Charlie. "I am afraid I was a bit rude, but she was not behindhand! Well, I think I am making myself appear something of a dolt to her, and she won't be in a hurry to say 'yes!' when I pop the question, as I must do just to please dad. He'll be cut up about it, but I can't help it!"

Charlie Crewe presented himself to Lucy as an indolent fellow, rather shallow in mind, and bordering on the fop; not at all the kind of man to maintain and increase a large business. She preferred a man of the masterly type; strong of body and brain, morally and physically brave, capable of facing and overcoming all difficulties. To her, therefore, this Charles Crewe was the opposite of her choice of a husband.

Lucy did not perceive that he was exaggerating, that he was not really what he showed himself to her, yet she ought to have guessed it, considering that she herself was playing a similar game of exaggeration. Lucy was not the blue-stocking which she made Charlie think she was; she had a liking for study and she enjoyed athletic exercises, but at heart she was essentially homely and womanly. Her disposition was gentle, tender, and she preferred the work of a home to the study of fossils, and the work of a geologist with hammer and other appliances. Instead of being really the rather masculine, independent, "stand-offish" girl, she was yearning for a strong arm to protect her.

Digitized by Google

They kept up the play whenever they met and they believed in the truth of one another's acting. When alone, each smiled at his, or her, success and experienced increased dislike for the other party. It was a game of cross purposes with a vengeance, and the cherished desires of the fathers were suffering in consequence.

Mr. Crewe and Mr. Reece both felt constrained to say something, when, after more than a week had passed, there was no result. Crewe had an interview with his son, in which he delicately made the young fellow aware of the fact that his own desire was no nearer realisation, and Charlie evasively stated that it was his intention to ask Luby to be his wife if—the elder man did not notice the significance of the remark—if she would have him! In his mind he was sure that he was making acceptance impossible. Reece, on the other hand, told his daughter that he feared she had not been so attentive as a hostess should be to a guest; this made Lucy flush as she felt that there was some truth in the reproof. She promised to mend her ways.

"That's right," said Reece, adding lamely: "You see, when we stroll out and Charlie's father and I somehow leave you behind, as we have done several times, and then we come back—h'm, some time afterwards—to find you, why, you two are apart as if you were strangers! He is smoking on the grass and you are botanising!"

It was a muddled kind of speech but Lucy understood the drift of it. She did not, however, respond to the obvious suggestion.

Lucy Reece began to mend her ways that afternoon; she decided to make an advance, a step which cost her some rebellious feelings.

"Mr. Crewe," she said to Charlie, whom she found in the library, smoking the inevitable cigar, "I am going to town, and it looks uncharitable to leave you alone, as our worthy parents are out. Will you walk with me? It is only three miles there and three miles back?"

She was just slightly confused; his clear eyes had lifted for a second, flashing a keen glance at her, only to close lazily.

"Is it the same distance each way?" he asked quizzically, seizing upon the awkward turn she had given to her speech. "I really do not think that I am equal to so much exertion, Miss Reece! Why not ride? It's perfectly useless to walk when you can ride, you know!"

"Then you will excuse me for leaving you?" she inquired in a tone that meant that he would be obliged to do so. "I am sorry to have disturbed you." Then, her temper getting the better of her at this rebuff, she burst forth before she was aware of it: "I don't believe you would walk or bestir yourself if you knew that someone was being killed outside on the lawn!"

She was gone. He laughed softly.

"That settles the marriage question! I must take an early opportunity of popping the question and get the thing finished. It was rather rude of me though! Yet, by Jove, she gave me a Roland for my Oliver!"

Lucy hurriedly dressed and went on her errand; she was furiously angry now, partly because of Charlie's refusal and partly on account of her own stinging retort. Oh, why do parents act so foolishly as to try to make matches between ill-assorted couples! Lucy could not understand why; she felt angry with her father, with old Mr. Crewe, with everybody, that she should have been placed in so awkward a position!

"It will not be for long now," she comforted herself by saying; "he will give up the idea and will find some excuse for going away!"

So she treated him with proper courtesy for the next two days, although he was almost exasperatingly cool and dense on occasions. She was congratulating herself that there would be no proposal, and therefore she would not have to bear the blame of having refused him, when the thunderbolt came.

They were alone in the small drawing-room used on ordinary occasions. Charlie Crewe laid down his book and went to her side. His face betrayed some set purpose, and, in her surprise and agitation—annoyance, she would have called it!—she rose from the couch at his approach.

The rope swayed with the strain and stretched ominously.

"Miss Reece," he began hesitatingly. He did not call her by her Christian name. "I must apologise for bothering you, because I can pretty well guess beforehand what you will say. I won't waste any words or sentiment over it! Do you think you could marry me? Would you be my wife?"

Everyone will agree that no girl in her senses could have accepted such an offer. Small wonder, therefore, that Lucy drew herself up stiffly and gave him a frigid answer.

"I suppose it is very kind of you, Mr. Crewe, to make the proposal, but I wish you had not."

"Just as I expected," he said, with unconcealed relief. "It was a sort of duty, you see. I was bound to do it, although I knew that the proposal would be unacceptable. I don't think we are suited, do you?"

"I do not think that there is any need to discuss the question of compatibility, Mr. Crewe," she returned icily, and she left him.

Charlie went back to his seat. He tried to smile, but that expression quickly gave place to a frown, and he began to gnaw savagely at his fair moustache. Somehow, he was not satisfied, although he had achieved his object.

"It was beastly hard on her," he muttered, jumping up and pacing the room with quick strides. "I don't want to be forced into marriage with any girl, but I ought to have adopted the more manly course of declining to carry out dad's wish. It wasn't manly to throw the responsibility on her, and to make the proposal in that way. Suitable? Well, perhaps not, but I needn't have insinuated that I didn't think she was good enough for me. Of course, that's how she will take it."

If Lucy had seen him as he strode townwards ten minutes later, she would have marvelled at the energy of this indolent man; and if she could have gauged the depths of his eyes at that moment, she would have entertained some doubts concerning the correctness of her idea respecting the extent of his intelligence. But Lucy had her face buried in the clothes of the bed on which she had thrown herself. Her well-moulded figure was shaking convulsively and a smothered sob betokened a condition of mind and heart that would have startled Charlie Crewe.

Digitized by Google

That evening Lucy did not appear at dinner, and Mr. Reece, with some anxiety, informed his two friends that she was suffering from a severe headache and appeared to be quite prostrate. Mr. Crewe expressed his great regret with evident sincerity; Charlie mumbled some words of sympathy, which were not quite intelligible. The meal was not a success, and the three retired earlier than usual.

Charlie Crewe could not understand what ailed him; he admitted that he ought to have been pleased, but he was not. Of course he did not wish to marry Lucy, and he was not going to marry her, so—— That was how he reasoned on the following morning, but he could not get any farther than the "so——" Lucy was at the breakfast-table, trying hard to appear cheerful, but it was not a successful attempt at all; the elder men were not happy, either, for they had learnt of the failure of the matrimonial negotiations. There was no ill-feeling between the two parents because Lucy had declined the proposal; they accepted the situation in all friendliness.

Charlie saw Lucy go out for a walk, perhaps on some fossilising expedition, as he would have said previously, and he wondered that he should feel rather cross that she had not asked him to accompany her; she must have known that he was fooling when he declined her invitation on the last occasion, he told himself, and now that there was no further chance of an unwelcome proposal, what reason had she for not asking him to go with her?

He watched her out of sight, gnawing at his moustache. It was vexing that she had not asked him; it was a fine morning, and he didn't want to sit in a stuffy library and smoke. A fellow cannot always be reading novels and smoking!

He decided to go out alone and to take a different direction. "I suppose I might have offered to go with her," he mused, as the thought occurred to him, "but I don't care to thrust myself upon anyone." He went off at a swinging pace, trying to wear away his ill-humour by hard walking or to get it blown away by the refreshing breeze.

About a mile from the house the land was hilly, and at one spot was a chine or ravine known as The Grindle. On one side the descent was comparatively easy, but on the other it was exceedingly dangerous to attempt a descent. It was almost perpendicular, with jutting pieces of rock here and there to afford a precarious hold. The Grindle was a lovely spot and formed the destination of many a walk.

Charlie Crewe unconsciously found himself near the Grindle after nearly an hour's tramp; he was on the steep side, and he decided to approach the edge in order to obtain a view of the sloping side and rest for a while.

"I wonder which way she took?" he asked himself incontinently. He gazed at the beauties of the Grindle for a minute or so, after which he threw himself on the grass and lay at full length.

"Charlie, my boy," he said, apostrophising himself "you've been an idiot! If you didn't want the girl"—there was a meaning pause at this point—"if you didn't want her," he went on, unconsciously emphasising the little if, "you needn't have gone on like that. I should think——"

He stopped and sat bolt upright as a sound struck his ear. He listened. There! It sounded like a cry for help!

He sprang to his feet and hurried along the summit of the Grindle, calling out, in stentorian tones: "Who's there?" And presently he caught the reply: "Here, down the Grindle!"

The voice came from one of the most dangerous portions of the chine, and he recognised it. Good Heavens! How had she got there?

He soon located the exact spot. Lying flat on his face, he looked over; he saw Lucy on a narrow ledge, several feet down. She was compelled to hold a small projection by one hand in order to keep on the ledge, which was almost too narrow to afford a foothold, and, moreover, sloped slightly downwards. It was evident that she had slipped from a higher projection, and had just managed to save herself. Even now, if her feet should slide along the sloping ledge, she would certainly be precipitated to the bottom, a distance of at least one hundred feet!

"Hold on, for Heaven's sake!" cried Charlie. "I'll get you out of that!"

His blood ran cold for a second as he thought of what might happen, but in a moment he was cool and collected. All the latent strength of his character came to the front.

There was no help near, and if he spent time in running in search of a rope, Lucy's strength might give way and—— He shuddered.

He was wearing a light overcoat. He slipped it off and cut and tore the material into stout strips, which he quickly tied together. The nearest projection to which he could attach one end was two or three feet below the edge. He cautiously clambered down and secured the improvised rope. The free end dangled a foot above Lucy's disengaged hand.

"It isn't long enough," groaned Charlie. "Can you hold on while I tear my jacket and make it longer?"

"I can't. My feet are slipping. I'll give a spring and grasp it."

He had great difficulty in suppressing a cry of fear as he saw her spring lightly upwards. Her hands grasped the line. It swayed with the strain and stretched ominously.

"For Heaven's sake," cried Charlie again, "be careful. Wait till I get down a little further to help you. Oh, what should I do if you fell? I cannot bear to think of it!"

She was climbing up, steadily, hand over hand, as she had been taught to do in the gymnasium; but at that involuntary remark she stopped and looked at him with a gaze that penetrated the inmost recesses of his heart and caused a peculiar feeling of exaltation to spring up within it.

"Would you care so very much?" The words came from her lips before she could realise their meaning; she flushed fiery red immediately she had uttered them, and, turning her eyes from him, she continued the ascent.

"I should have nothing else to live for, Lucy!" he declared, not impulsively, but with the cool deliberation that proceeds from full recognition of the truth.

She reached the projection to which the line was secured; while she held to that projection, he drew the free end of the line towards him and scrambled to the summit, where he held it taut as he lay on the ground. This gave her the means of getting to the summit.

Scarcely had she placed herself beyond danger when he had her in his arms; and she, nestling closely to him, gave vent to her over-strained feelings in a flood of tears.

She had been trying to get a specimen of the bee orchis when she had slipped, narrowly escaping a dreadful death.

"I am so sorry that I made that cruel remark about your not being energetic enough or brave enough to——" She began, but he stopped her with a kiss.

"I think we have both been making a big blunder, haven't we, now? And I propose that we go straight back to our worthy parents and tell them that we have decided, all of our own free will, to bring about the realisation of their hopes. Do you agree, Lucy?"

Charlie always averred that Lucy said "Yes!" but Lucy declared that she made no reply, for the simple reason that Charlie did not give her time. A man in love is so impulsive!

Geo. Day.

He: "But you promised me this waltz?" She: "Yes, but that was before I had seen you dance!".

"He offered her his hand and fortune." "Did she accept it?" "No; the first was too large and the second too small!"

"She is a Russian Countess." "Indeed! Has she much in her own name?" "Has she? She's got nearly the entire alphabet!"

Digitized by Google

Making the Best of It.

MABEL: "I'm sorry you asked me to marry you; it pains me to refuse." George (cheerfully): "Oh, don't worry; perhaps you know best what I am escaping."

Brave Girl!

ADA: "I saved a man's life at Blackpool last summer." Clara: "How? I didn't see anything about it in the papers." Ada: "Well, I should hope not. He said he'd die if I didn't let him kiss me."

He Had His Doubts.

JUDY: "Will ye give me yer promise, Dennis, that y'll love me foriver?" Dennis: "Sure, an' Oi'd loike to do that same, Judy, but Oi'm hardly of the opinion that Oi'll lasht as long as that."

Then They Recommenced.

JACK: "The photograph you sent me is just like you, dear. I kissed it ever so many times." Nina: "Did it return your kisses?" Jack: "No, of course not." Nina: "Then how can you say it is like me?"

Two Different Things.

DAISY: "I have an engagement with Cholly, and I don't know how to get out of it." Helen: "Haven't you any reason for breaking it?" Daisy: "Yes, I have a reason—Cholly is the reason—but I want an excuse."

Forewarned is Forearmed.

ETHEL (engaged a week): "George and I have never had a quarrel!" Maud: "Oh, I think you ought to have one before you are married; otherwise you can't be quite sure whether you are going to have your own way or not!"

Then There Were Screams of Silence.

"AH!" sighed Miss Antique, with a languishing glance in the direction of Mr. Oldboy, "if I had been born in the days of chivalry!" "Well," he said, as he scratched the bald spot on the top of his head: "You came pretty near it."

He Would Have Cause to Remember.

SYMPATHETIC SISTER: "Cheer up, Arthur, Mabel has treated you badly in jilting you, but you will soon forget her." Arthur (moodily): "Not for a long time, sis, I fear. The lovely jewellery I gave her was purchased on the easy payment system."

Hubby Had Got Tired of Cold Meat.

MASTER (to cook): "You needn't say anything to your mistress, Jane, but have you a policeman for a sweetheart?" Cook (indignantly): "Certainly not, sir!" Master: "Then you'll have to get one, or else leave. I want someone to eat up the cold mutton."

A Little Going a Long Way.

MR. HENPECK: "I shall have to go to town to-day, Maria, and I shall want some money, for there's train fare, lunch, 'bus fares, and I've got to——" Mrs. Henpeck: "Well, John, take this shilling, and, mind, if you come home the worse for drink I'll not let you in."

An Unkind Suggestion.

SHE: "So you are writing me a poem?" The Poet: "Yes, but I can't find anything to rhyme with 'Cupid' that will adequately express my state of mind." She: "Why not 'stupid'?"

A Cool Proposition.

"MY daughter is absolutely too young to marry," snorted old Goldrick. "Well," replied the dejected suitor, "what would you say to my taking her marriage dowry now and waiting a few years for the girl?"

Cruel Girl!

"I MET a pretty girl this morning, and she looked at me in a way which led me to believe she was trying to make an impression." "Shouldn't wonder. People generally select something soft for that purpose."

He'd Had Them Before.

MRS. YOUNGWIFE (welcoming husband home): "Now, ducky, I've been cooking all day. I've made pie and cake and biscuits." Ducky (cheerfully): "Then let us eat, drink, and be merry, for to-morrow we die."

Less Sudden Than She Thought.

HE: "Oh, pray, Miss Dalrymple, don't call me Mr. Brookes." She: "Oh, but our acquaintance has been so brief. (Sweetly) Why shouldn't I call you Mr. Brookes?" He: "Oh, only because my name's John Somerset!"

Poor Old Hubby!

"WHAT time is it?" asked his wife suspiciously, as he came in. "About one." Just then the clock struck three. "Gracious! When did the clock commence to stutter?" he said, with a feeble attempt at justification and a joke.

Would His Love Melt or Dissolve?

SHE: "If it were necessary, and I were your wife, would you go through fire and water for me?" He: "Do you think it would be necessary?" She: "It might be." He: "Then I think you had better marry a fireman. Good evening!"

Sufficient Credentials.

CAREFUL PARENT: "Before I give consent to your proposed marriage to my daughter I must know something about your character." Suitor: "Certainly. Here is my bank-book." Careful Parent (after a glance): "Take her, my son, and be happy."

The Joys of Matrimony.

HUSBAND: "Don't you think that you are rather unreasonable to expect me to take you to a ball, and stay awake until four o'clock, and then get up at eight and go to my work?" Wife: "I may be a little unreasonable, but it's perfectly brutal of you to mention it."

His Debts Had Grown.

RICH AMERICAN FATHER-IN-LAW: "My daughter and I are much disappointed in your estate. It seems to be a barren tract of land, and I don't believe anything has been grown on it for fifty years." The Penniless Count (cheerfully): "Monsieur forgets ze magnificent mortgages."

The Sarcasm Was Intense.

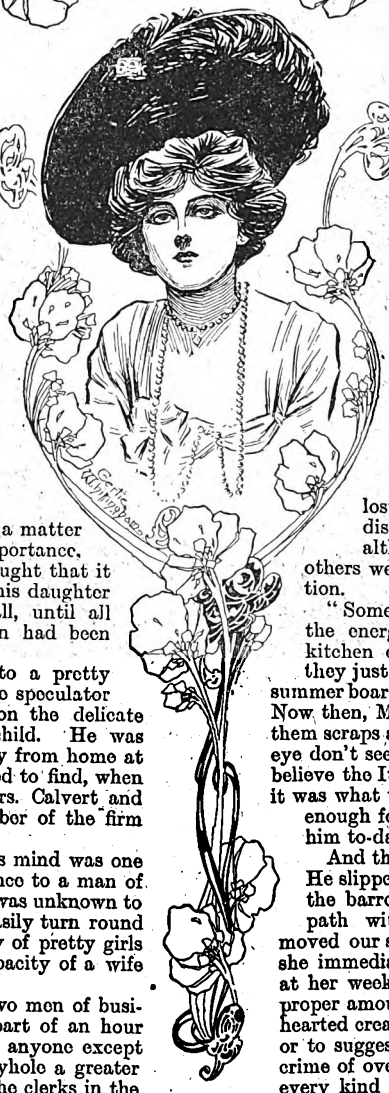
"MY hands are awfully cold," said the pretty girl suggestively, as they drove home from the dance. "Why didn't you bring your muff with you?" asked the practical young man. "I did!" she snapped. But she wouldn't explain where the muff had gone to, and he has been wondering ever since just what she meant.

But Ethel Said Nothing.

"ETHEL," said a fond mother, "did George leave any package for me last evening?" Ethel (falteringly): "Why, no, mamma! What made you ask?" "Oh, nothing; only I heard him say, as he said good-bye, 'Now, here is one more for your mother,' and I thought that it might be that pattern for lace-edging that his mother promised to send me."

Digitized by Google

ONLY AN AMATEUR.



The Romance of a Gentleman Organ-Grinder.

THERE were three alternatives offered to Mr. Nicholas Frost. The first was suicide, and he put that on one side immediately as being too painful to contemplate; the second was borrowing from his friends to enable him to pay the debt which he owed of £10,000, which looked so much like the broad and easy way leading to the workhouse that he fought shy of venturing along it, and the third was marrying his daughter to the firm of Calvert and Son, his creditors.

Whether the father or son had her was a matter which after all was of very secondary importance, and this was especially so because he thought that it would perhaps be wisest neither to take his daughter into his confidence nor to consult her at all, until all the preliminary details of the transaction had been successfully negotiated.

"There is some advantage attaching to a pretty daughter after all," mused this unfortunate speculator one morning, as he set out to the City on the delicate mission of endeavouring to sell his only child. He was glad that the young lady was staying away from home at the time, and on the whole he was relieved to find, when he reached the magnificent offices of Messrs. Calvert and Son, Stock Brokers, that the junior member of the firm was also away on his holidays.

After all, the subject which occupied his mind was one which he could broach with more confidence to a man of a certain age, than to a young fellow who was unknown to him even by sight, and who might very easily turn round and say that there were in the world plenty of pretty girls who would suit him admirably in the capacity of a wife without a forfeit of £10,000.

Exactly what transpired between these two men of business, closeted as they were for the best part of an hour together, will probably never be known by anyone except the office boy, who had his ear to the keyhole a greater part of the time. But it was noticed by the clerks in the counting-house that when Mr. Nicholas Frost came downstairs he looked very hot and uncomfortable.

The subject which he had in hand was one of such extreme delicacy, that he spent half an hour in beating round the bush in the most elaborate manner, before he dared come to the point; and it was only when he at last blurted out that in the place of the £10,000, which was due, his daughter would be at the disposal of Mr. Calvert, senior, that he discovered the very unpleasant fact that Mrs. Calvert was still alive.

Thereupon he beat a very sudden and shame-faced retreat, and as he wended his way home he confessed that the choice now practically lay between suicide and the workhouse. After the most unfortunate mistake which had occurred, he could not very well mention the subject which he had in mind to the junior partner.

His prospects were anything but cheerful, and it was even a question whether it was practicable to borrow £10,000 from his friends. If not—then he must go to bed and think it over.

The organ grinder at the gate had been grinding away for fully twenty minutes at the popular tunes which filled his barrel. The nurses and the children under their charge had gaped over the fence to their hearts' content, and the pitiful old ladies confined to their rooms on the upper floors of that fashionable country boarding house had rained down sundry pennies upon him, a good many of which were lost in the long grass, to judge from the disappointed look on the man's face, although he found them quickly when the others were showered down by way of compensation.

"Some won't encourage them," said Mrs. Grit, the energetic proprietress, as she stood at the kitchen door, duster in hand; "but I say that they just help boarders to keep lively; and if your summer boarder gets low spirited you're apt to lose her. Now then, Maria, don't stand gaping there, but take them scraps and warm them in the oven. What the eye don't see the heart don't grieve for, and I don't believe the Italian foreigner would care if he did know it was what the folks left on their plates. If it's good enough for mince to-morrow it's good enough for him to-day, ain't it?"

And then Maria called the foreigner to come in. He slipped the monkey's chain from the handle of the barrow, and shuffled up the well-kept gravel path with a look of eager expectation which moved our susceptible old lady upstairs to tears, and she immediately made up her mind not to complain at her weekly bill, although it was about double the proper amount, as Mrs. Grit was such a good, kind-hearted creature it would be cruel to hurt her feelings or to suggest that she had been guilty of the heinous crime of overcharging one of her boarders. And so every kind action has its reward, although we may not know it.

While the organ grinder was feeding in the kitchen with a relish which did great credit to the scraps, although it made them look rather small, a young man came down the road with a fishing-rod in one hand and an empty basket in the other. He was very good-looking, and his peculiar oval face with its bright Southern complexion and jet black hair was shown off to the very best advantage by the exceedingly Bohemian dress which he wore, probably for the very reason that he knew how becoming it was.

Your City man when he goes for a holiday as a rule prefers to be a little eccentric in his attire, and certainly the combination of coloured shirts, knickerbockers, and a huge fisherman's hat gave the young man the appearance of a theatrical bandit rather than anything else. He put down the empty fish basket inside the boarding-house gate, and then went back and examined the barrel organ.

"It looks easy," he thought to himself. "I never could see why girls should waste the best years of their lives learning the piano, which probably they will never play without giving offence to anybody with an ear for music, when the whole thing can be done so much better by just turning a handle. If I had to earn my own living I think that this sort of thing would suit me."

Digitized by Google

Then he took hold of the handle and began turning it. The result was very bad.

"Not so easy as it looks," he thought to himself, as he pounded the handle round with a series of disconnected jerks and began to get hot.

"Wonder what tune I'm supposed to be playing now. Never heard one quite like it before. Doesn't seem to attract any very great crowd either."

It was disappointing that there was nobody, not even a baby, to appreciate his efforts. The nursemaids, on whose support he counted, had all gone into the house to look after the children, and the older people, imagining that the legitimate grinder had recommenced operations in a very unfavourable mood, thought that the sooner he went away the better; and in the hopes of discouraging him to discontinue, they carefully abstained from looking out.

"Wonder where the owner of this muscle-developing machine has taken himself to?" mused the young man as he mopped his forehead with a handkerchief. Then an inspiration came to him.

"By Jove!" he said, laughing softly to himself at the brilliancy of his own thoughts, "I'll trundle the thing down to the village and see how much I can make. It's down the hill all the way there, and the old man can fetch it back himself if he wants it. Good idea."

He found the barrel organ a considerable weight at first, but after a time it seemed to run easier, and finally the only question was whether he would ever be able to stop the thing at the other end. However, half way down the hill, when the speed was estimated at fifteen miles an hour, he brought up against the wheel of a small dog cart which was coming slowly in the opposite direction.

Thereupon the barrel organ went over, playing the last chords of "After the Ball" as it did so, and finally settled down on the top of the young man who had got entangled in the handles.

When he got up again he found that the horse was rearing and doing its best to run backwards down the hill on its hind legs, while the young lady, who was driving alone, was screaming at the top of her voice.

Whether the horse had a natural antipathy to popular tunes, or hated Italians, or thought that the barrel organ was going to attack it again, did not appear, but it was some time before the young man who sprang at the frightened creature's head was able to persuade it to assume its natural position on four legs.

In the meantime the young lady, whose nerves had naturally been very much shaken, had not failed to notice the good looks of the man whom she was kind enough to consider her saviour, although, as a matter of fact, he had done more towards bringing her to a sudden end than anything else.

"Saved," she muttered to herself, as the horse at last resumed its horizontal position, "and by an organ grinder as handsome as he is graceful."

Miss Frost, for she was the daughter of the man who at that moment was trying to sell her hand to his creditors, had been to a modern school and she knew Italian, and as soon as she had caught her breath she aired it for the organ grinder's benefit.

"Signor," she said, bending forward and showing her pretty white teeth, "how can I thank you for saving my life? It was very brave of you."

"An Italian lady, by Jove," thought the young man—an Italian would never have supposed it for a minute—and he instantly replied in the same language and an accent peculiar to street arabs.

"Signorina, that I have done something to spare you alarm has made me happy. If by chance I saved your life I am too much honoured and favoured." He thought, on the whole, it was better to put it this way to apologise for having done his best to kill her.

"Never was there such an organ-grinder," thought pretty Miss Frost. Then her blue eyes lighted on the barrel-organ, where it lay apparently none the worse for the collision.

"Is it hurt—your organ?" she asked anxiously in the Italian language as spoken in the class-rooms at Girton. And the young man interrupted her in the same language as taught by Professor Sprachemalli."

"That is my affair, signorina."

"How proud he is—perhaps he is a prince who has been obliged to fly the country," thought Miss Frost, and thereupon she bestowed another gracious smile upon him, and, thanking him with all the most eloquent phrases she could remember, she drove away, turning once to wave a dainty lace handkerchief to her preserver.

And so they parted—Miss Frost to tell her adventure to her aunt, and the young man to find the missing owner of the organ, and to pay him the price of the damage which he had brought about.

At tea-time he had made many inquiries concerning the Italian lady, and to his surprise he found that nobody, not even Mrs. Grit herself, knew anything of her.

This was most disappointing, for he had already been looking forward to their next meeting with pleasurable anticipation, and framing a few words which would express his anxiety after her welfare in the most eloquent words of her poetic language.

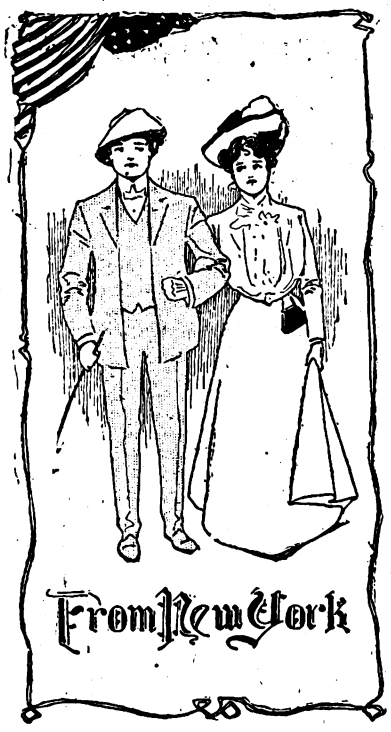
Do what he would he could not forget that pretty face and gentle voice, and he found himself singing, "Some Day" as he wandered about the garden on a moonlight night in a voice so plaintive that one old lady sent down her maid to inquire if he was feeling unwell, and if there was anything which she could do for him.

He procured an Italian dictionary and phrase book, and sat late into the night, brushing up his knowledge of the language, which had never been a very extensive one, and every day he wandered up and down between the boarding-houses and the village, looking out for that little red-wheeled cart with the spirited bay horse and the charming young lady inside.

However, it never came his way, and for the very good reason that Miss Frost's aunt had forbidden her ever to drive out alone again, and condemned her to the family carriage and the driving of old Carter Pattenden, the family coachman, who always avoided that hill into the village whenever he could.

So for many days the young man never saw the beautiful foreigner who had broken his romantic heart, while pretty Mildred Frost hardly knew whether she was wretched or happy, when she thought of the wonderful romance that had come into her life, for she owned to herself that she adored the organ-grinder, who was certainly a prince in reduced circumstances.

Digitized by Google



At last they met. It was in this way. The young man was consoling himself by fishing on the banks of a little stream which ran through a wood, and Miss Frost was out for a solitary walk, lost in contemplation of the happiness which was in store for her some day, when the second volume of her novel in real life would be good enough to begin.

"My gallant preserver," she cried, as she caught sight of his picturesque broad-brimmed hat. "Oh, signor, is it possible?"

And he answered in Italian also.

"Signorina, this is the happiest hour of my life. Ah, how I have dreamt of this meeting, how I longed with all the passion of my heart to speak to you once more, to stand face to face, and to gaze into those dazzling eyes," he had learnt this by heart out of an Italian novel, and he was rather proud of it.

And so these two began to make love to one another in a foreign language, and never for a moment did either of them suspect the nationality of the other. Miss Frost felt sure that her aunt would not welcome an organ-grinder as a guest, and so she had to make excuses for not asking him to call.

The young man, on his part, fished for an invitation as he had never fished for trout. He was a gentleman, and he thought that after the open way in which they had expressed their admiration for one another the least the young lady could do was to ask him to five o'clock tea.

He was desperately in earnest over this adventure, and he was burning to know her parents and to pay his addresses properly. However, Miss Frost did not feel equal to introducing a wandering musician into her aunt's drawing-room, and although she was in her heart secretly hoping that he would suggest an elopement, she did not dare even to think of her father's passion when he heard of her attachment for this handsome organ-grinder.

"I wish to goodness that she knew a little English," thought the young man as his adored sat on one side of the stream with a phrase book hidden under her muff, and he sat on the other with a dictionary concealed in his fish basket. "I don't understand half she says, except when she condescends to talk in the language of the eye. I expect something unpleasant will come of this."

Something did.

One evening about twilight the young man and Miss Frost sat in the little cove, which they had chosen on account of the utter seclusion, upon some damp but very mossy rocks.

His arm was about her waist, her head on his shoulder, and he had called her "Carissima" and "Bella Carissima" several times when an avalanche rolled down the steep bank upon them. That was the effect. It was, however, only the portly form of Mr. Nicholas Frost who had come down from town for the day and hearing that his daughter had gone out for a solitary walk, had set out in search for her. and attracted by the sound of voices, he had pitched upon the lovers, and, slipping in the excitement of the moment, he had come down the slope with a rush.

They broke his fall, but when he picked himself up he began to use language which was more forcible and penetrating than polite or coherent. And in the pauses he wanted to know "what the dickens his daughter was doing, and who on earth the confounded rascal was who sat with her."

The young man, quite conscious that he deserved the reproof, only it was the girl's fault for not having asked him to call, was just feeling in his pockets for a card, and wondering somewhat at the fluency with which the old gentleman, who was evidently her guardian or her father, spoke English, when, to his utter amazement, the girl flung herself on her knees.

"Father, please don't be angry," she pleaded in perfect English. "This is the noble organ-grinder who saved my life. He cannot speak one word of English, and in saving me broke his organ, and has to support himself by fishing. Remember, father, that but for him I should now be in my grave. Oh, father, I love him, and so, as you love me, be merciful."

"Mildred Frost," said the old man, "you're an idiot. Here, you organ-grinder, can you speaky Englesy at all, you know?"

"Perfectly," said the young man, with a gesture of despair. "In fact, I'm an Englishman. I thought your daughter was an Italian lady until this moment, and she apparently paid the same compliment to my knowledge of the language Allow me to explain the somewhat embarrassing position into which you have put us by your unexpected arrival. I have, I need hardly to say, the most respectful admiration for Miss Frost, and wish to——"

"I can't listen to any explanations," interrupted the old man, stamping his foot on the ground in ungovernable fury. "What business have you to make love to my daughter, you disreputable, dirty, lazy, good-for-nothing vagabond? If you broke your confounded organ in saving her life, although I would like to know how the dickens you did that, I will pay for a new one. I am deeply grateful for what you have done," he added, growing more conciliatory at the look of pain and supplication in his daughter's eyes, "but you see organ-grinding or fishing is not—that is—I——"

"Quite so," said the young man, with slightly heightened colour. "Only there seems to be some mistake. As to organ-grinding, I'm only an amateur. I thought your daughter knew that. I'm no more a professional than I'm an Italian. And perhaps you know James Calvert by name. He has rather an extensive business in the City. I'm his only son. It was a mutual mistake."

The old man sat down on the rock as if he had been stunned. "Done it again," he muttered to himself. "Lost my second chance. There's nothing for it but suicide now. What a fool I am to be sure. I might have seen the fellow was a gentleman."

However, when he had made it clear that he quite understood and appreciated what a good match the young man would be for his daughter, and how proud he would be to call Mr. Calvert, junior, his son-in-law, he found that things were going all right after all. The young man had no idea until he was married to Mildred, daughter of Nicholas Frost, that his father-in-law was no other than the ruined speculator who had lost all his money through his careless dealings with the firm of Calvert and Son, Throgmorton Street.

Stanley Hammond.

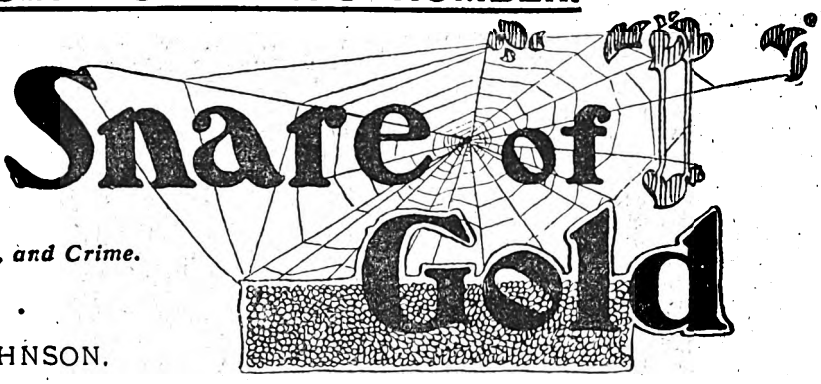
To Story Writers.

We shall be pleased to consider complete novelettes of about 20,000 words in length, and to pay cash down for those accepted. Manuscripts must be type-written (or very legibly hand-written), and should be sent to The Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London. W.C. Postage for return of MSS., if unsuitable, should be inclosed.

Digitized by Google

CONCLUDES IN THIS NUMBER.

The Snare of Gold



A Tale of Love, Ambition, and Crime.

· · By · ·

Henry T. Johnson.

TWENTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER.

Madeleine Pleads with her Father.

"Ronald Geldart was an outcast from his father's house. Now he is charged with the cruel murder of a poor lady whose only offence was clearly that she knew this Harvey Bligh for what he was; held in her possession the secret of his past, and, no doubt, to that knowledge owed her cruel death," continued Lord Lynton.

"Father! Father!" cried Madeleine, in anguished accents. "You must not speak of him so cruelly and so unjustly!"

"Why not?" exclaimed her father fiercely, fixing a thunderous look upon her.

And she, drawing herself erect, said very quietly and slowly: "Because I love him."

For some moments her father was silent, rage and amazement choking his utterance, then he demanded in a strained and husky voice: "How far has this folly gone? Has anything been said between you?"

"Yes," she answered, "he has asked me to be his wife, and I have promised."

"What! What! I could find it in my heart to say bitter things to you, but, of course, what has transpired has put an end to your folly; you will never see him again."

"On the contrary, I am going to see him now."

"To see him? A man in prison on a charge of murder—one who before long will doubtless be a felon. I forbid you, I dare you—dare you to sully the name you bear by such a course."

"I am sorry," she said, "because till now, strangers in all save ties of blood as we have been, I have always striven to obey you—but now——"

"Now? Well, now this fellow lies in a police-cell, the evidence against him, even without going into it is so overwhelming, that they will not grant him bail. And you——"

"I am his affianced wife. I believe in him and love him. It is in the hour of his direst gloom and peril that my place is most clearly at his side. In my hour of danger he rushed to my aid at peril of his life, in his time of peril I go to him whatever may befall."

"Go then," said the Viscount, pointing to the door, "but—you will not return, my house no longer is your home, you cease to be my child."

For a moment she swayed, convulsed by the conflict within her, not alone of love and duty, but of love and love, of duty and duty. Then she went forth out of the stately mansion, that palace in a colony of palaces, hastening in the direction of the cell wherein her lover lay!

Ronald sprang up with a glad cry. The station gaoler was a stern man, but with a strong heart within his coat of official mail, and he affected an absorbing interest in the perusal of a card of rules throughout their tête-à-tête, and there in the grim surroundings of the cell, in Ronald Geldart's darkest hour, the girl he loved repeated once again all that she had confessed of love for him, and trust and faith, in happier scenes, in brighter hours, all that and more.

So that when, a little later, he faced his accusers in the dock, he did so with head erect and a gaze so unflinching, that while some could not find it in their hearts to believe that the hand of Cain could rest upon a brow so frank and open, others, readier to believe evil, added to the list of his alleged offences the crime of callousness, averring that just the man who could bear himself so nonchalantly would do the evil deed.

Eric Geldart, called, repeated the evidence he had given at the inquest as to identification; also he identified the letter, making the appointment with the deceased on the night in question as being in his brother's handwriting.

This, however, Ronald admitted, reiterating also his admission at the inquest that he had kept the appointment on the night in question. And once again he was remanded.

TWENTY-NINTH CHAPTER.

Geldart Determines to Act.

George Geldart had attained his heart's desire, the end and aim he had aspired to had been reached.

What the big picture to be some day painted, the big book to be some day written, the big battle to be some day fought and won—what these things are to other men, his System was to him, it was his great work, at length he had achieved it, and, like countless men and women before him, he found the yearned-for fruit when gathered turn, like Dead Sea apples, to ashes on his lips.

His pet idea had realised his most sanguine expectations. Hundreds of thousands of pounds in various banks stood to the credit of the quaint, mysterious old man in the names of the various trusts and syndicates under whose denomination he, in conjunction with Sampson Scrimshaw, worked his elaborate scheme, and his one alloy of bitterness had been the reflection that, had his wilder son and partner had faith in him, and had his younger son availed himself of his birth-right partnership instead of flinging it aside, even the gigantic fortune he had piled up with Scrimshaw might have been multiplied, in fact, that with extended operations, their hoard might have surpassed those imaginations and calculations.

And there had been the consoling reflection that even yet it was not too late; he could go back to them now with his system proved, his new Golconda not only prospected but worked, and its output assayed, his Eldorado not only explored but exploited.

Wealth—wealth beyond the dreams of avarice, beyond the realms almost of human imagination could be his and theirs, and he could furnish proof, could give them earnest of the untold-wealth in store.

And then this had happened. Just when he had added the topmost pinnacle to his house of cards—of winning cards—at a breath the whole structure had collapsed in ruin, the son he had wronged and whom he meant to compensate so wholly, so munificently, and whose name he meant to clear from that unjust stain, now lay beneath a yet more heinous ban, charged with that supreme offence for which the law prescribes its extremest penalty.

Digitized by Google

That Ronald had done this thing he could not believe, and, reading the accounts of the tragedy, putting the evidence piece by piece together, he remembered on the night in question meeting, just by chance, Eric and Blagdon near that spot, coming from the direction where the ill-fated girl was found, within a few minutes, perhaps seconds, of the crime, and reflected that had he not turned aside to avoid encountering but pursued his path, he must have happened on the murdered girl.

What was Eric doing there on the very scene of the murder of the misguided girl who held the secret of his fraud?

And then, reading the account of Eric's evidence at the inquest, and listening to the stray comments that reached his ears regarding the affair (for the matter was the chief topic of public discussion), comments directly, desperately condemnatory of Ronald and sympathetic with his brother, the old man knew that Ronald had spoken only the truth and that it was his Judas brother who had lied.

What should he do? What could he do?

Suppose he stood forth before the world and proclaimed aloud his strange, weird story, who would believe him? Ronald perhaps, whose accusers would declare that belief, even if expressed, to be a lie. Eric? Eric might believe, but he would lie his hardest in denial, steep his soul in blacker perjury than ever to hide the lies and fraud of earlier days. And Blagdon? the arch hypocrite and humbug, would indorse his perjury.

True, George Geldart was conscious of the wealth at his command, but how was that to aid him?

Stanyer could tell his version of the story, but then to Stanyer he had represented himself as a very different individual in most ways from the well-known and highly-respected George Geldart believed to have died in Bryanston Square, and to be now resting beneath the marble sarcophagus of the family vault inscribed with his many alleged virtues.

Besides, even if he proved his story, which in the end he possibly might do, how was that to aid him? How was that to hinder Eric from his sinful hounding of his innocent brother to the scaffold?

What should he do? What could he do?

Whatever there was to be done, however many steps he had were to be taken, this was the first: to seek out Eric, to face him, and by all or any means prevail upon, force him if need be, to lift the load of calumny and perjury that he had heaped upon his brother's head.

THIRTIETH CHAPTER.

Blagdon Gets a Shock.

THREE men were seated in the smoking-room of Sampson Scrimshaw's luxuriously appointed flat. One talking, the others listening with indrawn breath.

And when George Geldart finished his story Scrimshaw wiped beads of perspiration from his brow, and Stanyer, clutching the arm of his chair, instinctively moved that chair a little farther from the speaker.

A shudder and a silence fell upon the two men, to whom it seemed that they were in the presence of one back from the grave, listening to the voice of one risen from the dead. And at last Stanyer, in a strained, husky voice, said slowly:

"Then, that man at Sydney was telling the truth?"

"Absolutely," said Geldart. "I knew Dick Farningham's cousin who went out to Australia very well."

His elbow resting on the table, he leant his head upon his hand with an absent, saddened air. His scheme had turned out so wrong, and ended so badly; the System had been proved; he had in what seemed to him the short sequel to his life's story amassed a fortune, yet what did it avail him?

He had also proved his younger son innocent of the theft of which he had suspected him, but then, at what a cost!

He had proved his elder son a very villain, how deeply dyed a villain he dared not even think; and Clare—whom he had regarded almost as a daughter—Clare was dead—murdered, and his younger son stood charged with the awful crime.

He was sure that younger son was innocent, also, of this charge, but who was guilty? That was the question he scarcely dared to frame.

"Well," said Scrimshaw, after a pause, "this accounts for a lot that puzzled me. I knew that only a man of long experience and colossal ability could be so perfect a master of financial craft as you. I knew you had a story of some kind, that you had been a man of mark.

"What I imagined was that in some way yours was a second life, though not in the way it has turned out to be; that in your earlier phase you had made some big mistake, something had happened that you could not face, and when I noted your aversion to meeting many people, and particularly people moving in certain swims and circles, and, again, when once or twice very early or very late callers at the office passing you casually upon the stair asked who was that strange old man, and tried to cudgel their brains to locate the face, I was all the more convinced.

"I remember watching from my window between the lights one night I saw a man in passing turn and look at you, then grow white and stagger, one hand on his brow, and the other on his heart; and when Jack Widdicombe came to the City to consult me about the Meteor, as he entered my room with a face white as death, he gasped out that he had seen a ghost."

"It seems to me," said Stanyer, "you'll very likely find some difficulty in establishing the fact that you are yourself, especially if you have two such men as Blagdon and that bright elder son of yours to deal with. Why didn't you make a clean breast of it all when you met me?"

"We hadn't met for so long, we'd become little more than strangers, and, to tell the truth, I was a little bit amused by the way you patronised me; it was a novel sensation. And then, again, I saw my way to fulfilling the dream of so many years and testing my System. But now I'm more bewildered than I was in those weird hours when the terror of the fate I had only just escaped was still upon me. What can I do—what can I do?"

"Clearly the first thing to be done," said Scrimshaw, self-possessed and matter-of-fact as ever, "is to extract the truth out of your son Eric and his precious partner. It won't be the easiest task. Getting butter out of a dog's mouth will be child's play to it. Eric will battle like a tiger; he's a villain, but he's a villain of grit—the easier man to tackle will be Blagdon; he's not such a villain as the other, but he's flabbier. Now it seems to me our best course is to get him here."

"Would he come?" asked Stanyer.

"He'll have to," said Scrimshaw. "I'll make him!"

"How?"

"I've got him in the toils; when you've got a man set fast in the toils of debts that he can't meet you can make him dance to a good many tunes, according as you pull the string. One moment!"

He walked across to the telphone and asked for Blagdon's number; then they heard him in conversation with the man they wanted.

"I want you to come over here to my rooms in Walsingham House. You can't? I'm afraid you must. Can't; you distribute prizes to—what? Oh, well, the Young People's Self Help and Mutual Improvement Society must get somebody else. You don't understand my tone? Come over here and then you will. Look here, if you're not at my rooms by nine o'clock to-night I close your account and tell my lawyers to put on all pressure. Don't do that? Well, you come here. What's it all about? Tell you when you come. Is it to your benefit? It's necessary to your safety. You'll come? Of course you will!"

He rang off, and turned to his visitors.

Digitized by Google

"That cur will come to heel." Then he rang up Eric.

"Want to see you here at half-past nine. At the House? No, here—I'm not coming down. You must? I tell you you mustn't. What do I mean? Come here and I'll tell you. You mean to vote against the Amendment? You must pair. What the dickens am I driving at? Come here, and you'll see. You'll demand an explanation? You'll get it. Yes, I've been dining, quite wisely. Be here at ten to-night or to-morrow's papers will publish something more than interesting and less than pleasant, so far as you are concerned. You will? Oh, yes, I'll explain my words, and more. Good-bye!" Then to his guests:

"He's coming too."

* * * * * *

The hour brought the man. Precisely as the subdued chime of the bronze pedestal clock in Scrimshaw's smoke-room sounded nine the soft-footed, subdued-mannered man-servant announced "Mr. Blagdon," and Boanerges, very flustered and perspiring, and breathing deeply and rapidly, hurried in. Having glanced round the room to see they were alone, he exclaimed:

"Bless my soul, Scrimshaw, what's the meaning of this? I was perfectly astounded by your peremptory tone and words; perhaps, however, it sounded differently through the telephone."

"Yes, the tone does lose in transmission. Sit down."

"But surely, Scrimshaw, you're not going to be unpleasant with regard to my account? You've always been so agreeable, when the balance has been heavier against me than now, and at the present moment it would be most inconvenient; in fact, impossible for me to—arrange a settlement."

"It depends on you whether I am going to be pleasant or otherwise."

"Bless me! what do you mean? What have I done?"

"It doesn't matter what you have done, it's what you're going to do that matters."

He touched a bell. Frederick Stanyer entered, and Scrimshaw, motioning him to a seat, went on: "This gentleman is Mr. Stanyer, back from Australia; you don't know him, but that's of no importance."

Blagdon puffed out his cheeks.

"I want him to listen to what I am going to read, and you are going to sign, and he and I are going to witness."

"But you've got it all in the accounts. I've never disputed your figures."

"It has no more to do with our account than with the man in the moon. Listen!"

And Blagdon, with his eyes almost starting from his puffy cheeks, listened while Scrimshaw read. And this is what he heard:

"I, Boanerges Blagdon, of The Laurestinas, Brixwell, in the County of Surrey, and of Billiter Square, in the City of London, merchant and broker, being of perfectly sound mind, conscious of and responsible for my actions, hereby make this solemn declaration.

"In the month of January of the present year I did in conjunction with Eric Geldart——"

Boanerges clutched the arms of his chair.

"Conspire unlawfully to commit the following offences."

"Why, what does this mean?" said Blagdon, starting up, with a catch of the breath and even paler yet.

"Sit down, and I'll tell you." And Scrimshaw went on reading:

"Firstly, having embezzled from the partnership assets of the then firm of Geldart, Blagdon and Geldart, of Billiter Square aforesaid, merchants and brokers, the sum of £10,000 in notes!"

Blagdon gasped.

"Is that man a detective? I won't sit here!"

"You'd better." And Scrimshaw repeated: "The sum of £10,000—to procure and incite one Clare Armitage, spinster, now deceased——"

The man's face turned from white to grey.

"To abstract the keys of a certain desk on the premises of George Geldart in Bryanston Square. Secondly, in conjunction with the said Eric Geldart, to change the said notes and with the proceeds thereof to replace the amount of the said embezzled assets. Thirdly, to steal and destroy a certain promissory note for £1,500 given by me to the said George Geldart, Esq., of Bryanston Square aforesaid, to secure the sum of £1,500 advanced by him to me. Fourthly, with the said Eric Geldart and one Hamish Macquoich, L.R.C.P., to manufacture false and fraudulent evidence respecting the mental condition of the said George Geldart with the object of and for the purpose of placing the said George Geldart under detention in an asylum for the insane."

Scrimshaw paused. Blagdon, with a dogged, hunted look in his eyes, cried:

"Is that all?"

"Not quite all, there's something I am going to mention later. But so far you'll sign."

"I won't," said Blagdon hoarsely. "I deny it all—all!"

"Just as you denied giving the promissory note!"

He passed his hand across his brow. What did it all mean? Had Eric split? But, no! even if he would have done so it would be as fatal to himself as to Boanerges. And if Eric had not split what other evidence could there be? Geldart was dead. Clare? With a shudder he reflected that Clare was dead. What then was all this indictment? What was their attempt to wring this confession from him based upon? Theory, imagination, bluff; then he would meet it with bluff.

"It's all a lie, an infamous lie!" he exclaimed, "and I will nail it to the counter and I will assert myself and vindicate my character, my unblemished character, against those who dare to assail a man in my position. Yes, by George, sir, I'll do so to their cost!" Then, after a moment's pause, convinced that he was on the right track, he turned on Stanyer.

"Are you a police officer? If so, where are your credentials? I demand to see them. If you are not, how dare you intrude your presence on me. And you, Scrimshaw, how dare you bring me here to listen to a charge so false, so infamous!"

"I'll explain that later," said Scrimshaw, striking a vesta and applying it to his cigar. Then, his foot upon the arm of his chair, after a few thoughtful puffs, he said:

"There's one other clause I'm going to add, but I'm going to get you to draft it."

"Some other preposterous lie. And what may that relate to?"

"The murder of Clare Armitage, and your presence on the scene at the time!"

All the bluff, all the bravado of Blagdon was instantly crushed and pulverised; his knees fell over with a sudden jerk; his manner, his bearing, the whole man, suddenly collapsed as he listened to the thundered words—met the thunderous gaze of his accuser, a gaze he had never seen in that man's eyes before.

Digitized by Google

"Now," said Scrimshaw, "there is pen and ink, add the other clause and—sign!"

"I won't—I won't!" he said in a hoarse, choking voice. For a moment he seemed unable to breathe. "I'll leave this place; let me out—let me out!"

"When you have signed!"

"But I won't; I'll leave this place!" He made for the door, Scrimshaw put his back to it, and the key clicked in the lock. He gazed at the windows.

"I'll shout for police!" Then his eye caught another door. Panting and breathless he made a dash towards it, turned the handle, flung it open wide. "You'll pay for this!" he said, facing the two, for they were standing calm and immovable, making no sign to stay him. "As for your other clause," he went on, "it's only another lie, we—weren't—I mean I wasn't there!"

"You were! You were!"

"Who saw me there? Bah!" for his question unanswered by them, he turned, dashed into the adjoining room, a dimly-lit chamber round which he searched, casting a hasty glance for yet another door.

And his eyes fell upon a mirror, a mirror reflecting the tiny gleam of one solitary gas jet. And his own white face.

And another face. Oh, God!—the face of George Geldart! whom he had seen in his grave clothes lying in his coffin! There—there it was beside him! With a shriek he turned from the reflected image, and lo! there face to face, close to him, almost touching him stood the image that had been reflected.

A moment, with hair rising erect, with a great spasm at his heart, he looked upon the face and form of the George Geldart whom he had betrayed, whose son he was content to let unjustly hang—then down in a heap he crashed and tumbled at his feet.

THIRTY-FIRST CHAPTER.

Father and Son.

So complete was his collapse that for a while they thought the shock had caused heart failure. But by-and-bye he recovered consciousness and came round. Only they dared not let George Geldart again approach him.

Piteously, frantically he clung to them as a child might to its parents, beseeching them to keep what he could not conceive to be other than the apparition, the accusing spirit of the man he had wronged, away.

And when they bade him, as the condition of their so doing, sign that confession, he, whimpering abjectly, assented to sign it as it stood. But Scrimshaw was firm.

"Bring Geldart in," he said, "let him tell what he knows!" And then the broken wretch bade them give him the pen and he would sign it, clause and all, only in mercy let them keep the awful Thing away.

Then Scrimshaw put it to him that he was there, and with the certainty of one thing for the basis of a guess at another, that he was standing by when it was done.

"No, no, not close by! Not far off, but I could not see what was going on for the mist and the darkness.

"Put that down, Stanyer! But you knew!"

"Not all, not all. I couldn't tell why she was screaming."

"Write that down too."

"You didn't think that he was killing her?"

"No, no; not till he came back and I saw his hands."

"Write fast, Frederick Stanyer:"

"Her blood upon his hands, on Eric Geldart's hands, and then you knew what he had done!"

"Not quite, not for certain; for when I challenged him he wouldn't answer, he only washed his hands at the fountain, then caught me by the arm and hurried me away."

"My God!" ejaculated Scrimshaw, "this is the worst thing I ever heard. Poor, poor Old Mystery! Have you got it all, Stanyer?"

"And hurried me away," Stanyer repeated. "Yes, there it is."

"Now sign," said Scrimshaw, handing the beaten, pulseless, backboneless wretch the pen.

A moment he strove to make one final stand.

"It'll mean my ruin!" But they, knowing that, whatever the penalty, he had merited it, knowing with what unhesitating callousness he had been content if not to wreck, to suffer another's ruin, to hold his tongue when even a word might save an innocent life, were quite relentless.

"Sign!" said Scrimshaw. "Bring Geldart in; let him tell him all he knows!"

"No, no!" he quavered hastily, and, knowing that they knew much, but not how much they knew, and dreading the approach of the man he had seen nearly a year ago in cerements, the man he for long had thought his treachery had killed, he took the pen and signed.

And no sooner had he done so than the consciousness of what he had done flashed upon him, possessed him even more strongly than his terror.

"Give it me back!" he clamoured. "I deny all—deny you to prove anything!"

But he appealed in vain. Scrimshaw, snatching the paper with one hand, with the other thrust him back into his chair.

"My friend, it is so seldom you perform a really honest action that, having brought you to one, I can't stand by and see you spoil it. And now you'd better have another nip of brandy to bring you quite round. Hullo!" for a bell rung, just as the chime hummed out the half hour and the smooth-faced, smooth-tongued, smooth-mannered servant announced:

"Mr. Eric Geldart."

"Don't let him in; don't let him see me, he'll—he'll murder me!" And Scrimshaw, opening a third door, he bundled swiftly through it, and made his way down a side stair out into the street, out into the world that he scarcely dared to face and that ere long might be ringing with the news of his disgrace.

The member for Little Claverton entered with a stern, inquiring look on his face.

"I don't understand your message, Mr. Scrimshaw, and am here to demand an explanation." Then his eye fell upon Stanyer.

"What does this mean?" he asked. "I was not aware that I was going to meet a gentleman with whom I am unacquainted."

"I think we shall be able to explain everything, Geldart," said Scrimshaw, lazily; "won't you sit down, and, if you'd like a drink, there's the tantalus."

"I will not sit down, and be hanged to your tantalus! I came here to learn your meaning in presuming to address me as you did just now over the telephone."

"And you shall. I sent for you here to save a life."

"What do you mean?"

"Your brother's life."

"My brother's life is nothing to me. He and I have long ceased to be brothers, and he must take the consequences of his crime."

"Precisely, but not of yours."

"What!" for a moment his eyes wavered and his face paled. "What new insolence, I may say madness, is this?"

"Neither madness nor insolence; plain, straightforward fact. I sent for you to clear your brother from the charge of murder now made against him, and from the earlier slander fixed on him of having robbed his father."

"And you and my brother can be hanged if you think that, because I have done business with you, and perhaps you have a few thousands against me on your books, that entitles you to be insolent; let me tell you, you have mistaken your man! After this interview never presume to communicate with me in any way again."

"So be it," said the other, "but before this interview closes let me read something that may interest you."

And he read aloud—"I, Boanerges Blagdon," and Eric started as at an electric shock, and as Scrimshaw read on and on his visitor's face became more set and rigid, his breath came and went slowly, his cheeks, even his lips, paled and his eyes

Digitized by Google

quivered with a dangerous light, his hands were clenched till the nails cut into the flesh

Stanyer, watching him narrowly, marked how when Scrimshaw reached the fifth clause Eric's nostrils dilated, his breath came deeper and faster; watched him, too, just as Scrimshaw had reached the last line of that confession, spring like a panther at the man who held it, and seeing this flung himself upon him, took him by the throat, and in another instant Scrimshaw had his wrist in a vice-like grip, for he was strong of hand as well as head.

"None of this, or else—a whistle, and the police are here, and you will leave with handcuffs on your wrists!"

"Scrimshaw, you shall pay for this!" cried Eric.

"I pay what I owe. Now listen to me. There is time for you and Blagdon to clear out to some country where extradition treaties cease from troubling, leaving a confession which clears your brother."

But the expression of impatient scorn on Geldart's face as well as on his lips, interrupted him.

"Very well then," he said, "alternatively, your brother steps out of the dock a cleared and vindicated man, and you take his place, charged with the crime of which he will have been acquitted."

"Scrimshaw," said Eric, "you talk like a fool. Do you think I am a child to be frightened by such a bogey as that. Blagdon never signed that paper; it's a forgery, or, if he did sign, then he was out of his senses or under duress, and beyond that where are your witnesses?"

Scrimshaw touched a bell. Stanyer threw the door open and in a moment father and son stood face to face.

Yes. Eric beheld the father he deemed he had followed to the grave nearly a year ago, beheld him with eyes dilated and glistening with horror, consternation, dread; iron as he was for a moment his fibre gave way.

"What—what is this?" he gasped, then he, too, trembled unnerved. "Who is it?" he cried again. "It can't be a ghost, there aren't such things! It's a living man—but no, no, no! it can't be!"

"It is—it is," the old man cried in an agitated voice, broken by a choking sob. "Eric, my misguided, poor, sinful son, it is your father!"

Eric Geldart with slow steps retreated, maybe some four yards, with terror-dilated eyes fixed upon the grief-stricken man who faced him, the others looking on as though spell-bound. For a while he could not find his voice, until at last with an effort, he whispered hoarsely and slowly:

"No—no, it couldn't be! I don't know what your plot is, but you are not my father, though for a moment I almost dreamt you were his ghost."

Then in as few words as might be, George Geldart told the weird and eerie story of his awaking from the trance which had held him so long only just in time.

As he listened, Eric Geldart's face underwent many and strange evidences of the mingled emotions working within him; dread, horror, fear, doubt, incredulity, and as he listened he reasoned, thinking as always, what was best for his own safety, his own advantage.

And gradually, clearly, the conviction forced itself upon him that his safest course, the only course it seemed that would save him from ruin, perhaps from the gallows, lay in absolute and strenuous denial of that story.

Brushing aside all considerations as to its possibility, plausibility, probability, its truth or falsehood, when his father, ceasing to speak, bowed his face into his hands, Eric Geldart, by an effort of will recovering to some extent his normal composure, sneered:

"Upon my word, a likely story for a twentieth century generation. Whom do you expect to believe it?"

"I believe it," said Scrimshaw and Stanyer together.

"It is true," said George Geldart.

"And nothing is of less importance to me than your belief," said Eric, with a venomous sneer at the listeners to the story. Then to its teller, "You'll find it somewhat difficult to prove."

"Not so difficult perhaps as you imagine, Eric. If it were

(Continued overleaf.)

Wanted: More Babies.

In recent years so many gloomy predictions have been made concerning the decline in the birth rate in Great Britain, that it is quite refreshing to find that John Bull has still left a remnant of sturdy sons and daughters possessing the faculty of perpetuating their species in a degree not one whit less than the most prolific of their ancestors.

To the Lincolnshire Agricultural Society we are indebted for this inspiriting discovery. At their Annual Exhibition held recently in Lincoln, prizes were offered to the labourers who had brought up and placed out the greatest number of children. The first prize was awarded to Thomas Hought, of Tealby, Market Rasen, with a record of 19 children born, 17 brought up, and 12 placed out. Other competitors had families of 16, 15, 14, 13, and 12, there being altogether ten entries for the prizes offered.

That large families, such as these, should still be common in rural districts, at a time when the birth rate is steadily declining in the great centres of industry and commerce, is but another proof of the damaging effect of city life and air upon the national health and vitality. One eminent authority declares that of persons city born and bred, who have attained the age of thirty years, not more than one in every ten is free from indigestion in one or other of its varied forms. When we consider how the body is starved and poisoned and the vital functions impaired by this scourge of modern life, we cannot be surprised at any shrinkage in the birth rate or deterioration in the national physique. To stop this ruinous loss of vitality and restore the national stomach to its former efficiency is an object worthy the support of every true patriot. Fortunately no time need be lost in experiments. In Mother Seigel's Syrup we have at hand a digestive tonic that exerts a curative and stimulating influence upon the debilitated organs of digestion, which fully justifies the position it has held for thirty-five years as the national remedy for indigestion.

To tens of thousands of tortured dyspeptics it has brought comfort, health, and renewed vitality. One of them—Mr. W. Nicholls, of Whitehall Mansions, Archway Road, Holloway, N., says: "At one time everything I ate, and especially the things that I most relished, seemed specially designed for my torture. After every meal the pain and discomfort in my body and sense of fulness and oppression at the chest were most distressing and wearisome. Coupled with this were constant retching, and the frequent vomiting of an acid fluid. It didn't much matter what or how little I ate, my stomach seemed utterly unequal to its task and I suffered in consequence. Though I regulated my diet and tried all manner of medicines, I gained no permanent relief until I had recourse to Mother Seigel's Syrup, and that went right to the root of the malady. In a very short time, under its influence, I could eat whatever was set before me without fear of pain or distress, and felt brighter and more buoyant than I had done for months. If, by any chance, anything that I eat disagrees with me a few doses of Seigel's Syrup invariably put me right again. As a digestive tonic I consider it has no equal, and my own experience and observation justify me in strongly recommending it to all who are cursed with indigestion or a weak stomach."

Abounding vitality and buoyant healthfulness such as follow the use of this tonic of fruits, roots, and herbs, are the surest antidotes to dwindling birth rates and national decay.

Pity the Lazy Man.

Don't be too hasty in censuring the lazy. Disinclination for work is often an indication of ill-health, and the idler in such cases is deserving rather of pity than blame. Indigestion and torpid liver cause languor, depression, and physical and mental degeneracy as surely as Mother Seigel's Syrup, the tonic of fruits, roots and herbs, dispels indigestion, tones the liver, and gives energy, vitality, health, and that is a fact proved beyond doubt by the experience of thousands who have tried it.

Digitized by Google

not true, how could I have told you the conversation that transpired between you and Clare in what you deemed a death-chamber?"

"She might have blabbed—I mean I deny absolutely that such a conversation happened—it's a lie—a lie—a lie! Your object may be fraud or blackmail, but I'll defy you, and I'll fight you to the end."

"Eric!"

"My name is Mr. Geldart, sir, to you. My father, George Geldart, is dead and buried, and I shall know how to protect my own interests and my own good name. As for you, Scrimshaw, I shall have a searching inquiry into your share in this transaction. I'll have it all dragged out where you found this man, how the impudent, impossible story was hatched, what you paid or promised him."

Scrimshaw made a step forward, then paused, controlling himself, and said with a scornful laugh:

"What I paid him—ha! ha! ha! Your father, Eric Geldart, can buy you ten times over."

Eric, surveying the not too smart figure, with a sneer said: "Another strain on credulity! I never gave you credit, Mr. Scrimshaw, for so bold an imagination."

"It's true, it's true, Eric," said George Geldart, a note of triumph breaking into his tone. "I've worked the System, I've proved it, I've proved and it's rung true from beginning to end in every detail. I worked it with Scrimshaw; we started it with tens and made hundreds, with hundreds and made thousands, went on with thousands, made tens of thousands, with tens of thousands we made hundreds of thousands—and I've proved that if you'd only believed in me and been true to me, you, Blagdon, Ronald, aye, all of us, might have made our millions!"

Once again Eric blenched. The System, the System, that he had heard the father he deemed dead dilate upon, as he considered, rave about, the wonderful manipulation of figures and of financial mechanism.

And it had triumphed. Now he understood much at which he had marvelled.

The remarkable, unaccountable fluctuations in the Share Market of late, the frequent absences of Scrimshaw when Eric had called, his frequent and sudden visits to the Continent, the relegation of matters in connection with his ordinary business to his clerks, his recent developments in style of living, environment, and so on, his stupendous purchases at big prices of art treasures, horses, yachts, and so forth, and his munificent gifts.

Eric had always guessed that some abnormal influence was at work to account for these things, and had characteristically ascribed them to some colossal and triumphant stroke of fraud.

And then Blagdon's confession! Yes, yes, with growing horror he felt that the story he had just heard was true, felt that his own doom was sealed, but he would not own it, even to himself.

Facing them defiantly he exclaimed:

"It is all a pack of lies, part and parcel of some scheme of fraud, a scheme that I, aided by the law, will frustrate and expose, an impudent imposture that you shall rue and suffer for, each and all of you."

"Go then," said Scrimshaw, "judgment will follow you, will some day overtake you."

He little knew how near that some day was.

Eric flung wide the door, turned upon them one look of concentrated malignity and defiance, then dashed out of the room, strode swiftly to the outer door, wrenched the handle from the servant's hand, shouldering the astonished man aside, and hastened down the corridor.

Ting, went the bell. He rushed forward.

"Stay there with the lift," he shouted, "one moment."

"Too late, sir; stand back!"

But Eric, blind and deaf to all, except the passions that possessed him, rushed madly forward, clutching and forcing back the gate of the descending cage the man was closing. He forced it open, thrust himself forward, though the man cried, "For God's sake, back!"

There was a sound of a crashing, sickening blow, Eric Geldart, with a groan, sank in a huddled mass half-within, half-without the cage that fell—and then stopped fearfully.

A few minutes later a horrified group stood round his prostrate form, a doctor kneeling beside him in Scrimshaw's rooms, where, at his request, they had taken him.

Opening his glazing eyes he whispered: "How—long—have I—to live?"

"Not very long," said the doctor.

"Send for——"

"A clergyman?" asked the doctor, filling up the pause.

"No—a magistrate."

"My boy, my boy," said old Geldart, kneeling beside him—"my poor lad, what do you want to do?"

"To—put—things—right, to—undo—some—of—the—wrong, the—hand of judgment—has fallen—on me."

Then for a while only his heavy breathing and his father's sobs broke the silence.

"Do—you—forgive—father?" he whispered.

"Yes, yes, my boy, the blame was not all yours, it was mine—mine, I made a god of gold and taught my sons to worship it. Then he turned to Scrimshaw, who had just re-entered, accompanied by another man, demanding almost fiercely, "Who is this?"

"My neighbour, Jefferson, who is a magistrate."

"Take him away," said the old man—"let the lad die in peace."

"I cannot—go—in peace—unless—I speak."

"But oh, my son—my son!"

"He is right," said Scrimshaw, "you must remember that you have another son. Justice must be done before it is too late."

Then in the silence of what was to be his death-chamber, Eric Geldart spoke, slowly, painfully, but distinctly.

"I have—read—that paper—Blagdon's—con—fession, it is—true—I—not—my—brother—robbed—my—father, I, and—Clare—planted—the notes—to—throw—suspicion on my brother. I—killed—Clare Armitage—to silence—her. God—have—mercy—on my—guilty—soul—for—Christ's—sake!"

His head fell back, the whispering accents ceased, and the soul went forth unto the Seat of Judgment and, thank God, of mercy.

THIRTY-SECOND CHAPTER.

Wedding Bells and Reconciliations.

The Meteor, in its next issue, which appeared upon the following day, excelled itself, broke even its own record in the way of sensations. It had done many things, had exposed gigantic frauds, brought home unpleasant truths to exalted people, originated and fermented during its short career many agitations which had resulted in drastic alterations in the law.

But on the day following the sudden and tragic death of Eric Geldart, the Meteor provided its readers with a sensation that was the subject of general topic that night in every club, dinner-table, or place of assembly in London.

The morning papers had furnished one sensation in the death of Eric Geldart, the Member for Little Claverton, but the Meteor surpassed them. For just when the editor of the paper had passed the complete number, Scrimshaw burst into the office with orders to stop the machine, and was closeted for a while with Mr. John Widdicombe, the general manager, and the editor, with the result that two formes were unlocked and reset up, and the paper on the following day appeared with an article which set the town by the ears.

For it dealt with the whole story of George Geldart's narrow escape from premature burial, his second secret life, and it wound up with the declaration that Ronald Geldart, charged with the murder of Clare Armitage and against whom a coroner's jury had returned a verdict of Wilful Murder, was (Concluded on page 542.)

Digitized by Google

The "Borderland of Deafness."

It seems remarkable that many people who have defective hearing refuse to believe that they are deaf. Although such a defect may be slight or only noticeable when the afflicted person has a cold in the head, and may not seem worthy of attention, yet such a condition will, of a certainty, become actual deafness if neglected. In fact the Aurist finds it most difficult in many instances to determine when the ear ailment began and consequently looks with great suspicion upon the slightest degree of defective hearing as placing the afflicted person within the "Borderland of Deafness." The Editor of The Review of Ear, Nose and Throat Diseases, in the last issue of this medical journal, goes into this subject thoroughly, and for the sake of those who may be interested will send, post free, on application, a specially written paper on Tests of Hearing and the Prevention and Cure of Deafness. All applications should be addressed to The Editor, Drouet Institute, 10 Marble Arch, London, W. The Editor advises patients, however, when possible, to visit the Drouet Institute for a personal consultation with the medical staff. Consulting hours are—in the morning, 10 to 12, and in the afternoon, 2 to 4, week days only. A fee of five shillings is charged for personal consultations.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

BORAX STARCH GLAZE
IMPROVES ALL STARCH

The whole art

of successful ironing lies in the use of Borax Starch Glaze. There is no middle course. It is either Borax Starch Glaze in the starch—or flabby, dull, and dispiriting results. With it the finish of the best laundries can be obtained at home easily and every time. Borax Starch Glaze compels good results even with inferior starch, but when best starch is used the finish will be immeasurably superior to any before obtained.

One penny packet from the nearest Grocer or Stores gives practical and convincing proof.

FREE SAMPLE AND SOME NOVELTIES if you name this Paper and your Grocer.

BY SPECIAL APPOINTMENT MAKERS TO THE KING.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd., Birmingham.

BORAX DRY SOAP
FOR WASHING EVERYTHING.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor
66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "I may send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ross Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

DON'T COUGH for
KEATING'S LOZENGES
EASILY CURE
THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1s. 1½d. tins everywhere.

Ask your grocer for

EPPS'S

(The most nutritious)

COCOA

And take no other.

SULPHOLINE LOTION

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 56 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors,

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

Digitized by Google

absolutely innocent of the crime, and that his innocence would be established by the evidence of his dead brother, and by a written confession made by Boanerges Blagdon, the one time candidate for Brixwell.

And when on the afternoon of that day Ronald Geldart appeared on the remanded charge against him, the court was crowded to suffocation. It was Cousin Jack who conveyed the startling news to Ronald Geldart.

Cousin Jack, accompanied by Madeleine Lorraine and Ronald's solicitor, entered his cell. First they told him that they had good news for him, then that the good news meant that evidence was to hand clearing him of the crime, that that evidence was the confession, the dying confession of the actual murderer.

That that murderer was his brother!

And here the strain told on Ronald, and he broke down and sobbed upon the bosom of Madeleine.

But they soothed him, told him to nerve himself, to prepare to hear yet more startling news, and they paved the way to breaking that news by telling him that it cleared him from all suspicion of having robbed his father. This gave him comfort, a comfort tempered, however, by his own exclamation: "If only my father could have known!"

Then they told him that his father had known, they could satisfy him on that point, strangely, marvellously. Then, bit by bit, they broke to him the startling story of his father's narrow escape from premature burial by waking from the trance that was so like the death.

And later they brought his father to him, leaving the pair alone in that strange interview that wrung both their hearts, that stirred innumerable emotions.

And later on Ronald Geldart left that crowded court discharged, proved innocent without a stain, after one of the strangest hearings of a charge that had ever taken place within its walls.

Blagdon had been called, had been sent for, and, not in the slightest degree to the surprise of those who knew, could not be found. He never has been found, though rumours have arrived by travellers returning from Colorado, Denver, U.S.A., that a man answering his description, but a silent, saddened, broken-down old man, is living there in retirement, his only companion a devoted wife.

* * * * *

George Geldart, though he reassumed his name and identity, led thenceforth a quiet, subdued, secluded life, devoting the means he had amassed to the alleviation of want and suffering and amelioration of the lot of those around him.

The truth of his story was finally established by the Home Office granting exhumation of the casket that had been supposed to contain his lawful remains, but which was found to inclose instead only the contents he had enumerated. Hence the tablet to his memory was removed from the cenotaph, to be replaced, when the time shall come, by tributes rendered by sincerer hearts.

His few intimates are Cousin Jack, whose bright home he sometimes visits, and whose buxom, cheery little wife always affectionately esteems him as "Old Mystery." Stanyer, restored to the daughter he loved, is as happy a returned cornstalk as thrives on English soil. Also Scrimshaw, who having at last got tired of piling up fortune upon fortune, has taken to winning Derbys, growing orchids at a thousand pounds a bloom, and dreams of some day sending out a challenger to lift that cup that Britain covets but America has nailed down.

So now this tale is almost ended—a tale of wrong wrought, injustice endured; of suffering and of sin, but at last of innocence vindicated, of injustice in some degree atoned for, of wickedness brought home and terribly requited.

It ends, as all stories dealing with a lover and his lass should end—with wedding bells. Wedding bells for Ronald Geldart and for Madeleine Lorraine, despite her father's anger, his declaration that if she bore that name he would see her face no more.

They were married, as became the circumstances, very quietly, and after their wedding they went away together for a while to try to forget in new lands and new surroundings the sorrows they had known.

The wedding bells of Cousin Jack and Phyllis, who are none the less happy because once, a while ago, Phyllis closed and buried in her heart of hearts a little love story that only she herself knew of, and that never worked out to an ending.

And someone else still cherishes a story that she and she alone has ever known of. A little servant-girl in a Bloomsbury boarding-house, who, while polishing boots, fireplaces, or knives and forks, dreams again and again of that bright Apollo whom it was enough for her to behold and worship from afar. Her love story never will have an ending because it will endure as long as she lives, for her alone to know, for her alone to muse on, until her dreams are broken by the rocking of the bells and shrill or strident calls for Arethusa.

Viscount Lynton, deceived in Eric Geldart, broken in spirit and in fortune, had declared that he would never again look upon the daughter who had disobeyed him and who for the sake of the man who though proved innocent, bore the name of one who had led him to his ruin.

For years he kept his word, nor indeed was he approached with any overtures to reconsider it.

And then, at times looking back, he saw where he had erred, saw that the estrangement between them had been of his own causing; and, broken in health and fortune, he began to yearn for the daughter's love that he had thrown away.

And one day, to distract his mind from these thoughts with the Spring sunshine, the Spring air, and the Spring flowers, he strolled into the Park.

And, by-and-bye, he happened on a fair-haired little fellow scarce some five years old, in great distress, and inquiring the cause the Viscount ascertained the little boy had lost his nurse. Patting the little golden head, Lord Lynton asked where his home was, and being told the number of the house in Holland Park next asked the little belated wanderer's name.

A pair of blue eyes, still tearful but sunny, looked up frankly in his face, and the little fellow lisped:

"My name, dear kind gentleman, is Lupus Ronald Geldart."

Geldart! The old man started at that name. And Lupus! Then she had given his name to this, her first-born, her dearest loved with the sunny hair and eyes. Yes! yes! he could see something of Madeleine in those eyes.

Then she had not quite forgotten him, had preserved some love and tenderness for him, they were not quite so far estranged as he had thought!; had they known it, perhaps had never been really so very far estranged at all, only too silent, too reserved, too occupied each with his and her own ways; he too absorbed in his dreams of politics and wealth, enmeshed too tightly in the Snare of Gold to take even her, his only child, close to his heart.

And while these and a thousand other thoughts flashed through his mind, he was walking on holding the little fellow by the hand.

And the younger Lupus, confident, trustful, and now quite composed, began to chatter of the things that occupied his dreams by night and day—his boats, his pony, his toys, and—best boon of all—his dear mamma.

And by-and-bye they came to the threshold of the little fellow's home. It was swiftly opened—not by the pale-faced servants in the hall there, but by the distracted mother, who swiftly stooping swooped up her treasure to her arms. Then she looked at his friend and guide.

"Father! father!" she cried. "You—you brought him back to me!"

"No, no, Madeleine! He brought me back to you!"

The End.

Next week starts "A Criminal Millionaire," by George Griffith.

Digitized by Google

PRUDENTIAL GIGANTIC BALE

49/6 BEDDING & DRAPERY 6/- DEPOSIT 1/6 WEEKLY

This Bale contains Pair Full-sized heavy Whitney Blankets, 1 quilt, red and white, blue and white; White Honeycomb Marcella or Red Twill your choice; Pair Full-size White Twill Sheets, 2 Pillow Cases, 1 Bolster Case, 5 Toilet Mats, 1 Toilet Cover, 2 Turkish Towels, Pair Fine Lace Curtains, 1 White Table Cloth, 1 Fringed Damask Table Cover, 6 Dusters, 2 Tea Cloths—28 Articles 49/6. How to pay. Send 6/- only, we send Bale, carriage paid for approval; balance can be paid in six monthly payments of 6/-, and one of 7/6. If you pay balance on receipt, send only 38/6, saving 5/-. Address below.

55 ARTICLES FOR 25/- ON CREDIT.

Our Gigantic Parcel contains 6 Table Knives and Forks, 6 Dessert Knives and Forks, 12 Tea Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 1 pair Sugar Tongs, 2 Table Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, and 2 Salt Spoons. We send, carriage paid, on receipt of 3s.; balance 1s. weekly.

PRUDENTIAL FURNISHING STORES, 150-150L Seven Sisters Rd., Holloway, N.

GIVEN AWAY with this week's HOME NOTES (No. 510).

A PAPER PATTERN OF THIS BLOUSE.

Of all Bookstalls & Newsagents. PRICE 1d.

SONGS COPIED.

Legibly as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly 6d. page. MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

YOUR FUTURE IS KNOWN.

For 1s. Mr. WILDE will send a Reading of the Stars W. T. STEAD, Esq., and many other prominent gentlemen have testified to the accuracy of their forecasts. Send the exact or approximate hour of your birth, if possible, date, year, &c., together with P.O. 1s. and stamp. Satisfaction will be guaranteed, THE RESULT WILL ASTONISH YOU. SEND TO-DAY TO (DEPT. P.S.S.) GEO. WILDE, 143 High Holborn, London, W.C.

PAWNBROKER'S SALE

Every article in new condition.

SPECIAL BARGAINS UNREDEEMED.

A full list sent post free on application.

SAVE £ d $

13/6 Gent's magnificent 18-ct. Gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch, jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper, 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable curb (pocket to pocket) double Albert same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; thus together.

12/6 Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch, jewelled movement; exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed) elegant West-End pattern the two together.

14/9 Furs.—Magnificent Alexandra Dagmar necklet and muff, beautiful real Russian sable hair, worth 4 guineas, not been worn; sacrifice for 14.9; approval willingly.

19/6 Genuine Italian Mandoline, by Stridente, Naples; fine tone; 21 ribbed, real rosewood, pearl and tortoiseshell inlaid, in saddler-made case; approval.

8/9 Feather Boas; bankrupt stock; special bargains: real Ostrich Feather Boas, beautifully curly; perfectly new, in box; colours: grey, and white black and white, and natural.

10/6 Lustrous diamond and ruby Half-hoop Ring, set with 5 matchless doublet rubies and 8 real diamonds; solid gold, hall-marked.

7/6 Curb Chain Bracelet, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case.

6/9 Brooch; very handsome 18-carat rolled gold, 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls in case.

21/- Lady's solid gold Keyless Watch, jewelled in 10 rubies, beautifully engraved case, splendid time-keeper; 10 years' written warranty; week's free trial.

8/6 Fashionable Long Neck-chain; genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished; very choice design.

9/6 Organ Toned Melodeon; magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, and 4 acting stops, including Tremolo and Diapason action; rich powerful tone, perfect order.

9/6 Necklet with Heart Pendant, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise.

12/6 Magnificent 5-row Pearl Collarette; finest quality, mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case.

Any of the above articles sent on approval willingly.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

Our Readers will Please Remember that

TUESDAY, 3rd NOVEMBER,

IS

KING EDWARD'S HOSPITAL FUND

SHOPPING DAY,

and that a large number of shops in London will be displaying a notice in their windows that they are giving a percentage of their takings on that day to the London hospitals.

We hope, therefore, they will make a point of making some purchase, anticipating some requirements on this particular day, viz., TUESDAY, 3RD NOVEMBER. Most shops joining the scheme will be offering some special cheap lines, and reducing their prices to make a good day for the Hospitals. Boots and bonnets, furniture and eatables, all and everything, little and great, help the scheme.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Lax Lover.

"I HAVE been going out with a young man for four years," writes "SISSY," "but he has as yet said nothing of marriage, though he has told me he cares for me very much. I am not in a hurry to marry, but my friends keep on questioning me about the date of the ceremony and what sort of ring I am going to have. Don't you think it is time he made some proposal? I feel rather hurt at his want of confidence in me."

* * * * *

Yes, four years is a very long time for a courtship which has not blossomed into an engagement. I should quietly tell the young man the questions that are being put to you by your friends, and leave it to him to act in a straightforward way. Perhaps, as you say, he is putting by money for a home. In any case, he should have confided that much in you.

Calf Love Again.

"MATER" has a son of eighteen, living some distance from his home. When he writes, he generally refers at length to his "love" affairs. Lately he has been talking about becoming engaged, though he is only earning a very small salary. How should "MATER" act?

* * * * *

As a general rule, "MATER," youths of eighteen do talk rather freely about engagements, and such things, and are generally fairly flush in the matter of love affairs. These things are not to be taken as seriously as if the youth were four or five years older. I presume the young lady to whom he refers has parents, who are not likely to allow your son to pay too close attention to her. A little visit to him would enable you to judge matters for yourself, and if things look serious, you had better take steps to stop it. A word to the girl's parents would, perhaps, have the desired effect.

A Prejudiced Sweetheart.

"SOME months ago," writes "J. M. A.," "I fell madly in love with a girl of twenty-two. I am sure she returned my affections. Since that I have heard she is not fit to be loved by anyone. Much as I dislike to believe this, I have infallible proofs of its truth. I still love her, but feel I could not see her without being prejudiced. What is the right course to pursue?"

* * * * *

If "J. M. A." loves the girl, as he says, that is rather an argument against his contention that she is not fit to be loved. She must have some redeeming qualities to have attracted him as she has. Let him ignore the "infallible proofs," and find out for himself whether or not she is a fit object of his affections. Nobody is blameless in this world, and a lover should be the last one to cast stones at the object of his love. Be charitable, "J. M. A.," and only be influenced by your own personal feelings towards her.

How to Start an Affair.

"I MET a young man the other day to whom I took a great fancy," writes "H. T. Y." "He has not seen me since, nor has he written or sent any message, so I do not know whether he wishes to resume the acquaintance. However, I myself am very anxious to do so. Will you please advise me how I can give him the opportunity?"

* * * * *

If "H. T. Y." has a friend who knows the young man, she might ask her (or him) to convey the hint that she is anxious to open up correspondence. Should the young man be also inclined to do so, probably he will write to "H.T.Y." on some matter or other, giving her an opportunity of replying. If "H. T. Y." has not a mutual friend able to do this service, why not drop him a line herself? She might easily find some excuse for writing; asking him for an address, or something of the kind, and she could then judge from the tone of his reply if he is inclined to correspond more fully. If not, then "H. T. Y." had better let the matter drop, as the young man may have other attachments.

Etiquette of Presents.

"WHEN a man admires a girl, but has not yet proposed, or even expressed his feelings, would it be bad form to send her a present? If not, what kind of present could be sent?" "E. W." asks me this question, he himself being in such a position.

* * * * *

It is not correct to send a girl with whom you are slightly acquainted jewellery, or any item of toilet. Those are reserved for the later stage of the affair. At the first stage, the present should take the form of flowers, or pretty trifles, Books, music, too, are presents which can be given under such circumstances; or if "E. W." possesses a dog or a kitten, and knows the girl to be fond of domestic animals, he could make her a present of that sort. The present, by-the-bye, had better be made in response to some wish expressed by the young lady, or "E. W." may find himself in the absurd position of making an unwelcome gift. I have known stern parents to themselves return such presents to the sender, with curt notes, particularly in the case of jewellery. Certain gifts are looked upon as suggesting familiarity, and that is an unpardonable offence in a comparative stranger.

A Mature Flirt.

"MONA" is in doubt as to the genuineness of a sweetheart of hers. He is a gentleman sixteen years older than herself, who has no particular occupation, but lives with his mother. Though he kisses and squeezes "MONA," and professes undying love, he has told her that he cannot yet consent to a public engagement. I am asked to say whether I think the gentleman has no further intentions towards "MONA" than to flirt with her.

* * * * *

From your description, "MONA," the man does not altogether seem of the marrying sort. As he has no occupation, and has reached a mature age, and also, as you say, has had a good many love affairs, and been rather "fast," he seems the kind of man that would trifle with a young girl's affections, but avoid the responsibilities of marriage with her. I certainly should ask him definitely what are his intentions, and decline to permit his attentions unless he makes a definite proposal. And why not tell your mother? Surely her advice in the matter is the very thing you want? Without knowing the gentleman, it is very difficult for me to say whether or not he is sincere in his admiration.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A SITUATION WORTH £100 A YEAR

For a BOY. (Parents may help their Son to win.)

A SITUATION WORTH £100 A YEAR

For a GIRL. (Parents may help their Daughter to win.)

Offered by THE BOYS' LEADER, "The Paper a Boy can take Home."
Published by the Proprietors of "Pearson's Weekly," &c.

The Editor of THE BOYS' LEADER offers a Situation in the Offices of PEARSON'S WEEKLY, THE BOYS' LEADER, &c., and a salary of £100 a year to commence with, to a boy; and a like Situation and Salary of £100 a year to a girl.

100 CONSOLATION GIFTS WILL ALSO BE AWARDED.

These will be offered by competition, and the competition is this:—

SIX QUESTIONS WILL APPEAR EVERY WEEK IN "THE BOYS' LEADER."

THIS IS THE FIRST SET.

1. Who wrote Robinson Crusoe?
2. What famous British soldier is known as "Bobs"?
3. Who is your favourite hero (not fiction), and why?
4. Who made most runs in first-class cricket this summer?
5. Which is your favourite book, and why?
6. When was King Edward VII. born. Give year and day?

The Second Set of Questions will appear in THE BOYS' LEADER (1d. every Tuesday), on Tuesday, November 14.

It will be noticed that some of the questions call for an expression of opinion only, and others you will have to search for in books.

Cut out and paste these questions on a sheet of foolscap paper numbering it No. 1. Write your reply to No. 1. immediately below, and then follow with No. 2, and so on, saying in what book you found the information and who helped you to find it.

Anybody may help you provided you say who. No competitor must be over 21 years of age. No reply must exceed fifty words. Keep all replies until the last set appears and until we tell you to send them in. Write plainly in ink on one side of the paper.

HINTS

Most towns and even villages have now a Reference Library, so it will be easy to get access to books.
Parents and friends may be able to tell you many of the replies, and you can use this information provided you tell us how you obtained it.
This competition will be a valuable education for a boy or girl, even if they do not wish to enter for the prizes.
The two successful competitors will be given the choice, after we have arranged with their parents, of entering one of the following departments of our offices:—The Editorial Department, the Art Department, the Counting House.
Should the winners live outside London, we have no doubt we shall be able to arrange with their parents as to their residence.
At all events, here is an opportunity for some boy and some girl to put their feet on the first rung of Fortune's Ladder, and we hope every parent who has his child's interest at heart will make an effort on their behalf.

THE BOYS' LEADER is the best paper a boy and girl can read. It is only a few weeks' old, but has already, by reason of its healthy tone, taken the first place in this class of literature; and articles and stories are contributed by Jules Verne, George Manville Fenn, Theodore Roosevelt (President of the United States), Sir Henry Seton-Karr, M.P., Major Baden-Powell, T. P. O'Connor, M.P., Lord Ernest Hamilton, the late Max O'Rell, the Duke of Argyle, General Sir Evelyn Wood, G.C.B., &c., &c.

Digitized by Google

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

are composed of vegetable drugs of great purity and medicinal value; have been in almost universal use for over half-a-century, and are without doubt an Effective Corrective in all cases where a corrective is needed, as they act directly upon both the digestive and Nervous Systems

BEECHAM'S PILLS Assist Assimilation. Banish Biliousness, Cure Constipation, Develop Digestion, Liven the Liver, Strengthen the Stomach, Correct Unhealthy Conditions.

A box of BEECHAM'S PILLS should always be kept in the house, as like a "stitch in time," they may save much future worry, and on the first sign of any derangement of the system a dose should be taken, and they will invariably have the most beneficial effect.

They Cure Disease by Removing the Cause of It.

REMEMBER that if you require a reliable remedy to remove the complications caused by Biliousness, Imperfect Digestion, Torpid Liver and Impure Blood, you can always depend upon BEECHAM'S PILLS.

Sold Everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 pills), 2/9 (168 pills).

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 774.] Week ending October 31st. 1903. [Price One Penny.

"Give me those papers, before I count ten, or—your lover dies!"

(A Thrilling Incident from this week's "THE PURSUIT OF SARA." See inside.)

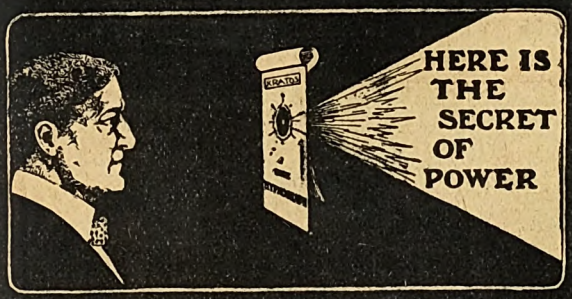
Digitized by Google

SELF-HYPNOTISM



MAKE YOURSELF OVER.

A new and unique device called The Hypnograph has been invented for Self-Hypnotism.

The idea is to use hypnotism on yourself and thus intentionally re-form your mind and character and improve your health through the well-known laws of auto-suggestion. It is perfectly harmless and a most beneficial, delightful and fascinating exercise.

The Hypnograph works with any one straight away. It impresses the mind with wonderful quickness and precision. It supplies a glorious opportunity to rapidly develop your Will-Power, Energy, Courage, Self-Confidence, Persistency, Concentration, and all the qualities of mind which make for Success in life.

The Hypnograph is strictly scientific. It is to mental work what the compass is to navigation. It cannot fail to help you. Until you have used it you cannot realize what a wonderful and beneficial thing it is.

FREE. At present The Hypnograph is not for sale, but is offered free in order to create an interest in our practical books on mental subjects. If you are sufficiently interested to want The Hypnograph write for the free Illustrated Booklet "The Power Within," enclosing 1d. Stamp for return postage.

RESEARCH PUBLISHING CO. (Dept. 437),
Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, London, E.C.

LIFE-SIZE DOLL FREE!

"Baby's Clothes will now fit Dollie." GIRLS can get this beautiful Life-size Doll absolutely free for selling only ten packages of the Electric Polishing Fabric, at 6d. a package. Something new for cleaning and polishing Jewellery, Silver Ware, &c., without the use of powder, paste, or liquid. Sells at sight. Write to day, and we will send you the Fabric post paid. When sold send us the money (5s.) and we will send you post free this Life-size Doll, which is 2½ft. high, and can wear baby's clothes. When stuffed, this doll is an exact reproduction in fast colours of a hand-painted French creation, done on extra-heavy cloth that will not tear. The workmanship is perfect, the colour effects the very finest. The doll is intended to be stuffed with cotton wool or flock, &c. It is this century's model of the old-fashioned Rag Doll that Grandma used to make and would make Grandma open her eyes in wonder. Dollie is printed with Golden Hair, Rosy Cheeks, Brown Eyes, Kid-Coloured Body, Red Stockings, Black Shoes, and will stand alone. If Mamma can donate one of baby's out-grown dresses that her little daughter can put on and off, button and unbutton to her heart's desire, the Life-size Doll will live in that child's memory long after childhood's days have passed. If you do not care to sell our goods, we will send the Doll post free to any address in the United Kingdom on receipt of 2s., or a single packet of SHY-NALL on receipt of 6d. These Dolls are sold all the year round.

SHY-NALL,

SHY-NALL CHEMICAL CO. (Doll Dept. 38E),
75 Queen Victoria St., London, E.C.

Special Notice to Foreign and Colonial Readers only.—Orders from abroad for dolls or single packets of Shy-Nall must be accompanied by an additional 6d., and for the ten packets of Shy-Nall to be sent on sale or return 9d. must be enclosed for postage. Remittance to be made by Post Office Order only.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS repayable on demand. 2½%

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

J. G. GRAVES'

BOOTS & SHOES

Footwear of every description illustrated from Photographs and fully described in our No. 6 Catalogue, which we forward Post Free. Full particulars of Easy Payment Terms, also of the Important Advantages offered to Cash Purchasers, enclosed with each Catalogue.

Agents Wanted. Liberal Commission.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., Sheffield.

Home Rupture Cure.

Marvellous Blessing to Those who are Ruptured. Proofs so Positive and From Such Reliable Sources as to be Free From All Doubt.

Dr. W. S. Rice (Dept. 431), 8 and 9, Stonecutter Street, London, E.C., has the distinction of perfectly curing even the most difficult ruptures of long standing. He does this without causing the patient one bit of pain, absolutely without danger and without the loss of a moment's time from work. He does not use the knife, and sends his method and treatment direct to the sufferer's home, where it can be used without assistance, and brings immediate relief. Dr. Rice has cured hundreds of old men who have been ruptured 30 and 40 years. Never before have such letters of testimony been received as Dr. Rice receives every day. Mr. James Cole, 13, Holdick Street, Midland Road, Peterborough, was cured at the age of 66 years. He writes Dr. Rice as follows:—"I had a bad rupture, and when I saw your method of cure advertised I was rather doubtful as to permanent cure; but I am thankful I tried it, for I do not feel anything of the rupture now. It was just the treatment I required to effect a cure." It will pay anyone who is ruptured to write to Dr. Rice for a sample of his method, which will be sent free by return of post. Investigate fully his method of cure. Do this at once. Don't delay in a matter of such importance. Write to-day. Thousands of cases cured.

MR. JAS. COLE.
From a Photo.

An admirable Food of the

EPPS'S

Finest quality and flavour.

COCOA

Nutritious and Economical.

BALDNESS.

A French Specialist who has devoted his life to the study of Hair Diseases, having cured thousands of almost hopeless cases, will send a FREE TRIAL PACKET of a genuine inexpensive treatment to all who write enclosing 2 stamps. New Hair grows in 4 to 10 Days.

Mr. C. R—— writes: "Your small sample has done me more good in a week than another much advertised remedy did in 6 months."

P. HENRI-FRANCIS,
BRIXTON ROAD, LONDON.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 774.] Week Ending October 31st, 1903. [One Penny.

Fascinating New Series. Start To-day.

THE PURSUIT OF SARA

For New Readers.

Miss Sara Gillespie, who is the relater of these experiences, found employment as a typine in the firm of Messrs. Templeton and Co., General Agents.

The partners in the firm, Mr. Templeton, Mr. Harrington Shackell, and Mr. Rigby Starr, treated Sara most courteously, especially the senior partner, who, before very long, induced her to tell him all about her absent lover, Noel Masterman.

The latter was by profession a doctor, but as he lacked the capital to start a practice in England, he had accepted the post of medical attendant to a friend, who was travelling on the Continent for the benefit of his health, and was at present in Nice.

Noel had been brought up by his uncle, Sir Francis Masterman, and had excellent prospects, but when he fell in love with Miss Gillespie, Sir Francis refused to have anything more to do with him.

Mr. Templeton assured Sara that he thought Noel had been very hardly treated, and suggested that the best thing for him to do would be to return, and he would see whether he could not obtain a practice for him.

Then one day Noel entered the office unexpectedly, and told his love he had had a wire from his cousin Herbert, saying that Sir Francis was not expected to live long. He had hastened from Nice in order to get his uncle's forgiveness before his death, only to find the Baronet already dead.

In his will, Noel's uncle had bequeathed him a thousand pounds, and with this he intended to buy a practice to which Mr. Templeton had recommended him.

One evening Noel and Sara paid a visit to Sir Herbert, and learnt from him that he had insured his life in favour of Templeton and Co. for fifteen thousand pounds. Just as they were leaving Sir Herbert's valet entered, and, with a cry of amazement, Sara asserted that he was Harrington Shackell, one of her employers. It was, however, explained that Shackell had a moustache, whereas the valet was clean shaven. With this explanation Miss Gillespie had to remain content.

All rights reserved.]

The following day Noel received a telegram summoning him back to Nice, and in order that he should be able to buy the practice in question, he gave the thousand pounds to Mr. Templeton, and signed a document authorising the firm to deal for him. By a piece of trickery, the senior partner converted this document into one authorising the firm to deal with his whole estate.

In the afternoon Sara overheard Templeton and Rigby Starr talking, and their words aroused her suspicions. She understands that Noel is heir to the Baronetcy, in the event of Sir Herbert having no children, and realises that, should Sir Herbert die, the firm has sole control of her lover's estate.

Just then Harrington Shackell entered, and she was shocked to hear him announce that Sir Herbert Masterman was dead—murdered by him, his valet! So, after all, her suspicions had been only too well grounded! Then, little by little, she heard the diabolical plot against her lover unfolded, and also the hint that she herself was in danger, as she was the only one the murderers had to fear, and they intended to run no risks.

Then she resolved on a bold scheme—to get possession of the notes and the document. Bursting into the room, she seized the precious papers and managed to elude her astounded employers. Then she fled.

Besides the £1,000 in notes, Sara had about five pounds of her own money with her.

She wired to Noel, bidding him return to England at once. Then Miss Gillespie took train to Bedford, where she expected to find an old school-friend, who, however, had gone.

Calling at the Post Office to see if there was a reply to her telegram from Noel, she was thunderstruck to hear someone else had called for the telegram.

Who could it be but Templeton and Co.?

Faint at heart, she made her way to the Park, where she met a prepossessing-looking nurse, who seemed in great trouble.

They arranged to meet in the evening, and did so. Strolling along, they came to Newnham Bridge. Suddenly the nurse made a cowardly attack on Sara, forcing her back into the waters. The river closed over—she was drowning!

The nurse's bonnet was thrown aside, and revealed the features of Rigby Starr!

Digitized by Google

The Pursuit of Sara

AT NORTHAMPTON.

The Horror on the Racecourse.

The water filled my mouth, the pressure of Rigby's hand upon my throat thrust me down deeper and deeper. Then, as the world turned dark with the foretaste of death, the grip of his fingers suddenly relaxed; in his eagerness to destroy me, he had lost sight of his own safety. The ground on which he knelt, sodden with water, collapsed beneath his weight. He was pitched head foremost into the river and carried by the current some short distance down the stream. Released from the fearful pressure, I rose to the surface of the water. My fingers, almost within reach of the bank, clutched eagerly at the grass, the fallen leaves, the very stones; slight as was their support, it served to bring me closer into the shore. With a desperate effort, I grasped at the overhanging branches of the tree. The bough I caught was slender, it bent beneath my weight. Slowly and painfully I dragged myself towards the shore. Once it had almost snapped with the strain, and, poised over the black depths for a shuddering moment, I had thought to slip back. With a convulsive movement I raised myself and fell, gasping but saved, upon the shore.

By this time Rigby's shouts for help were ringing through the night. I could distinguish a dark object floating on the water, nearing by slow degrees the fatal weir.

His life against my safety and my lover's. For a moment I had wished him dead. The next, with a strange relief, I heard an answering shout, and caught sight of figures running down the bank, distinguished the splash of oars from a rescuing boat.

I did not wait for more, but staggered, borne down by my garments, heavy with water, to the other side of the road. There behind a friendly hedge, I took off my coat, shook the wet from my hat and hair, and tried to think out my next move.

The precious document and the packet of notes were safe. My ordeal had not been in vain; but with my teeth chattering and my limbs numb, even this consolation failed. I was ready to lie down and die by the roadside!

A forlorn and miserable object, I dragged myself to the middle of the road, and stood with uplifted hand to attract the attention of a passing cart. The driver stopped short when he saw me, and commented freely on my bedraggled condition.

"Been in the water, eh? So I should think. Whatever were you up to?"

Falteringly I explained that I had stumbled in the darkness, and narrowly escaped from death.

"I came down to spend the day with some friends," I continued mendaciously, "and when I got here I found they had left Bedford. I must go back to London to-night or I shall lose my situation. Could you help me?" I looked up at him appealingly. "Perhaps you live near; your wife might let me dry my clothes. I can't go to a hotel, I haven't enough money."

He considered for a moment and looked at his nice clean cart—it bore, I believe, the familiar name of Dudeney & Johnstone—and from his cart to where I stood, dripping and depressed.

"You're in a terrible state, missie," he said at last. "Still, I suppose I must help you. Come along up." And, leaning towards the ground, he gave me a friendly hoist to the seat beside him.

It seemed a long time before the cart drew up at a small house in Garfield Street; a very eternity before, a wordy argument with his good lady over, my friend conducted me to a neat, bright-looking kitchen. A comfortable meal was spread upon the table, the kettle was singing on the hob, and a cheery fire blazed in the grate. The housewife, a comely matron of about forty, relented when she saw me, assisted me to divest myself of my clothes, and, wrapping me in a huge garment of her own, sat me in an armchair by the fire until such time as they were dry.

St. Paul's was chiming half-past eleven when I left the house—the kind-hearted folk would not take a penny for their trouble—and walked up the High Street once again; my limbs were stiff and my head ached badly, but my courage had returned and I was ready to fight to the last gasp. I realised that it was imperative I should leave Bedford before the morning. I must abandon the chance of hearing from Noel. To run the risk of capture again and renew the experience of the evening would be madness. The next day would find the firm eager and alert. I could not hope to escape their clutches if I were still in the town.

I found the station deserted, the booking office closed, and the porters in a state of somnolence from which it was difficult to rouse them. I feared that the last train for—anywhere—had already left, but a severe cross-examination elicited the fact that a train from London for the North was due at—1.33 a.m. I had as yet formed no decision as to my next stopping-place. I did not wish to go too far afield from Bedford. The hope of claiming Noel's telegram, which I fondly pictured lying at the little stationer's, dissuaded me. I must select a town large enough to hide successfully from my persecutors, near enough to permit me to communicate with Sawyer's—the shop in the Midland Road.

I decided on Northampton, and learnt that if I took the 1.33 to Wellingborough I might catch an early morning train from there to my destination. The next two hours dragged very slowly. Alternately I paced the platform and the waiting-room, starting at every shadow, shuddering at every footfall.

At length the station roused from silence, woke up to activity. The down train from London was due. I watched the few belated passengers alight, and envied them the comfortable homes, the warm and loving greetings which awaited them.

I hastily took my ticket, and, having claimed my packet of notes from the cloak-room, chose a carriage at the end of the train, and settled myself in the corner. The whistle sounded, the train began to move. I breathed a sigh of relief. I had defeated Templeton & Co.! I was leaving Bedford free, and with the papers still in my possession.

Another moment and we should have steamed out of the station. And then a figure darted across the platform, and, regardless of protesting porters and irate officials, swung into the nearest carriage. I had caught but a glimpse of the late passenger, but that glimpse had sent me sick with fear.

The man who jumped on to the train was Rigby Starr.

The train rushed through the night, a metallic roar rose from the glistening lines that marked its path. The throbbing of the engine, pulsating with energy, seemed to keep time to Castle Station, Northampton, to which Sara made her way, after being brutally pushed from the train by Rigby Starr.

Digitized by Google

The Drapery, Northampton, to which Sara wandered before she had recovered from the effects of her rough handling.

the beating of my heart. The carriage swayed from side to side; the dim lamp swung from the top, its faint beams falling on the huddled figure of a girl whose eyes, big with terror, looked from a small white face, whose hands wet with fear were convulsively enclasped.

What was that sound that rose above the rattle of the engine? A door banged farther down the train. I felt, rather than heard, soft, cautious steps upon the footboard, covering by painful, slow degrees the distance between my carriage and that other.

It was I, Sara, that those steps were approaching. It was I, that stealthy figure sought. I—weak, defenceless—that the bloodhound hunted. I heard, in fancy, those evil feet stop at my door; I saw, in fancy, a white face glare at me through the glass. A hand shot through the door, a hand that closed upon my throat with a relentless, murderous grip.

I started to my feet. Where could I hide, how could I escape? Under the seat—impossible, it would make the task easier for my assailant. Should I pull the danger cord to stop the train? I could not; if I summoned assistance I must offer explanation, and that would result in my incrimination.

Half mad with panic, I opened the door upon the other side, stepped through, and with the daring of desperation, turned my fingers round the handle, and crouched, half kneeling, on the footboard.

The whirr of the wheels deafen me, the jolting strains my muscles almost to tearing point. My eyes are dazed; the throbbing of the engine beats upon my brain.

And then the door upon the farther side is opened. The sound thrills me like the edge of a keen knife. The footfalls sound close. I sicken with a deadly nausea.

Will he never end his search? Each cushion has been overturned, the space under the seats examined.

Dear Heaven, surely he is going now?

He will not look through the window, nor open the door? He cannot dream I have escaped that way.

And then the window is darkened, his head cranes out, his face, his evil, mocking face, looks down on mine.

With a laugh he stoops and grasps my arm.

"I've got you now," he shouts, "you sha'n't escape this time!" and strikes at my wrists with all his force. "Let go, let go, you little fiend. You sha'n't escape this time, I say. Another minute and you'll be beneath the train, and the papers will be in my pocket. Let go."

The blows fall on my head, my arms, my hands. He twists my wrists, tearing by main force my fingers from the handle. In the struggle the door flies open. I am swung off the footboard, swung over the earth that rushes past with such velocity.

A moment and then—the door, the train, Rigby's white, wicked face are whirling in the distance, and I am left a quivering heap upon the ground!

At first I thought that I was going to die. Weak as a child, I had not the ability to move. I lay as I had fallen on a heap of gravel. My face was cut, my hands bleeding, but as yet I felt no pain; my heart seemed to have stopped beating. I was benumbed from head to foot.

The recollection of Rigby's threat stirred a desire for life within me. He had declared he would kill me, that dashed to pieces by the train the papers I had striven to guard would fall into his hands. Those papers, thank Heaven, were still safe, the touch of them seemed to help me. I wondered if he would stop the train and institute a search for me. It would be easy for him to trump up a tale of suicide.

Reflection convinced me he would adopt more cunning methods. There was some hours' interval between the 1.33 and the next train. There would be plenty of time for Rigby to get out at Wellingborough, the first stopping place, and walk back along the line until he found me—or as he hoped, my dead body. The train reached Wellingborough at 1.54. I judged it wanted ten minutes to that time. I might, therefore, expect the junior partner to return in something over half an hour. I could rest for a little while before I moved to safer quarters. Unless I had been injured in the fall, in which case I should still lie at his mercy.

Slowly I staggered to my feet. I could stand, my legs were not broken nor my arms, though my wrist was badly sprained. The movement stirred my blood, my body seemed to wake suddenly to a sense of pain. I ached and smarted all over, my nerves were jarred at every step. Ill as I felt, I did not realise at the time how close to death I'd been. Had I fallen on the bare ground I must have been killed. I should inevitably have broken my neck.

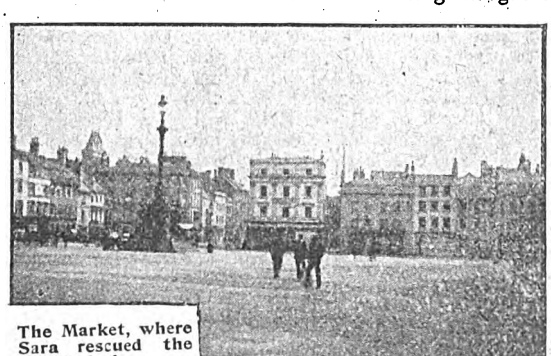
Gradually and with great pain, I stumbled along the line until I reached a gate opening into a field. It was padlocked, and at first seemed an insuperable obstacle. Somehow or other I clambered over, and walked, swaying to and fro, across the meadow, down a lane, and then into another field.

By this time I must have been light-headed. I remember fancying I was in the Strand with Noel at my side. The stars gave place to the electric lights, the spectral trees became shop fronts, the hedges the portals of a theatre.

Instinct must have led me to where, sheltered from the wind, there rose a hayrick. It had already been partially demolished and a lot of loose hay was scattered at the foot. Instinct again led me to gather up the soft, sweet-smelling stuff by armfuls, until I'd formed a fragrant heap. There, close to the rick, warmed by its scented heat, I rested, and thinking I was back once more in my Brixton lodgings, I fell asleep.

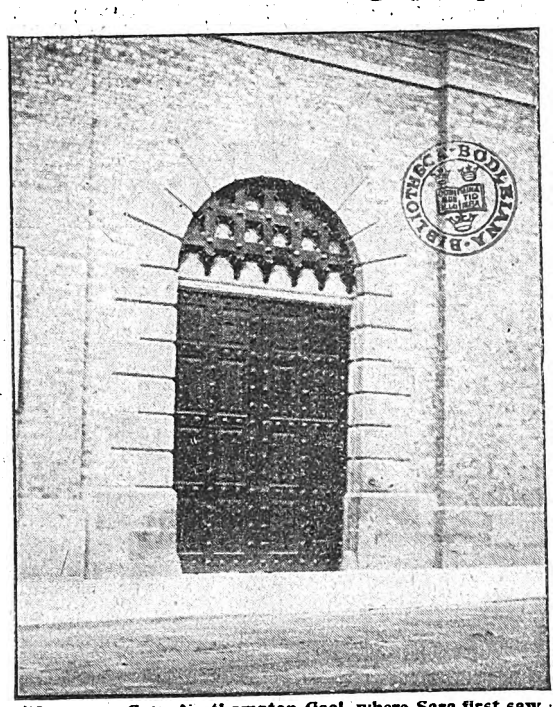
The sun was high in the heavens when I woke; the birds, lured into the belief that it was summer, sang their sweet songs until the neighbouring thicket thrilled with melody. The pain had left my limbs, my head was clear. I realised that, thanks to my youth and strength, I had passed safely through a dangerous crisis.

I found my way to a neighbouring farmhouse—removing first the straws hanging, Ophelia-like, about me—and purchased a slice of home-made bread and a long draught of



The Market, where Sara rescued the little boy.

Digitized by Google



The Prison Gate, Northampton Gaol, where Sara first saw the red-haired man.

milk. The nearest station I was told was Elsham, a village a few miles from Kettering. By slow degrees I reached my goal, and after many changes and some long, dreary waits, found myself, at length, at the Castle Station, Northampton.

The platform was crowded, the bridge, which one had to cross to leave the station, thronged with passengers. I was jostled and pushed hither and thither, too weak and dazed to stem the current. I gave up my ticket, clasped mechanically in my hand, and then instinctively clutched at the pocket of my dress to reach my purse. It was not there!

The sickening feeling that came over me, the shiver of fear that seemed to run along my blood into my very fingertips, the sudden faintness that caught my heart! Penniless—it would be suicidal to try to cash one of Noel's notes—alone, in a strange place, barely recovered from one ordeal, how could I hope to face another?

The shock paralysed my faculties, I walked dazed and benumbed up Gold Street, not knowing nor caring where I went. The shock had been too great, I felt like a derelict tossed on a sea of circumstances.

I must have wandered about for hours before I found myself in a wide thoroughfare, lined with bright shops, busy with gazers into the well-stocked windows. The Drapery, as the townsfolk have christened this particular locality, is built on a gradual ascent. From Adnitt's, the Peter Robinson's of Northampton, I looked down on the square-towered church of All Saints, lit up by the noonday sun. The cool green trees that flank the building were restful to the eye, standing like sentinels, untroubled and serene, amidst the roar of traffic, the clatter of trams that circle round the church.

A town of sharp and vivid contrasts; a jumble of fine buildings, mean dwellings, splendid thoroughfares, squalid streets. Its people marked by fierce individuality, vigour of life, a scorn of bearing, an immense impatience of control.

Something of this I realised as I walked down the hill towards the church, leaving the fashions of the Drapery and Adnitt's tall electric lamps behind.

From the Drapery I made my way into the market, a huge square, shut in by large and for the most part unprepossessing buildings. A fine site, and on market day cheerful with the hum of buyers and sellers, busy with rows and rows of stalls. But on that morning it wore an empty, almost forlorn appearance. The shops seemed void of custom, the pavement of life. It was an oasis of silence in a desert of sound. A few stragglers loitered in the roadway, towards Sheep Street, a knot of factory girls, neat in white aprons and sailor hats, were gossiping.

Suddenly the silence was broken in strange, dramatic fashion. The wild inspiriting clatter of horses' hoofs upon the cobble stones, the jingle of harness, the shouts of the crowds, gathered as if by magic, proclaimed the coming of a fire-engine. In an instant the upper end of the market square was thronged. Shopmen left their customers, operatives curtailed their dinner hour, street boys appeared as from the ground beneath their feet.

Nearer and nearer came the inspiring jangle; swept by the crowd I stood eager as any, on the kerb-stones.

As the engine turned the corner, from the group of factory girls, there broke a curly-headed mite of five or six. Wild with delight he shouted, waving his cap, dancing with joy within the path of the galloping horses.

I stood the nearest to the child, and automatically responded to the exigencies of the situation. Like a flash I darted from the kerbstone, and plucked the child from under the horses' hoofs. For a second I stood dazed, and then, even as the horses and the men, aye, and the very engine seemed falling on me, I was pulled back, an arm was thrown about my neck, and I stood the centre of a crowd of cheering men and tearful women.

"He's my brother," said a dark-haired girl, her face ashen, her voice trembling. "I couldn't ha' lived if he'd been killed." She didn't thank me—in words—but gazed, a world of gratitude in her brown eyes.

"It's nothing," I said feebly, "nothing," and then the market seemed to rise, the statue in the middle to topple, the houses to shake, and I remembered nothing more.

Propped up against the knees of a fat and friendly market woman, I opened my eyes, a strong taste of brandy in my mouth—to find myself the centre of a friendly crowd. The dark-haired operative stooping over me, lifted me gently to my feet.

"You're a stranger, my dear?" said the market woman.

I nodded and clung to the slim figure that supported me.

"You'd best come home with me and rest a bit," she said; and spoke in such a kindly voice, and with such evident desire for my consent, that I could not demur. I felt as some poor traveller in a desert to whom a helping hand is suddenly extended from a bush of thorns.

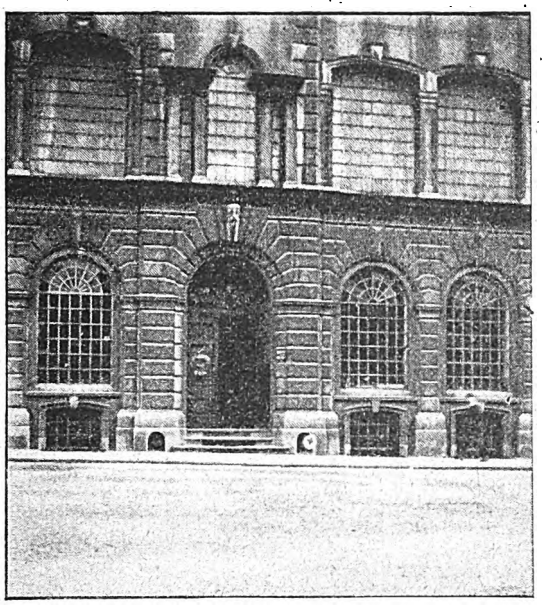
Home—the word brought tears to my eyes. Home—I gratefully linked my arm in hers, and buoyed up with a sense of security, managed to walk to the corner of Abingdon Street, where we took a tram.

Some short distance up the road, my friend signalled for the tram to stop. We alighted at Wood Street, a wider and more picturesque turning than the majority of streets, where the workers of the Midlands have their homes. Profoundly depressing are those rows and rows of two-storeyed red-brick dwellings, which, without a pretence of forecourt, open right to the street.

Bald, and staring, without distinction, and lacking all possibility of privacy, the monotonous, barefaced structures—alike in every town throughout the Midlands—lack all that should be present in the dwellings of the people. The giant factories that consume the workers' health and strength, have left a mark upon their very souls, slowly but surely grinding out all longing, all desire for lovely things.

Maggie Dunkley lived at the top of Wood Street, on the right-hand side, going to Campbell Square. The house was overgrown with creeper, the windows, draped with clean white curtains, were bright with flowers. Her mother, an apple-cheeked woman, with brown hair touched with silver, accorded me a cordial welcome. The news of her boy's rescue had already reached her, and she was overflowing with hospitable intent. She was somewhat anxious, however, as to who and what I was; and but for her daughter would have embarked on a kindly but thorough cross-examination. Maggie, however, nipped her intention short, and taking me up to her room, helped me into bed.

Digitized by Google



Cooper's Factory, where Sara applied for a situation.

"You shall tell us to-morrow," she said, when I tried to explain my forlorn condition. "No money?" her kindly face flushed with sympathy. "Never mind, you're with friends." And, with a soft kiss on my cheek, she left me to a long, deep sleep—the first since my escape from Templeton and Co.'s London offices.

It was to Maggie's kindly ears I told my history, as much, that is to say, as I thought wise. The notes I did not mention. I had grown chary of trusting strangers. She was sufficiently quick-brained to understand the salient points of my narrative, and enthusiastic in her admiration for my pluck in fighting Noel's enemies. I explained that I had no money, and no means of getting any until I had a letter from my sweetheart, but she overruled all objections to my staying, and promised to do her best to find me employment if I did not hear from Noel within a week or two.

I wrote two letters that afternoon, one to Noel, telling him all that had occurred since we had parted, and another to Mr. Tenant, his patient. I addressed both to Nice, hoping that if Noel's failed to find him, the other would reach its destination.

Maggie at my intreaty took a journey to Bedford to inquire for letters or wires at Sawyer's, but the errand was fruitless. Noel had sent no word. It remained for me, then, to wait for my lover and to guard against Templeton and his two partners.

The time passed quickly and not unpleasantly in the house of the virginia creeper. Mrs. Dunkley was glad of my assistance in the house, and did not seem to grudge me a home. Her husband, at work at a shoe factory, was a quiet but not unkindly person. The other members of the family were Maggie, a "fitter" in the same factory as her father, and Dick, the curly-headed urchin whose life had been so nearly ended in the market place.

As day followed day and none of the firm made their appearance, I was lulled into a sense of security; but for my fear for Noel, the gnawing anxiety I felt for news from him, I had been almost content. When, however, at the end of the week no news had come, I felt it was time to bestir myself. I could no longer intrench on the Dunkley's hospitality. I must get work. Maggie's endeavours on my behalf not being successful, I determined to apply myself.

To this end one sunny morning I set out for Cooper's factory. At the top of Wood Street on the way to Campbell Square, there stands Northampton Gaol. The walls, tall and grim, tower above one's head, so high they stand that the mind cannot scale the barrier set between the world of silence and the world of life. The prison gate, Fate's doorway, through which how many children of despair have passed, lay dark and stern, a blot upon the sunshine of the day. It had a fascination for me this same door; often I stood, my ears filled with the sound of laughter as the hurrying factory hands swept past, my eyes dazzled with the brightness of the clear, cold sky, till gazing at the portals I had shuddered.

If it should be my fate to cross that threshold; if my enemies, relentless in their pursuit, should trace me, capture and cast me into that place of death!

As I gazed the little wicket on the right hand of the prison door was opened. A man looked out upon the world; not a warder nor yet a prisoner, though I doubt if there were in the prison one whose face bespoke such guilt. I did not know the man, I had not seen his face before. Lean and cadaverous, his long, thin face was pointed, his eyes—small, crafty eyes—set close together in his head. His hair of a red, so vivid as to touch scarlet, lay in a peak upon his forehead, like—like, yes—like a stain of blood.

My fixed regard attracted him; as his gaze met mine, I felt as if some evil thing had looked at me, a moment his eyes remained on mine, the next his face had disappeared, the wicket closed.

With a sigh of relief I turned away. Alas! that face was doomed to play a large part in my destiny.

After that afternoon my feeling of security came quickly to an end.

Arrived at Cooper's factory, I interviewed the manager and pleaded hard for work.

He shook his head, regarding me, I thought, contemptuously.

"You are too old for an apprentice," he said, "and too untrained for a worker. I don't suppose you can work a machine?"

"I could learn," I faltered. "I'm not stupid."

"I'm afraid I can't hold out any hopes," he replied. "All our workers are apprenticed quite young—just after they leave school."

Dispirited by my lack of success, I asked if I might go into the workroom and see Maggie. It was close on five o'clock, near the hour of dismissal. I felt that a walk with my friend and kind companion might cheer me up.

Having gained permission, I sped up the winding staircase, past rooms heavy with the scent of leather—brown, black, and faint coloured fawns. Huge piles representing thousands of pounds were waiting to be converted into shooting, walking, golfing—every kind of boot; past the cutters' room, where Maggie's father worked, packed full of men, young, old, and middle-aged, their eyes glued to their work, their shoulders bowed with stooping. Into the machinists' room, where the whirr of revolving wheels made the brain giddy. Young girls of seventeen and under, guiding with incredible dexterity the heavy leather that the needle pierced so easily; matrons, mothers of families, working machines even more complicated, and here and there a faded little woman shrivelled and wizened to the colour of the leather that she held. In the "fitters'" room I discovered Maggie; above the clang of the hammer her laughter rang out. Her face fresh as a flower, with damask cheeks and clear brown eyes, glanced up at me.

In a few words I explained my errand. She smilingly agreed to my request that she should leave, and a few minutes later, after a hasty cup of tea, we were hurrying down Abingdon Street, to look at the shops.

We studied the windows intently, admiring the hats in Adnitt's, the dress materials in Cole and Hughes. Maggie was a managing soul; her earnings, some sixteen shillings weekly, she husbanded carefully, the greater part being deposited each week in a savings' bank.

Digitized by Google

She decided that afternoon, however, to purchase a new gown, and to that end collected a large number of patterns. By the time we had selected the ones we preferred, the evening had set in. The streets immediately about the market were thronged with work girls, shouting, laughing in high spirits. At the corner of Guild Hall Street we encountered a neatly-dressed, horsey-looking man.

Maggie turned crimson when she met his eyes.

"It's my young man," she whispered, and the next minute was clinging closely to his arm. It seemed to me a time when my absence would be more appreciated than myself. I shook hands with the horsey gentleman, and murmuring something about "shopping," moved off in a contrary direction; up the street, towards Abingdon Square, past troops of operatives, with here and there a young man in their midst, clean-shaven, gaitered, horsey from head to foot. Through the square itself, with its desolate looking People's Café that flanks the statue of Charles Bradlaugh, dauntless and unafraid, the genius of the Northampton people. Whether the statue be a fine one or not it is impossible for me to say. During my stay in the town it was invariably surrounded by barrows bearing advertisement placards setting forth the attractions of the Music Hall. It was strange to catch a glimpse of that earnest, powerful face rising above letters a foot high proclaiming that "Joe Elvin's" performance was unrivalled!

I was too tired to walk further that afternoon, and the trams, crowded with folks, did not appeal to me. I retraced my steps, taking a short cut through the Guild Hall from Abingdon Street. Half way down the corridor I ran against an individual coming in the opposite direction. Glancing up, I recognised the man I had seen that afternoon at the prison gate. Murmuring an apology, I hastened on; to my discomfort, he turned round and followed me. In a sudden panic I rushed on at full speed, flying down the steps of the Hall, and falling almost into Maggie's arms.

"Help me," I said wildly. "I'm—I'm frightened. Look," and I pointed to the man with the scarlet hair regarding us from the top of the steps.

"He's not pretty to look at, certainly," said Jim Goodman, Maggie's sweetheart. "Would you like me to go for him, missie?"

"Oh, no," I urged. "Let us get home. I can't bear to be near him," and much to Mr. Goodman's disappointment we set off for Wood Street, the groom, for that I discovered was Jim's calling, enlivening our way with descriptions of certain fights in which, by all accounts, he had not played the part of a spectator.

He left us at the door with many expressions of good-will towards me, and offers "to go for" any man I liked to name.

That night I could not rest. Every sound resolved itself into footsteps, each gust of wind seemed to me like a voice—my enemy's voice crying for my destruction.

Next morning I confided to Maggie that I carried with me bank notes for a thousand pounds. I felt I could no longer bear the weight of the secret all alone.

"If you really think the red-haired chap means trouble, you ought not to walk about with the notes upon you," she said thoughtfully. "You say you've cut 'em in halves? Well, you keep one packet, I'll hide the other here under this board in the floor."

It struck me as a primitive hiding place, but, failing a better, I took advantage of it, and deposited the packet under the loose plank by my bed.

Abingdon Abbey, near the park, where Sara encountered Shackleton cunningly disguised.

I was up early that morning, straining my eyes down the street to catch a glimpse of the postman.

"No letters?" I asked, my heart torn with fear and hope.

"Not this time," was the answer, and the man, unconscious arbiter of life and death, passed on.

In the afternoon of the same day, I took Dick up to Abingdon Park, where it was arranged that Maggie and her lover should meet us later on. It was a lovely afternoon, the old Abbey girdled with trees, cloaked with ivy, towered up straight and tall against the clear blue sky. I sat down on one of the seats provided by a thoughtful corporation, and, keeping Dick well in sight, waited for my friends.

Maggie and Jim arrived a full hour before I had expected. I gave Dick into their charge, and declining an invitation to accompany them, gave myself up to reverie. If only I could see Noel but for a moment! I hungered for him, my soul cried out for a touch of his dear hand. The tears forced their way to my eyes and a lump rose in my throat.

"Noel," I whispered, "Noel."

As if in answer to my call a step sounded on the gravel path. Hoping I do not know what wild feverish thing, I turned, and met the gaze of the man I had seen at the prison door!

He was taller than I had thought at first, and his shoulders were broad, his build powerful. I rose from my seat and hastened from the Park, not pausing until the echo of his steps, pursuing me, had died away.

I left the Park by the nearest gate. It led into a fine wide thoroughfare, lined with well-built houses standing in ample gardens, it is a pleasant suburb and a growing one.

Some distance down the road I passed a pair of large iron gates through which I caught a glimpse of trees and flowers and a broad carriage drive. The lodge, overgrown with green, was picturesque enough to make me pause.

Looking up I scanned the windows, neatly draped with spotless muslin. One I noticed particularly, was framed with creeper, kissed by the autumn into blushing red, looking exquisitely pretty.

"What is this place?" I asked a passer-by.

"It's an asylum," was the answer, "a lunatic asylum!"

I gave a start—flowers, open windows, fresh green trees—the place did not present the appearance one associates with a madhouse. I wondered if the inmates were all mad; it might be some were the victims of a conspiracy as cruel as that which parted me from Noel. I glanced again towards the window of the lodge and watched until, as if in response to my scrutiny, someone approached. A hand lifted the window higher, a black-coated arm appeared upon the sill, and then a head and shoulders filled the aperture. For a second I gazed, breathless with fear and hope. Then, with a scream that brought the people to their doors, I flung myself upon the iron gates.

It was Noel who looked at me from the window. His dear face that gazed at me. Noel, Noel!—a prisoner in a madhouse!

"Come out!" I shrieked, and then gripping the iron bars, clanged the bell, appealing with wild cries for help!

The window was shut down, Noel taken away, perhaps—the thought was madness—to a padded room, where bound and gagged he would endure the horrors of torture both physical and mental!

Again and yet again I shook the gates, until the sound of approaching wheels aroused me from my passion. A brougham drew up outside the house. A tall, professional-looking man whose air and manner proclaimed him to be a doctor alighted on the path, close to his heels a second man stepped out; the red-headed individual who had caused me such alarm.

Digitized by Google

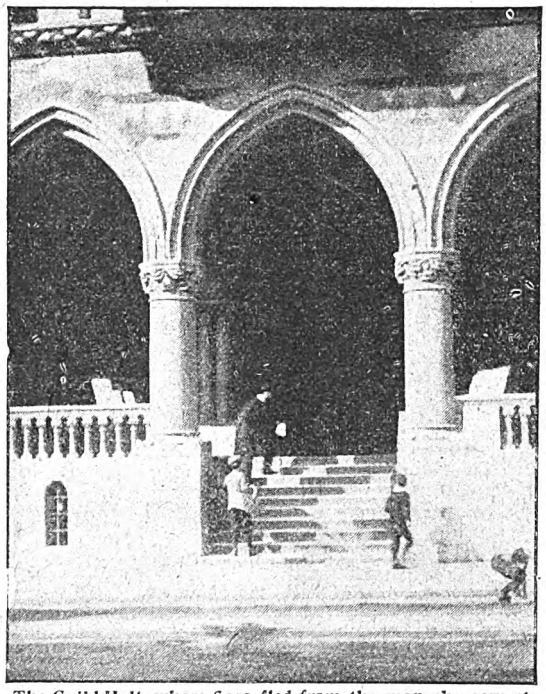
"We're in good time after all, Dr. Anesley," he said.

Anesley! The name awoke a thousand recollections. The doctor whose practice Noel had wished to buy was called Anesley. Doubtless he, like Noel, had been duped by the firm of Templeton & Co. He would help me, help my lover. It was a veritable stroke of fortune that had sent him to me at this crisis.

"Doctor, I want your help. My sweetheart, Noel Masteman, the man who was in treaty for your practice through the agency of Templeton & Co. is in that place"—and I shook my fist towards the lodge. "You don't know me; I'm, Sara Gillespie, the girl to whom he is engaged. I was employed as typine in their office at St. Helens. I discovered they were plotting against Noel; I discovered they had murdered, murdered his cousin, and that—"

With a gesture the doctor stopped my flow of eloquence.



The Guild Hall, where Sara fled from the man she saw at the prison gate.

"What proof have you that Mr. Masterman is here?" he asked.

"I have seen him in that room"—and I pointed to the window framed in rich red leaves.

"Doctor," I clasped my hands about his arms. "Let him come to me; he is not mad; dear Heaven, you know he is not mad!"

He gazed at me with kind, compassionate eyes, then, signing to his companion to withdraw, led me aside.

"Now," he said quickly; "if I'm to be of help you must control yourself. You tell me Mr. Masterman is at the lodge. If that is the case, I, as one of the physicians of the establishment, will inquire the reason of his detention there. It is, however, possible," his voice sank almost to a whisper, "that he's there for purposes of investigation. Others beside yourself my dear young lady, have reason to suspect Messrs. Templeton & Co. You must understand their influence is far-reaching. Mr. Templeton, in fact, is one of the trustees of the asylum. I cannot openly question his doings; it is a matter for diplomacy."

"Meantime——" I interrupted.

"Have no fear, Miss Gillespie; I will help you to the best of my ability. I will call at the lodge, see Mr. Masterman, and ascertain the reason for his detention. If he is kept there by the agency of Mr. Templeton I will on my own responsibility release him. If, as I suspect, he is there to keep an eye on the head of the firm, I will ask him to send you a message to that effect."

His words were plausible, his manner kind. I yielded to his persuasions and consented to remain outside the lodge gates until I heard from him or Noel.

"That man," I said, pointing to the red-headed person, "I mistrust him; who is he?"

"A keeper in the asylum," the doctor replied. "He is devoted to me, and takes special interest in my own particular cases."

"I saw him at the gate of the prison the other day."

"Quite possible; his brother is a warder in the gaol."

He smiled the gentle, persuasive smile of the medical man. I yielded to his influence, and watched him and his familiar through the iron gates, waiting, hungry of heart outside.

Within five minutes the scarlet-headed man appeared. My own locks being more of red than auburn, it may seem peculiar that his hair should have inspired me with such a feeling of revulsion. The explanation lies, I think, in the fact that his head was sleek and smooth (my hair is very curly), his skin of, leaden hue, his face, his figure, redolent of craft and cunning—a very Judas.

"I am to tell you," he commenced in a gruff voice, which to my fancy sounded like the grating of a prison door, "I am to tell you that Mr. Masterman is watching over your interests and his own. He dare not see you now. Were he to try and leave the place it would excite Templeton's suspicions."

"Where's Templeton?" I gasped, "not here?"

"He is at present seated with the Board in company with Dr. Anesley."

"But is Noel a—a—— Is he thought to be mad?" I asked.

"He was received here on Templeton's recommendations and by the certificate of two doctors as a patient. His cleverness helped him to escape and remain concealed in the lodge. That same ability will enable him with my help to leave the place to-morrow morning, when he will join you."

"Where?" I asked, my heart beating wildly, "where?" In my enthusiasm I was ready to smile upon the man of the prison gate.

"You are to meet him on the racecourse by the grand stand at five o'clock in the morning. That, and no other is the hour when he can in safety see you. Will you be there?"

He looked at me nonchalantly, not by so much as the flicker of an eyelid did he reveal the anxiety which he must have felt.

"I will come," I answered. Then: "Can you take a note from me to—to—Mr. Masterman?"

"Better not," he answered, shaking his head. "It will excite suspicion."

Somehow the answer reassured me. I felt reproached at the disgust the man's personality had inspired in me, and at the conclusion of the interview felt constrained to thank him for his kindness!

Maggie was not enthusiastic when on my return to the house in Wood Street, I told her what had happened.

"You should have hammered and hammered at the gate until he came to you," she said, "I could not have left Jim in a madhouse were it ever so."

"But Noel sent a message to me," I remonstrated, "saying I must wait. Don't you see, Maggie, there's so much at stake. We have to bring these people to justice, to——"

"I reckon you want him most of all," she interrupted, "so long as I had my lad I'd let the others—rip."

With which illogical conclusion she ended the discussion.

Next morning before the dawn lightened the darkness of the sky I was astir. Something, I know not what, a premonition of menace, a foretaste of danger, made me rouse my sleeping bedfellow.

"I'm afraid to take these with me, Maggie," I said softly, thrusting my packet of banknotes and the paper that Noel had signed into her hands; "keep them for me. If all is well, Noel and I will come together and reclaim them, if not——"

Digitized by Google

"If you're not here by seven o'clock I shall know there's mischief," she interrupted. "Even now, I'm loth to let you go alone. I wish I had told father," she paused; "anyway, Jim knows." She smiled at the mention of her sweetheart's name, and, linking her arms about my neck, wished me "good luck" with all her heart.

The streets, dim and ghost-like in the grey morning, struck a chill to my heart. Abingdon Street, void of trams and traffic, empty of pedestrians, seemed like a churchyard. Wellingborough Road, shrouded in mist, was to my excited fancy peopled with ghosts. The trees made shuddering noises; through the white vapours the funnel-shaped steeple of the church built by a healthy brewer—dubbed by the irreverent Spillsby's "Fire-escape," formed a landmark. I groped my way until the racecourse, ghostly and deserted, loomed before me. I leant against the palings that fence the grand stand and waited, heart and brain on the alert to catch the sound of anyone approaching. Gradually the mists dispersed, the course lay clear before me. In fancy I conjured up phantoms of the steeds, the jockeys who had ridden to the winning post. Scarlet and green and blue, the jackets passed before me mounted on satin-skinned thoroughbreds, darting like arrows from a bow.

What fortunes had been made and lost on this same course! How many eyes had craned to follow the horse which bore the last hopes of a spendthrift; how many voices had been raised to greet the victor as he swept by!

The place, no longer desolate and lonely, was to me thronged with the tragedies, the comedies that are enacted on a race-course.

Far, far as the eye could reach the white posts reared themselves upon the soft green sward; in the background a line of hills, mystic, wonderful, made the sky line. In the near distance a row of houses, spectral in the dawning, turned blind eyes towards me.

Of a sudden a shaft of light crept rapidly across the horizon. In its beams I distinguished a group of men approaching me. Filled with apprehension I hastened towards them. I had taken but ten paces in their direction, when from the grey mist that enveloped me, I felt a hand upon my shoulder, another on my wrist.

I was held fast—immovable.

Struggling, I turned my head. The men who held my arms were strange to me.

"Keep quiet," said a low voice, "and we won't harm you. It's no use to struggle, you'll only hurt yourself."

The figures I had first observed were rapidly approaching. A tall man, gagged and bound, led by two others; a third walked at their side; a fourth in advance.

The latter came quickly to where I stood. I seemed to recognise in him the man of the prison door.

"Where is Noel Masterman?" I called, struggling with frantic efforts to release myself.

"Here!" And he pointed to the figure bound and gagged behind him.

"You," I commenced. With a gesture he cut me short.

"Look," he said, and, raising his hat, he made a mocking bow. "Look at me, Miss Gillespie. Do you not know me—now?"

He thrust his face—his hateful mocking face—into mine. The red hair, that like a stain of blood had marked his forehead, the leaden-coloured skin, the narrow brow, were gone—gone—and in their place there looked at me the murderous face of Shackleton!

"You're very clever, Miss Gillespie," he said derisively. "But this time we have you tight. There is your lover," he pointed with a gesture of contempt to Noel. "And now"—his thin lips twitched with eagerness—"you must make your choice. Tell me where I shall find the paper and the notes or——" he paused, throwing up his hands. At the signal the man who walked near to my lover drew out a pistol, and held it to Noel's head.

"Speak," cried Shackleton, "or——" and his gesture said the rest.

"I give you ten seconds to make up your mind. The papers are not on you; that I know. Say where they are, and your lover's life is spared. Refuse, and, by Heaven, he shall die!"

My throat grew parched, my tongue clung to my palate. I tried to think, tried to evolve a plausible tale that would deceive him, so that I need not confess that the papers were in Maggie Dunkley's hands. He simply dared not murder Noel before my eyes. He——

"One!" counted Shackleton, and the earth went round me at the sound.

"Two!" Gasping, I babbled out a tale of having buried notes and papers up in Abingdon Park. It sounded wild, improbable, to my own ears, to his it was mere balderdash.

Fear, as the torturers of long ago well knew, deprives the imagination of all power to invent, the mind to all strength to conceive. The victim under the strain of torture is driven back upon the naked truth. He cannot lie.

"Three!" Must I tell him? I might surely trust Maggie to keep faith, and yet on my silence hung my future and my lover's. They dare not kill him?

"Herbert Masterman died," said Shackleton, reading my thoughts, "why not Noel?"

"You will not have him killed," I gasped, "if—if——"

"I will spare his life," he answered, "if you confess. Then, marking the irresolution still upon my face, snapping his fingers. "Four, five, six!" he cried.

My eyes searching the plain espied a horseman galloping towards me. Close on his heels ran a figure, strong, alert. Were they coming to help me and Noel? Had Maggie, fearing foul play, flown to my aid?

Why could I not invent a colourable lie to gain time, until they arrived? If I could hold his attention, if I could keep back the seconds that he counted with such fiendish joy!

"Help," I screamed, throwing my voice towards the horseman.

"Eight," said Shackleton, and the trigger of the pistol held to Noel's head was raised.

The horseman spurring his steed drew nearer.

"Nine! Is he to die?" cried Shackleton.

I tried to answer, but my voice was strangled in my throat. Only a hoarse murmur came from my lips. I could not speak, I could not even make a sign.

A second, but a second, and my love must die!

Ten—and the fatal shot was to be fired!

(Sara Relates her Adventure at Leicester Next Week.)

Arthur Applin's New Story,

"THE GAMBLE OF LIFE,"

Has Just Started in Pearson's Weekly.

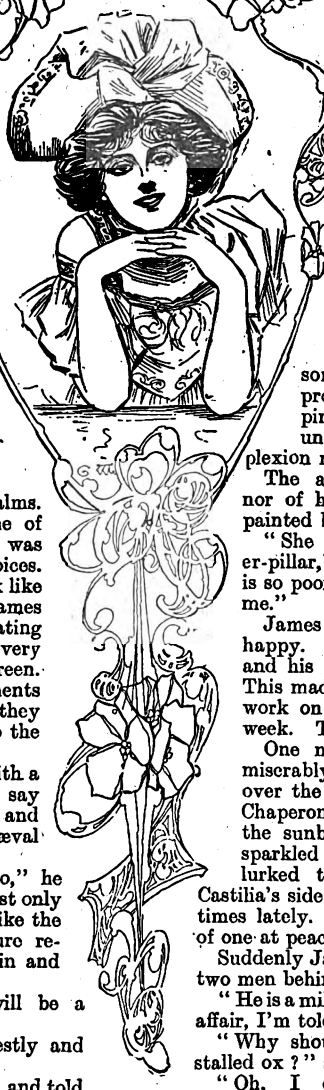
One Penny. Every Friday.

Digitized by Google

A ROSE-LEAF PRINCESS.



Relating the Mistake She Made.

HER name was Susan Anna, but her lover re-christened her Castilia. If he had been a plumber or a paper-hanger he would probably have called her his "black-eyed Susan"; but he was a poet and an artist, even if his name was James Henry Perkins, so he named her Castilia, and told himself that her eyes were the colour of a mountain lake when the storm hangs over it, and her hair was as densely black as a moonless midnight.

They met at an afternoon tea, and sat talking in a little shaded alcove behind some tall palms. The atmosphere was heavy with the perfume of roses, and the tremulous music of the violins was broken by the thin, airy treble of women's voices.

A red-shaded lamp made Castilia's cheek look like a peach on the south side of a sunny wall. James Henry told her so with a delightful, hesitating boldness, and she blushed divinely and was very glad that the lamp-shade was not blue or green. They discovered in those ten undisturbed moments that they were absolutely sympathetic; they worshipped the same authors, were devoted to the same actors, and adored the same things to eat.

"Fancy you being an artist," said Castilia, with a fascinating note of awe in her voice. "I dare say you have a lovely studio, with painted windows and rusty armour, and old tapestry and mediæval chairs."

Perkins smiled cynically. "I have a studio," he answered, "but the properties you speak of exist only in the imagination. The light in my studio is like the strict truth, crude and hard, and my furniture resembles the tale of Mark Antony in being plain and unvarnished."

"Ah, yes," sympathetically. "But you will be a great artist some day."

"I hope so. I mean to be," he said, modestly and firmly.

At this moment the Paternal Friend appeared, and told Castilia that her Chaperon-Aunt desired her presence immediately. The Paternal Friend was a very charming man, by the way, but James Henry hated him on the spot.

For several days after this James Henry saw nothing of Castilia; but it happened that Castilia could not easily forget the man who had so plainly given her to understand that he thought her lovely. She reflected that for a long time she really had been intending to have her portrait painted, and she was quite sure that Mr. Perkins had a great deal of talent, not that she had any especial interest in him, but she was so weary of frivolous and empty-headed Society people, that it was very pleasant to meet an interesting and companionable man.

When James Henry was made aware of this decision of Castilia, he promptly turned his great historic picture to the wall. He would, for a season, cease chasing the will-o'-the-wisp—Fame—and paint the droop of Castilia's eye-lids and the curves of her lovely mouth.

Castilia did not find him so companionable as she had hoped during the sittings. For one thing, he looked at her with a certain critical, professional gleam in his eyes, and for another, he scarcely talked to her at all, and it was very tiresome sitting in one position so long, but she obtained some consolation from the reflection that he probably stood in awe of her aunt, a vast, pin-cushiony woman, with a skin so white and unwrinkled that it instantly suggested complexion masks and an unfeeling heart.

The aunt did not approve of James Henry nor of her niece's wild idea of having her portrait painted by an obscure young artist.

"She treats him as though he were a c-c-cater-pillar," sobbed Castilia upon her pillow, "and he is so poor, so deserving, so m-m-much in love with me."

James Henry, in the meantime, was miserably happy. He was desperately in love with Castilia, and his affection he knew was absolutely hopeless. This made him miserable. He was doing excellent work on her portrait, and he saw her twice a week. These facts made him happy.

One night when he was feeling particularly miserably happy, he went to the opera. Glancing over the house, he saw Castilia in a box with the Chaperon-Aunt. She wore a gown that was like the sunbeams veiled in mist, and shining stones sparkled in her dark hair. In the background lurked the detested Paternal Friend, and by Castilia's side was a man James Henry had seen many times lately. He was florid and stout, and had the air of one at peace with the world and himself.

Suddenly James Henry's quick ear caught her name; two men behind him were speaking of her.

"He is a millionaire—made money by mining—definite affair, I'm told."

"Why should she yoke herself unequally with that stalled ox?" said the other man.

"Oh, I don't know. Money always marries money."

James Henry levelled his glass at the chorus, but it was a confused blur; he paid no heed to the prima donna, although she was singing divinely. After the curtain fell he rose and left the house.

He was now obliged to confess to himself that unless Castilia returned his love, life would not be worth living; but he had no reason to suppose that she did; and what had he, who was just beginning to make his name known, to offer her? It was by reason of these inward cogitations that James Henry became acquainted with the chill, grey dawn which crept through the windows each morning and greeted his sleepless eyes.

"Oh, Mr. Perkins, are you ill, or have you had bad news?" faltered Castilia, at her next sitting.

"I am not ill," said James Henry coldly. He looked towards the Chaperon-Aunt, who had fallen into a gentle doze; then he blundered desperately, "but—but—I am going far away."

Digitized by Google

"Going away! Why are you going far away?" cried Castilia, with a sob in her voice.

"Because I love you, Castilia, with all my soul; because I will not be so selfish and cowardly as to ask you to marry me, when I have nothing to offer you, so I am leaving you forever."

"Nothing to offer! Leaving me forever!" exclaimed Castilia, with honest scorn and amazement. "You don't regard my feelings in the matter," she said inarticulately, "and—and"—impulsively—"I love you, James Henry, just as much as you love me."

The pincushiony Chaperon-Aunt opened her eyes on a prettier tableau than she had ever seen on the stage, but she was a very unromantic person, and she expressed her opinion in very strong terms. She was only one, however, and her opposition did not count for much.

So Castilia and James Henry were married, and fancied that they were destined to live in a state of ideal bliss ever after—only they did not.

In the first place, James Henry was a very ambitious man and absorbed in his work, and Castilia, instead of being properly delighted at his industry, was offended, for she was young and foolish and exacting.

The artist sat many hours in his studio, and when the light faded, and he could no longer paint, he thought much of his work, and was often pre-occupied and absent-minded, and Castilia was firmly convinced that he had ceased to love her, and sought once more the society she had characterised as frivolous and empty-headed.

Her portrait was finished in time for the Academy, and all London rushed to see it, and went into raptures over it.

And Castilia was very, very proud of him, but she would not tell him so. "He would think it's only because he's become famous."

"She might have said one little word of appreciation, and not have been so utterly, heartlessly indifferent," thought James Henry bitterly.

When Castilia's portrait was brought home the best light was found in her sitting-room, so there it was hung, where she could sit and watch it by the hour. And how she grew to hate it!

Really, it was Castilia at her best, her beautiful, Spanish, haughty best. Some one had called it the portrait of a rose-leaf princess; and, indeed, her lovely face stood out, flowerlike, from the warm shadow of velvets and furs.

She often apostrophised her portrait ungratefully. "You hateful thing," she would cry, "I don't want to be 'a rose-leaf princess,' I—I'm a woman, and I want to be loved."

Just about this time, Perkins began to paint the portrait of a very charming woman, older than Castilia by some years. She had a mobile face, wonderful light eyes, changeful as the sea, and masses of light hair; and she was very witty and fascinating. Castilia hated her, especially when James Henry expressed his opinion that to paint her portrait so as to do her justice was the work of a lifetime; for she was variable as the winds, and her wonderful play of expression mirrored every mood.

His artist's soul was pained because Castilia would not see her beauty.

"Beauty!" she scornfully exclaimed, "I should think her bones would make holes in her dresses, poor creature! and she looks as old as the hills with that sallow, faded complexion."

She became more and more dissatisfied with her own portrait. Sometimes she felt that she would like to burn it. Why had James Henry given her that arrogant expression, which seemed to say, "Behold me! I am an heiress!" She wished she hadn't a penny.

One evening she strolled into the dimly-lit room, where her husband sat dreaming before the fire. Resting one arm on the mantelshelf, she looked curiously down upon him. "He's thinking of that horrid creature," was her jealous fancy.

"Tell me, James, dear," she said, "what is the best thing in the world?"

"The best thing in the world?" he said dreamily. "Why, freedom, I suppose."

That was enough. She turned and left him. "You poor thing!" she said to her portrait as she passed it. "You poor thing," she repeated, meaning herself.

"Why, Susie," said the Paternal Friend, who had just been admitted, "in the dark, and in tears? Is the world hollow, and your doll stuffed with sawdust?"

"I'm crying," she said meekly; "I—I—was just crying."

"I see. Shedding a few tears for want of something better to do," jestingly.

"I'll tell you why," she said desperately: "I hate that portrait of myself—I loathe it. I can't stay in the same room with it!"

"Send it to me then, Susie," he said soothingly. "I'll give it house room until you want it again."

"Oh! for goodness sake, take it, will you, really? It's so cold, and haughty, and scornful."

The Paternal Friend thought he understood. "I will send for it to-morrow," he said. "And, remember, when you wish for it, it is yours."

"Where is your portrait, Castilia?" said James Henry the next day.

"I didn't like it here," replied Castilia, "I took it down."

The artist grew a little pale and said nothing.

Now, since his marriage with Castilia, he had become very chummy with the Paternal Friend, so a day or two after this conversation he called at the house where the Paternal Friend lived in solitary state. He was admitted on the supposition that the master of the house was at home, which turned out to be a mistake.

While waiting, James Henry looked idly about him. Suddenly he staggered back against the wall, for there, hanging in the broad light, was his portrait of his lovely, haughty Castilia. Hastily leaving the house, he turned mechanically homeward. As he neared his own dwelling he lifted his moody eyes to see the Paternal Friend walking blithely away from the door. James Henry strode gloomily into the house; in the hallway stood Castilia—a radiant, different Castilia.

"Oh, James!" she cried joyously, "what do you think has happened?"

"Susan Anna," he said, sternly and gravely, "I know what you have done with your portrait."

"Susan Anna!" The end of the world had come. In the days of his greatest indifference he had never called her Susan Anna.

And because she was a woman, and very much in love, she—slightly prevaricated.

"Yes," she said sweetly, "he has just been here to tell me that he is going to be married to that horrid woman with the green eyes; and"—triumphantly—"I sent the picture to him as a wedding present."

James Henry's face cleared, and then clouded anew. He looked bewildered.

"But—but," he stammered, "he came to-day to tell you of his engagement, and you sent the picture to him three days ago."

"I know I did"—despairingly—"I hated it so, and I cried and said that I couldn't stay in the same house with it, and he offered to keep it until I wanted it again."

"You hated your beautiful portrait, the best thing I ever did," said James Henry in astonishment. "Ah, I see! It was because I painted it, and you had ceased to love me or to take any interest in my work."

"No," she cried, "not that; I never ceased—to take an interest in your work. I—I—James Henry, it was you who ceased to love me."

"Castilia!" he exclaimed in amazement, "I never loved anybody in this wide world but you."

"Not even the Paternal Friend's fiancée?"

"What nonsense! My lovely, darling Castilia, she is excellent for purposes of study; her grace and odd colouring are so marked; but you are you—and all is said."

Nancy Blake.

Digitized by Google

A Matter of Business.

Which Tells of a Policy that Cut Both Ways.

"Yes, Jack, I do love you."

"You — do — really, Doris?"

"Why, of course I do, you silly boy."

The above conversation took place in the wood which stretches from the outskirts of the village of Amfield away down to Mouswater.

It was the old, sweet, inexhaustible story over again; man's love told in halting, passionate utterances; woman's reply, shy and trembling.

In this case Jack Guthrie could hardly believe the evidence of his ears. Not that he doubted Doris Thornton, but he did not seem to be able to bring himself to understand that this beautiful girl could actually yield herself into his keeping for ever.

Doris Thornton was the only daughter of James Thornton, Esq., a wealthy brewer, who was also the proprietor and editor of the Domsey Times.

Jack Guthrie was the owner of Horseley House, a fine old English mansion standing in its own park. It had a home farm, good and plenteous shooting, wild deer, and, in fact, all the attributes which go to make up an English country gentleman's home.

Jack's father, the late William Guthrie, J.P., M.F.H., had died some years before. Mrs. Guthrie and Jack had lived on at Horseley House although they often spoke of buying a smaller place. At least Mrs. Guthrie did, and Jack would doubtless have agreed if Doris Thornton had not come home from the Continent.

She had gone away an angular, bony, plain, awkward girl, and had returned to England at the age of twenty, a most graceful and beauteous maiden.

Why, it was the custom in Amfield and Horseley to say, in praise of anything beautiful, that it was "as pretty as Miss Doris."

Now she had hardly been back four months, and she was already engaged to be married.

It may sound rather calculating to say it, but Doris could hardly have done better. Jack Guthrie was a good-looking, well-educated man of about twenty-six years of age. He was exceedingly well off in regard to monetary matters, and a better fellow or finer athlete was not to be found if you searched the countryside for miles around.

Was it not on record how he had caught hold of Bill Boffin, who was more drunk than usual in the King's Head at Horseley, and carried him struggling for almost half a mile into the park; there he dipped him in Catbasket Pond, which effectually sobered him, and took him home to Mrs. Boffin, into whose hand he put a sovereign.

And there were many similar tales to be heard, for the young master was a great favourite in Horseley.

So now he stood with the trembling form of Doris Thornton clinging to him; his face bent down and pressed against hers; his arms holding her to him as though he would never release her.

She loved him; he could hardly credit it. But it was true—true as God's air and sunshine that he breathed and stood in.

They had met near the Keeper's Cottage at half-past two, and now it was just on six o'clock. Guthrie glanced at his watch, and uttered a sharp exclamation of surprise.

"I must hurry back home, Jack. Father will wonder wherever I have disappeared to," said Doris, when he acquainted her of the hour.

"H'm!" he replied. "That opens up some fresh possibilities. Do you think Mr. Thornton will be pleased when he hears of our engagement?"

"Whyever not, Jack?" Doris cried, in tones of astonishment.

"Well, you remember, he and the guv'nor never used to hit it off very well, did they?"

"Oh, no," cried Doris in anxious tones. "But surely he would not let that interfere between us."

"I hope not, Doris, with all my heart. I suppose I must come over and see him soon. When shall I come?"

"He is going to London on Wednesday, Jack. You had better come to-morrow."

"To-morrow then it is," he replied with an anxious and enormous sigh, which provoked a rippling laugh from Doris.

In half-an-hour's time Jack was striding swiftly along the woodland path which comes out just above Mouswater.

Doris was his, he kept repeating to himself. The very birds sang her name, and he caught himself repeating:

"There's a thought of Thee in the soft sweet breeze,
That sighs o'er the golden moor.
There's a song of thee in the green-leafed trees,
And will be for evermore."

He hardly slept that night through excitement, but a swim in Catbasket Pond refreshed him wonderfully, and he whistled merrily as he passed through the Amfield Woods to beard Mr. Thornton.

"Mr. Thornton will be down in a moment, sir," announced the footman who showed Jack Guthrie into a large morning-room, that opened out into the grounds of Amfield House.

Jack seated himself, and proceeded to survey his surroundings and the position. His reverie was broken by the sudden entrance of Doris. She stood for a moment in the flood of sunlight at the door, and then, with a cry of pleasure, she darted forward and in a moment was in her lover's arms.

It was exceedingly unfortunate that Mr. Thornton happened to choose that exact moment to enter the room. And it was still more to be deplored that his game-keepers had reported that morning that there had been a big raid by some poachers during the night.

"Wh—wh—what the d—d—dickens does this mean?" he spluttered.

"Er——" remarked Jack.

"Oh!" cried Doris, and then she retreated hurriedly, basely deserting her lover.

"Good-morning, Mr. Thornton," began Jack. "I am pleased to see you."

"That's not the truth, sir. You were not pleased to see me," was the ungracious rejoinder.

"No," replied Jack meditatively. "I suppose I was not."

"Well," grunted Mr. Thornton, "now you are certainly candid.

"First of all, though," he went on, "I should be glad to know what the pretty scene that I was unfortunate enough to interrupt meant. Confound it, sir!" he was getting angry now. "What do you mean by kissing my daughter?"

Digitized by Google

"That's what I came to see you about, Mr. Thornton."

"Oh, you did, did you—came to see me about kissing my daughter, eh? A peculiar mission indeed."

"Well, not exactly that, but——"

"Do you know what you do want?" peevishly broke in the old gentleman. "At least I can tell you one thing you do want and that is a business education. You come here to see me about something, and you hum, and haw, and what not, instead of coming to the point."

"I love Doris," burst out Jack, goaded to desperation by Mr. Thornton's haggling.

"Oh, now we have something to work on. Is she equally silly?"

"I don't understand you, Mr. Thornton."

"No, I suppose not. You are one of those young men who have been brought up in the lap of luxury and have never known what it is to want. You have never had to depend on your business ability or your own cleverness, have you now?"

"No," replied Jack glumly.

"I suppose you want to marry Doris?"

"Yes," replied Jack blithely.

"Well, the question I put to you just now was, does she want to marry you?"

"Why, you do not suppose——"

"I do not want any suppositions," broke in Mr. Thornton, "but a plain answer. Yes or no."

"Yes," snapped out Jack.

"Well, that's decided, at any rate. Now then, what qualifications have you as a suitor for my daughter's hand?"

"Eh?" responded Jack blankly.

"Goodness, gracious! You are as dull as the Opposition. Why should I agree to your marriage with Doris?"

"We love each other," replied Jack shortly, for he was beginning to lose his temper. "I shall make her mistress of Horseley."

"Very nice, very nice. But I do not wish my daughter to marry a man for whom I have no respect."

"What in the world do you mean, sir?" roared out Jack, as he towered over Mr. Thornton.

"Now, please don't get excited, a good business man always keeps his head."

"Good business man be hanged," retorted Jack. "I want to know what you meant by saying you did not respect me?"

"Well, what have you done that I should? You are not responsible for your position and wealth. You have done nothing but shoot, ride, drive, and all the rest of it. Why should I respect you?"

There was no reply. It was a knotty point and required consideration.

"Now, look here, my boy," said Mr. Thornton, in a kindlier tone than he had yet adopted. "When you can come to me and show me that you have got a good business head on your shoulders you shall have Doris. Do something clever in the business world, something to show that you have brains, but until you have succeeded I refuse to agree to your marriage with Doris."

It was a knockdown blow for Jack, but the fighting blood of his race surged through his veins; he set his jaw, and momentarily clenched his fists. Mr. Thornton noted these unconscious actions, and inwardly approved them.

"That is your ultimatum, sir?" said Jack at length.

"It is, my boy."

"Well, then, I'll agree. But you'll let me see Doris once more?"

"You shall have her to yourself for half-an-hour," replied Mr. Thornton. "And then you must endeavour not to see her until you have fulfilled the conditions of our compact.

"It will be better in another way, too," he added. "For it will test whether your love for each other is strong enough to endure separation. Now I'll send Doris in to you."

Jack impatiently paced up and down the room after Mr. Thornton's departure. His brow was knit, and his lips tightly compressed. Hearing the door open, he swung round. Doris came towards him with a troubled, apprehensive look on her face.

"Well, Jack?" she said, as she crept into the shelter of his arms.

"Well, little woman. We must make the most of this half hour for it is the last we shall have together for some considerable time."

"Jack!" she cried. "The last! What do you mean?"

Then he told her of her father's decree, and that he had had to agree to it.

"But I will not keep you long, dear," he added. "I'll do something to make him come round very quickly."

The remainder of the interview need not be chronicled, but after Jack had gone Doris was some considerable time putting her hair straight. Having done that, she sat down and sobbed, and made her hair all untidy again.

As for Jack, he strode on down the main road, looking neither to the right nor the left. Through Amfield he tramped, down the road past Mouswater and on to Horseley, but he did not come back to ordinary everyday thoughts until he found himself past the village of Abis, and only a little way from Dunchester.

Two days passed by, and many plans had evolved in his brain, but they were all dismissed for some reason or other.

Suddenly his eyes gleamed, and he jumped to his feet excitedly.

"Got it!" he screamed. "By the Lord Harry, I've got it."

And the next day he departed to London.

* * * * *

Domsey (pronounced Dumsey) is a quaint old town built round a very ancient monastery. It is tenderly referred to by its inhabitants as "Domsey in the Mud."

Sleepy is the most characteristic adjective to apply to Domsey, except on every other Thursday when a market is held. There is one every Thursday, but the fortnightly market is much the larger of the two.

Like the town, Mr. Thornton's journal, the Domsey Times, was a peaceful, ambling sort of newspaper. They used to say that subscribers who were accustomed to an afternoon nap, very often failed to sleep if they had not got a copy of the Domsey Times in their hands.

It had a delightful little way of its own of appearing on different days of the week, according to how much time the Editor could spare to it.

However, Domsey woke up one morning to find all its walls placarded with staring posters. They were printed with a green ground and white letters with a scarlet edging. Altogether they produced a most startling effect. The text of the contents was as follows:

TO THE INHABITANTS OF DOMSEY!
You will shortly be the proud possessors of a first-class
NEWSPAPER
which will not send you to sleep.
READ THE DOMSEY TELEGRAPH.
Price 1d. Published every Thursday.
A LONDON NEWSPAPER IN DOMSEY!!!

It is really only in a country town or village that people talk to each other about everything, and that the popular opinion is generally quickly known.

Domsey viewed this innovation with marked interest. It was a splendid idea of the promoters to publish the paper on market days.

The Domsey Times had always been on sale at the various stationers, and there the subscribers had to go to obtain a copy. But on the Thursday when the first edition of the Domsey Telegraph came out, a number of boys paraded the town with copies of that paper for sale.

Most people bought both of the papers, and made nasty comparisons to the detriment of the Times.

Digitized by Google

"Well, Oi be danged!" remarked a burly, red-faced countryman. "This be a foine paper, I'll taak it hoam to the missus."

This expressed the general opinion of the Domseyites, more particularly when they read that copies would be delivered free of charge to all subscribers within a three mile radius of Domsey.

A large office and printing works had been taken over by the promoters in Church Street, which was surveyed with wondering admiration by all the townsfolk.

At Amfield House, Mr. Thornton read the Domsey Telegraph with vague, angry feelings of uneasiness.

"Won't last, my dear," he assured Doris. "You will see that my words will come true. The Times has been established too long, and has too firm a foothold to be thrust out by a flashy paper like this. I tell you, my dear, the Telegraph will expire in a fortnight."

Doris did not care much about the rivalry between the papers, all she wanted was Jack. She had not heard a word about him since he went to London, and she yearned to see him again.

However, a month went by, and the two vivid red motor-cars still made their rounds to the subscribers to the Telegraph. The new paper appeared with marked regularity, and was always far better informed than the Domsey Times.

The latter paper never made the slightest mention of its rival, but where you saw one copy of the Domsey Times you would see four copies of the Domsey Telegraph.

The climax came when the Telegraph commenced a series of prize competitions which highly took the fancy of Domseyites.

The circulation increased by leaps and bounds, and people living in Dunchester and Sarbury, both large country towns about eleven miles distant from Domsey, began to take in the Telegraph.

Mr. Thornton commenced to look worried. The Domsey Times had always been a lucrative investment but now he was beginning to lose money over it.

True it was that he could well afford it, but the idea went against the grain, and at last he came to the conclusion that he must adopt some means of altering the state of affairs.

It was a sore blow to his pride after having held the field for twelve years to have to give in to a newcomer after two months.

Sadly, therefore, he sat down and indited the following letter:

Amfield House, near Domsey.

To the Proprietor of the Domsey Telegraph, Domsey.

SIR—It must be apparent to you that there is no opening for two local papers in Domsey, and in consideration of that fact I beg to make the following proposal:

That the Domsey Telegraph and the Domsey Times be amalgamated and incorporated under one Proprietor and Editor, but that the original proprietors of the two papers receive a division of profits, such division to be arrived at by placing the accounts of the two journals in the hands of a trustworthy valuer, etc., etc., etc.

In two or three days' time a reply came back from a London firm of solicitors who were empowered to act for the proprietor of the Domsey Telegraph. The letter was to the effect that their client would not consider for one moment the question of amalgamation, but he would be willing to be bought out.

Mr. Thornton was now at a critical piont. Either he must give in, and cease to issue the Domsey Times, or else he must agree to the said proposal.

Already people were quietly laughing at him, and he knew that the death of the Domsey Times would mean a great loss of prestige. So he took the bull by the horns and commenced negotiations for the purchase of the Domsey Telegraph.

The price asked was a high one—£500 more than he had anticipated paying. After some haggling he managed to reduce it by £150, but had to close at that figure.

So the Domsey Times, now somewhat glorified, remained the only local newspaper in that remarkable and somnambulistic town.

All this time Doris was worrying the roses from her cheeks through the absence of Jack. Never a word or a message had come from him, all she knew was that he had gone to London.

Mr. Thornton had been too much occupied by reason of his newspaper controversy to pay much attention to his daughter's looks, but now he had time to himself he was astonished to find how ill she was looking.

"Here," he said, when he had elicited the cause of her pale looks from her. "We'll have that young man back at once. I'll write him to-day."

But at that very moment a footman brought in the visiting-card of Mr. John Guthrie.

Doris hastily slipped upstairs.

"Well, sir," said Mr. Thornton, "what can I do for you?"

"Fulfil your part of our contract," was Jack's reply. "I have done my part."

"Indeed, and what have you done?"

"That!" cried Jack, as he handed Mr. Thornton the cheque with which he had paid for the Telegraph.

Mr. Thornton looked at it, and then his face went scarlet with suppressed rage.

"What!" he shrieked. "You did that?"

"Yes, sir. Good business, was it not?"

"Good business!" Mr. Thornton almost screamed. "You young——" He paused and considered for a moment. Then the angry look died away, and an amused twinkle appeared in his eyes.

"Well, after all," he said. "You've only done what I told you to do. Here, take this back."

He held out the cheque.

Jack took it, and deliberately tore it into several pieces.

"Now, sir, we're quits. I've had my turn and paid for it."

"No," cried Mr. Thornton. "You must not do that."

In vain he protested, Jack was obdurate.

"Well, my boy. You've been a bit smarter than your future father-in-law. Here's my hand on it. Now I will send Doris in to you."

Presently she came in, and Jack has said that the bliss of that reunion was worth the pain of the parting and absence.

With the aid of some of his journalistic friends and the outlay of some capital, Jack had found it very easy to produce the Domsey Telegraph and to make it a far better paper than the Domsey Times.

"Where there's a will there's a way"—even in Domsey—and generally everywhere when there's money to back the will.

E. Newton Bungey.

Small Homes and How to Furnish Them.

By Mrs. Waldemar Leverton.

With 16 Illustrations, cloth, price 1s., or post free for 1s. 2d.

Some of the Contents are: Choosing the Home—The Furniture—Wall Papers—Floor Coverings—On Colourings, &c., &c.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

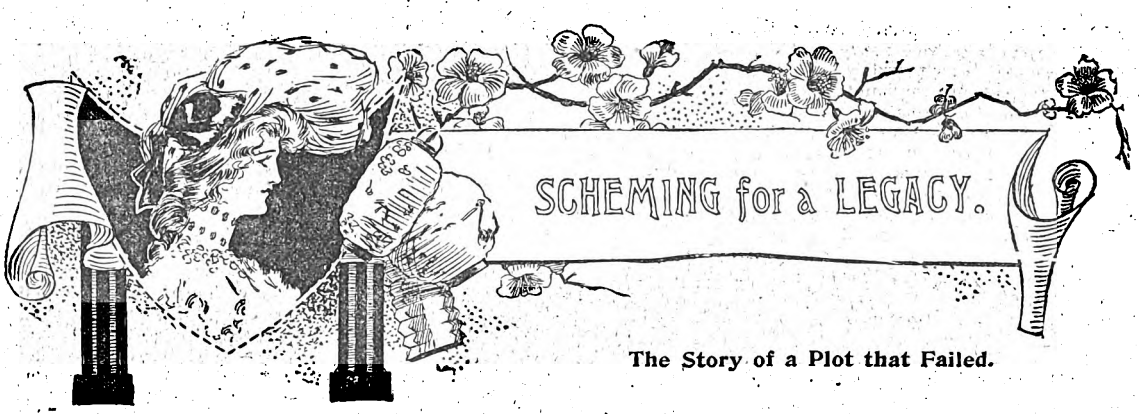
To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "Small Homes and How to Furnish Them," for which I inclose the sum of 1/2.

Name.....

Address.....

Digitized by Google



The Story of a Plot that Failed.

THE first time I met Mrs. Penthony she was—very naturally and properly, as it was only two months after Terry's death—clad in deepest widow's weeds. "My poor, dear husband," was written large all over her, from the orthodox crape bonnet on her head, to the dainty black-stockinged ankles revealed as she stepped out of the carriage.

We had not been aware of the existence of Terry's wife until she announced herself in a heart-broken letter to my father as Terry's widow, and then my mother insisted on inviting her at once to Penthony Court.

We had all adored Terry—my father, mother, and myself. In earliest years I had trotted after him, his devoted little slave, and, when asked my name, had always responded, "Terry's sister," instead of the proper reply, "Diana Penthony."

Terry, however, had not turned out quite as he ought to have done, and after a somewhat lurid career, he was sent abroad with a tutor, to rusticate in a quiet German village, from which he sent my mother repentant and affectionate letters. It was a terrible shock to us all when we had a wire from Mr. Green, the tutor, announcing our poor, dear boy's sudden death, followed by a letter telling us that the authorities had insisted on the interment taking place within the next two days.

My father was prostrate with grief, and his next heir and nearest male relative, my cousin, Dare Penthony, was in India, so poor Terence was buried far away from us all without one of his kith and kin to follow him to the grave.

Six weeks later, Mrs. Terence Penthony's letter amazed us all. Of course Terry, being twenty-four, might quite easily have got married without seeking his parent's consent, but there seemed no motive for secrecy.

Katherine Penthony was, she told us, the daughter of an independent gentlemen, who had settled in the remote German village for his health's sake, and she certainly wrote us in the style and handwriting of a gentlewoman.

"Poor, dear boy," sighed my mother, "it seems strange he did not tell us of it."

"It seems her father died very suddenly," said my father, glancing over the letter again, "and Terry asked her to marry him at once because she was alone, and then the poor boy's death followed before he could announce the marriage to us."

"Poor child, it is very sad for her," murmured my mother.

"She doesn't seem to know that Terry came into ten thousand pounds on his marriage," my father went on.

"Did he really?" asked Dare, who had come back from India, on receiving my father's summons.

"His godfather left him ten thousand pounds, to be paid over to him on his marriage day, not before, and to pass to his widow, if she survived him. It was rather a queer idea, wasn't it?"

"Rather," said Dare. "But you are not going to accept this woman's unsupported statement that she is Terry's widow, are you?"

My mother fired up at the idea of doubting the poor girl's word, and my father picked up another letter with the same post-mark, and opened it.

"As it happens, my dear Dare," he said quietly, "we are not required to accept Katherine's unsupported testimony. This letter is from Green—Terry's tutor, you know, giving a fuller and more detailed account of the marriage than the poor, broken-hearted child has been able to do. It seems that they fell in love with each other at first sight, but that the father's sudden death precipitated matters. Terry's own death occurred but two days after his marriage, before he had time to write to us. Read for yourself." He handed the letter to Dare, who glanced over it, and then passed it on to my mother.

An invitation was sent to my sister-in-law by return of post, with the result that, within three weeks, she arrived in the deepest possible mourning, and with a face expressive of the acutest grief.

But she was very beautiful. I had been in the habit of considering myself rather a pretty little person, but I faded into insignificance beside Katherine. What was my round, rosy face compared with that faultless oval of hers? How commonplace were my grey eyes beside her large, velvety black orbs. My nut-brown curls seemed unworthy of admiration, seen near the heavy, rich black locks that crowned her small, graceful head. And how short and stumpy I looked beside her tall, slim, exquisitely graceful figure.

She took us all by storm. Her manner was perfect, sweet, gentle, mournful, pathetic. My father and mother adored her, and wished her to make her home entirely with us, but, to my secret joy, she refused. She would spend every summer with us, she promised, but there was an old uncle in Krahwinkel—the German town where she had met Terry—with whom she wished to make her home while he lived. It might not be long, for he was over eighty, but, while he lived, her duty, she thought, was to him.

So it was agreed that she should remain with us until arrangements could be made for paying over to her the ten thousand pounds, due to her as Terry's widow, and then she should be free to return to Krahwinkel until next summer, when she would come again to Penthony Court.

I secretly hoped affairs would be arranged very soon, so that she might go, for, however much I might have liked her had she not been such a general favourite, it was really more than an ordinary, flesh-and-blood girl could stand to see her winning the affections of both father and mother, and, far worse, of the young man on whom I had set my own heart, and whom I had fondly imagined to be my own lover.

He had certainly been very tender to me in my first grief at my brother's death, and we had got upon very affectionate terms before the arrival of the disconsolate widow. Was she so very disconsolate though? Were my jealous eyes mistaken when I saw glances cast at Dare—glances which no disconsolate widow ought to throw to another man, much less a man who was rightfully another woman's property.

Digitized by Google

Quite three months had passed before the lawyers had everything in order, and were ready to hand over the ten thousand pounds to Terry's widow. The money was, by her request, to be paid into the hands of a banker in London, there to await a suitable investment.

It was a lovely evening in mid-September, a glorious harvest moon shone down on the flower-beds on the lawn at Penthony Court, lighting them up with its pale but distant beams, and leaving the terrace and house in the shadow.

I had been at the piano ever since dinner, playing favourite bits of music to my parents, but my attention was chiefly occupied in wondering with all my jealous, wounded heart, what had become of Dare and Katherine. An hour ago, they had gone out of the low French window on to the terrace to look at the moon, and apparently they were still looking at it.

I stole a glance at the other occupants of the room. My father had dropped asleep over his newspaper, my mother was absorbed in a difficulty she had encountered in her lace-work. They would not notice, if I slipped out after the missing couple. Go I must; my heart was on fire with jealousy, anger, and pain.

Two figures, both dark, were at the end of the terrace, where the steps led down to the lawn, and the moon was shining full on them. They were leaning against the balustrade, so absorbed in each other's society that they did not notice my approach. I did not mean to become an eavesdropper, but there was a big lump in my throat as I saw their loving attitude, which quite prevented speech, and before I could swallow it down and call attention to my presence, Dare had bent forward and kissed the glowing cheek so near his own, and I stood frozen to the spot. My worst fears were realised; the man I loved was the lover of my brother's widow.

"Kate, darling," he was saying, when, to a certain degree, I came to myself, "you do love me, don't you? It's too early to talk of a second marriage as yet, I know, but give me a word of hope."

"Don't be ridiculous," Kate's sweet voice replied. "You know you love Diana."

"I thought I did," Dare answered slowly. "Yes, Kate, you are right; I thought I loved little Di; she is a sweet, dear little girl, but you—Kate, you are a goddess. My beautiful, my glorious love, kiss me."

With a faint cry I drew back, and fled in the other direction, down into the park. How could I bear it? My grief for my brother's death had been hard to bear, but what had that been compared with the pain that his widow had brought upon me? As I ran sobbing through the park I suddenly heard a man's step approaching me, and before I could stop myself I ran headlong into the arms of someone coming from the West Lodge.

"Di, my little Di," said a familiar voice in my ears, and dear, well-known lips pressed mine. "Well, little sister, is it you?"

"Terry, Terry, Terry," I cried. "Oh, how can it be you? You are dead."

"Dead!"

He released me in his surprise, and faced me in amazed silence. The moon showered its beams full on his astonished face, and showed it to me as clearly as if it had been daylight. It certainly was my brother Terence; my brother whom we all believed to be buried in a little German village, and whose widow was now on the terrace with the man I loved.

"Dead!" he repeated, almost in a whisper. "Diana, what do you mean?"

"Well, anyhow, your widow is here," I said confusedly.

"My widow!" he echoed. "Dear little Diana, what is the matter with you? My widow? How can I have a widow? I never was married—nor am I dead, as you can see."

"Well, she says she's your widow," I said, doubtfully, "and she says you're dead. And Mr. Green says you're dead."

"Ah, that I understand," replied Terry, with a peculiar look. "Does mother think I'm dead?"

"Why, of course, Terry," I cried; "you mustn't go to her now—the shock might kill her. I'll prepare her. But—who's Kate?"

"Kate? A great, strapping creature, is she? With black hair and eyes? Handsome, but coarse?"

"Yes, that's Kate," I replied, greatly consoled by this description of her triumphant charms. How I wished that Dare could have heard it."

"That's Green's sister. I'll tell you all about it, Di, and then you must break the news of my return to my father and mother, and I'll make a clean breast of it to them. Come and sit down here. I know very well why she's posing as my widow here. We weren't long in Krahwinkel—why did my father send me to such a dull hole?—before I found out that Green wasn't a bit what he pretended to be, and he found the place as unendurable as I did, so we soon set off together for Monte Carlo, where I lost heavily. Kate, Green's sister, was at the tables, too, and Green, who knew that by my godfather's will I came in for that money on my marriage, tried his best to bring about a match between us. But I was not having any. She's just the kind of girl I can't stand at any price. Well, I had lost so much money that I had got into a regular fix, and I worried myself into a brain fever over it. When I came to myself, I was in a miserable little hut, where I had no idea, with a dirty old woman gabbling Italian to me. After a bit, Green turned up, and told me that he was going to keep me prisoner there until I promised to marry his sister. One way or another he did manage to keep me there—I was very weak with the fever, remember—until three days ago, when he also took ill with some kind of fever, and I managed to escape, while the old woman was attending to him. Now, dear, run off to the house, I can't wait any longer. Break the news to my father and mother, but don't give Kate Green any warning, if you can avoid it."

How I managed to tell them the glad news, I don't know, but I did somehow, and in a very short time Terry was in his mother's arms, back from the dead!

The routing of Terry's widow followed shortly afterwards, and was undertaken by Terry himself.

I was not present at the scene, and only know that she was permitted to remain at Penthony Court that night, and that no proceedings were to be taken against either her or her brother. She went off by an early train next morning, and we never heard any more of either brother or sister.

As for Dare, he was first stunned and then remorseful for his treatment of me, but I am of a very forgiving disposition, and I soon pardoned his brief infatuation.

In fact, I may as well confess that when he asked me to prove my forgiveness by becoming his wife, I only required a judicious amount of pressing before I faltered out a shy but very willing "Yes."

It was very lucky that Terry returned at the moment he did, lucky for himself, myself, and—Dare!

Vera Serkoff.

Digitized by Google

POWERFUL NEW ROMANCE. STARTS TO-DAY.

A CRIMINAL MILLIONAIRE

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "Olga Romanoff," "The Lake of Gold," etc., etc.

FIRST CHAPTER.

Lady Medcalf-Mears' "At Home."

"I SAY, Maud, you know everybody in town. Tell me who that chap is?"

"Which 'chap,' my dear Captain Iddison?" replied Lady Maud.

"Oh, look here, Maud, you needn't be so awfully formal with a fellow, you know. Hang it all, we're——"

"Yes, of course, my dear Percy," interrupted Lady Maud Hyam, the latest, and, as some said, the most beautiful of the season's fiancées, "but I was only following your own example, and, after all, formality has its uses even between engaged people."

"All right," replied Captain Iddison. "You know I don't pretend to be much good at formality."

"No, my dear boy, I know you aren't, and I am very glad of it," replied Lady Maud, dropping her fan lightly on the broad shoulder of the young Hercules who was sitting by her side in Lady Medcalf-Mears' big drawing-room in Lowndes Square. "You are a good deal better at fighting, and that's why—well, I suppose that's why I like you. At any rate, it's one of the reasons. And now which fellow is it that you mean?"

"Why, that one, of course," he replied, so far forgetting his good manners as to half point with his finger at what was certainly the most distinguished male figure in the big, crowded drawing-room.

"Oh, yes!" she said, with a little note of awe in her voice. "That? Why, Percy, do you mean to say that although you returned only a fortnight ago from the ends of the earth, you haven't yet made the acquaintance of the lion of the season? Don't you know that Lady Medcalf-Mears always has the newest and biggest lion in the whole social menagerie at her 'At homes,' especially just when the season's beginning? That is Mr. Isolo Staunton, the modern Monte Christo, as they call him.

"He is one of the biggest scores that even our experienced hostess has ever made. He is a man—you have only got to look at him to see that—six feet one in his boots if he's an inch, and built to scale; a millionaire no one knows how many times over—and something else which raises him far above the ordinary rut of men and millionaires—a mystery."

"What's that?" murmured the Honourable Percy, leaning if possible a little closer to her and looking into the beautiful face which was so temptingly near his own. "A mystery—what do you mean by that? I should hardly have thought that a man with a past that no one knows anything at all about, if that's what you mean, would have been taken up by Lady Mary, however big a pot he might be in other ways."

"My dear boy," she laughed, "you ought to know that a man with an unknown past, if he has done something, or made himself something, is one of the most successful social exhibits that the modern hostess can put on show!"

"Is that all you have to tell me about the new lion? You see I have only been back a fortnight, and I have spent about eight days of it up at Harrowby, which is nearly a day's journey each way. Can't you tell me anything more about him? I don't know why I should take such an interest in the subject, but somehow I do."

"Yes," said Lady Maud with a little toss of her golden-crowned head, "if he were a woman and as good-looking as he is as a man, I should almost be inclined to be jealous, but really I can't tell you anything more than I have done, except what everybody can tell you at the clubs.

"He is, as I have told you, a multi-millionaire. No one knows who he is, what he is, or where he came from. Of course, without his millions, I suppose no one would ever have heard of him, but with the millions to gild what everyone admits to be a very interesting personality—well, here he is, Isolo Staunton.

"But stop, here comes Mr. Ellerton. You know him, of course—the only son of Sir Wilfrid Ellerton. I think Sir Wilfrid is one of the men we really ought to be proud of. He began life, they say, as a fitter, or whatever they call it, in a machine shop at Ellerton, in Yorkshire. You know such a lot of people in the North are named after the places they live in, or else the places are named after some far-away ancestor who made the place, and so they must be a sort of aristocracy of their own kind with scores of generations behind them. But you can see for yourself," she continued in a lower tone as she rose and held out her hand.

"Good afternoon, Mr. Ellerton, I hope you haven't been here very long, or I should feel inclined to be offended with you for not having come to speak to me before. You don't know Mr. Iddison—I beg his pardon, Captain Iddison? He is only just back from Somaliland, so you may as well be introduced now."

The Honourable Percy Iddison, captain of His Majesty's Engineers, V.C., D.S.O., and special service officer in South Africa, shook hands warmly with Ellerton.

The handshake didn't mean much, but the look that was in their eyes convinced both of them in the same moment that each had met a man, and each instinctively liked the other.

What Percy Iddison saw, when he shook hands with the son of the man who had taken the world by the throat for the sake of his son, was just this:

A straight, upstanding, square-jawed, broad-browed, curly, chestnut-haired young fellow of about twenty-four, a year less than his own age, with dark eyebrows over-arching grey-blue Celtic eyes. A sort of man that he would like to have with him in a tight corner, or meet face to face in what he would have called a really good scrap.

Digitized by Google

"I see that you know each other already," said Lady Maud, with a little laugh rippling through her words. "I suppose it is a case of when man meets man—now, isn't that quite the prettiest compliment that woman could have paid both of you?"

"Really, Lady Maud, I am afraid you are quite too flattering, at least to one of us," said Ellerton, with a glance which the other man would have resented if he hadn't felt that he was quite safe, "still——"

"Thanks, but don't say any more just now, because—well, I think other things are going to happen. Now, Percy, you are going to have a new sensation. Excuse me, just one moment, Mr. Ellerton, here is Lady Mary bringing the lion of the evening to be introduced."

As she said this Wilfrid Ellerton turned his head towards Lady Mary Medcalf-Mears and the Lion. As he did so, Iddison noticed that there was a streak of almost white hair running from the front of the left ear down almost to the base of the skull, which showed up like a streak of white mist against a bank of blue-grey thundercloud. His hair was dark chesnut, almost black in certain lights, and almost golden in others.

"Rather curious, that. Still, I've seen that sort of thing happen in a month or so in the field, but not go in a streak like that. Wonder what's been the matter with him. Not an Army man, so he can't have got it in that way!"

These were the thoughts which ran through Percy Iddison's brain as he shook hands with Wilfrid Ellerton and then turned to greet his hostess, Lady Mary Medcalf-Mears, who had brought her latest lion to be introduced to her most interesting, although, perhaps, not her most distinguished guests.

"I don't think you all know each other yet," said Lady Mary. "Mr. Isolo Staunton, Lady Maud Hyam, Captain Percy Iddison, Mr. Wilfrid Ellerton, and vice versâ. Well, now, you know yourselves as far as the conventionalities go, and the rest, I think, I can safely leave in your own hands. You see, I am rather busy this afternoon, and so I know that you will excuse me."

With that she vanished into the throng of the other guests with grace that no other woman in London had been able to copy.

The preliminaries of polite conversation-making were hardly over when a famous Hungarian violinist, accompanied by an almost equally famous German pianist, began to play. This, of course, put an end to all talk save among those who, in spite of their breeding, were yet sufficiently ill-mannered to think that the music—which was costing their hostess something like five guineas a minute—was only intended to mask the muttered commonplaces with which they were wasting time until it was possible to make a decent leave-taking.

"Shall we go and listen?" said Lady Maud, rising with a look, that was practically a command, at Iddison. "I love the violin."

The others who were seated rose also, and they drifted along with the tide, which was flowing with a gentle frou-frou of silken underskirts, into the music-room overlooking the pretty, old-fashioned garden.

SECOND CHAPTER.

A Spectre from the Past.

But there was one man in that company for whom just now the sweetest strains that genius could win from the most perfect instruments were only utter discords, tormenting almost to madness.

Percy Iddison was not the only man who had noticed that curious white streak among Wilfrid Ellerton's chestnut curls. Isolo Staunton had seen it to, and he had all too little reason to wonder how it came there. As soon as the music was over he made his adieux and went out into the street, staring about him with wavering eyes like a man newly awakened in a strange world. When his brougham came up to the door he dismissed his man, saying that he preferred to walk home, and telling him he was not required.

Isolo Staunton was a man of action, as well as of thought, and when he was thinking really hard it was also absolutely necessary for him to have his muscles as well as his nerves at work, and so he walked.

"Good afternoon, Mr. Ellerton," said Lady Maud, "let me introduce you to Captain Iddison."

His brain had never been working with such fierce intensity as it was working now as he made his way along the crowded pavements of Sloane Street and Knightsbridge. Much of his life had been passed in the wilderness, and now he felt a desperate longing for the solitude of the wilderness again, and the solace which that solitude brings.

He turned up into the Park past Apsley House, and walked across to the Marble Arch. So far there was only one thought in his brain, only one thing that his eyes really saw—that thin streak of white hair running through the closely-cropped chestnut curls of Wilfrid Ellerton. It was something like a brief but ever-recurring nightmare to him.

At the corner of Edgware Road he took an omnibus to Cricklewood.

He got out into the open country as soon as he could. He knew it had to come, and with that primeval instinct which possesses every human being, he wanted to get away from his fellow men and fight his trouble out in solitude.

For an hour he walked on, a strange figure, clad, as he was in his light grey frock suit and a glossy hat, which was now tilted back at an angle which would have made men in Pall Mall look round at him, his hands behind his back, his head bent forward, seeing nothing but the road over which he was walking.

Digitized by Google

Then out of the dust which rose on the wind blowing behind him, certain shapes began to form themselves. The fields and the hedges vanished. In their place came a wide, blue-grey expanse of water.

The sky-dome above was blue-grey also. Its colour had been burnt out of it by the fierce rays of the sun that was blazing overhead. What was left of paint on the whale boat was crinkling up into blisters. There was a man lying forward, just as he had dropped off the seat. He was the second who had died that day. The other had seen visions of islands, green with verdure, fed by clear springs, and he had drunk the seawater and had presently dropped himself overboard, raving mad, to drink more of it, and so find the common death of the castaway.

He was steering, and beside him was an axe, the symbol of the power which he had taken into his own hands when the boat was cast adrift from the sinking ship which had been hurled hundreds of miles before one of those gales which come up from the Antarctic.

On the mid-thwart there was a man sitting. His arms were on the gunwale and his head lay loosely between them, moving with every motion of the boat. He was half dead already and it would not take very much to finish the business with him. Forward on the next thwart there was a boy of about fourteen, dying, but still strong with the miraculous vitality of youth. There was enough of biscuits and tinned meat and water to last one man for another fortnight or so, but not enough for three. He was half mad with the insanity of thirst aggravated by the horrible temptation to drink by the pint the precious water which his discipline had so far limited to a few spoonfuls. He saw himself let go of the tiller and rise wearily from his seat. He heard himself say:

"It's no good, Willy. Jack's gone and old Tom is about finished. You and I had better make an end of him and finish the cruise somehow between us. We have not stuff enough for three. There might be for two."

Then the boy jumped up and came at him with a sudden flush in his white cheeks, and a sudden energy in his whole body.

"No," he muttered hoarsely, the words coming thickly and slowly from between his parched lips. "No, I see what you mean, but you sha'n't. It is murder. It doesn't matter whether he is half dead or not. It is murder all the same. You —You shan't do it. It's murder, I tell you!"

He picked up the axe as the boy jumped at him. He tripped over the half dead body of the man on the middle thwart, and as he went down the axe fell. He saw a streak of red among the chestnut curls and then the sky and ocean seemed to come together.

He stumbled forward, lifted the axe again and struck the prostrate man. As he lifted it once more his own brain seemed to snap with a bang—and there the scene ended.

The curtain of forgetfulness dropped swiftly upon the stage of memory. The scene vanished—and here he was again walking between the green English hedges with the broad fields on either side of him sloping upwards to the softly rounded tree-growing hills.

Isolo Zuarez, castaway and convict, was dead, once more. Isolo Staunton took off his hat, wiped his forehead, put his hat on again, thrust his hands into his pockets, and walked back to the Cricklewood Arms, saying to himself between his tightly clenched teeth:

"If he remembers well, I suppose it will mean I return to the Chinchas, again a convict. If he doesn't, so much the better. If I'd finished the job before I fainted no one could have traced me. Tom was dead and Willy was insensible, and I was mad when they picked us up. The axe had dropped overboard, and when the young beggar came to he remembered nothing.

"If he only has forgotten, then in just a few years more the world shall see another Napoleon—the uniter of a thousand warring interests, the director into a single channel of the energy which is now spent in conflicts which are as trifling as the quarrels of children in the gutter, the Creator of a new Power in the world, a Power which, directed as I will direct it, shall break the yoke which these Anglo-Saxons have put upon the necks of the nations, and make Spain once more what she was in the days of Cortez and Pizarro, Queen of the Seas and Mistress of East and West!"

THIRD CHAPTER.

Looking Backwards.

The key-note of Isolo Staunton's later existence had been independence. It did not matter to him whether the person with whom he had to deal for the moment was a man or a woman. He was wont to pride himself on the consciousness that in matters of business—he recognised no distinction of sex, and this, as many of his unsuccessful rivals were forced to admit, was a very great advantage to him. He could swindle a pretty duchess or get a Cabinet Minister into financial troubles which would be profitable to himself with just as light a heart as he would get the better of a German Jew financier.

He cared for nothing but money, and for what money could buy for him.

Although he possessed the genius of making money he also had the cleverness to see that it is not exactly money which makes one a power in the world, but rather the use that money is put to, and so he used the superfluity of his wealth wisely.

One of his carefully calculated extravagances was his turbine yacht Isola. She was a thousand-ton vessel and her engines were the latest development of the turbine principle of propulsion. Her lines were exquisite, she was a veritable aristocrat of the ocean and, although no one outside her officers and crew knew it, she was also the fastest craft in the world.

His little expedition to Cricklewood had really been one of the most strenuous experiences even in a life as full of living as his had been. He was just thirty-eight and he had begun to live at ten. His father had been a Scottish adventurer, called sometimes Staunton and sometimes Saunders, and Zuarez had been the Spanish disguise or semi-translation of the latter which he had adopted when he took the plunge into South American politics which, after a couple of bitterly fought revolutions, had resulted in his becoming first Vice-President and then President of Peru. He had married a very beautiful Spanish girl and Isolo, their only child, was both physically and mentally as good and as bad a compound of Scottish and Spanish American as could well have been produced from such a union. He had his father's inches, a good six feet of bone and muscle, his mother's features, but the shape of his head was Scottish in its squareness, and his hair was a crisp, curly, reddish-brown. The fire of the Spanish American was tempered by the cold, calculating genius of the Scotsman, strangely combined with the dreaminess of the Celt.

The second revolution had ended in utter ruin. His father had refused to believe in the failure of his cause, and so had delayed beyond reasonable limits his preparations for escaping with the Presidential plunder. The result was that he was caught and shot by the victorious revolutionists, and his plunder duly transferred to the pockets of his successor, and those who had helped him to overthrow the tyrant, and in the natural course of events some other tyrant was put in his place.

This had happened when the boy was ten years old, and after it had come five or six years of poverty and exile with his mother in Chili. Then his mother, the only human being he had ever loved, died, leaving him her own ideals and the lessons she had taught him as her only legacy, and after this had begun the wild life on the coast, now ashore and now afloat, a desperate gamble of liberty, and perhaps life, for sudden wealth, the living death of the Chincha Islands, the almost miraculous escape, a few years at sea, then the tragedy of the whale boat, and then the marvel which had laid the foundation of his present fortune, the extent of which no one but himself could measure, and of which no one save those in his inmost confidence knew the real sources.

Digitized by Google

So far for nearly fifteen years these fortunes had grown steadily and swiftly, and as the millions had piled themselves on each other the great ideal which he had inherited from his Spanish mother had come nearer and nearer to its longed-for fulfilment. Political and military agents all over the world had been working for years towards the same end under the orders of an unknown and invisible master. Diplomatists had found their negotiations shaped almost unconsciously by the same mysterious power and, in short, all the vast machinery that he had set in motion was working smoothly and well, when this spectre from the past had suddenly risen above the unclouded horizon and he saw not only the fabric of his life work but even his own liberty, nay, his very life itself, at the mercy of a lad of twenty-three.

The Isola was lying alongside Ocean Quay, Southampton, about a week after the reception, with steam up ready for one of those mysterious trips which periodically took her owner far away beyond the ken of the fashionable world of Europe.

Isolo Staunton was lying on a lounge in his exquisitely, though somewhat plainly appointed, private room at the after-end of the long, spacious promenade deck. It was entirely isolated from all the other saloons and state-rooms on the ship. It had double walls of steel and oak and double windows of thick plate glass through which no sound could penetrate, and it was generally understood on board the great yacht that when the Señor was in his sanctum no one was to approach him, or have any communication with him except by telephone from the captain's room under the navigating bridge. It was in fact the most perfect council chamber that any ruler of men crowned or uncrowned could have possessed, an inviolable sanctuary of secrets which the most ingenious curiosity must fail to penetrate.

The Señor was just now in earnest consultation with his principal counseller and only real confidant, a tall, sparely-built man of about fifty-five, whose delicately-cut, aquiline features, dark, piercing, though somewhat closely-set eyes, high, narrow forehead, and still dark, glossy hair only slightly frosted with grey at the temples proclaimed him a Castilian of the purest blood. This was Don Ramiero Valdez y Valdivia. He was the last remaining scion of one of those ancient Castilian families which had settled in Peru soon after the conquest, and had kept its proud blood pure by avoiding all inter-marriage. Like many other such families in South America, wars, revolutions and confiscations had reduced them to almost absolute poverty, but President Zuarez and Don Ramiero's father had been comrades in the revolution which placed him in power, and he had done much to restore the fortunes of the Valdez family. Comradeship in arms had led to complete personal devotion, and Valdez had become the President's one trusted counsellor as Ramiero was now the one confidant of Isolo Staunton.

He knew of the irregularities which had consigned the man whom Society called the modern Monte Christo to the sea-girt prison of the Chincha Islands, but in his eyes they were political offences against a usurping government, and therefore rather in the nature of virtues than of crimes. He knew also of the tragedy of the whaleboat—for Staunton never gave half confidences, knowing well how treacherous they are—and that he excused on the double ground of delirium and self-preservation. Under any circumstances the son of his father's friend and the benefactor of his house had a better right to live and do his great work in the world than a couple of common seamen and an insignificant ship's boy.

"Of course the great point is," said Staunton, after they had put in a few moments of hard thinking, "whether young Ellerton remembers me and the painful circumstances of our last meeting or not. If he doesn't, which is the same thing as saying that if that crack which I thought necessary to give him across the head has, as such a crack will do sometimes, cut that little piece out of his memory, I don't see that we need disquiet ourselves in vain about him."

"Pardon, Señor," interrupted Valdez, with grave deference, "but there I would say that you are going wrong at the very beginning. It is exactly in that case that I would counsel you to take the most prompt measures for his very necessary suppression."

"I am afraid I hardly follow you, my dear Ramiero," said Staunton, looking up quickly. "If the fellow remembers nothing, and he certainly didn't seem to have the ghost of a recollection of me the other day at Lady Mary's, what harm can he do? As far as that little incident is concerned it is as good as dead."

"For the present—yes," replied Valdez softly, as he rolled a little brown Peruvian cigarette between his tapering, long-nailed fingers, "but for all that his existence, or if you have scruples about proceeding to extremities, his continued existence in freedom, can nevertheless be nothing but a perpetual menace, not only to that great and glorious work to which you have devoted your life, but even to your life itself. Is he not the one living link which connects the present with the past? He knew, as you have told me, of your escape with Martinez from the islands, for Martinez had told the whole story in his delirium in the boat. He was on the ship which picked you up, and therefore he must have known that your story about the shipwreck was false—that you were not cast-away sailors but escaped convicts; wherefore his story of the real shipwreck and your rescue would be quite sufficient to connect you with the man who was sent for life to the Chinchas, to say nothing of the necessary abolition of your sometime accomplice, Martinez. No, no, Señor, memory or no memory, he is a living menace to you."

"And, therefore," said Staunton, after a long meditative pull at his cigar as he watched the blue rings curling up towards the maple panelled ceiling, "therefore, with your usual thoroughness of policy, I suppose you are going to counsel the completion of the work which the hatchet would have finished there and then, if I hadn't been faint with hunger and thirst, and dizzy with delirium. Frankly, I don't like the idea. I suppose I have become, if not more moral, at least more fastidious since those wild old days came to an end. I fight with money, with my own and other men's brains, not with hatchets. They are too much like the savage's tomahawk. In other words, I suppose I have become civilised. No, no, we must not talk about abolition. I will have no bloodshed until it becomes absolutely necessary. Ah! wait a moment, we ought to have some of the reports by this time. This may be something."

The telephone bell rang softly as he spoke. He got up and took the transmitter from the hook.

"Very well," he said, after listening for a few moments; "kindly ask Mr. Morton to come here."

He put the transmitter back and said, as he sat down:

"I had an idea it was Morton. As I told you, as soon as I made that unfortunate discovery, I put him on to look up the Ellerton family history with a special reference to Master Wilfrid's doings since he came back from sea. There he is! Would you mind opening the door, Ramiero?"

Valdez rose and noiselessly opened the double doors.

"Come in, Mr. Morton," said Staunton, leaning back on his sofa and lighting a fresh cigar.

The Honourable Reginald Morton, close-clipped, clean-shaven, well-set-up, and perfectly dressed walked in, with glossy hat in hand, as Valdez closed the doors behind him.

As he will play no insignificant part in the present narrative the reader may as well make his acquaintance here as elsewhere.

He was one of those social products which have come into being since the aristocrats opened their arms and their houses to the plutocrats. He was the younger son of Sir Reginald Wriothesley Morton, a baronet of long descent and ancient creation whose position in Society was rather too big for his means, and who was further burdened by the possession of three marriageable daughters who cost a great deal to keep in the social swim, and whose matrimonial prospects had remained at the vaguest for some four seasons. The elder son Wriothesley had inherited a nice little fortune from his grandmother and also occupied a very snug permanent secretaryship, and the two combined to raise him above the reach of financial temptation.

Digitized by Google

A CRIMINAL MILLIONAIRE.

Reginald had begun the world with a good education, a very fair Oxford degree, perfect manners, a limitable assurance, and a very easy conscience. His leanings were towards finance, and his father's influence had got him a very decent berth in a big stockbroker's firm, and through this channel he had drifted into connection with Isolo Staunton, and so far now, as the world knew, he was one of the millionaire's confidential secretaries. As a matter of fact he was his social spy. His birth and breeding gave him the entrée to the most exclusive circles. He knew how to keep his eyes and his ears open and his mouth shut, and however unscrupulous he was in getting information it was part of his social creed to be absolutely true to his salt. At present the said salt was worth about two thousand a year to him, to say nothing of the good things he was always getting on to, the plums and currants, as it were, that were left behind when his employer had taken his own slice out of the financial cake.

"Good afternoon, Morton," said Staunton genially; "there's whisky and soda, help yourself and take a cigar. You've got some news, I suppose?"

"Yes," replied Morton, putting down his hat and taking a cigar, "about the Ellertons, of course. Not very much that isn't generally known, I am afraid. They are not a family with secrets, you know. They are not old enough to have cupboards with skeletons in them. Sir Wilfrid makes no secret of his humble origin—rather glories in it, in fact, after the manner of self-made men who have had the good sense not to turn out misfits. I've traced the family tree back for three generations, and there the roots lose themselves in quite hopeless obscurity. Authentic history seems to begin with Sir Wilfrid and his son, and of course everyone knows who and what Sir Wilfrid is and was."

"Anything about the son?" asked Staunton carelessly. "I suppose he has not done anything to particularly distinguish himself yet, has he?"

"No," replied the spy, looking at the ash on his cigar; "his general reputation is almost monotonously excellent. His manners and breeding seem to point to some remote ancestry to which he has harked back. He's a sportsman, though, and does everything that a gentleman ought to know and do, a great favourite with women, whom he rather tolerates than worships, which is perhaps the only peculiar thing about him except the past."

"His past!" echoed Staunton, with a slight lift of his eyebrows. "Surely he is rather young to have a past, isn't he?"

"You've noticed that curious streak of white hair that he has over his left ear?"

"Yes," said Staunton, with a half-stifled yawn. "Has that anything to do with his past? I did notice it the other day, now I come to think of it."

"No, it isn't that, but it is connected with the only curious fact in the whole of my investigations."

"And that?"

"Well it seems that when he was quite a lad Master Wilfrid showed his independence in character by running away to sea. He got round the Horn and up to Valparaiso, and thence up to Callao and Peru, and then somewhere off the coast he got wrecked. He was saved with two or three sailors in a boat, went pretty nearly mad with hunger and thirst, and that's all he remembers, and he came to himself weeks afterwards in New York. He can't remember the name of the ship he was wrecked in or who got away with him in the boat. All he does know was what they told him on the ship that picked him up, that there was one man lying dead in the boat and another dying, and that he had a cut in his skull that would have let the life out of anything but a boy. When the cut healed, curiously enough the hair grew over it again quite white. The other fellow who lived was quite a harmless lunatic and remembered nothing. They lost him in New York. That was Master Wilfrid's little mystery of the sea. But anyhow, it is true because he told me himself."

"Thank you, Morton," said Staunton, with an air of boredom which was so admirably simulated that it looked as though he were trying to disguise it. "I'm afraid your investigations have not been very fertile, though, of course, you have found out everything that there was to find. Your last item is of course romantic, if unimportant, still it is interesting as a curious little bit of psychology. Did he tell you, by the way, whether anything had been tried to get his lost memory back."

"Well," replied the spy, "of course his father wanted all sorts of things done, but Wilfrid absolutely refused to have his skull fooled about with. He argued that, after all, it didn't matter having those few weeks cut out of his life. The episode was over, and everybody connected with it was dead, except himself. His brain wasn't injured—as it certainly was not seeing what he has done with it since—and the result has been that he has had his own way, and that is about the end of it."

"A wise decision," said Staunton carelessly. "I'm going for a couple of months' cruise, and if you care to take a holiday for that time in your usual social happy hunting ground I hope you will do so. And now, if you really won't have a whisky and soda I needn't detain you any longer."

FOURTH CHAPTER.

Sentence of Living Death.

"Well, friend Ramiero, what do you think of that?" said Staunton as Morton disappeared, and Valdez closed the double doors behind him, "there doesn't seem to be very much danger as long as my late shipmate adheres to that very convenient resolution of his, not to let the doctors make experiments with his skull. That I think relieves me from the disagreeable necessity of adopting your unpleasantly drastic proposal as to speedy and permanent abolition."

"I am afraid I cannot see eye to eye with you there, señor," said Valdez, meditatively rolling another of his everlasting little brown cigarettes. "My own opinion is the same as it was before, and if anything stronger."

"But how can that possibly be when the fellow has absolutely forgotten about everything that happened then?" exclaimed Staunton, a trifle impatiently.

"A danger that is only latent, señor," replied Valdez slowly, "is not a danger which has been abolished. What I mean is that this young man's memory of those few weeks, which means as he thinks so little to him, and which, as you know, means so much to you, may have been totally destroyed. On the other hand it may only be in abeyance."

"You mean, of course," said Staunton, with a faint echo of anxiety in his voice, "that if Master Wilfrid were to meet with another accident to his head, say a fall in the hunting field, rendering an operation necessary, the doctors might insist on operating upon that part now injured? Well, granted such a remote contingency might possibly come to pass, I don't see how we are going to prevent it, unless by means which I will really not consent to."

"There are others not quite so drastic," murmured the Spaniard in a gently suggestive tone. He paused for a few moments, but Staunton made no sign, and he went on speaking, now quickly and earnestly. "You must forgive my insistence, señor, but this, as you must see, is not a matter to be played with. Who is this young man, or what is his family to you or to us? His family are nothing. He is a constant source of danger. Think of it, I pray you. All the splendid promise of your life work, your liberty, perhaps your very life, depends perhaps upon the continued pressure of a little splinter of bone on that boy's brain. Even if he had a serious illness, say a fever of some sort, the injury would at once be aggravated. The doctors would at once inquire into the cause. For my part I am perfectly certain as to what they would find, and, therefore, as to what they would do, and Wilfrid Ellerton would rise from his bed with those few weeks put back into his life. What, I ask you, señor, in all earnestness, might be the possible results of such a recovery to you and to us? And then," he went on with a sudden softening and lowering of his tone, "there is the Señorita Mercedes. What would become of all the brilliant prospects that lie before her if Wilfrid Ellerton became able to tell the story of those two or three weeks, and if the Peruvian Minister in London demanded an inquiry? I need not remind you that once suspected, not even your millions would buy indemnity for the son of the man they still call the tyrant Zuarez."

Digitized by Google

"Heavens, no!" exclaimed Staunton, getting on to his feet and thrusting his hands into his trousers' pockets. "No, you are right. Whatever happens there must be no danger to Mercedes' future."

He began to walk up and down the room, his hands still deep in his pockets, and his eyes fixed on the dull red Turkey carpet. Valdez rolled and lit another cigarette, and smoked in silence. He knew his chief's mind too well to interrupt the train of thought which he had set in action, and he was right, for Isolo Staunton was thinking quite as hard just now as he had done that day in the lanes and fields of Cricklewood. For him the whole world only held one human being whom he loved with the passion of absolutely disinterested devotion, and that was his beautiful nineteen-year-old daughter Mercedes, a child of a boy and girl marriage, born only a year before the heavy hand of the law had fallen upon him and thrust him into the living grave of the Chinchas. Her mother had died of grief and shame, and some had whispered of starvation, too, during his captivity, and it was not until ten years later, when the foundations of his mysteriously sudden fortune had been laid, that his agents had been able to trace her to the convent school of La Merced in Lima for orphan girls, and been allowed to take her away to the care of a father who was obliged to remain nameless, leaving a splendid contribution to the school endowment in exchange for her.

Every advantage that love could suggest or money could buy had been lavished on her since then. This season she had made an informal, but brilliant, entry upon the social stage. Next year she was to be presented by a Duchess and an aunt of a Cabinet Minister, and already her extreme beauty, enhanced if possible by the golden halo of her father's uncounted millions, had set busy tongues wagging as to the magnificence of the social future which might be hers if she chose. Certainly this exquisite girl, with her delicate and yet radiant Andalusian beauty, made more bewitching yet by the dash of Celtic fire, this daughter of the great financier who was also the friend and confidant of rulers and statesmen, might surely look high.

And for her, his beautiful, idolised Mercedes, to find herself banished from that brilliant-seeming world, whose confines she was only just crossing, as the daughter of an escaped convict and the murderer of his companions. For her to endure the agony of seeing him, the father whom she adored, and the father whom she honoured above all other men, as it were, stripped naked in the world's market-place amidst the jeers and laughter of his rivals and enemies, and taken from her for ever either to the scaffold or to the long despair of the living death—no, anything better than that. Don Ramiero had kept his best argument to the last, and he had got it home. Whatever there might be necessary to prevent it, that catastrophe at least must not happen. Of what consequence was this lad's life or a dozen lives for the matter of that in comparison with the present and future happiness of his Mercedes?

Mercedes' right hand was lying on the rails. Ellerton's hand fell gently upon it, and the next second his arm would have been around her waist.

He stopped opposite Valdez and said quietly:

"Yes, my friend, you are right, that must not be. Rather than risk any danger to her I would even go to the extremity you suggested. At the same time I must remind you that even with the facilities which we have at our disposal it is not the easiest thing in the world to arrange for the disappearance of the son and heir of one of the best known men in the country. We are not in Peru, you know, nor have we got him there. Mere assassination, I think you will agree with me, is not to be thought of in such an absurdly over-civilised country as this, and as far as I can see deportation would be every bit as difficult and just as risky. Have you any idea on the subject?"

"I have been thinking, señor," replied Valdez, after a few meditative puffs, "that it would not be altogether impossible to enlist this inconvenient young man in our company of submarine toilers up north yonder. They, as you know, are to be trusted utterly since faith with them is a matter not only of wealth and comfort, but, as they well know, of life and death, and once among them down yonder in the bowels of the earth, fifty fathoms beneath the bottom of the North Sea, he would be as safe as though the condors had already picked his bones at the bottom of one of the gorges of the Andes."

Digitized by Google

"Friend Ramiero," said Staunton, dropping on the sofa and again taking out a fresh cigar, "allow me to congratulate you upon a most excellent idea. If you could only see your way to carrying it out without arousing suspicions, you will have made me your debtor for life. Permanent exile in the home of our trusty Cyclops will meet the case much more decently than assassination. We could make him work too. They say he has quite a hereditary genius for engineering, and as for escape, he might as well try to get out of a diving bell at the bottom of the ocean. The only question is to get him there. Have you any idea on the subject?"

"It may be difficult, but it may not be impossible," replied Valdez musingly. "Of course the main point is to get him on board the Isola without the knowledge of any of his acquaintances. Then the matter would be as easy as taking him into one room from another. Or, stay, permit me a few moments' thought. I think I see a means of arranging his disappearance, which will be as satisfactory to us as it will be convincing to the young gentleman's relatives and friends."

For the next five minutes or so Don Ramiero sipped his wine, puffed at his cigarette, and stared with fixed pupils at a little gem of marine painting on the wall opposite to him. Staunton saw that his active, subtle brain was hard at work, and so he respected his silence. Presently Ramiero dropped his cigarette in the ash tray, moistened his lips with wine, and said as quietly as though he were proposing a most ordinary commercial deal instead of a project for destroying the happiness of a family and condemning a bright young life full of the promise of youth, happiness and usefulness to the misery of a living death, to a doom worse even than that of the felon in penal servitude:

"I think I have it. I know you have always believed as I have done that the boldest measures are after all the safest and the best. I propose, therefore, that you should put off our trip to the South for a little, as you can easily do since they have abundance of metal to work on down yonder, take the Isola round to Cowes for a week, and meanwhile, let the señorita send out invitations in your name for a trip afterwards, say to the Fjords of Norway, and see that Mr. Ellerton junior is one of the party. Our friend Morton can easily manage that for you. I don't think there will be much difficulty in getting a party for the Isola, especially with the señorita as hostess. Half London will envy those who are invited.

"If you will arrange that, señor, and leave the rest to me, I think I shall be able so to control circumstances, that one night there shall be a cry of 'Man overboard!' raised possibly by myself. At the same time, or soon after, there may be a little accident to the engines which will make it necessary for us to come to at our old anchorage for an hour or so. I need hardly say that the man had not gone overboard, he will be below in a certain chamber that I need not mention, being duly prepared for a little dive in his sleep—and when he wakes it will be in the under world which owns you for its master. I trust you follow me?"

"Yes," said Staunton briskly, "I do. You are a genius, Ramiero. We will do it."

FIFTH CHAPTER.

Love at Second Sight.

"After all it must seem even to you—you who have seen so much of the world and all the chances and changes of this transitory life, if I may say so without irreverence—that we should meet again under such wonderfully altered circumstances. You don't seem even yet to quite recognise it, but I can assure you that it really is so.

"You were the boy and I was the girl. Surely you remember that afternoon when the Chilenos sacked and burnt Chorillos—when the warships were firing from the sea and the shells were bursting among the houses, blowing their roofs off—not that they mattered much, for you must remember that it never rains there, and many of them were only thatched with reeds—and how the walls of the houses burst out as though a volcano had broken out under them as it did once at Arequipa, and how a scream came through the air, and you, yes, I am sure it was you, caught a little girl—that was I—round the waist and jumped off the pier into the water with her and swam back to the beach—and how we found afterwards that the shell had smashed everything into ruins and killed everyone just there on the promenade in the front of the Marine Hotel. They told me afterwards what a dreadful ruin it was. But surely you remember, don't you?"

"Remember, of course I do. As if anyone could forget a thing like that. Yes, I can see every detail of it now. I remember the dull, hoarse bang of the gun and the scream of the shells in the air—and you, were you really the little girl that I got hold of and jumped into the sea with, because I thought it was going to kill us?"

"Us! I don't—or at least I don't think I thought then, Mr. Ellerton, that you were thinking very much about us—"

At that instant the sentence was cut short by the sudden flashing of the electric lights along the promenade deck of the Isola, on which Mercedes Staunton and Wilfrid Ellerton were standing, leaning on the rails just under the port end of the navigating bridge as the yacht was swirling smoothly eastward and northward along the Hampshire coast with the Spithead forts about three miles behind her.

As the lights gleamed out about them their eyes met, and for the first time in his life Wilfrid Ellerton looked into the eyes of a woman and saw in their deep, dark depths that revelation which comes at least once in his life to every man, and Mercedes, as she looked up into his, saw that which comes, alas, not always to every woman.

The distance between two human souls is really greater than that between the planets or the stars, and yet in an instant it may be bridged over infinitely more swiftly than the ray of light can connect world with world or sun with sun.

Thousands of millions of human beings have lived upon earth knowing as little of each other and caring as little as though they had lived upon different worlds, and yet in millions of cases it has happened that two of these beings have been brought together, oftentimes from the uttermost ends of the earth—and instantly, as they have looked into each other's eyes for the first time, the distance that was between them has been annihilated, and their souls have come together.

Between man and man and woman and woman, this coming together is called friendship, between man and woman it is called love, the greatest and the holiest and most sacred of all those mighty mysteries with which this little commonplace, human life of ours is so strangely surrounded.

Had the revelation come to them under different circumstances; had they been walking over one of the lonely moorlands, whose bleak solitude and lonely beauty formed Wilfrid Ellerton's earliest recollections, or along one of the high dykes dividing the rice fields and the cane patches which make green the valley of the Rimac from the sea into the grey-brown, barren hills of the Andes, then what their souls had said to each other with their eyes would have been repeated by their lips both in words and in that more eloquent language of love in which the lips are silent.

But the sudden flash of the electric light along the deck, followed by the sound of laughter and conversation as some of the Isola's company came out of the big drawing-room on deck, made that impossible. In a few moments they had ceased to be alone and were part of this same company, for nowhere is solitude more difficult than on board ship.

Mercedes' hand was lying on the rails. Wilfrid looked at it for just a moment. The next his own right hand fell gently upon it. If they had been alone his left arm would have been round her waist, and many things about to happen would never have come to pass. As it was there was only time for a swift pressure and another glance from soul to soul through their eyes, and they had to leave the rail with the fateful words unspoken, so that Mercedes might join her guests and continue her duties as hostess.

Digitized by Google

For the next two days Wilfrid lived in a state of mental exaltation, which was no less wonderful than it was delightful to him. When he met Mercedes on deck the next morning before breakfast, she was walking arm-in-arm with Lady Maud Hyam, who, with her beloved young Hercules and several other members of Lady Medcalf-Mears' very exclusive set, were guests on board the yacht.

It was impossible, in view of her own recent experiences, for Lady Maud not to know the meaning of the swift half-shy, half-eager glance which passed between them as he raised his cap and said "good morning." She pressed Mercedes' arm ever so slightly, and as Mercedes turned and looked at her with a quick, bright flush and a startled expression in her eyes, she laughed, and said:

"Good morning, Mr. Ellerton, isn't this weather perfectly glorious? And what a lot of good it seems to be doing everybody. Just look what a lovely colour our charming hostess has got."

"Yes," replied Ellerton, rather awkwardly, for such a straight-spoken man, "but you see, Lady Maud, that if one couldn't look very well, and," he continued, after the briefest of pauses, during which he looked at Mercedes, "and, as you say, have a delightful colour, and feel as though this was really the best of all possible worlds, in such absolutely perfect weather, and on such a gorgeous yacht as this—where on earth or sea could you feel thoroughly fit, and therefore look it?"

"Just exactly my sentiments," said Captain Percy Iddison, who lounged up towards them just as this moment, tubbed and shaved and clad in immaculate flannels, careless, happy, and yet, though he knew it not, one of those unconscious instruments of Fate which, through the medium of just a few idle words, may alter the courses of other lives.

"Miss Staunton, and you, too, my lady," he began again, with a smile and a bow towards his radiant sweetheart, "I want you to allow me to take Ellerton away for a moment. "I have noticed that he is looking a little, well, flushed, almost feverish, in fact, and I have discovered a peculiarly soothing and generally delightful cocktail. The fact is, of course, that I want one myself, and I don't care to have it alone. It's a bad habit, you know, which one learns in those desolate places of the earth where it is sometimes easier to get a drink before breakfast than it is to get the breakfast itself."

"That, Percy," said Lady Maud, drawing Mercedes somewhat reluctantly aside, "is merely a specious excuse for quite unnecessary depravity. Still, I know it is not the slightest use trying to argue with a man on that subject, and so I suppose we shall have to let you go."

"And I hope you won't forget," said Mercedes, still laughing and looking first at Wilfrid and then at Iddison, "what they say in South America about cocktails."

"Dear me," exclaimed Lady Maud. "May I ask what you know about cocktails before breakfast?"

"Not guilty," laughed Mercedes in reply. "I have never tasted that form of refreshment in my life. It is only what I have heard my father say and there certainly seems to be a good deal of sense in it. It is this," she went on, with another look at the two young men, "one is enough, two are too many, and three are nothing like enough."

"Exactly!" said Ellerton. "Therefore, Iddison, it's got to be just one, and if we don't hurry up and get it the breakfast bugle will go."

Scarcely had the two young men strolled away, than Staunton and Ramiero Valdez came up out of the saloon and joined them.

If Staunton had only seen one of the glances that had passed between his daughter and Wilfrid during the brief conversation, the crime which had already been decided upon would never have been committed, and many things which came to pass in consequence of it would never have happened.

Another long instalment of this serial next week.

Your Editor Chats.

This week another adventure which befell Miss Sara Gillespie, in her flight from her pursuers, is related. Northampton is the scene of the episode, and all citizens of the famed boot-making town will be, I am sure, delighted with the photographs that are reproduced.

From all sides I have received intimations assuring me that great interest has been aroused in this series, and in letters from readers, there often recur the words "I only hope that the coming instalments will be as absorbing as the opening ones." Now, of course, I have had the privilege of already seeing the future episodes, and I can unreservedly say that nobody need have any fear that the realisations of their hopes will suffer in comparison with their anticipations.

Sara will relate in our next issue what happens to her at Leicester. There is no need for me to say anything in recommendation of this instalment, but I can promise you that it is a splendid one.

I have now an announcement to make which is of especial interest to residents in Leicester and district.

I want readers of that town who feel sufficiently interested in this series to help to make it known in their district, by handing a few leaflets to their friends. As an inducement for you to do so, I will offer a Gramophone to the Leicester reader who makes the best use of his leaflets, and a charming little gold-plated pencil case to each of the twelve persons who show the next greatest amount of ingenuity in the distribution. You may personally hand each leaflet to a friend, with a remark about "The Pursuit of Sara"; you may place the leaflets in conspicuous positions; you may push them through letter-boxes or doors; or you can do exactly as you think wisest and best. The prizes will go to those readers who distribute the leaflets in the most novel and helpful way; the number you get rid of is not of so much consequence. To obtain them, drop a postcard, with "Leaflets" marked in the top, left-hand corner, to "The Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, W.C.

Our Gramophones are beautiful pieces of mechanism, and one of these musical instruments would be a boon to any household. They are fitted with a concert sound-box, and accompanied by two records.

Come, Leicester readers, make a good bid for that Gramophone, and the special consolation prizes. All of you have equal opportunities.

On page 560, the new serial story from the pen of Mr. George Griffith commences. It is a powerful romance, in which masterly crime plays an important part, crossing, as it does the path of love, totally contrary to the expectations of Isolo Staunton, criminal millionaire. It is an old adage that says that "the course of true love never runs smooth," and our new serial is an excellent illustration to its truth. As the story continues, the plot becomes stronger and stronger, till the great climax is reached. "A Criminal Millionaire" should appeal to all who enjoy reading good literature.

I will announce, as soon as possible, and I expect it to be at a very early date, the result of the recent "Juggled Letters" Competition.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

A Wilful Girl.

Relating How She Won a Young Doctor's Heart.

"This can't last!"

Doctor George Gordon sprang from his chair with the words, and began to pace his office floor from wall to wall.

It was a miserable, drizzly November day, but Doctor Gordon's vehement exclamation had no reference to the weather. It was directed towards the unfortunate aspect of Fate in general, and his own affairs in particular.

Three weeks ago, full of hope and energy, he had started his practice in this little quiet street, and had begun his professional career. That is, he would have begun it, had any requisition for his services been made; but, with the exception of one or two cases, no hint or shadow of practice had fallen in his way. His funds were running low, his sturdy patience seemed to droop, at last, and hope no longer answered his misgivings with a smile. Worst of all, a terrible loneliness had fallen suddenly upon him—the forerunner of despair.

"It can't last!" he repeated desperately, pushing his fine white hands through his brown curling hair. And at that instant the door-bell rang.

Hastily opening a heavy volume or two, to convey the idea that his studies were suddenly interrupted, and assuming a calm, professional air, Doctor Gordon proceeded to the door.

This time it was neither peddler, book-agent, nor machine oil, but a lovely young woman, in a blue waterproof, with chestnut hair in glossy rings on her white forehead. She held a little boy by the hand—a boy who had evidently been crying loud and long, and was still in good condition for an indefinite continuation of the exercise.

"Doctor Gordon?"

The doctor bowed, and the young lady lowered her umbrella.

"I am glad we have found you in," she said, smiling, and disclosing two distracting dimples. "My little brother has crushed his hand. I want you to examine it, please. We feared there might be bones broken—it has been so painful."

"We shall soon find out," answered the doctor briskly, his elastic spirits rising wonderfully as he ushered in his visitors. "I was about to make a call or two" (which was true—he had intentions of going out for a cigar and a newspaper), "but nothing very urgent. Be seated, please. I will let in more light. Now, then, my little man; will you come here to me?"

"Tommy, dear," said the young lady, very gently and tenderly, as Tommy leant his head against her and began to sob, "let me see now how brave you can be. And doctor won't hurt you—I am sure he won't"—with an eloquent glance at the individual in question.

"Not one bit, or so very little that you won't mind it at all."

"And Dora will stay by you"—putting her arm round his neck and drawing him gently towards the consulting chair. "That's my own good boy. And to-morrow you will be ever so much better. Now, doctor, see, he is going to be splendid!"

To Doctor Gordon's credit be it said, he conducted his examination with coolness and cleverness, albeit this pretty creature hung over him enveloping him in her exquisite magnetism, and thrilling him deliciously now and then, as the folds of her dress touched him or their fingers met accidentally in their mutual attention to the case.

When the bones were declared to be intact, and the hand dressed and bandaged, then came the story of the accident's happening—in fact, almost half an hour of bright, pleasant talk; then thanks and gratitude, and—"How much must I pay you, doctor?"

The idea of paying him for this gleam of warmth and sunshine that had come into his blank and dreary life!

But he mentioned his modest fee in a business-like manner, and received it with professional ease. Such a dear little purse and such a slender, pretty hand, and such a kind, innocent, charming face! It was hard to think he might never see her again.

At parting he made an effort. As she opened her umbrella again and the blue eyes looked at him smilingly from a background of rain and mist and dreariness, he observed in an off-hand way:

"Please bring the boy in to me in a day or two. I shall want to examine his progress. Let me see—Wednesday—well bring him on Friday. Oh, not at all? I think he will do nicely now. Thanks—good-bye."

And as he looked after the trim little figure of his visitor he suddenly realised that he did not even know her name, except that part of it was "Dora."

It never rains but it pours. It both rained and poured on this eventful evening. To his surprise and deep thankfulness, the doctor received two other calls before midnight, and on the following day three more. He began again to feel of use and importance in the world. The blue waterproof, the dimples and smiling eyes, had brought him what the gamblers call a "streak of luck," or so he firmly believed.

When Friday arrived he was quite in a flutter of expectation, and sported a new necktie for the occasion. At half-past ten the office bell rang. It was the advent he hoped for.

"Oh, good morning!"

Fresh as the morning itself she looked, in a pretty costume of brown cashmere, with a sweeping feather in her hat, a bunch of sweet violets at her belt, and a world of light and sweetness in her eyes. Tommy, at her side, nodded quite tolerantly in answer to his share of the doctor's greeting.

"Such a lovely day. Did you expect us?" (Did he?) "Oh, yes, so much better. It is quite easy now—Tommy, isn't it? We are glad we came to you. Our old doctor—Doctor Briggs—was ill, and we did not know where to come—did we, Tommy? And I said, let us try here. How do you do, doctor. Are you well?"

Digitized by Google

By this time they were in the office, and she was regarding him with a friendly, somewhat thoughtful, scrutiny.

"Quite well, thanks."

"I thought you did not look so very well that other day, you seemed so pale. I suppose you work too hard. All you doctors do."

"When we are fortunate enough to have the chance. I believe I have grown pale longing for work. I am only just beginning here, you know."

"Ah," with a glance full of interest. "Are you a stranger, then?"

"Quite a stranger. I came from Somerset. All my people are there. I sometimes think it was a wild venture of mine to come to London to begin my profession."

"All your people? Oh, that is dreadful! Have you no friends here—no one?"

"I am entirely alone."

"How strangely you must feel. I should think it would be terrible to live like that"—with another long, thoughtful look. "Oh, well," breaking into a smile, "I am sure you will make a practice here. You will not mind it so much when you have plenty of business. We will do what we can to help you, and we know lots of people. Tommy, darling, take your hat off. Come here to me. I'll undo the bandage. Now, let Doctor Gordon see. I don't think he will lose the nails after all."

"Very satisfactory indeed," said Doctor Gordon. "I can see that you have followed my directions."

"Oh, yes; of course"—lifting up her earnest face. "He was very good about it. He let me bathe it and dress it, and I know it must have hurt him."

"He had a very gentle nurse."

The doctor was busy over the wounded hand as he made this remark.

"I tried to be as gentle as you were," was the quick response. "Your hands seemed so light and kind. It must be beautiful to be able to help people and relieve pain."

"Pain that can be relieved—yes," said the doctor, feeling quite charmed that she had noticed his hands, which, indeed, were well worth noticing, and accustomed to receive a good deal of his own attention. "If we could only reach mental suffering as easily."

"Ah! I know very little about that"—she shook her head with a pretty seriousness. "I've never had real trouble yet. It frightens me when I think how happy I've been."

"Frightens you? Why?"

"Because all my suffering is yet to come."

"Oh, mine isn't!" said Tommy, nodding with an air of triumph. "I've had lots of pain. I sprained my ankle once, and I fell down the cellar stairs, and a boy gave me a black eye, and the ear-ache and the mumps, and no end of tooth-ache. But this hand—that was worse than all. I think I am getting all my sufferings now."

"You and I, Tommy—we know what it is to have afflictions," said Doctor Gordon, with his hand on Tommy's shoulder. "Happy people, like your sister, can only wonder at us. It must be very nice to be so—so content and at peace with Fate."

"Don't you feel happy, too?" she asked, with womanly pity in her tone. "I should think you would love your profession."

"I do love it certainly; but it is not all my life. I want other things—friends, companionship. The struggle with poverty is dreadful when one is alone."

"You are not married?"

This question was asked with delightful straightforwardness, the candid eyes looked frankly into his.

"I have not that good fortune—yet."

They both flushed slightly; the young lady glanced away, and said quickly—

"Well, you will not always be alone, unless you wish to be. And I know you will succeed in your profession; your manner is so pleasing and sympathetic, you inspire confidence at once. And I am sure—I am very sure—you must be clever."

"Oh, thanks, you are too kind," murmured the doctor, as much astonished as pleased by this innocent, delicious flattery. "I owe you my heartfelt gratitude for your kindness—your encouragement. I was almost despairing. I shall always believe it was my good angel who sent you—and Tommy—to my rescue."

"It was our good angel, perhaps, who showed us how to find you," was the smiling, unembarrassed answer. "I felt an interest in you at once. I told mamma about you as soon as I went home, and she is coming to see you too. But now we must go. I will leave you my card, though, because"—with an arch look—"you don't even know my name yet. And I want to leave you this little bunch of violets, too, if you will accept them. I think there is such companionship in flowers, if one feels lonely or sad."

She disengaged the little bouquet from her belt and the doctor took it, and the kindly hand that offered it, into his own an instant.

"I don't know what to say to you—I can't express my sense of your goodness, so undeserved."

"Oh, that's nothing! I love to give flowers to people who care for them—that is one of my pleasures. Well, good-bye. Shall I need to bring Tommy in again—or is it all right?"

"If you could let me see him in three or four days from now," returned the doctor, with gravity. "It is not absolutely necessary, but if you have time, you might bring him in, and—a—a——"

"Very well. Some time next week then. Good-bye. I do hope you'll gets lots of patients—of course, I don't hope that people will be ill, poor things; but I mean that if they must be ill, I hope they will send for you. And don't feel lonely or depressed, remember. I did think you looked so sad that first day. Good-bye."

As soon as he was alone, Doctor Gordon took up the little square of pasteboard from the table and read, "Dora Hartley, 98, West Street, Kensington." He actually put it to his lips. Then he threw it down quickly, and hastily drew from the vest pocket above his heart a girl's photograph, at which he looked long and fondly.

"You would not mind, Clara, darling," he murmured, half aloud. "She is such an utter child."

The apology which Doctor Gordon offered so fervently to the portrait of his soul's idol, in extenuation of a kiss bestowed on Miss Hartley's printed name was merely the first of a long series of such apologies and protestations. During the next four weeks Clara's picture was in constant requisition. He bestowed on it confessions and explanations that would have astonished the original, to whom his semi-weekly letters conveyed no hint of the existence of "Dora."

But in the life of Doctor Gordon, Dora was an accomplished fact, and a wonderfully bright and important one. She recommended him right and left among her friends, and sent him some excellent paying cases, in which his usually superior skill made itself apparent. She even persuaded her mother, whose health was uniformly excellent, that she needed medical advice, and at once Doctor Gordon was summoned—the result, his instalment as family physician, and a pleasant revenue from Mr. Hartley's purse. Added to this, he was petted and made much of by the entire family. But Dora remained his special ally and friend. She used to run into his office on all sorts of pretences—sometimes escorted by one of her brothers (of whom there were five), sometimes by the huge Newfoundland dog, sometimes only by her own innocence.

Digitized by Google

Doctor Gordon had begun by declaring that Dora was "an utter child." Before long he discovered a certain tact and womanliness that astonished him. She would discuss his affairs with him in the gravest way, and make little practical suggestions, full of commonsense; give him hints as to the foibles and weaknesses of certain of the new people she introduced, and in innumerable ways, help and strengthen him. She made "tidies" for his chairs, pillows for his sofa, painted vases for his mantel, mended his gloves, darned his handkerchiefs, objected to his neckties, criticised his linen, in short, surrounding him with an intoxicating atmosphere of femininity that fascinated and bewildered him. Through it all she preserved her direct, child-like manner.

"You would not believe," she would say to him, with her elbows on the table beside him, and hands clasped under her white chin—a favourite attitude. "You'd not believe how much I liked you that first day. It seemed so odd—the very first time we met. Somehow I felt as if I had always known you, and oh! I knew very well we were going to be friends! At least, I made up my mind about it"—and then, without the slightest change of tone, "Do you think those curtains look all right? I imagine they ought to be fuller. If I were you I'd have dark-red ones. I saw some in Stewart's the other day." Or else, rushing in, flushed and smiling, she would say, out of breath: "Oh, dear, I can't stay, but I thought I must run in for a minute! I have brought you some oranges for your cold—they are lovely and sweet. I was just carrying some to old Mrs. Shannon—she's the dearest old thing, and her cold is terrible, worse than yours. Do, please, take care of yourself. I sha'n't have any peace till you are better—both of you."

Then in a flash she was gone again. She seemed especially anxious lest he should feel too keenly the loneliness of his life, and tried constantly to brighten his solitude with a thousand gentle cares and attentions.

He felt deeply touched, and blessed her from his heart for all her goodness, but his mind was full of uneasiness as he found himself forced to the conclusion that Dora was falling in love with him very fast indeed.

As their acquaintance progressed he could but notice a growing change in her manner—a sort of wistfulness and almost sadness at times, and his conscience smote him terribly that he had withheld from her the fact of his engagement. It seemed daily more impossible to divulge it without making himself seem like a villain, and yet to deliberately continue to conceal it was a villainy in itself.

As to the nature of his feelings for Dora, he was in a state of bewilderment. Her warmth of heart, her impetuous temper, her sweet, wilful, lovable ways, her very faults, were charming to him.

She was a constant study and delight; and yet, even if he were free—if he had never seen and chosen Clara—would Dora be the sort of woman he could wish to marry? He could not tell.

He only knew that the spell of her presence was upon him, and every meeting made the spell more strong.

Her family, too, seemed quite to accept him as their own, and to look upon his interests as their especial care. It was so pleasant to have friends of good standing, to feel himself no longer a waif and a stray in the great community.

But the price he paid threatened to be a hard one—the loss of his own self-respect. A time came when his conscience faced him with stern accusation, and commanded him to be true.

* * * * *

It was his birthday. Early in the morning there had come from Dora a pair of embroidered slippers and a lovely bunch of roses, and from each of the others some little token. His room was bright with pretty souvenirs, and the happy recipient sat brooding at his desk, wretched, penitent, torn with conflicting emotions—looking at Clara's photograph, and thinking, as usual, of Dora.

She had been so kind to him, so gracious and tender and generous, and now he must wring her guileless heart and stab her maiden pride, and lose her for ever!

He had at last made up his mind to write and tell her all—the paper lay spread before him, and he sat silent, thinking his miserable thoughts, and listening to the rush of the rain and the long, sweeping sigh of the wind.

He was trying to picture Dora as she would look when she read his letter. The sorrow and amazement in her sweet face; the blue eyes filled with passionate, regretful tears, or flashing scorn and anger; the little kindly, ministering hands clasped and trembling——

"Dora!"

Roused by some slight sound, he had turned and saw her in the room beside him. She was clad in the blue waterproof he had learnt to love.

The rain glistened on her hair, and her face was very pale; but she smiled a bright greeting.

"Don't scold; I had to come! I ran in by the alley. I was afraid some one might be here. It is just lovely to find you alone!"

Doctor Gordon looked at her with a sudden flush on his fair face. He rose; he could not trust himself to touch her hand.

"Take off that wet cloak," he said abruptly. "It is a terrible night for you to come out. What is the matter? Has anything happened?"

"Something is going to happen," she answered quietly, loosening her cloak and hanging it over a chair. Then with both hands she smoothed back the damp waves of her hair, and sat down in her favourite low chair beside the doctor's desk. He stood near her irresolutely a moment, but finally seated himself in his usual place.

"You look very pale, Dora. Are you ill?" He made a great effort to speak in his usual manner, but his voice trembled slightly.

"I am well enough—quite well; but," she pressed both hands against her heart. "like Hamlet, I can say, 'You little know how ill all's here.'"

Their eyes met in a long look, and a deep blush rose to her cheeks, but she did not avert her gaze.

"I—I was just thinking of you as you came in," the doctor murmured. It was not at all what he meant to say, but the truth has a habit of speaking itself at times. "I wanted to thank you for your beautiful flowers, and for—so many things. Dora, you have been more to me than I can—than I dare express. I wish you could know—could understand——"

"Do you think I have been good to you? Have I really made you a little bit happier? I longed to,—because I—because you—— Oh, Doctor Gordon, you must let me speak to you and tell you!—my heart is so full. Don't think me wild or reckless, but there is something I must tell you!"

"Dora, Dora!" He caught her hand fervently in both his own. "I, too, have a confession to make. For weeks I have waited."

"Let me speak first," she said imploringly. "I came for that purpose. Doctor, I am going away from home; I am going in a few days—not to come back any more."

"You are going away?"

"No one knows of it—not even my own precious mother. I am going away—to be married."

The hand he had held so tenaciously was suddenly released.

"Married, Dora?"

"I did not tell you of my engagement. I thought perhaps mother had spoken of it. Yes, I have been engaged nearly five years; and I liked you first because your eyes are so like his—like Will's, you know. He is a doctor, too. He went away from London over a year ago to begin practice, just as you came here; and when you told me about being all alone, my heart went out to you so. I thought of my own poor boy; I knew how to sympathise with you and I longed to be your friend. I thought at once, 'If any one would take an interest in Will, and pet him and cheer him up and help him, how I could love that person!' And so I wanted to do everything I could for you. And I liked you so much, I couldn't go away and never tell you, nor say good-bye. Please—please don't look so sad! Are you angry with me? Do you think I am very wrong and wicked?"

Digitized by Google

"I! Ah, Dora, how much do you care for my thoughts of you now?"

"As much as ever," she said eagerly. "I have no friend in the world dearer than you are—you must know that. And will you tell mamma—will you talk to her? It is so dreadful to go away in this manner, but it must be done, sooner or later. If I should wait till Doomsday, they would never give their consent. Of course, when it is all over, they will forgive me and love me just the same. And you will coax mamma—won't you, doctor?—and say a good word for Dora when she is far away?" Her voice broke slightly, but she smiled bravely as she gave him her hand.

"Why must you go, dear?" he asked forlornly. "And what will become of me? I shall miss you so terribly, and you don't care at all. I can see by your eyes how happy you are."

"I am happy at heart," she answered earnestly—"very, very happy! I am glad I have decided. Surely, you must acknowledge my first duty is to Will, because I love him so dearly. He asks me to come to him, and it is my duty and my heaven to obey. My people will love him, too, bye-and-bye, when they know him better. They only oppose the marriage because they love me too much. I am sorry to leave you all, but I am, oh! so glad to go to Will!"

Doctor Gordon, holding the little hand between his own, looked regretfully in the little friendly face. Half an hour ago he was sorrowing for the pain he was about to inflict on this confiding innocent heart; and now the spectacle of her bright contentment wounded and angered him; his pride was terribly hurt. He had told himself passionately that he would make any sacrifice, almost, to secure her happiness, and now that, without requiring the slightest sacrifice from him, she was supremely happy, he felt much injured and aggrieved.

"You mustn't be sorry," she said, very gently. "Of course you will miss me and I shall miss you—that is only natural; but we can write to each other, and as soon as I am forgiven I will come home on a visit, and I shall see you all!"

This and much more she told him in her gracious, kindly voice, trying to heal the wound that she began to think might have been deeper than she could have dreamt.

When it was time to part, she lifted her face and kissed him frankly and willingly, with a whispered: "God bless you, dear!"

For an instant Doctor Gordon's arms were round the damp waterproof and the slender figure beneath it, pressing them impartially to his heart. And then Dora was gone.

He sat quite a long time. Somehow, he had no need of Clara's photograph to strengthen him in his trial. He would not feel exactly at home in expressing his emotions to that calm and placid image.

Madeline Bridges.

To Story Writers.

We shall be pleased to consider complete novelettes of about 20,000 words in length, and to pay cash down for those accepted. Manuscripts must be type-written (or very legibly hand-written), and should be sent to The Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Postage for return of MSS., if unsuitable, should be inclosed.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache and Neuralgia.

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Kaputine is not a single crude drug such as has been condemned as dangerous by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients, having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The SAFE Remedy.

Kaputine is the only preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and infirmaries. Proof positive of its superior and sterling qualities.

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1½; Samples 1d. each.

Kindly mention this paper.

TO AVOID INDIGESTION.

That distressed feeling is simply a poorly-working stomach—it needs a little help—but no matter how bad it may be, a dose of will speedily give relief. Take Beecham's Pills for a few days, and the trouble will disappear.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

Digitized by Google

A JUSTIFIED BURGLAR.

A Story with a Moral to Husbands.

ARNOLD TODD must have become accustomed to it, for periodically burglars relieved him of all his pocket-money, diamonds and other personal bric-a-brac without ever being caught in the act or leaving any clue to their discovery. Nothing was ever taken belonging to Mrs. Todd, but, as that woman pathetically said, she had nothing they could take except her wedding-ring, which was on her finger, or her clothes, which would not have repaid the effort. For Mrs. Todd was a veritable household drudge. Her husband had houses and lands, as well as money in several banks, but he never gave her any of his wealth, and she had to beg for enough money to buy shoes and stockings for the children. Their clothes she made over from her own and their father's worn-out garments, and in making Mr. Todd's trousers into jackets for the little Todds she always managed to work the knees that bagged into the under side of elbows.

The burglaries did not worry Mr. Todd—if the truth were told—as much as they did Mrs. Todd. He usually waited until the stolen goods could not be recovered, then he purchased a new outfit and, after hiding them carefully every night for a few months he would grow careless and the burglars would give him another call. Mrs. Todd consistently promised to lie awake and watch, but she declared she must have been chloroformed, otherwise she would never have closed an eye.

"I should think, Mary," her husband complained, "that your anxiety about the children would keep you awake. Think what an effect it would have on them to see a burglar in their room!"

"But the burglars never go there," said Mrs. Todd faintly. "Children never have any valuables—at least ours don't," she added with unconscious sarcasm.

One night the unexpected happened. It was the turning-point in Mr. Todd's destiny. At the hour when he should have been sleeping the soundest he suddenly awakened and saw by the dim night light a strange figure in his room—that of a man muffled in a black cloak with a slouch hat drawn over his face and a silk muffler round his neck and chin. He was rifling Mr. Todd's pockets. Mr. Todd did not own a revolver. He would not have killed a man to save all his wealth, much as he loved it. He lay still for a moment, thinking how to surprise the burglar, then, having made up his mind to a plan, he put it into immediate execution. He leapt from the bed with a bound that took him into the middle of the room and pinioned the burglar from behind. A terrific scream rent the air. Todd held in a mighty grasp a limp, trembling form from which he tore the disguising cloak, revealing the partner of his joys and sorrows, Mrs. Todd.

"Mary!" he gasped. "Mary, you?"

"Yes, Mr. Todd, me." She turned and faced him. "Oh, you needn't be surprised. Where did you suppose I got any money if I didn't either steal it or beg it, seeing that you never gave me any. If I wanted a penny to put in the contribution box on Sunday I had to ask you for it, and explain what I was going to do with it. You never gave me a sovereign in your life without expecting nineteen shillings back in change."

"Mary!"

"It's the truth, and you know it, Arnold. Instead of making me a regular allowance, as any husband ought to, you make me save and scrimp and go without everything but food. Many a time I've left my empty purse lying about hoping you would take the hint and fill it. And you never did. And all the time you carried gold, silver and notes in your pocket—and bought what you wanted."

"You might have taken it without disguising yourself as a burglar, Mary."

"You would have suspected me, and how long could I have kept the money? No, the burglar was more welcome to it than I would have been. But I never dreamt that you would wake. I meant to jump out of the window if you did see me. Now, I do not care for myself—I am only sorry for you. The man who can drive a woman to such straits is to be pitied. I have as good a right to the money as you have—I helped to make it, and there is no law to convict a wife for stealing from her own husband."

Mr. Todd was seeing things past and present, and in those few moments of time as the dying do—clearly and without prejudice. He took his wife in his arms.

"You are nervous and tired, dear," he said. "Lie down and compose yourself to rest. I see, Mary, that I am the real burglar—I have robbed you of your earnings and your lawful dues. Before I sleep you shall have a bank account in your own name, and I will never ask what you do with the money. And you can give up being a burglar for good and all."

Henry Haines.

"AND you permitted this strange man to kiss you?" "No, mamma; he didn't give me time."

"IF you had no idea when you could get married, Tom, why did you propose?" "To tell the truth, dear, I had no idea that you would accept me."

MR. HIGHLIFE: "My dear, I'm going to turn over a new leaf!" Mrs. Highlife: "That's right. James says when you came out of your club last night you turned over a couple of pages."

"JOHN," whispered the good woman in the dead of the night, "there are burglars downstairs!" "You go down, dear," replied John, sleepily; "they wouldn't dare to strike a woman."

ARDENT SUITOR: "I lay my fortune at your feet." Fair Lady: "Fortune! I didn't know you had money." Ardent Suitor: "I haven't much, but it takes very little to cover those tiny feet." He got her.

AMBIGUOUS.—MRS. GRUE: "Henry, do you think you would ever marry again?" Grue: "What! After having lived with you for eleven years? Never!" (Mrs. Grue would give something handsome if she only knew just what he meant by that.)

Digitized by Google

VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE

The purest and most efficient Remedy procurable for COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, CATARRH, WEAK LUNGS, and CHILDREN'S COUGHS.

BRONCHITIS AND ASTHMA

Veno's Lightning Cough Cure
Produces its most brilliant effect in Chronic Bronchitis and Asthma. It effects astonishing cures in the worst and most persistent cases.

Rev. W. W. TULLOCH, D.D., Bonar Bridge, Sutherlandshire, writes: "July 22nd, '03.—I have been a martyr to asthma all my life and lately to chronic winter bronchitis. I have found Veno's Lightning Cough Cure a valuable medicine."

CHILDREN'S COUGHS

Mrs. ADA S. BALLIN, 5, Agar Street, London, Editor "Womanhood," and a great authority upon children's diseases. writes:—"Veno's Lightning Cough Cure is an exceedingly successful remedy; it is very pleasant to take and the relief it gives is very rapid. The preparation is perfectly safe for children."

W LASCELLES-SCOTT, F.R.M.S., in his Certificate of Analysis mong other things says:—"I have pleasure in certifying that in my opinion VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH COUGH is an exceptionally pure, safe, and effective preparation

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES 9½d. Regular Sizes, 1/1½ and 2/9.

Ask for VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE at Chemists and Drug Stores, or post free from the VENO DRUG CO., Hulme, Manchester, England.

J. G. GRAVES.

COMPLETE FURNISHING

Furnishing Requisites of every description fully illustrated and described in our No. 3 Catalogue, which we send Post Free. Special Terms of Easy Payment arranged for orders ranging from £5 to £100 and upwards. Important Advantages to Cash Purchasers.

PROFITABLE AGENCIES offered to Persons with Spare Time.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., Sheffield.

GIVEN AWAY

With this Week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 511)

Paper Pattern of a

CHILD'S KNICKERS.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents. PRICE 1d.

CATARRH AND CONSUMPTION.

The possibility of Catarrh extending to the lungs is described in the last issue of the

REVIEW OF EAR, NOSE, AND THROAT DISEASES.

Anyone interested in the subject can obtain a free copy of this Medical Journal by addressing The Editor, 10 Marble Arch, London, W.

Our Readers will Please Remember that

TUESDAY, 3rd NOVEMBER,

IS

KING EDWARD'S HOSPITAL FUND

SHOPPING DAY,

and that a large number of shops in London will be displaying a notice in their windows that they are giving a percentage of their takings on that day to the London hospitals.

We hope, therefore, they will make a point of making some purchase, anticipating some requirements on this particular day, viz., TUESDAY, 3RD NOVEMBER. Most shops joining the scheme will be offering some special cheap lines, and reducing their prices to make a good day for the Hospitals. Boots and bonnets, furniture and eatables, all and everything, little and great, help the scheme.

Digitized by Google

It Requires Practice.

Angela (to whom Edgar has been proposing): "Tell me, Edgar! Did you ever say anything like this to any woman before?" Edgar (in a burst of honesty): "My dear girl, do you think it could be done like that the first time?"

He Was a Bit of a Bore.

Reggy: "Do you really believe that absence makes the heart grow fonder?" Miss Brady: "Oh, yes, indeed. I think twice as much of you when you are somewhere else."

He'd Cause for Remembrance.

"Isn't it sad," asked the young lady romantically, "to think of the roses of yester year?" "It is," replied the young man emphatically; "I have an unpaid florist's bill for £10."

Worth the Trouble.

Cleverton: "Miss Twilling rejected me the other night, but she let me kiss her before we parted." Dashaway (reflecting): "I think I'll go round to-night and propose myself."

Well Experienced.

Paterfamilias: "And could you support my daughter, sir?" Her Lover: "I have two strong arms." Paterfamilias: "But can they support her?" Her Lover: "They often have, sir."

There Were Others, Too.

Mr. Gillis: "Surely, Miss Gray, you haven't forgotten me already? Why, I proposed to you at the seaside last summer." Miss Gray (much puzzled): "Can't you recall some other incident?"

And Ethel Blushed Vividly.

Tommy: "Yes, cats can see in the dark, and so can Ethel, 'cause when Mr. Wright walked into the parlour when she was sitting all alone in the dark, I heard her say to him, 'Why, Arthur, you didn't get shaved to-day.'"

Economical Wifey.

Husband: "Have you done your best to economise this month, Mary, as I requested?" Wife (brightly): "Oh, yes; I spoke to the grocer, the butcher, and the landlord, and got them to put off sending in their bills till next month."

He Has a Wife Now.

She (insinuatingly): "Are you looking for anybody, Mr. Johnson?" He: "Yes, I am looking for my wife." She (coquettishly): "I didn't know you had a wife." He: "No; that's just why I am looking for her." And he found her there and then.

Those Girls Again.

May: "He's awfully inquisitive. He tried his best to find out how old I am." Fanny: "Yes, he admitted that to me." May: "And just for fun I told him I was thirty-four. Did he tell you that?" Fanny: "No, but he did say you were the most truthful girl he had over met."

A Very Convenient Arrangement.

Miss Manyseasons: "No, Mr. Bloom, I cannot be your wife, but I will be a sister to you." Mr. Bloom (youthful adorer): "You are very kind, and I know my mother will like that arrangement. She has often said I would have been a better man if I had had an elder sister to look after me. When will you begin your duties?"

So It Seemed.

Jack: "Does Miss Smythe return your affections?" Simon (tearfully): "The unopened envelope seems to indicate it!"

A Satisfactory Arrangement.

Miss Riche: "One can be very happy in this world with health and money." Suitor: "Then let's be made one. I have the health and you have the money."

Symptoms of Distress.

Mr. Jones: "That young Snodgrass seems like one of the family." His Only Daughter: "How so, papa?" Mr. Jones: "Why, he looks scared when your mother's anywhere near."

Drew His Conclusions.

Sandstone: "Weren't you dancing with Miss Calloway last night?" Fiddleback: "Yes; how did you know?" Sandstone: "I saw her going into a chiropodist's this morning."

Would Cause Excitement.

New Hubby: "I'm sorry, but I really can't let you see my wife if you wear that beautiful new hat. She's quite ill, and the doctor has expressly said that nothing must be allowed to excite her."

Then They Recommenced.

Wife (repentent after a little breeze): "If I were to die, Phil, what would you do?" Phil (sulkily): "I'd be nearly crazy, of course." Wife: "Would you marry again?" Phil: "No; I wouldn't be as crazy as that."

Worse Luck Impossible.

Patience: "Did you say Daisy is about to take her thirteenth husband?" Mabel: "Yes, I did." "Isn't she at all superstitious?" "Oh, yes; but she knows her thirteenth can't be any worse than the other twelve."

Expenses Not Allowed.

"Come, my darling," said the impatient lover at the foot of the ladder. "It's no use," replied she. "The elopement's off." "Why? What has happened?" "Papa absolutely refuses to advance the money for our travelling expenses."

"Popping" the Question.

"Did Miss Flyppe receive many proposals when she came out?" "Many? Why, receiving proposals got to be a habit with her. In a very short time she couldn't even hear a soda-water bottle pop without exclaiming 'This is so sudden!'"

Considerate Boy.

Stern Parent: "Your mother tells me you have been naughty again, and, therefore, I shall be obliged to punish you." Troublesome Son: "Wh—why can't ma punish me herself, dad? I don't s—ee wh—why you should have to d—do all the odd jobs!"

Speaking from Experience.

Mr. Hardnut: "I admit, sir, that my life has not been what it should be, but I truly and unselfishly love your daughter, and if ever I give her a moment's pain I hope I'll be made to suffer torture for it." Old Gentleman (warmly): "Oh, you will. You don't know her."

No More Love Letters of 'Liza.

She was doleful—oh, so very doleful. "John," she said, "I don't believe you ever really loved me at all." "Why?" he demanded. "Because," she replied, "I've been over all your old love letters, and while they seemed all right at the time, they actually aren't worth publishing in a book."

She Altered Her Decision.

"And so," said the young man, "you say you cannot marry me because I am too young?" "That is my reason," averred the girl. "Surely you do not mean me to understand that you consider yourself too old to marry me?" he murmured diplomatically. Looking at it in that light, she concluded that she had been too hasty.

Digitized by Google

Year after Year.

Who has not read the remarkable letters from working men and women which, day after day, and year after year, are being published in this and thousands of other newspapers throughout the United Kingdom respecting the undoubted merits of Dr. Tibbles' Vi-Cocoa as a Food Beverage?

"Yes," you say, "I have read all about it, but I have not tried it." Then take our advice and do so at once. Vi-Cocoa is not an ordinary cocoa. It is not sickly and insipid like many of the foreign cocoas, but a pleasant beverage, and a food and tonic in the bargain.

There is no cheaper or better article on the market. It is sold by all grocers and stores in 6d. packets and 9d. and 1s. 6d. tins; or you can try it absolutely free by writing (a post-card will do) to Vi-Cocoa, Limited, 60, Bunhill Row, London, E.C., for a dainty sample tin.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 14 stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ross Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

This Bale contains Pair Full-sized heavy Whitney Blankets, 1 quilt, red and white, blue and white; White Honeycomb Marcella or Red Twill your choice; Pair Full-size White Twill Sheets, 2 Pillow Cases, 1 Bolster Case, 5 Toilet Mats, 1 Toilet Cover, 2 Turkish Towels, Pair Fine Lace Curtains, 1 White Table Cloth, 1 Fringed Damask Table Cover, 6 Dusters, 2 Tea Cloths—28 Articles 49/6. How to pay. Send 6/- only, we send Bale, carriage paid for approval; balance can be paid in six monthly payments of 6/-, and one of 7/6. If you pay balance on receipt, send only 38/6, saving 5/-. Address below.

55 ARTICLES FOR 25/- ON CREDIT.

Our Gigantic Parcel contains 6 Table Knives and Forks, 6 Dessert Knives and Forks, 12 Tea Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 1 pair Sugar Tongs, 2 Table Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, and 2 Salt Spoons. We send, carriage paid, on receipt of 3s.; balance 1s. weekly.

PRUDENTIAL FURNISHING STORES, 150-150L Seven Sisters Rd., Holloway, N.

PINK'S MARMALADE IS PURE.

TRY IT.

TRIUMPH Cycles

£10 10 to £19 19

or by Deferred Payment System.

"The Best Bicycle that British Workmanship can produce."

CATALOGUES GRATIS.

TRIUMPH CYCLE CO. Ltd., COVENTRY.

4 and 5, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C.

30 Deansgate Arcade Manchester. 4 King Edward St. Leeds

YOUR FUTURE IS KNOWN.

For 1s. Mr. WILDE will send a Reading of the Stars W. T. STEAD, Esq., and many other prominent gentlemen have testified to the accuracy of their forecasts. Send the exact or approximate hour of your birth, if possible, date, year, &c., together with P.O. 1s. and stamp. Satisfaction will be guaranteed.

THE RESULT WILL ASTONISH YOU.

SEND TO-DAY TO (DEPT. P.S.S.)

GEO. WILDE, 143 High Holborn, London, W.C

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Stores, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1¾d. tins everywhere.

PAWNBROKER'S SALE

Every article in new condition.

SPECIAL BARGAINS UNREDEEMED.

A full list sent post free on application.

SAVE

13/6 Gent's magnificent 18-ct. Gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch, jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper, 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable curb (pocket to pocket) double Albert same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; three together.

12/6 Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch, jewelled movement; exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed) elegant West-End pattern the two together.

14/9 Furs.—Magnificent Alexandra Dagmar necklet and muff; beautiful real Russian sable hair, worth 4 guineas, not been worn; sacrifice for 14/9; approval willingly.

19/6 Genuine Italian Mandoline, by Stridente, Naples; fine tone; 21 ribbed, real rosewood, pearl and tortoiseshell inlaid, in sadd'er-made case; approval.

8/9 Feather Boas; bankrupt stock; special bargains; real Ostrich Feather Boas, beautifully curly; perfectly new, in box; colours: grey and white black and white, and natural.

10/6 Lustrous diamond and ruby Half-hoop Ring, set with 5 matchless doublet rubies and 8 real diamonds; solid gold, hall-marked.

7/6 Curb Chain Bracelet, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case.

6/9 Brooch; very handsome 18-carat rolled gold, 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls in case.

21/- Lady's solid gold Keyless Watch, jewelled in 10 rubies, beautifully engraved case, splendid time-keeper; 10 years' written warranty; week's free trial.

8/6 Fashionable Long Neck-chain; genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished; very choice design.

9/6 Organ Toned Melodeon; magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, and 4 acting stops, including Tremolo and Diapason action; rich powerful tone, perfect order.

9/6 Necklet with Heart Pendant, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise.

12/6 Magnificent 5-row Pearl Collarette; finest quality, mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case.

Any of the above articles sent on approval willingly.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

The Morning Vision.

"H. S. I. F." writes, "I meet on the way to business every morning a young lady whom I much admire. I have not yet had courage to say more than 'good morning' to her. What is my best way to get into further conversation?"

* * * * *

If you have got so far as to say "good morning," I do not see why you should not take an early opportunity to remark on the weather. Then perhaps she travels by a certain train, or 'bus, in which you might accidentally find yourself sometimes. If you get so far as to be on speaking terms with her, you should try to get to know her relations. How to do that must depend on circumstances, and if you have any mutual friends. You will best be able to judge that yourself.

❦❦❦

Too Effusive?

"DOUBTFUL" is very hard to please. She has kept company with a young man for three weeks, and finds him very demonstrative. He constantly goes to see her, and wishes her to become engaged to him. He is in a very good position, and his family are wealthy. This all seems most fortunate, yet "DOUBTFUL" is haunted by fears. "Can his affection," she asks, "be true and lasting, when he is so demonstrative? Would she be wise in becoming engaged to him?"

* * * * *

I do not see, "DOUBTFUL," why his affection should be any the less sincere because he seems able to show it visibly. Don't consent just yet to an engagement, as you evidently have not made up your mind whether or not you love him. Ask him to wait awhile and repeat the question later, when you will be more certain on the point. Three weeks is not a long time to have known him, and you should see how long his affectionate manner lasts.

❦❦❦

Etiquette in Calling.

"I MET two very nice girls at a party recently," writes "EDWARD." "Their mother was present, but I was not introduced to her. We got very friendly, the girls and I, and on parting, one of them said to me: 'You must call and see us when in our direction,' giving me their address, which was in the country. Now is that a proper invitation, seeing that I do not know the mother?"

* * * * *

It would have been better if you had met the mother, and got the young lady to confirm the invitation in her presence. You could then have suggested a suitable day to call, if convenient to them, and made the arrangement on a formal social basis. As it is, you might find it awkward to call only on the girls' invitation, especially if they were not at home. In your present position, I should write to one girl, an ordinary chatty letter, and leave it to her to confirm the invitation on behalf of her mother.

Wanted, a Chaperon.

"LONELY BACHELOR" lives in rooms by himself. He knows several girls, but of course cannot invite them to tea, while he often visits them at their homes. How could he invite them to his home without breaking strict etiquette?

* * * * *

The best thing would be for my lonely correspondent to ask his sister, mother, or aunt to stay with him, and then to invite his lady friends when she is there. It would not, of course, be quite right for him to ask them without some such chaperon, though people who call themselves "Bohemians" have long ago discarded such formalities.

❦❦❦

A Fickle Girl.

"JACK" had kept company with a girl for six months, and during that time found her everything that could be desired. After three months' courtship, however, she gradually seemed to change. He has since found out that she was constantly meeting other young men without his knowledge, and when he remonstrated with her, she passed it off as "mere jealousy on his part," and continued the intimacy with them. "JACK" now feels that he no longer loves her, but only likes her. He can no longer rely on her being true to him.

* * * * *

I imagine the girl has grown tired of you, "JACK," and that being the case, you had better let the matter drop. As you find you no longer love her yourself, I should cease to try to bind her, as she is evidently a bit of a flirt.

❦❦❦

Should He Marry?

"T. L." writes: "I am a tradesman, earning 28s. a week during the summer, but my trade is very bad in the winter, when I only earn £1, and sometimes I am thrown idle. I have met a girl who is an orphan, and very poor, and I would wish to marry her. Should I ask her to wait till I am in a better position—perhaps a year?"

* * * * *

If she is not dependent on you for support, "T. L.," it would certainly be better not to marry until you are in a better position. But if the girl is very poor indeed, and you would have to help her in any case, I think you would find that it would be better to marry soon. With economy, you should be able to make both ends meet even on your winter income, and no doubt a good wife would help you to do so.

❦❦❦

A Trivial Offence.

"SOME months ago," write "MARIE and MADELEINE," "we met two young men of our own age, and kept up an acquaintance with them for some time. They said they had no professions, and, without any intention of offending them, we said we thought every man ought to follow some profession. We think they must have taken offence at this, as their manner became very cool towards us both, and they now only bow and pass on when we meet them. Would it be forward for us to stop them and explain that we meant no offence? We both grew very fond of them, and they used to take us about a lot."

* * * * *

Yes, I think no harm whatever would be done in your speaking to them next time you meet. What you said was quite true—every man ought to have some occupation, and I don't think men who are absolutely idle ever make good husbands. If they were offended at your saying so, they must be very sensitive. However, explain your intentions by all means, and leave it to them as to whether they care to resume their intimacy with you. It seems a trifle to have separated you, in any case.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A SITUATION WORTH £100 A YEAR

For a BOY. (Parents may help their Son to win.)

A SITUATION WORTH £100 A YEAR

For a GIRL. (Parents may help their Daughter to win.)

Offered by THE BOYS' LEADER, "The Paper a Boy can take Home."
Published by the Proprietors of "Pearson's Weekly," &c.

The Editor of THE BOYS' LEADER offers a Situation in the Offices of PEARSON'S WEEKLY, THE BOYS' LEADER, &c., and a salary of £100 a year to commence with, to a boy; and a like Situation and Salary of £100 a year to a girl.

100 CONSOLATION GIFTS WILL ALSO BE AWARDED.

These will be offered by competition, and the competition is this:—

SIX QUESTIONS WILL APPEAR EVERY WEEK IN "THE BOYS' LEADER."

THIS IS THE FIRST SET.

1. Who wrote Robinson Crusoe?
2. What famous British soldier is known as "Bobs"?
3. Who is your favourite hero (not fiction), and why?
4. Who made most runs in first-class cricket this summer?
5. Which is your favourite book, and why?
6. When was King Edward VII. born. Give year and day?

The Second Set of Questions will appear in THE BOYS' LEADER (1d. every Tuesday), on Tuesday, November 10.

It will be noticed that some of the questions call for an expression of opinion only, and others you will have to search for in books.

Cut out and paste these questions on a sheet of foolscap paper numbering it No. 1. Write your reply to No. 1. immediately below, and then follow with No. 2, and so on, saying in what book you found the information and who helped you to find it.

Anybody may help you provided you say who. No competitor must be over 21 years of age. No reply must exceed fifty words. Keep all replies until the last set appears and until we tell you to send them in. Write plainly in ink on one side of the paper.

HINTS

Most towns and even villages have now a Reference Library, so it will be easy to get access to books.
Parents and friends may be able to tell you many of the replies, and you can use this information provided you tell us how you obtained it.
This competition will be a valuable education for a boy or girl, even if they do not wish to enter for the prizes.
The two successful competitors will be given the choice, after we have arranged with their parents, of entering one of the following departments of our offices:—The Editorial Department, the Art Department, the Counting House.
Should the winners live outside London, we have no doubt we shall be able to arrange with their parents as to their residence.
At all events, here is an opportunity for some boy and some girl to put their feet on the first rung of Fortune's Ladder, and we hope every parent who has his child's interest at heart will make an effort on their behalf.

THE BOYS' LEADER is the best paper a boy and girl can read. It is only a few weeks' old, but has already, by reason of its healthy tone, taken the first place in this class of literature; and articles and stories are contributed by Jules Verne, George Manville Fenn, Theodore Roosevelt (President of the United States), Sir Henry Seton-Karr, M.P., Major Baden-Powell, T. P. O'Connor, M.P., Lord Ernest Hamilton, the late Max O'Rell, the Duke of Argyle, General Sir Evelyn Wood, G.C.B., &c., &c.

Digitized by Google

MOTHER USES "Matchless" Metal Polish

Guaranteed free from acid. Produces quickly a lasting brilliancy.

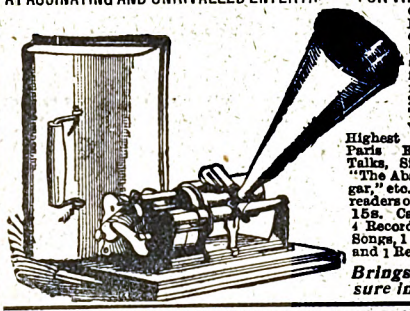
Manufacturers: THE MATCHLESS METAL POLISH Co. Ltd., Liverpool.

WHY DON'T YOU?

"THE MACHINE THAT TALKS."

CAMPBELL'S GRAPHOPHONE is the best Talking and Singing Machine in the Market at the Price.

A FASCINATING AND UNRIVALLED ENTERTAINER FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

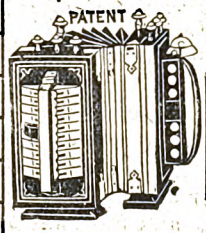


CAMPBELL'S HOME GRAND GRAPHOPHONE. This is no German manufacture, but the new American 20th Century Talking Machine, which gained the Highest Awards at the Paris Exhibition, 1900. Talks, Sings, and recites "The Absent-Minded Beggar," etc. Special price to readers of Short Stories, £2 15s. Carriage paid, with 4 Records free. 2 Vocal Songs, 1 Orchestral Piece, and 1 Recitation.

Brings Endless Pleasure into the Home.

CHARMING MUSIC FOR THE HOME.

CAMPBELL'S Gold Medal MELODEONS



With Organ and Celestial Tone, and Sweet Bell Accompaniments. No Home should be without one. No Knowledge of Music required. Used throughout the world.

200,000 TESTIMONIALS.

Special Offer to the Readers of Short Stories

Campbell's "Gem" Melodeons, price only 6/9
Campbell's "Miniature" Melodeon, „ 10/9
Campbell's "Paragon" Melodeon, „ 14/-
Campbell's "Favourite" Melodeon, „ 16/6

Cut out this and send P.O.O. for the amount

Either sent carriage paid to any address in Great Britain & Ireland.

All lovers of music should at once send for Campbell's New Illustrated Privilege Price List of all kinds of Musical Instruments for Season 1901-2, now ready. 200,000 sent out yearly. Send 1d. Stamp to—

CAMPBELL & CO., Musical Instrument Makers, 116 Trongate, GLASGOW. Established 50 Years. BEWARE OF WORTHLESS IMITATIONS.

80,504 PAIRS

Represents the Increase in the Sale of

"OCEANIC" BOOTS

DURING THE LAST SIX MONTHS.

HALF-A-GUINEA EVERYWHERE.

TRY THEM.

ROB WASHING DAY OF ITS GRINDING TOIL BY USING

SELLERS' LABOUR SAVING WASHERS

Write for copies of letters received from users of these machines.

Price £3.3.0 Delivered Free. AGENTS WANTED

THOS. W. SELLERS & SONS KEIGHLEY Yorks.

DELICIOUS WHOLESOME PURE.

'Rothesay' Rice.

16 Gold Medals & Highest Awards

JOHN HILL & SONS

A delightful plain cake, rich and fragrant. A ½-lb. sample sent FREE on receipt of 3d.

THE 'TUDNO' CAKE. Splendid for daily family use, of choicest quality & Genoa character. 8d. per lb.

SEND 3D

THE "TUDNO" CAKE & BISCUIT FACTORIES, ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 775.] Week ending November 7, 1903. [Price One Penny.

"He held out a paper. It offered £100 reward to the person who arrested me!"

(A Very Striking Incident from "THE PURSUIT OF SARA." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE

The purest and most efficient Remedy procurable for COUGHS, COLDS, BRONCHITIS, ASTHMA, CATARRH, WEAK LUNGS, and CHILDREN'S COUGHS.

BRONCHITIS AND ASTHMA

Veno's Lightning Cough Cure

Produces its most brilliant effect in Chronic Bronchitis and Asthma. It effects astonishing cures in the worst and most persistent cases.

Rev. W. W. TULLOCH, D.D., Bonar Bridge, Sutherlandshire, writes: "July 22nd, '03.—I have been a martyr to asthma all my life and lately to chronic winter bronchitis. I have found Veno's Lightning Cough Cure a valuable medicine."

CHILDREN'S COUGHS

Mrs. ADA S. BALLIN, 5, Agar Street, London, Editor "Womanhood," and a great authority upon children's diseases, writes:—"Veno's Lightning Cough Cure is an exceedingly successful remedy; it is very pleasant to take and the relief it gives is very rapid. The preparation is perfectly safe for children."

W. LASCELLES-SCOTT, F.R.M.S., in his Certificate of Analysis among other things says:—"I have pleasure in certifying that in my opinion VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH COUGH is an exceptionally pure, safe, and effective preparation

LARGE TRIAL BOTTLES 9½d. Regular Sizes, 1/1½ and 2/9.

Ask for VENO'S LIGHTNING COUGH CURE at Chemists and Drug Stores, or post free from the VENO DRUG CO., Hulme, Manchester, England.

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

J. G. GRAVES'

Supplied Direct from the Factory to the Home. CUTLERY

THE "ENTERPRISE" PARCEL, 25/-

Is the Finest Table Cutlery Value in the World.

51 Articles, making a complete outfit of Table Knives, Forks and Spoons for 25/-. Sent on receipt of order with 5/- and promise to complete purchase by monthly instalments of 4/-. Send for Catalogue No. 8.

AGENTS WANTED. WRITE FOR TERMS.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., Sheffield.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY FOR

Headache and Neuralgia.

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Kaputine is not a single crude drug such as has been condemned as dangerous by the Medical Press, but is composed of several approved ingredients, having the full confidence of the Medical profession. The SAFE Remedy.

Kaputine is the only preparation of its kind used in British and Foreign Hospitals and Infirmaries. Proof positive of its superior and sterling qualities.

Write to KAPUTINE, Huddersfield, for Samples Free.

Packets of 18 doses 1/1½; Samples 1d. each.

Kindly mention this paper.

GIVEN AWAY

WITH NEXT WEEK'S

HOME NOTES

(No 513),

A PAPER PATTERN of this

BOY'S NIGHTSHIRT.

Of all Booksellers and Newsagents.

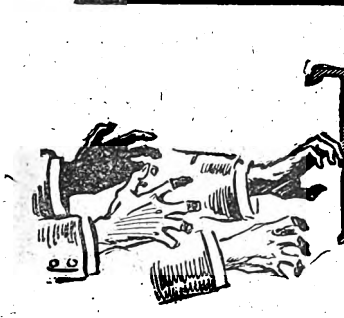
PRICE ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 775.] Week Ending November 7th, 1903. [One Penny.

Fascinating New Series. Start To-day.



The Pursuit of Sara

For New Readers.

Miss Sara Gillespie, the relater of these experiences, was a typine in the firm of Templeton & Co.

The partners in the firm, Mr. Templeton, Mr. Harrington Shackell, and Mr. Rigby Starr, treated Sara most courteously, especially the senior partner, who, before very long, induced her to tell him all about her absent lover, Noel Masterman.

Noel was the nephew of Sir Francis Masterman, who in his will left him a thousand pounds. With this money he intended to buy a doctor's practice, and to give up the situation he was holding, that of medical attendant to a gentleman who was travelling on the Continent.

He came home to England on the death of the Baronet, but was soon recalled by telegram to Nice, as his patient had shown bad symptoms.

Noel was, however, loth to give up the idea of purchasing the practice he had in view, so, leaving the thousand pounds with them in notes, he signed a document authorising Templeton & Co. to act for him.

By a piece of trickery the firm converted this into a document authorising them to deal with his whole estate. He was heir to the baronetcy, in the event of the present holder of the title, Sir Herbert, his cousin, having no heir.

The next day Sara overheard the three partners gloating over the probable success of their schemes.

Then she was amazed and horrified to hear Shackell relate how, posing as Sir Herbert's valet, he had murdered the baronet in cold blood, and had been most careful to leave no clues behind him.

Little by little she understood the full meaning of the vile plot the scoundrels had in hand.

Her betrothed was now Sir Noel Masterman, and Templeton & Co. had full power over his estate!

She resolved on a bold scheme—to get possession of the notes and the document. Bursting into the room, she eluded her astounded employers, seized the precious papers, and fled.

Besides the £1,000 in notes, she had about five pounds with her. Sara wired to Noel to return at once, and then she took train to Bedford.

While there a murderous attack was made on her by Rigby Starr, disguised as a nurse.

He endeavoured to push Sara into the river by Newnham Bridge, but in his eagerness he was nearly drowned himself.

Sara escaped, and, still retaining the all important paper relating to her lover's inheritance, made her way to Northampton.

Templeton & Co., she knew, would leave no stone unturned to find her; no course would be too desperate for them to take in order to regain the document.

At Northampton Sara rescued a little boy from death, and thereby gained the devoted friendship of a young girl namep Maggie Dunkley. To her she confided all her troubles.

While strolling in Abingdon Park, Sara encountered a villainous-looking man with red-hair.

She was told that he was a keeper in a lunatic asylum, and later she found out that Noel was detained as a patient in that asylum!

Madly she intreated for his release, but all in vain! Then the red-haired man told her that he would aid Noel to escape, and told Sara to be on the racecourse the next morning at five o'clock.

Thence Sara went. Suddenly she was seized from behind! Before her, she saw Noel gagged and bound! A man was holding a pistol to his head, and a voice exclaimed:

"Tell me where the papers are before I count ten, or—your lover dies!"

The speaker was Harrington Shackell!

Suddenly she saw a man on horseback galloping towards her. How could she gain time, till her possible rescuer could reach her? "Help," she screamed.

"Eight," said Shackell, and the trigger of the pistol held to Noel's head was raised.

The horseman spurring his steed drew nearer.

"Nine! Is he to die?" cried Shackell.

Sara tried to answer, but her voice was strangled in her throat. Only a hoarse murmur came from her lips. She could not speak; she could not even make a sign.

A second, but a second, and her love must die!

Ten—and the fatal shot was to be fired!

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

THE PURSUIT OF SARA

HEMMED IN AT LEICESTER.

At the last moment with the word—that fatal "ten," the signal for my lover's death—trembling on Shackell's lips, a conviction, strange and startling, came to me. Something, perhaps a turn of his head, maybe a look in his eyes, or, as I like to think, the intuition of my love, laid bare the fact that the man at whose head the pistol was pointed was not Noel!

With a cry I broke from my captors.

"Fire!" I shouted; and again "Fire! That's not Noel Masterman, whoever he may be!"

For a second a blinding fear that after all I was mistaken, sent the world spinning. The next, Shackell turned on Noel's substitute and reviled him.

The other, throwing the loosely knotted cords from arms and chest, replied in kind. The two had almost come to blows, when Shackell, suddenly remembering, missed me.

"Where's the girl?" he yelled, striking at his men who stood about, idly regarding him. Then, as he caught sight of my vanishing figure, "Hurry, make haste, she must not get away. Confound you, why don't you run, you miserable idiots!"

Heading the chase he raced across the turf. Swift he might be, but I was lighter-footed. The horseman I had seen in the distance came nearer, closer, stopped.

"Up you get, missie!" Jim Goodman's strong arm swung me lightly to the saddle before him. "Now, then, Tom," to the boy who ran beside him, "get back and tell my girl the lady's safe. Off!" He waved his whip, shook the reins on the brown mare's neck, and like the wind we tore away, until the shouts of Shackell and his crew grew like the yelping of a pack of hounds in the far distance.

"Maggie was bothered about you," he explained, when at length he judged it safe to draw rein and take a breathing space. "At five in the morning the race-course is a queer sort of place for a girl to go to, and she scented danger. She came down to me at the stables, roused me up, and started me and Tom off after you. I'm glad I came, too, they were a roughish-looking lot of chaps for you to be amongst, missie."

"I can never thank you enough for coming. You and Maggie."

"It's nothing," he remarked, as though he had rescued persecuted people from his birth upwards. "I'd do more than that, for anyone who'd been a good friend to my Maggie."

"Where do you think I had better go, Jim?" I asked.

"You mustn't come back to Northampton, that's certain," he answered, "unless"—his voice grew hard—"unless you ride straight to the police-station and give those chaps in charge."

"I can't do that," I faltered. "I daren't! It may seem strange to you, but indeed it's no wrong or shameful reason that stops me. Maggie knows," I added, "and she approves."

"If she thinks it's all right, missie, I won't say any more. All the same it would be a deal simpler to go to the court and have 'em put in gaol, than to run away. The chances are they'll find you out again, so I understood Maggie to tell me, and then what are you going to do?"

"I can do nothing but hope and, and—fight," I answered, my voice shaking. "It's not for my own sake, Jim, but for my sweetheart's. I have something belonging to him, something I took—or, as they say, stole—from his enemies, the people who pursue me. I daren't go to the police, all I can do is to fight on and on until he comes back. Until——" A sudden fear made me start and all but overbalance.

"The papers, Jim!" I gasped. "I left some papers with Maggie before I came out."

"Here they are, missie, all safe and sound. Maggie gave them to me the last thing. If you don't mind, I'd rather she didn't have the keeping of them any more, miss. What I can do for you myself I will, but if she should come to any harm——"

"Don't worry," I interrupted. I promise you Maggie shall run no further risks."

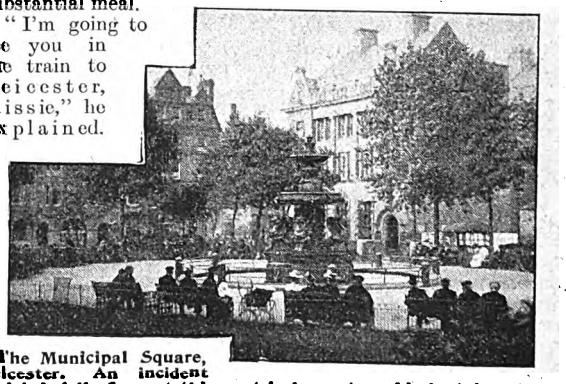
Jim murmured his thanks, and tried somewhat awkwardly to excuse himself for his anxiety. I did not aid him in his endeavours but let him flounder in a sea of apology. I acknowledged the justice of his request, but I was hurt none the less on its account. It seemed as if I were destined to be a sort of female Ishmael, outcast and alone.

At Jim's suggestion I dismounted at a little country inn some miles out of the town, where, he said, I might in safety spend the rest of the day.

"The landlady knows me and Maggie," he explained; "as a friend of ours she'd be pleased for you to stay. I'll tell her you've been travelling and want some hours' rest."

I was shown to a room at the top of the house, and, flinging myself on the bed, fell into a deep sleep, from which I did not wake till close on six o'clock. At seven the faithful Jim reappeared, and under his care I descended to the coffee-room and partook of a substantial meal.

"I'm going to see you in the train to Leicester, missie," he explained.



The Municipal Square, Leicester. An incident which befalls Sara at this spot is in next week's instalment.

"I'd advise you to go to a hotel for to-night, it will be safer for you than lodgings. The bigger the place the more people in it, and the less chance for anyone to kidnap you. Meanwhile, here's five pounds from me and Maggie, which you can pay us back when better times come. It'll keep you going for a bit. If you want more you must let us know. You'll write to Maggie?"

"Of course; directly I get to Leicester. Do you think it wise to go to such a large place?"

"Much safer than a smaller one. Besides, from Leicester you can keep in touch with us. Maybe a letter will come from your sweetheart, and we should want to bring it on at once."

I thanked him for his kindness, and sent many messages of love and gratitude to Maggie. At any rate I left Northampton less forlorn than when I came. I had found friends, faithful, loving-hearted people to whom I could turn in distress, sure of help and sympathy.

It seemed a long run from Northampton to Leicester, and in spite of my day's rest I felt terribly fagged when, dazed by the clatter and din of the big station, I found myself at my journey's end.

Mindful of Jim's instructions, I appealed to the porter, who seized on my bag with the avidity of a bird of prey, and asked if he could recommend me a hotel.

Digitized by Google

He glanced me up and down, and after a moment's thought, suggested that there was a temperance hotel opposite the station.

Visions of "Pearce and Plenty," eminently clean but to my mind inhospitable, rosebefore me.

"I don't much like temperance hotels," I faltered.

"There's the George, but"—he paused, "you're very young," he said with a fatherly shake of the head; "you'd better go to the Temperance," and shouldering my bag—Maggie's last gift—he led the way up many flights of stairs out into the street, across the road, and into the hall of the hotel.

I was located in a room at the top of the house, at the extreme end of a very long corridor. Furnished in the approved fashion of hotels, lit by a dim gas burner, the surroundings were not calculated to rouse my drooping spirits. However, I felt better after supper, and lay down to rest with a quieter mind than I had hoped to enjoy.

I awoke some hours later, my heart beating violently, my nerves a quiver, my whole being stirred by the sense of danger. I started up, crouching on the side of my bed. What had roused me? In what subtle fashion had my nerves been quickened to a consciousness of peril?

In the silence of the night, far, far down the corridor, I heard a soft, shuffling sort of tread. Nearer it came and nearer, each second hastening its approach. Frozen with the fear that comes in the night watches, I shivered, clasping my fingers round my throat that I might feel the contact of warm, living flesh.

What was it, man or beast? that shuffled down the corridor. My room—the last—lay at the end of an abrupt turn in the passage, and was some yards distant from the rest. As I realised this I remembered with a dismay so sharp as to cause physical pain that I had not locked my door!

I could not move. A wild fear that even as I reached the door and grasped the key, the thing would fall upon me, kept me still.

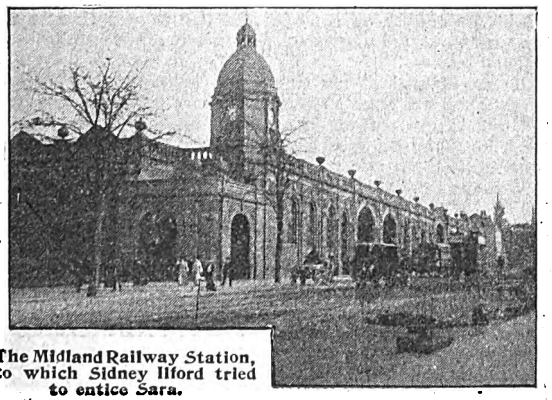
Slowly the curious, halting feet came along the corridor. Another minute they will reach my threshold; and then——?

I glance round for the bell, to reach it I must cross the room. It hangs upon the other side of the fireplace. I cannot stir. I cannot!

With the last effort of a rapidly paralysing will, I throw myself off the bed. Turning the key, I grasp it tightly and creep back, hiding under the clothes.

The steps pause outside my room. The door is softly tried, and in the silence I seem to catch the murmur of an oath at its resistance. Then comes a scratching on the paint. I throw back the bedclothes, and cautiously sit up. The dim light that streams through the window is suddenly intensified. The moon emerging from a cloud illumines the sky, and casts its beams with lavish splendour on the earth. In the clear, cold radiance the door shines silver. Fascinated, I watch the beams fall lower, lower till they reach the floor.

And there, ghostly and lean in the strange light, beneath



The Midland Railway Station, to which Sidney Ilford tried to entice Sara.

Granby Street, to which Sara went in order to dispatch a telegram to Maggie, telling her of her arrival.

the lintel of the door, curved upward, inward, like the talons of a bird of prey, stretched the four fingers and a thumb of a man's right hand.

It seems to my excited fancy that the door rises with the strain, that the fingers pressing with such cruel strength will lift it from its hinges. I hardly dare to breathe, the slightest sound may thwart my purpose.

Noiselessly and with infinite precaution I make my way to the dressing-table and feel for a dagger-shaped hatpin, which, sharp as a knife, is a valuable weapon of defence.

This hand that seeks to steal my lover's property—for that I feel is responsible for its appearance—shall not go empty away.

I stoop down by the door, poising the weapon carefully. And then with a quick movement stab the fingers with my pin. Bleeding and maimed, they are withdrawn, the footsteps shuffle back along the corridor—I am alone.

Reflection decided me that I had better keep silence as to my midnight adventure. Once again I must refrain from seeking help against my pursuers. Two attempts had already been made upon my life, as many upon my, or rather Noel's, property. All had failed. But the next—I sighed, my heart grew heavy. I decided not to leave Leicester, despite my fears. Hitherto I had fled before my enemies. This time I resolved to reverse my methods. I would stay in Leicester and defy the firm of Templeton and Co. to do their worst.

It was evident they did not intend to summon the law to their assistance; had they contemplated appealing to the police I should have been under arrest long since. They seemed to rely upon their strength and cunning to regain possession of the documents. It remained for me to defeat them by the power of love.

From the hotel I found my way down Granby Street, populous and bustling, to the Post Office, where I dispatched a wire to Maggie telling her of my safe arrival. My next call was at Wheeldon's, a large stationer's, with well stocked windows. My errand was to ask for employment. In a town like Leicester there must surely be a demand for typines. I was a skilled operator, and ought not to find a difficulty in getting a situation—until Noel returned.

The assistant stared somewhat at my request, and assured me there was no opening in that establishment, nor so far as he knew in any other.

Much depressed, I was turning to leave the shop when a customer at the other end of the counter came forward.

He had overheard my question. If I would forgive his interference he thought it possible he might be of use!

This, punctuated with smiles, and bows and flourishes of neatly gloved hands.

Very tall, with a slight, willowy figure, a fresh coloured face and a neat black moustache, despite his good looks and ingra-

Digitized by Google

This is "The New Walk," Leicester. At this spot Sara had a most exciting adventure with Templeton himself, which will be fully described next week.

tiating manner the stranger did not favourably impress me. I looked him up and down, however, searched in vain for any trace of a likeness between him and one of the three partners, and finally decided he was well-meaning, if effusive.

"I heard only yesterday that Messrs. Cooper Corah, the big manufacturers, had a vacancy in their establishment for a young lady clerk. You might call at the office and inquire," he bowed again. "You might be successful, at any rate, you could try. I suppose," he tapped his left palm with the slender fingers of his right. "I suppose you have references and all that sort of thing?"

"I can offer the highest testimonials," I replied in the words of a ready letter writer. "There need be no difficulty as to that."

The stranger smiled severely, offered me his card, and bowed himself into the street. I followed, gazing absently after his tall figure.

The card bore the name of Sidney Ilford, and the address of a London club. I put it in my pocket and turned my steps in the direction of St. Margaret's Works.

Progress was necessarily slow; the Corporation was engaged in electrifying the tram service, and the roads for the time had become trenches filled with workmen, digging, hammering, clanging iron against iron in one continuous shriek.

The footpaths, encumbered by rubbish, were barricaded by huge mounds of gravel, and piles of timber. Round the clock house the din was at its height. Groups of pedestrians fascinated by the scene watched from the pavement, a solid mass of humanity—blocking the traffic, through which one had literally to fight a way.

From Granby Street and Gallowtree Gate I turned up Church Gate, exchanging the tall, prosperous buildings, wide thoroughfares, and bustling air of life for the stereotyped rows of red brick dwellings sacred to the artisan and operative.

I did not take the quickest route to Cooper Corah's factory. I missed my way, forgot my directions, and finally found myself in the middle of Abbey Park, within sight of the factory chimneys, but separated from them by winding paths and waving trees. A charming spot, the Park has an individuality that marks it out from kindred places of recreation. In the centre of the most populous part of the town, it is environed, by a forest of chimney stacks, that—over the flower beds, bright with many-coloured blossoms, over the water sparkling iridescent in the sunshine—breathe heavy clouds of smoke. The air throbs with the pulsation of vast machinery, the wind is charged with odours strange, indescribable, vaguely reminiscent of burnt leather—yet neither smoke nor the close proximity of toil can wholly mar the green quietness of this place of peace. Wrested from the encroaching tide of commerce, it lies tranquil and serene, held in the heart of the city's turmoil.

After some little trouble I arrived at Cooper Corah's, a large, white looking factory busy with the hum of many voices. I was directed to the counting-house, where I inquired if the firm were in need of a careful and accurate typine.

The gentleman interviewing me shook his head and assured me there was no vacancy of the kind in the establishment.

I pleaded that he might have overlooked the fact that such assistance was desired, but his denial was even more emphatic.

I left the place depressed at my failure, and irritated that I should have been sent on a fool's errand. What object could the smiling idiot in the stationer's shop have had in telling me such a string of falsehoods? It was evident he had invented the whole story. Love of interference would not explain, nor yet a malicious turn for joking. Could it be—

I stopped short. It was impossible he could have any connection with Templeton and Co. There was nothing to be gained by sending me to Cooper Corah's, they at any rate were not in league with my former employers.

By this time I had reached the churchyard of St. Margaret's, through which there lies a footpath. The beautiful tower of the old church rising above the sad discoloured gravestones loomed dark and stately against a background of blue sky.

The stillness of the scene took hold of me; here, in this place of the dead, the fact that I had life seemed, for the moment, wonderful enough to balance all my troubles. And then, out of the stillness that surrounded me, there came the sound of dragging footsteps that shuffled softly down the path.

Where had I heard the tread? My heart contracted, I felt again the terror of the night. That soft and stealthy step had passed down the hotel corridor, had paused outside my door.

With a cry I turned and faced—Sidney Ilford!

"Were you successful in your application at Cooper Corah's, Miss Gillespie?" he said, smirking.

"How do you know my name?" I asked, moving away.

"For a very sufficient reason," he returned. "I will give you full particulars if you will grant me a few minutes' conversation."

"I have not time," I answered, catching at the first excuse. "I am in a hurry, I wish you——"

He stayed the word upon my lips. Gripping my arm with his left hand—he had good cause to spare his right—he bent his head so that his face was level with my own.

"If you are wise you will hear me now," he said.

"I do not know you," I answered. "Let me go," I raised my voice. "Help!" I cried, urged to desperation. "Help!"

"If you call again, as Heaven is above us, I'll whistle for a constable and give you into custody. On what charge?" he laughed insultingly. "The police will know, at all events," he sneered. "Such an accomplished thief as yourself cannot hope to escape recognition."

As he stopped, he took a paper from his breast pocket and handed it to me, still keeping a tight grip on my arm.

"Read," he said, "it will interest you."

From the document, in a printed notice, there stared at me a hideous and distorted likeness of myself! With a cry I grasped the paper tight, and read, my cheeks aflame, the description of my face and figure that succeeded.

"Height 5ft. 6in., broad shoulders, slim waist, small feet and ankles. Red hair, green eyes, large mouth, good teeth! Anyone giving such information as will lead to the apprehension of the above will be rewarded with £100."

"This bill——"

"Is one of many," my companion interrupted. "Before to-night they will stare at you from every hoarding, face you at every railway station, haunt you in every street. Go—if you like"—he loosened his grip upon my arm, "but if you do, before to-night you will be lodged in gaol."

"Who are you?" I asked again. "What have you to do with me?"

"I will answer both your questions, but not here. It is impossible to converse on weighty matters in the middle of a public footpath. Let us sit down," and he pointed to a seat close to the wall, against which, ranged in solemn fashion, a row of tombstones reared their heads.

It was futile to combat the suggestion; I must know where I stood in regard to this unexpected ally of my enemies before I could hope to defeat his attack.

Digitized by Google

"I suppose you are employed by Templeton and Co.?" I asked, seating myself as far as possible from him.

"I am an agent of the firm," he answered cautiously, "and as such, I have heard of the disappearance of their late typine—with notes to the value of a thousand pounds."

"You will, if you please," I answered promptly, "drop this style of conversation and speak plainly, or not at all. I took the notes, also the paper that Noel Masterman was entrapped into signing. You know I took them, as you know also why I did so. You are aware, no doubt, that Messrs. Templeton and Co. have tried to murder and to rob me. They have failed as you"—I looked at his right hand—"have failed also. Don't trouble to deny it!" I cried angrily. "You tried to break into my room last night. Proof?" I laughed scornfully. "There," I answered, and struck at the fingers of his right hand with my glove.

"You shall pay for that," he snarled, the mask thrown off. "I vow you shall pay——"

"You waste time in threats," I interrupted. "Let us come to business. What are your—terms?"

"Either you deliver to me the bank-notes and the document signed by your lover, or you return with me to London to await Templeton's instructions."

"If I refuse?"

He shrugged his shoulders.

"Before night, I again repeat, the town will be flooded with these bills."

"I don't believe you. It would be too great a risk for the firm to have me arrested. I know too much."

He grinned maliciously.

"To have you arrested on the charge of stealing the notes and the document would be a foolish proceeding of which my employers are not capable. The charge preferred against you would be that of misappropriating some £5 of the money given to you for office expenses. In other words, embezzling the petty cash. How does that strike you, Miss Gillespie? What sort of defence would you, an absconding clerk, masquerading under false names, have to offer? Whatever charge you brought against your late employers would redound to your discredit, not to theirs. Besides"—he gave me a side look from his crafty eyes—"besides, nothing you said could be proved. It's not likely you're such a fool as to carry the papers about with you," he paused, and I felt his glance burn into mine. Not by so much as a tremor did I betray the anxiety the question caused me. If he gained a hint that at that moment I had the papers, he would—I knew it—close with me in a frantic attempt to gain them.

"No," I said calmly, "I'm not so silly as that. I'm like an advance agent, always a town ahead. I left the papers"—I paused as if confused, and bit my lip.

Mr. Sidney Ilford made a note of my slip, and no doubt decided to communicate with the firm's representative at Northampton, so soon as he was through with me.

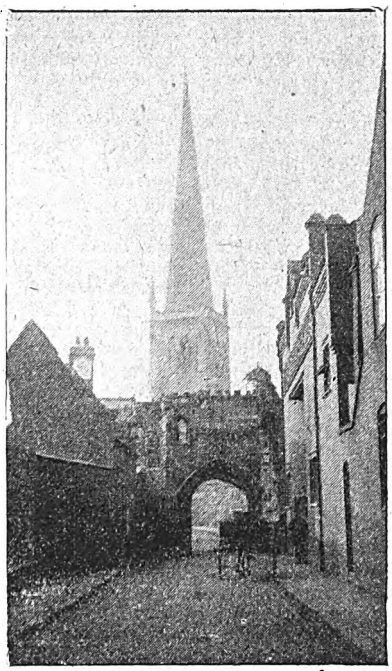
"Am I to give you in charge or not?"

"You haven't the power," I answered, fighting desperately. "I can prove you were not my employer."

"Pardon me," his suavity of manner had returned, "you are mistaken. As it happens I am a director of the company that employed you, and as such I can have you detained on suspicion. Once you are in confinement, if only for four-and-twenty hours, the game is ours. We know all your movements, where you went, with whom you stayed, since you left the office. We shall discover the whereabouts of the papers almost immediately. Meanwhile you will be committed for trial on the evidence of the respected man of business, Mr. Templeton, found guilty, and sentenced to imprisonment."

"Against that you suggest I should accompany you to London? What advantage should I get from the latter course?"

"You would be spared the ignominy of a trial, and the disgrace of imprisonment. You know enough of the firm, Miss Gillespie, to understand that when I say you will be found guilty, such will be the case. There is, however, a third alternative; give me the notes," he stretched out his maimed right hand, "you can make better terms with me than Templeton. Tell me where the notes are to be found. And, and"—his face worked convulsively, his eyes shone with cupidity—"you can keep the paper," he said hoarsely. "I don't require that, it's the notes I want. Give them to me, and I will tell you where you can find your lover. It's the last chance you'll have, Miss Gillespie. Where are they?" He brought his face close to mine. "Only tell me and you shall be with Noel Masterman this afternoon."



Church Gate, at which point Sara made a daring and successful attempt to escape from Ilford.

The temptation to yield was terrible. All that I had endured, the terror, the pain, the agony of fright, the apprehension of discovery combined to weaken me. After all a thousand pounds was a small price to pay for happiness. Noel would not grudge ten times that amount. Should I consent? The eager face watched mine.

I turned upon my tempter fiercely.

"I will not give you the notes," I answered hotly.

"Then——"

"Neither will you give me in charge," I interrupted. "I have made my choice. I elect to go with you to London. Come," and I rose prepared to accompany him.

My decision seemed to surprise, not to say disappoint him, and he wasted some time and eloquence in trying to induce me to accept his terms. At last, with a bad grace, he resigned himself to the inevitable and leaving the churchyard, linked his arm in mine, and led me in the direction of Granby Street.

"We'll go by the Midland," he said, "there's a fast train to London about one, I think."

It wanted but a quarter to the hour, yet he did not seem to hasten, and I judged he was in some perplexity how to act. It struck me as possible that Templeton might not be best pleased at the turn things had taken. Probably he was not in London; he might be engaged in some transaction in the provinces, which he would not care to leave.

In that case, I thought, it would be doing my former employer a kindness were I to make good my escape. That I had not the slightest intention of accompanying Mr. Ilford to London, I have, I trust, made sufficiently plain. I only watched my opportunity to break loose from my captor and take refuge in flight.

The opportunity came quickly. At the corner of Church Gate our progress was stopped by a dense mass of men and women watching the men at work upon the tram-lines. It was the dinner-hour, and every one curtailed their leisure to inspect the progress of the alterations.

In the middle of the crowd I threw my whole weight upon Ilford with such a sudden jerk, that, staggering, he involuntarily threw up his hand. Snatching my arm from his grasp, I flung myself heavily among the crowd around us. Rushing, dodging, I forced a way until I reached the front rank of the throng and essayed to make my way along the street.

Digitized by Google

Immediately Sidney Ilford yelled out the cry of "Thief, stop thief!" A thousand throats took up the cry, eager for pursuit as a pack of wolves. At the cry I changed my course, and, doubling like a hare, fled across the road; over the stones, the rails, the rubbish that made the way all but impassable I fought a path, until I reached the pavement on the other side.

There—Heaven bless him—some kind Samaritan made way for me, and tried to stop the chase, that, yelling at all top speed, came after me. Down Gallowtree Gate, the road growing clearer and my pursuers closer. Gasping I fled, Noel's name on my lips, Noel's paper at my heart.

Down Market Street, barely escaping the clutch of greedy hands, over the cobble stones into the Market-place, thronged with stalls. It was Saturday, and end to end they stood, loaded with meat and vegetables, sweetmeats and cakes—and everything the busy housewife wants to buy. My heart in my throat I dodged between the stalls, overturning bales of merchandise in my mad flight. There never was a busier market than Leicester upon Saturday. The place was packed, one could walk upon the people's heads. The chase let loose, charged marketers and stalls with a great rush so that neat, well-adorned barrows, thrown helter-skelter one against each other, collapsed and fell with a crash on the ground.

Meanwhile with panting breath I crept behind a large capacious stall hung with lace curtains of all sorts and prices. The proprietress, a stout comely woman, took pity on my frightened face.

"Here," she said shortly, and pushed me underneath a pile of goods stacked in a corner close against the awning By this time the pursuit had cooled; faced by infuriated hucksters, the friends of "justice" felt their enthusiasm abate. They slunk off rapidly, leaving Sidney Ilford to continue his search alone.

Once or twice I thought I heard his voice, and felt a chill run through me. Gradually, however, my apprehension died away, I emerged from my hiding place and sought my protector.

In the middle of my earnest thanks, a shout arose from the neighbouring streets.

"Fire," screamed the crowd. "Fire!" The cry was taken up, repeated on all sides. With one sweeping movement the crowd, gathering at the cry, poured down Gallowtree Gate and Granby Street, to where a thick cloud of evil smoke darkened the sky.

Yielding to the attraction wielded by the very name of "Fire," I abruptly left my shelter and hurried from the market to the blazing pile—a shoe factory in Campbell Street. The building was well alight. Luckily there was no fear of loss of life, all the hands had left the place an hour ago.

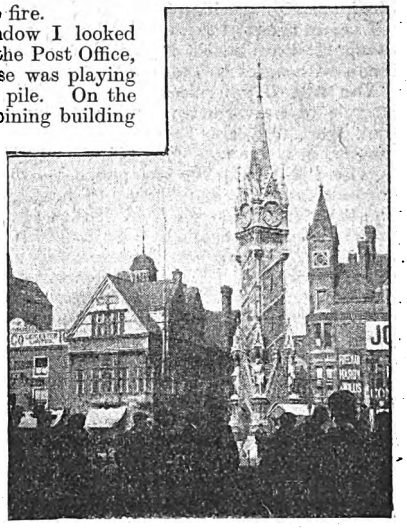
At last, however, a fire-engine made its appearance; ladders were run up against the building, and some attempt made to subdue the flames. By this time another engine appeared, and under the direction of a grey-bearded official, whom the crowd greeted as Superintendent Ely, the pumps were got to work.

But the fire had too firm a grip upon the place to give way easily. The air was dense with smoke, the flames shooting through the roof were fanned by a strong breeze, that cast the charred fragments of slate and brick upon the crowd below. The place was getting all too hot for safety. It occurred to me that from the back windows of the hotel I could command a safer view than from the street.

Pushing a path through the crowd, that somewhat stolidly lined the road, I made my way back to the hotel. The house was in an uproar, the factory was in too close proximity not to raise a feeling of alarm.

The corridors were dripping with water, exuding from the pipes that had been pressed into the service of the brigade. Through a landing window the glare in the sky was frightful to behold; I hurried up the staircase, fled down the corridor, into my little room—hot with the raging of the fire.

From my window I looked over the roof of the Post Office, from which a hose was playing on the burning pile. On the roofs of the adjoining building men stood shouting directions to the firemen. A huge sheet of flame, red-hearted, yellow-tipped, hung like a curtain between earth and sky. The water playing from all sides, seemed to have no effect. I thought the factory doomed. Engrossed with the sight, I hung over the window-sill, and oblivious of all save the burning pile, did not hear soft steps outside my door. Not till the grating of the key in the lock from the outside, warned me of danger, did I realise what had happened. Sidney Ilford had traced me to the hotel and had fastened me a prisoner in my room!



The crowd watching the men at work on the tram lines.

For a moment I hesitated whether I should peal the bell and summon the assistance of the servants.

Ilford had possibly left the hotel either to communicate with Templeton or to fetch the police. My chance of escape lay in his absence. If I called for help it would mean a delay in leaving the place.

There was a telegram lying on my table. It read:

"Important news for you. Coming to-morrow.—MAGGIE."

News—that meant news of Noel. Maybe he was in England. Perhaps we would be with me to-morrow, nay this very afternoon. In a passion of joy, I kissed the precious words.

I was a prisoner in my room. Useless to try and force the lock, futile to ring the bell. There remained but one way of egress—the window. From a great height I looked down on slanting roofs of slate, slippery with water. To the left the factory blazed on high, to the right—I drew back, a scream of horror broke from my lips. From an adjoining building two men were manipulating a long ladder in the direction of the hotel. In the confusion of the fire, fearing that theirs would be the next house attacked, none paid heed to the doings of frightened householders, men pumped water, erected ladders, directed a hose as pleased them best. The ladder that slowly but surely was approaching the direction of my window was supported by a tall, square-shouldered man, under the directions of a man some years his senior. And in the two I recognised Richard Templeton and Harrington Shackell!

The ladder which reached my window was steadied into position. Try as I would I could not displace the iron that rested on the sill. A slight boyish figure set his foot upon the lowest rung. Rigby was coming towards me.

A sudden burst of smoke clouded my view, so hot, so close were the flames that they scorched my cheeks and seemed to burn my eyes.

When I looked again Rigby was nearer. I caught the gleam of a weapon in his hand.

"Help! Help!" I scream, and know no help can come.

And then, with blind fury I throw myself against the figure clambering now into the room.

(The Leicester episode concludes next week.)

Digitized by Google

Faint Heart and Fair Lady.

How a Man Pleaded for his Friend.

ONCE Harry Tiverton and James Ridgemore were bosom friends. Something happened; they were never seen to speak again and they cut one another dead whenever they met. This is the curious story, never before related, of their estrangement.

One evening Tiverton sat in his sanctum—called by courtesy his study. He was a reader, a voracious reader, but chiefly of the lighter forms of literature. What life lacked for him in romance he found between the covers of novels.

Unannounced, as usual, Ridgemore entered. They warmly shook hands, and Tiverton pulled forward a second armchair. There was clearly a more than common understanding between them.

"You've been quite deserting me, Jim, of late."

"I've not dropped in this week, if that's what you mean."

"Nor last week either! What's been amiss?"

"I'll tell you. It's nothing very serious, but—let me light up first!"

Satisfied that his pipe was alight, Ridgemore continued:

"Something has occurred, Harry, which I reckoned entirely impossible."

"You've come into a fortune?"

"I suppose I have—a piece of good fortune anyhow."

"You're promised a rise at the office, eh?"

"Nothing so material! It's a trifle hard to tell you, old friend. Got a good novel there?"

"My dear chap, you make a statement that raises my curiosity to boiling point, and then calmly suggest taking up a book."

"I didn't mean that, Harry. You're a novel reader. You know something of the hearts of men—and women. I think you will understand me."

Tiverton looked at his friend with a perplexed air. His manner was mysterious and slightly nervous.

"I don't know you, Jim, in this serious mood."

"Nor I myself. The whole thing has just turned me upside down. The fact is—I am in love."

The candid and unexpected announcement caused Tiverton to edge his chair a couple of inches away in surprise.

"Don't shun me as though it were measles," the other humorously observed.

"You've astonished me—I confess it. But my congratulations are none the less sincere, Jim." He held out his hand. "When did the engagement take place?"

"I never said a word about an engagement. The two things don't naturally follow in the least. You shouldn't jump to conclusions."

"I see. The course of true love not running entirely smooth, eh, Jim?"

Ridgemore nodded. His pipe had gone out. He paused to relight it.

"I wish I could help you, old fellow."

"Probably you can, Harry. I don't understand girls—have never pretended to. If I'd had a sister of my own it might have been different."

Tiverton looked sceptical. He had four sisters of his own, and they did not help him one whit to understand the sex. He kept silent.

"My case is just this, Harry. I love the girl, but don't know in the least her feelings towards myself. The usual advice in such circumstances is to go in and win, but I'm a nervous, backward chap and simply can't move without knowing a bit first how the land lies. It's in that I think you can help me."

"My dear Jim! Why, I don't even know the girl!"

"Yes, you do."

"It's not—er—one of my sisters?"

He advanced the idea with a certain timidity.

"No, don't look so anxious, Harry. I've no designs in that quarter. But you're pretty warm. It is a relative of yours—your cousin, Nellie Mayo."

Tiverton's pipe dropped from his mouth into his lap, then on to the floor. He did not trouble to brush away the ashes which were distributed over his clothes in its fall.

"That little kid!"

Ridgemore looked slightly huffy.

"She's not so very little."

"It seems only yesterday she put up her hair and took to long frocks."

"She's twenty-one next year, Harry, and only half a head shorter than myself."

"I beg pardon, but I've always looked upon her as a youngster. And to think that you're in love with her!"

"Is it so very queer?" Ridgemore's tones were not very conciliatory.

"Forgive me! I did not mean to put you out; it was the surprise. Well, she's a decent girl and pretty, very pretty, some people have said."

The other's face wreathed itself in smiles.

"You're right, Harry. And she's good, isn't she?"

"I believe so. But how can I help you? It's hardly in my line."

Ridgemore pointed to the rows of novels.

"And you've devoured all those. I simply want you when you meet her next to find out how the land lies. You will do the thing tactfully, I know. Introduce my name in conversation and get to know somehow what she thinks of me."

"But what good will that do?"

"It will encourage me to proceed. She has rather a shy manner; I'm shy, too, and can't get behind it. But when I know that she really does care for me, I sha'n't be nervous any longer."

Tiverton looked reflective.

"It's rather a queer thing to ask, Jim. You don't wish me to disclose your feelings towards her?"

"By all means if you think it will help matters."

"But if things miscarry?"

"They won't. You're far too level-headed for that. Well, Harry?"

"Yes, I'll do it."

"Thank you no end! You're the best friend I ever had. I shall owe you everything if all goes right. Let me know, won't you?"

* * * * * *

Digitized by Google

"It is good of you, Harry, to bring me here."

"Not at all! I'm glad you are enjoying yourself."

"It doesn't seem to you a waste of a precious Saturday afternoon?"

Tiverton thought of his important mission.

"I could not employ it in any better way, Nellie."

They were seated in Hyde Park on the banks of the Serpentine. Before them the water, smooth as a mirror, gleamed in the sunshine. On its surface several boats were gliding, but the weather was too hot for energetic rowing. The fresh green of the trees showed up against the blue sky, hardly flecked by a cloud. It was a perfect day and Nature was in her most sentimental mood.

Tiverton congratulated himself. He had come to the very spot to open the subject engrossing his mind. He felt himself burning with zeal for the success of his friend's suit. Ridgemore was a fortunate fellow.

"One might be twenty miles from anywhere instead of in the heart of London," Nellie Mayo dreamily observed.

"If you listen very attentively, you will hear the roar of 'buses at the Marble Arch."

"Don't be horrid! This is fairyland. Perhaps you will take me for a row presently, Harry."

"Perhaps—when the sun goes down."

"Ah, you're lazy."

"No. But I want to have a good talk with you first. One can't chat properly when toiling with the sculls."

In her cousin's eyes, Nellie had acquired a new importance. He scanned her features. They were far prettier than he had ever imagined, and in this summer costume—a white dress and a pink sun hat—she looked absolutely bewitching. Perhaps, after all, the fact of Jim being "gone" on her was not the wonder it seemed.

But it was time enough to open proceedings.

"Do you know something, Nellie?"

"What do you mean? Oh, isn't this place a dream?"

Ignoring her second question, Harry replied only to the first.

"Why, Nellie, that you're getting quite pretty."

"Nonsense! I wish you would be sensible."

Yet she could not disguise the pleasure in her eyes.

"But you are. There, I shouldn't be at all surprised if some fellow fell in love with you."

"You are too absurd, Harry."

"I mean it, though—every word of it."

His glance lingered on her head. What pretty ringlets of hair! What a well-shaped ear, like an island in their midst! How delicate and white a neck, and what a rosebud of a mouth! He involuntarily began to hum the tune, "Lucky Jim."

Nellie checked him.

"Hush, Harry! I mean, don't spoil the beautiful quiet." A pause. "I say, you weren't chaffing just now?"

"I'm not given to chaff. You are pretty, and I know a fellow who——"

He stopped. Wisdom dictated more cautious progress at this juncture. Too sudden a disclosure of Ridgemore's ardour for her might upset the girl.

"Well, what?" She could not wait for him to proceed.

"Thinks a tremendous lot of you."

"Oh, Harry, who?"

But he only laughed.

Nellie was growing visibly excited. There was a fine colour in her cheeks, and her eyes glistened. Tiverton felt more and more interested in her. A surfeit of sentimental novels had worked its way into his youthful blood. He began to draw upon his recollections of various episodes in them.

"Ah, Nellie, when love seizes a fellow, it lifts him up to the skies."

"I know the feeling a little bit."

"You do? Then I needn't explain."

"Oh, please do! I like it!"

"Well, you feel warm all over and most awfully jolly. And you vow to be such a decent fellow—to be worthy of her, you see."

Nellie's lip was trembling, and the colour in her cheeks matched the shade of her hat. Tiverton drew further and further upon his imagination.

"You sleep with her photograph under your pillow, and kiss it half a dozen times directly you wake up in the morning."

"I haven't had mine taken—er—since I was quite young."

"Then you must at once, Nellie. You don't know how someone would appreciate it."

Suddenly Harry felt a small gloved hand gently pressing his own. It was evidently Nellie's way of showing her appreciation of his gratifying remarks. Ridgemore's success was assured now; she was a girl with a heart.

"Oh, Harry, why didn't you tell me this before?"

"I? How could I?"

"I don't know. But it would have been nice to have known before."

A man came up and demanded twopence for their seats.

Tiverton paid the money and was glad to see his back, Nellie played with the handle of her parasol. She was evidently brooding deeply over something.

"Harry!"

"Yes, Nellie!"

"I wonder if you saw Scrappy Bits last week."

"It doesn't often come my way. What was in it?"

"It was so silly. I didn't agree with it in the least."

"What did it say?"

"That first cousins shouldn't marry."

"Gracious goodness! Nellie! You don't suppose—why——" He stopped, speechless.

"No, Harry, it's all right. As I said, I don't believe it a bit. You know I've loved you for years, don't you, dear?"

He stammered something which she construed into assent.

* * * * *

When Ridgemore came down to breakfast on Monday morning, a bulky letter from Tiverton lay on the table. For a minute or so he fingered the envelope. What had caused Tiverton to write so lengthy a communication? He nervously broke the seal.

There was a long preamble, apologetic in vein. Why could not Tiverton, with such hazards at stake, come more quickly to the point? He read impatiently on.

An uneasy suspicion took root in his mind.

"I implore your forgiveness, Jim, for what I am going to tell you," the letter read. "You know the interview with Nellie was not of my own seeking; I sought it out solely on your account. All, as I imagined, was proceeding so nicely for you, when there was a stunning revelation. Prepare yourself for a shock, old man! Nellie told me that she loved me and had done so for a long time. We are now engaged to be married."

Incredulity—dismay—anger flitted across Ridgemore's face in rapid succession.

He tore the letter to bits and threw it into the grate.

As he brushed his silk hat for the City, he said to the cat:

"There, if you want a thing done properly, you always have to do it yourself."

The cat blinked.

And that is why Harry Tiverton and James Ridgemore, once bosom friends, never now speak to one another.

Herbert Jamieson.

MISS PASSEE: "I should like to see a young man try to kiss me." Miss Young: "You cruel thing!"

SHE: "Shall I sing 'Then You'll Remember Me'?" He: "Yes; but, Ethel, don't forget that I want to remember you as kindly as possible."

Digitized by Google

A Girl's Boast.

How Joan Mortlock Tried to Carry it out and what Came of the Attempt.

"SHE ought to have been a boy!"

Richard Mortlock thought of the words of the head-mistress of the Mount School for Girls as he watched his nineteen-year-old daughter romping about the lawn with her great dog. The very picture of health, youth, and exuberance of animal spirits! Dark hair, sparkling eyes, cheeks with a touch of carmine, well-rounded figure scarcely above the medium height, and full of natural grace and suppleness. Richard Mortlock thought of the bygone days when his wife and Joan's mother had appeared to him as the central figure of a picture that had much similarity with that upon which he was gazing, and his eyes grew moist.

"No! It's wrong!" he murmured. "Miss Jevons doesn't understand. Joan has as much roguishness in her composition as most boys, and she dearly loves a little fun, but to say that she ought to have been a boy is wrong! To turn such a charming piece of humanity into a member of the opposite sex would be a mistake! Although I say it as shouldn't, as the village people remark, Joan will perform a greater and better duty as she is, by bestowing her wealth of affection and energy upon some worthy man, and urging him on to greater things than he would be able to accomplish without a wife, or with one who has less mischief in her composition than Joan!"

He smiled, and the moisture that had crept into his eyes was gone. His smile deepened as he saw her racing the dog to the end of the lawn and away to the spot where a small river flowed past the grounds of Mortlock House. Then he saw her gather her skirts together and he uttered an exclamation of anxiety. He made a step forward as if to pass out of the window in pursuit, but stopped immediately. The girl and the dog had made a leap and had alighted on the opposite bank, where Joan faced about and waved her hand airily towards her father.

Mortlock answered the greeting, then turned back into the room and seated himself in a really easy-chair. That trifling escapade had caused a change in the train of his thoughts.

Joan's animal spirits might cause her to run the risk of bodily harm. Might it not also happen that her mischief-loving propensities, in conjunction with her unsophisticated ideas, would lead her into other dangers—dangers of the heart or soul?

"I should not have the slightest misgiving if she were—if she saw things as clearly as some girls do, but she is somewhat too trustful!" mused Mortlock. "I ought to have a feminine relative here with her, but I don't care to damp Joan's spirits by tying her to the society of someone much older than herself!" He sat staring at the carpet for several minutes, then he shook himself and arose with a laugh. "I am foolish! Joan has enough wit to take care of herself and not permit her boisterous energy to lead her into any madcap act!"

The object of Richard Mortlock's solicitude certainly seemed able to take care of herself, but how far this confidence was justified will be seen in the sequel.

On the following day there was to be a gathering in the Abbey ruins, a kind of garden party, where the Rector would have tea served and the young people would enjoy themselves. Joan was looking forward to this afternoon's pleasure; it was something to do, and there would be an opportunity to see the Rector's guest, of whom she had heard much from her friend, Edith Graham. That young lady, some two summers older than Joan, called at Mortlock House in the morning to ascertain if Joan were sure to be there, and it was that call which caused the trouble to commence.

"Of course I am sure to be there!" declared Joan emphatically. "It will be grand. I am dying to see this handsome stranger, naturally! What is he like?"

"Handsome! That sums it all up!" replied Edith with a laugh. "He has just one defect; he is coldly polite to ladies, and rumour has it that he is invulnerable to the charms of feminity!"

"Is he?" cried Joan, laughing in her turn. "Well, he must not think that he is so superior a being and that the members of our sex are so inferior!"

"Oh, he isn't at all like that! But he appears to be one of those men who—who are not easily captivated!"

"Wouldn't it be fun to see him a captive to the charms of one of us!" cried Joan, clapping her hands. "I wish——"

"One of us!" echoed Edith. "Why, you haven't long left school."

"Oh, I wasn't thinking of myself!" said Joan truthfully. "I was thinking of the others. And yet," she continued in a tone of mingled vexation and jest, the former sentiment having been caused by Edith's rather sarcastic observation, "why shouldn't even poor little I be capable of doing it? I should like to do it just for the fun of the thing! It would be grand to make this invulnerable man surrender at discretion! I have a good mind to try!"

"You might as well spare yourself the trouble; you will not succeed!" said Edith Graham coldly.

Joan's eyes flashed; those words were really a challenge, and they aroused all her spirit. The idea was one calculated to afford scope for her mischief-loving propensities, which was another inducement to carry it out. Without fully estimating the significance of her words, Joan burst forth with:

"I'll do it! I'll bring him to the proposing point, or I'll forfeit my next Christmas box from papa in favour of the county hospital!"

Edith Graham laughed a trifle hysterically because, as she gazed at the flushed face and small figure, she could not prevent herself from inwardly acknowledging that Joan stood as good a chance as anyone of accomplishing such a task. They separated with a friendliness which, it must be confessed, was not quite genuine, and Joan set her lips firmly together, shut out all misgivings, and prepared to carry out her boast! Yes; it was a boast and she was wrong to have made it, but she would go through with it!

The afternoon was an ideal one for such an occasion. The sun shone on the hills and dales of the ground which had once been the domain of saintly men and, prior to that, a castle fortress. Wild flowers grew at the foot of the ruins of ancient walls, ivy-covered some of them, forming themselves into shady nooks, the grass of the flat land was velvety, and here and there divided by a parterre of cultivated flowers. Seats were fixed about the ruins for those who desired to rest without sitting on Mother Earth.

Joan was full of gaiety; her lithe form moved swiftly about the grounds and attracted general attention. Joan had been briefly introduced to the Rector's guest, who had bowed in the most polished manner, but had otherwise not been much interested in her, to judge by appearances.

Digitized by Google

Mr. Frank Spencer had disappeared; he seemed to be one by himself and was probably enjoying a pipe in some quiet nook. "From which I shall promptly haul him!" murmured Joan with determination; "a man mustn't think that he can escape the civilities of society in that way!"

Quite suddenly, in turning a corner, she came upon him; in fact, she nearly tripped over his foot as he sat with his back against an ivy-covered wall and his legs stretched at full-length. She hastily apologised, and he, not in the least disconcerted, lazily informed her that she "needn't mention it!"

"I have mentioned it!" said Joan. "I always think that it is rather absurd to tell people not to mention this or that when they have done it!"

"I shouldn't think so deeply if I were you! It's hard work and causes wrinkles!" he returned imperturbably.

She looked at him searchingly, but he gave no trace of his feelings, and she could not make up her mind whether he was quietly chaffing her or not.

"Thinking again?" he inquired, as she did not speak, and Joan was piqued to find that her eyebrows had contracted in meditation.

"I was thinking that you would make a good picture of——" She stopped herself abruptly, before the acid little speech was finished.

"Laziness!" He finished it for her nonchalantly. "You were going to say that, weren't you?"

"I intended to say 'indolence.' It's more polite!" she returned, with a mischievous twinkle in the expressive eyes which he did not fail to notice.

"It is very comfortable here!" he said, with an attempt to excuse himself. "I cannot ask you to sit down, as there is no seat. Pity, isn't it? I am sure we could pass a few minutes very agreeably in conversation; we understand each other tolerably well, do we not?"

Joan opened her lips to reply, checked herself, and then decided to say it, which she did with an air of defiance.

"Most gentlemen, less indolent, would have made another suggestion; but I can understand that it would require too much energy on your part!"

"By Jove! That's an arrow-pointed little speech, Miss Mortlock, but I'll own that I deserve it!" He sprang to his feet. "May I walk with you for a minute or two through these lovely grounds? I will not bore you long with my presence!"

Joan felt her face grow crimson. He would think her very forward! She must check her capacity for making a quick retort!

"I can't refuse, since I have really asked for it!" thought Joan, feeling uncomfortably warm.

So they strolled about the grounds for nearly half-an-hour together, till they came upon the Rector and a small party who engaged them in talk, and Joan contrived to slip away.

The half-hour with Mr. Frank Spencer had been a very agreeable one; she had forgotten her discomfort and they had chatted and bantered one another in true friendly fashion. He had received a brilliant education and she was by no means a vapid schoolgirl.

They met every day for the next week, either at some social gathering or while out on an errand or taking a constitutional along the country road. Somehow, Joan felt that she looked forward to these meetings, and she was disappointed on the one occasion when they did not have a minute or two in private conversation. She wanted to tell herself that she was pursuing her plan, but this was not exactly tasteful to her; and when she tried to examine her sentiments and find an explanation for this desire to see Frank Spencer, the answer that came to her mind caused her to blush at her own reflection in the mirror, and to call it "an absurd idea!" So she continued to look for the time when she would meet him, and to refuse to understand why she did so!

He met her one day about a mile from home and they walked together in the direction of Mortlock House and the Rectory. When those two commenced a quiet chat it was like knocking flint against steel, for sparks would fly very quickly. Spencer took a delight in exciting sharp retorts from this impulsive girl, and she tried to galvanise him into life, as she said.

"Don't you think I have idled my time away quite sufficiently here, Miss Mortlock?" he asked quizzically. "I ought to be devoting myself to some more useful occupation, eh?"

But Joan did not reply. Her power of speech seemed to have deserted her for the moment. Her face was averted, or he would have seen that it went pale, and afterwards became more red than before. Going away? She thought she heard him say that he was going away to-morrow! And what about her boast? No, it wasn't that which disturbed her. It was—nothing, nothing, nothing! How silly she was!

"I shall be sorry to go," he was saying. "It has been very pleasant here, but I must return. It isn't fair to leave a sweetheart so long. I am afraid I haven't treated her fairly, as I promised to be back about a week sooner. I wonder if she is capable of jealousy? Hardly, I think! I feel sure that she would like to see you, Miss Mortlock. I have to——"

"That is father's trap," interrupted Joan in a shrill voice, that was not at all like hers. "I can ride home now, thank you!"

Richard Mortlock came up at a trot and exchanged cordial greetings with the young man.

"I can give you a lift if you are going straight back," he said. "I think we can squeeze three persons on this seat!"

Frank Spencer looked at Joan and waited for her to second the invitation; it struck him that he would not object to the squeezing if she would only glance at him with that roguish flash of the eyes! But there was no answer to his gaze.

"Thank you very much, Mr. Mortlock, but I prefer to walk this morning!" he said politely, but he could not altogether repress the ring of disappointment which struck Joan's ears very strangely.

Joan, much to her father's surprise, complained of a wretched headache and did not come down from her bedroom after lunch. On the following morning she did not look at all well, and Mortlock was much concerned, but Joan would not let him send for the doctor. "I shall be all right again by to-morrow, papa!" she told him. Mortlock wondered and wondered at the cause, and his heart grew a trifle heavy with the suspicion that it was a love trouble.

It is questionable whether any girl ever felt more wretched than Joan. She had faced her trouble squarely and she had realised the truth.

She had deliberately set out to bring this man to her feet with no more praiseworthy object than that of carrying out a boast born of her own love of fun and the vague challenge of an envious girl. She had been caught in her own trap, for—she loved Frank Spencer! Why should she conceal it from herself any longer? She had grown to love him with an ardour that almost startled her now that she recognised it. And he? He had fought her with her own weapons. He had made her love him, and he must know it, and yet he had a sweetheart at home!

She would lose her £10 note, and be laughed at into the bargain, but what was that compared with the loss of Frank? How dreary life would be in the coming days without him! She shivered as if the cold grip of winter were upon her, but the next moment it seemed as if the air of the room would stifle her, and she went out into the spacious grounds.

The Joan who walked wearily through the garden and into the shrubbery beyond was a different being from the merry, emancipated school-girl who had tripped so lightly along those very paths three weeks or so previously. This Joan was more of a woman, with a woman's emotions and knowledge of some of the bitterness of life. Love had caused the transformation, and the disappointment of a love wrongly given had occasioned the fuller knowledge of the fact that life is a serious journey along the unknown. And Joan began dimly to realise that the joys of life are made greater by contrast with its sorrows.

Digitized by Google

She reached a small opening, a circular space of about a dozen feet in diameter, on one side of which a seat had been placed by her father. It was so quiet there, and Mr. Mortlock liked to retire to this spot occasionally and smoke his pipe. Joan threw herself on the wooden form and leant against the hedge at the back; she closed her eyes and tried to imagine what life would be without Frank. In utter weariness she must have fallen asleep, for she was awakened by a touch. She opened her eyes and saw Frank Spencer trying to balance her hat neatly on her head without rousing her.

"Now, you should not have moved!" he observed reproachfully. "It fell off and you were exposed to the sun, so I was trying to put it on without disturbing you. You have spoilt the picture by jumping up in that fashion!"

He was looking at her with such evident admiration that the girl's face grew red at his heartlessness.

"How dare you come here?" she asked, trying hard to repress the tears of vexation. "You have no business here!"

"Oh, haven't I?" he said imperturbably. "I think I have. I've come on very serious business! I should like to know why you treated me so shabbily yesterday, when your father came up!"

"I treated you no worse than you deserved!" she retorted.

"Two blacks don't make a white," he returned, not in the least disturbed. "If I had treated you shabbily, which is not the case, it didn't right matters when you followed a bad example, or thought you were following it. Now I want to know why!"

"I shall not tell you!" she cried fiercely.

"You must!" he said, approaching her.

"I shall not!" cried Joan again. She tried to get away from him, but the seat was in the way; and, somehow, she did not care to remind him of what he had said. "Please leave me!"

"Not till you have told me that you love me as madly as I love you, Joan!" he said, all his assumed coolness gone.

She felt his arms grasping her; she struggled against his embrace, but she was helpless, and in a second he held her captive, his eyes gazing into hers, his lips close to hers.

"May I take a kiss to seal the compact?" he asked passionately.

She bent her head still further back, and, in desperation, gasped: "Wait till you see your sweetheart at home!"

He relaxed his grasp in sheer surprise, and she released herself, standing erect before him, defiant though in tears, and panting for breath. She was a perfect picture, and his amazement and annoyance melted away under the spell which her appearance cast over him.

"There is some blunder!" he said gravely. "It is very stupid of me to call her my sweetheart, but I never thought that it would lead to such a scene as this. Joan, surely you didn't think me such a rascal as to make love to two women at once?"

Joan grew more confused than ever, but Frank came to her relief.

"It was all my fault, Joan, of course. Sit down here with me, and I will explain. My widowed mother has been wanting me to marry for the last three years, but I have never felt the slightest inclination to fall in love with anyone. But the dear mother insisted every little while that she would like to see me settled with a good wife. I always laughed it off, and one day I told her, just to tease her, that I should always regard her as my sweetheart and should never want another. And I have kept up the fun ever since, calling her sweetheart so commonly that I say it unconsciously, much to the amusement of my friends.

She felt his arms grasping her. She struggled against his embrace, but she was helpless.

"So, Joan, you see that my sweetheart at home is my mother! And I can assure you, dear," he added tenderly, "that she will be most happy to resign the title and position in your favour."

He placed his arms round her once more, and Joan, all blushes and repentance, was yielding to his embrace, when a horrid thought crossed her mind.

"Oh, I cannot!" she moaned, burying her face in her hands. "What will they say? They will think me a designing creature and call me horrid names, and tell anybody that I didn't love you one scrap, and that I married you to carry out a boast, and——"

"Dear me! What dreadfully bad grammar you are using, to say 'and' so often," he interposed in a droll tone, "Better tell me all about it, because I am not going to lose you if I can help it."

Thereupon Joan unburdened herself, with half-averted face, and told him what had passed between Edith Graham and the mischief-loving girl that Joan Mortlock used to be.

"Oh, is that all?" he inquired, with a smile. "Well, we won't worry about that! I think we had better say that the result of the battle was a compromise, and that we will make the donation to the hospital jointly. It seems to me that such a proceeding will disarm all who might desire to say unkind things. So we will call it settled, and now, as we have cleared away all obstacles, I'm going to have that kiss!"

And he had it, followed by others, so that there should be no mistake about the binding character of the compact!

Geo. Day.

Digitized by Google

AN INTERRUPTION.

Telling Why a Girl Altered Her Mind.

THE many exciting and merry features of the long day that had just passed had tired the passengers of the s.s Imperial, and one by one they left the saloon to seek their bunks, to dream of the Old Country, whose shores they would be able to discern when they rose in the morning. In a short time the saloon was empty but for two.

A young woman, as fair a specimen of her sex as the most exacting critic could wish for, who was seated at the piano, situated at one end of the cosily-lounged, white-and-gold decorated room, playing a soft melody, and a man tanned with two years' wear of war, and exposure to a strong African sun, who was leaning over her, watching the deft fingers manipulating the keys.

The last few notes of the air sounded on the piano, and the player leant back on her stool, and looked up at the man with a smile. He did not say a word, but with a strange, tense look flashing across his face, suddenly bent his head, and kissed the red lips so near his own. For one moment of awful tension Alison Cartwright gazed at him with an expression of horrified amazement, and with a look in her eyes as if something had just been revealed to her that cut her heart in two.

Then of a sudden she leapt to her feet, and stood facing him with a countenance like marble, so still and stony was it.

"How did you dare, Mr. Carstairs?" she gasped with an effort. "You coward!"

The man's face went ashen, and he opened his mouth as if to speak, but a look in the girl's eyes kept the words from coming. His head slowly dropped to his breast, as if he acknowledged the truth of the epithet that no one of his own sex could have rightly bestowed upon him.

There was another dead silence for an instant, then the woman turned on her heel, and ascended the broad staircase leading to the berths, with not so much as a glance behind at her companion, who had thrown himself into a lounge, with hands covering his face.

He remained in this attitude of dejection, while the marble clock on the mantelpiece ticked away half-an-hour, when there came a loud shout of horror from above, followed by a crash that shook the liner from end to end. Rushing on deck Carstairs saw the great outline of another vessel just disappearing into the darkness.

A loud sucking noise below, and the smashed bulwarks on the Imperial's port side told a silent tale of what had happened. In the darkness some other vessel had collided with her, to what extent he knew not.

The truth was soon out, for with a calmness that did much to soothe the terrified passengers, the Captain gave orders for the boats to be manned. Quickly they were released from their thwarts and lowered to the water level, and the passengers took their seats.

Dick Carstairs was about to get into one of the boats, when a thought entered his mind that seemed to run through his veins like molten lead. "Where was Alison Cartwright?" She had not entered the boats; he could swear to that. She must still be below!

Caring nothing for the risk he was running, he rushed along the deck, and down the stairs. At the bottom he stumbled over some prostrate form, which was lying full length at his feet. It was the girl, and to all appearances she had fainted.

Gathering her up in his strong arms Carstairs tore up the stairs again, and along the deck, but except for that terrible sucking noise there was no sound, and Carstairs' heart almost stopped beating as he realised that they were alone on a sinking ship.

For a moment the terrible fact robbed him of his senses, but the noise beneath the deck was becoming more threatening every minute, and some quick action was imperative. The words of one of the A.B.'s that had been addressed to him only that morning occurred to him at this juncture. "Yes, sir," the man had said, "them there seats 'ull float like a cork, but they 'll only 'old one of your size."

He had been speaking of the seats on deck which were built on the pontoon principle, and would act as a life-saver in a case of extreme emergency.

There was one thing to do, and Carstairs did it. Laying the senseless form of the girl upon one of the seats, he lowered it gently into the water, then plunged in beside it. Guiding it with his two hands, he kicked out strongly with his feet, and gradually pushed the miniature raft away from the doomed vessel. They had drifted fifty yards when a deafening hissing report came from behind, and a violent commotion of the waves announced the fact that the s.s. Imperial was no more.

"Poor old girl," murmured the swimmer. "Her death was a sudden one, but it looks as if two of her passengers were going to make up for it in the matter of time."

This view of the matter was grim, but only too near the truth, for the wind had risen suddenly, and the waves were beginning to get more choppy and more boisterous with every rise and fall, and though Carstairs tried hard to steady "the raft," as he inwardly termed the floating seat, the waters were too strong for him, and it began to rock in an alarming manner.

The see-saw motion and the occasional lapping of spray over her face restored consciousness to the feminine passenger; a low shuddering sigh shook her form, and Carstairs heard her whisper freely: "Oh! how could he? And I thought him such a gentleman,"

Though his tan deepened somewhat, Dick took no heed of the reproach, but placed his wet hand on her forehead. The cold touch roused her thoroughly, and she turned her head towards him, and opened her eyes.

"Mr. Carstairs! Oh, where are we?" she asked fearfully.

"Don't be frightened, Miss Cartwright," he said, in as soothing a tone as possible. "The Imperial collided with another boat and sank in ten minutes."

"But the other passengers?" she asked quickly. "My uncle and aunt. Where are they? For pity's sake do not say that they are drowned."

"Don't distress yourself, Miss Cartwright, they are not dead," Dick answered cheerfully. "All the rest of the ship got away safely in the boats, but I——"

He paused, puzzled for the minute to describe the incident correctly, and over the girl's face flashed a quick look of understanding."

"You came back for me," she whispered, in a hushed tone.

Carstairs saw a glistening drop in each of her eyes, and the sight paralysed his tongue, so he said nothing.

The moon was rising now, and in her pale light, Dick looked about him. But on every hand there was sea, sea, nothing but sea, and a lump came into his throat at the sight. Not for his own safety, he had risked that many a time in the land he had been coming from—was not his name embellished with those coveted symbols, V.C.?—but for the safety of the girl on the feeble raft, that was floating beside him.

He said a few gentle words of hope to her, and besought her to get some sleep, but she refused even to try, and wanted to insist upon him having a rest on the fragile seat, while she swam beside it for a distance, a suggestion which he laughed at.

Digitized by Google

Slowly the long night wore on, while the waves grew higher every minute, and Dick found it more difficult to keep his frozen fingers on the arm of the seat as time went on. Now and again the misery of this endless bath in the cold ocean prompted the thought within him to let go and sink quietly into the waves and end it all, but the woman seemed to divine his intention. Whenever it rose in his mind a look from her beautiful eyes would banish the thought. One of these looks seemed to Carstairs to hold more than a reproach, and his eyes brightened as he swam nearer to her side.

"Miss Cartwright," he said quietly, and though he tried hard, his voice would shake slightly. "Have you forgiven me for the insult I offered you last night?"

The answer came softly to his ear above the hiss of the waves.

"Yes, Mr. Carstairs, freely."

"It was a coward's trick," he said hoarsely, "but something made me do it—Miss Cartwright—Alison—if—I—we live through this, will you be——"

In his excitement he had loosened his grip somewhat, and with a roaring gurgle a giant wave seized him. He struggled hard to free himself from its grasp, but the long hours that he had been submerged, and the power of the wave, crushed the remains of his strength, and the last glimpse the girl on the raft had of him showed his face white and despairing under the moonlight, yet with a look of great hope in his eyes.

* * * * *

"Good Heavens! Surely it can't be! By Jove, it is though! Carstairs, old man, where the dickens have you sprung from? Why, do you know that all England has been mourning you as dead? Poor old chap, how bad you look!"

Dick Carstairs, with no tan on his face now, but with an alabaster colour in its place, smiled feebly at the speaker's remarks, especially as they had been uttered in a tone that the whole thoroughfare could hear distinctly.

"I don't expect that I look the picture of health now, Deering," he answered, as brightly as his feelings would allow. "You see, I've been ill for the last six months."

John Deering looked sympathetic, and his jolly face grew longer than it had been for many a month. Suddenly it relapsed again to its usual joviality, and he gave Carstairs a thump on the back that reminded that individual of the collision on the Imperial.

"I know just the thing to pick you up again, old man!" he roared excitedly. "Come down to 'The Denes' with me. You know the mater will be delighted to see you, and our Bedfordshire air will brace you up again in a twinkle. Now don't say 'No.'"

Deering spoke the last sentence in a most piteous tone, and Carstairs felt he could but do as his friend asked, moreover, he had experienced some of the hospitality of the Deerings before, and he knew none to excel it.

A couple of hours later and he was chatting to a beautiful, silver-haired old lady in the drawing-room of her home. Deering's mother had greeted him in so excited a manner as to puzzle Carstairs. To his mind it seemed as though she had some mysterious delight in knowing that he was not dead.

She would not allow him to be carried off to dress, but banished her son alone to the dressing-room with the plea that she had something for her guest's private ear. When the door had closed the old lady seized Dick by the arm, and leading him to the conservatory, thrust him inside with a chuckle of glee.

Carstairs, with a feeling of bewilderment, looked around him, and the sight of a figure in a basket-chair beneath a huge palm set his pulses throbbing heavily. At the sound of the door closing the figure looked up, then sprang to her feet with a gasp.

"Mr. Carstairs—is—it—you?"

The conservatory was dark, and Dick could only see the outline of a slim figure dressed entirely in black, but he knew the voice. He had last heard it half a year ago, when he and its owner had been together on the bosom of the waves of Biscay.

"Miss Cartwright! Oh, thank Heaven for its mercies!" he said fervently.

Then, striding across the floor towards her, he looked into her face as if to satisfy himself that he was making no mistake. The girl returned his gaze, her eyes were shining with a deep thankfulness.

"I never thought to see you again, Mr. Carstairs," she said softly. "Will you tell me how you escaped?"

He bade her sit down again in her chair, and drew up another beside it.

"It is not a very long story," he answered, "but how I am alive now is beyond explanation. That brute of a wave seemed to knock all the strength out of me, and all my efforts to get back to you were unavailing. Yet somehow or other I managed to keep afloat as long as I can remember. But I must have lost consciousness, for I woke again to find myself in a pretty little bed in a house on the French coast, as I learnt afterwards. I had just time to see two people beside the bed and to hear a joyful exclamation in French, when darkness came again.

"I was ill for weeks, good old Madame Pautier and her husband told me later, and when I recovered my memory had gone. These good people kept me there for six months, until everything came back to me suddenly two days ago. They said that I had been found insensible on the beach, but of you they had seen or heard nothing.

"I thanked the good peasants for their great kindness, and got back to England as fast as boat and train could bring me, and John was the first friend that I met. That is all the story, but it is a miracle that I am still alive. Can I hear yours, for since I recovered my memory, I have been half mad to know whether you were alive or dead."

The girl nodded consent.

"When you disappeared," she said gently. "I felt inclined to drop into the sea and stop there, but the hope that you would still live kept me on that dear raft until daylight came, and a homeward bound liner sighted me and picked me up. When it reached port I made inquiries everywhere about you, for I owe you my life, but no one came forward with anything to tell, and after a time I had to think that you were d—dead."

A quiver seemed to run through her frame, and insensibly she touched her black dress. Carstairs felt his heart leap within him, and he bent forward and took one of her hands.

"And you wore black because you thought I was dead?" he asked hoarsely.

She did not answer him, and Dick rose from his chair and knelt beside her.

"Do you know what question I was going to ask you, Alison, when that wave separated us?" he asked in a whisper.

A swift flush crossed the girl's face, and she lowered her eyes before the expression in his.

"I—I think so," she murmured weakly.

"And if I were to ask you that question again, darling, would you give me the answer I long for?"

Her lips scarcely moved, yet a word came to Carstair's ears that for all its weakness of sound, meant more to him than aught else in the world. It was "Yes."

Arthur Edwards.

To Story Writers.

We shall be pleased to consider complete novelettes of about 20,000 words in length, and to pay cash down for those accepted. Manuscripts must be type-written (or very legibly hand-written), and should be sent to The Editor, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Postage for return of MSS., if unsuitable, should be inclosed.

Digitized by Google

UNSOLVED LOVE PROBLEMS.

No. I.

THE AWKWARD PREDICAMENT OF EDWARD CLEMENTS.

(A Prize of One Guinea is Offered for the Best Way Out of the Difficulty. See "Your Editor Chats.")

It was a prematurely warm day in February, and pretty Kitty Treloar, full of the insolence of youth that takes life, sunshine and flowers as its right, came along a field-path leading away from the newly "exploited" suburb of South Dealing.

She could hardly keep her feet from dancing, and her voice from singing, so full of joy did the spring fill her.

"Come on Rover, now for a race."

And away they flew, the one as joyous as the other. But with a sudden recollection she stopped and, straightening her hat, said:

"I hope that ridiculous Ted Clements is not waiting at the next stile."

Sure enough at the next stile, there was a young man, to no outward appearance ridiculous except in so far as he was young enough to blush immoderately at the advent of a charming, mischievious girl.

"Why, Mr. Clements! How you startled me! It is curious I should meet you on this lonely walk."

Ted would have liked to reply that since he knew it to be her favourite walk, he had met her there, on an average, three times a week, but he had not the courage, so only stammered something about its being "the only real country walk about there."

"Do you love the country also?" she said. "It is very beautiful to-day, and I, and the birds, and Rover, are all enjoying it. Hark!" she continued, well content to make the conversation and let him admire her—"hear how they sing, and see how the primroses are all coming out, for all the world as if we should not be hiding our blue noses in furs next week, and seeing everything black and shrivelled with the frost."

Her laughing face confuted the pessimism of her words, and Ted, casting about in his mind for suitable words with which to introduce the avowal that had been trembling on his lips for weeks, began (how many proposals have been ushered in by these lines?):

"In the Spring a brighter iris gleams upon the burnished dove,
In the Spring——"

But Kitty interrupted:

"Just so."

"In the Spring a young man's fancy, lightly turns to thoughts of love."

"The secret of happiness is, take everything lightly, whether 'tis measles or love."

Ted's sentimentalism vanished, as she meant it should, but a righteous wrath arose in him at her sacrilegious words.

"Miss Treloar, are you never serious? Do you not believe a man's destiny is to love, to find the only true happiness in giving his whole heart unreservedly and for ever to some beautiful and noble woman?"

For all answer she sang mockingly:

"Oh, love for a year, a week, or a day,
But alas for the love that loves alway."

"At least it would be 'alas,' if anybody ever did it, except in poetry and novels. It doesn't work in with present-day life."

Ted was boyish enough to feel exceedingly annoyed at her teasing words, which he took as a personal insult, feeling sure that "he loved as never man loved before," and so, being annoyed, he forgot to be shy and spoke out like a man.

"Miss Treloar, I love you, with all my heart; and as I love you now, so I shall to the end of my life."

Somewhat abashed at his earnestness, Kitty stammered a little, though she replied saucily:

"That's a bit rash—you have not got to the end of your life yet."

"Oh, you may mock at me if you please," he cried, reckless in his wrath, "you don't know the strength and unchangeableness of a man's love, but I think you might give a man of my age credit for knowing his own mind."

Ted was young, but Kitty was younger, and she could not help admiring him in this mood more than in his former bashful stammering attitude toward her, so nineteen murmured softly to twenty-one:

"I did not mean to hurt your feelings—I—I beg your pardon."

Her unwonted humility brought him tumbling down off his high horse, he turned suddenly and seized her hands, saying in a trembling voice:

"Kitty, Kitty, do not beg my pardon, it is I who beg your pardon, and your love. You are the most beautiful and charming girl in the world, and I do love you so much. Can you not love me a little bit? Oh, Kitty, darling, say yes," and in his eagerness he tried to draw her to him.

For a moment it seemed as though she might yield, but she recovered herself and said:

"I can't say yes, because I—I don't love you."

"But you will?" he interposed eagerly.

"No, I sha'n't," she replied, shaking her head obstinately.

"You might wait a bit and try," he urged, hope dying out of his eyes. "Lots of girls don't love fellows at first."

Kitty, now quite mistress of herself and keeping him at arm's length, had quickly made up her mind.

"I don't think I should," she said dispassionately, "and I am not going to try. I don't want to love anybody yet, I want to enjoy myself a bit longer."

An older man who knew the world would have seen an unconscious pathos in these words, Ted (with whom she had flirted for some months) saw only selfishness.

"Enjoy yourself!" he cried, and then lashing himself into a fury, as she smiled and nodded, he went on, "Yes, go on enjoying yourself, go on leading more foolish men to love you, and then laugh in their faces; go on exacting admiration and attention from all and giving nothing in return; go on enjoying yourself, and let me go hang!" and he turned quickly and walked off in the opposite direction.

The words were bitter, but he had some cause to feel bitter as even Kitty herself acknowledged as she gazed after him with tears in her pretty eyes.

"Poor fellow, he was very rude, but he seems to feel it more than I thought he would."

A week later she heard he had gone to join a brother on a banana plantation in Jamaica, and the feeling grew gradually upon her that life was very blank now that he was gone.

Digitized by Google

and she wished he had been in less of a hurry to put the ocean between them.

A year passed, eighteen months passed, and Ted Clements taller, broader, and manlier, but thinner, and more tanned, was seated in his brother's cool verandah, smoking and reading home letters.

One, from his sister, contained the following words:

"By-the-bye, your old love, Kitty Treloar, has been quite ill. She has had at last to go away to some foreign cure place, but has come back looking rather worse than better. Mrs. Treloar, who is completely wrapped up in her, seems very upset about it."

He let fall the paper.

"Kitty ill! It does not seem possible. That bright, merry little girl!"

All his resentment against her had died out with his love, and that was no more than a tender recollection at the end of a year. For some months he had thought life held nothing more for him, that his heart was broken, and that all women were frivolous, light-minded creatures, not worth an honest man's love. But change of life and scene and plenty of work worked wonders. First he found comfort in work, then beauty in the world, then joy in living, and lastly a certain Miss Elsie Braithwaite had caused him to doubt the truth of his heresies about women.

Now, therefore, he thought condescendingly:

"Poor little Kitty! Well, I was very angry with her once, but I am not sure now that she did not do me a good turn after all. She was quite right, she was too young, and so was I. Ridiculous! What do nineteen and twenty-one know about life? Now, it is different with twenty-two and nearly twenty-three. Those are ages when one is really competent to choose one's life partner," and he went off into a not unpleasant reverie.

At last he roused himself.

"Hullo, here's a strange handwriting, but with the old postmark, South Dealing. Who can it be from?"

He opened the letter and glanced at the signature, "S. M. Treloar—Kitty's mother, by all that's wonderful! What can she be writing to me about, and he read as follows:

"DEAR MR. CLEMENTS,—I fear I am going to do something very unusual, but I feel I can dare anything for my daughter's happiness—it may be her life. Still, before I go any further I must beg you to believe that I am writing this letter quite unknown to her. To continue, I hope you will excuse my saying that I am aware that my daughter refused you last year, and I must add that I did not think she treated you well in the matter, as we had all thought she intended to accept you, and no doubt you thought so also. Surely one can forgive such a mere child for not knowing her own mind. Ever since you went away so suddenly, she has drooped and pined—nothing does her any good. The doctor says she has something on her mind, and unless we can remove the trouble he is afraid the consequences may be most serious. I think I am justified in saying she would give you a very different answer now, if you were to ask her again. Oh! Mr. Clements, to one of your constant nature, I feel I need not apologise for writing what will bring about your happiness as well as hers.

"If it is impossible for you to come over at once, perhaps you would write to her, or to her distracted mother,

"S. M. TRELOAR."

"Here's a go," said Ted, staring moodily out into the brilliant sunshine beyond. "Ask her again—but I have no desire to—and then there is Elsie Braithwaite. Hang it all, I can't. My constant nature—and it's not more than a year ago. The old lady seems so sure I shall still feel the same and no doubt Kitty does too. When I remember what I said to her I feel an awful cad to have changed so soon. 'Pon my word I'm in a beastly hole which ever way I look at it. If I say I still love her and want to marry her, I shall be telling a lie, and if I refuse to do so, I shall be acting like a cad. Good Heavens! What is a fellow to do?"

L. Hughes.

Your Editor Chats.

"THE PURSUIT OF SARA" is causing a great deal of excitement. The very novelty of the revelations has appealed to thousands of people, and especially is this the case in those towns directly connected with her flight. All will admit, too, that Miss Gillespie is gifted with the power of describing her experiences graphically, and this is, of course, another important factor in the great popularity of the series.

She herself is highly delighted that her narrations are so entertaining, but when she called to see me in my sanctum the other day, she mildly rebuked me on the ground that I had flattered her in this column by calling her a heroine. Such is modesty!

THIS is just a reminder to readers in Leicester and district, in which locality the episode told in this number takes place, that a splendid Gramophone and twelve charming gold-plated pencil-cases are offered them as prizes in a simple competition.

I have had printed some very pretty leaflets, on one side of which is a reproduction in colours of this cover, advertising "The Pursuit of Sara."

Now what I want Leicester readers to do is this. Write me a post-card, addressed to "The Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, W.C.," with "Leaflets" marked in the top left-hand corner, asking me to send you a small supply of this advertising material. Then you must, in the most ingenious manner you can think of, distribute these to the best advantage. It does not matter how you get rid of them as long as the way is helpful to the cause.

When you have distributed your leaflets, write to me and explain your method of doing so. No replies must come later than first post Wednesday morning, November 11th.

I WILL then decide, and, of course, my decision is final, which reader's attempt has been most beneficial to the paper. To the best one I will award the Gramophone, and to each of the twelve next a gold-plated pencil-case. I should advise you to apply for the leaflets early.

ON the opposite page appears an Unsolved Love Problem, the first of a series.

I am offering a prize of one guinea to the reader who sends me, not later than Friday, the 13th inst., what I consider the best way for Edward Clements to get out of his dilemma. The solution should be written in about one hundred words.

State as clearly as possible why you believe your solution is the right and honourable thing for him to do, and back up your statement by good, lucid arguments. Replies must be written on one side of the paper only.

Mark your envelopes "Love Problem" in the top left-hand corner, and address them to "The Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C."

Do not forget that the last possible day on which I can receive replies to Problem No. 1 is Friday, the 13th of this month. All arriving after that date will be disqualified.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

POWERFUL NEW ROMANCE. START TO-DAY.

A CRIMINAL MILLIONAIRE

By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," "Olga Romanoff," "The Lake of Gold," etc., etc.

INTRODUCTION.

CAPTAIN PERCY IDDISON and Lady Maud Hyam, his fiancée, are present at an "At Home!" given by Lady Medcalf-Mears.

There they meet Isolo Staunton, the lion of the hour, a multi-millionaire, and styled "the modern Monte Christo." The curious feature about him is that, although he is admitted to the very cream of society, nobody knows his past nor how he accumulated his vast wealth.

Wilfrid Ellerton, a fine young fellow, a worthy son of a worthy father, is also there, and is introduced to Iddison.

The latter notices a remarkable streak of white hair on the other's head, running from the front of the left ear down to the base of the skull.

Isolo Staunton also sees this, but it causes him a great deal more anxiety than it does Iddison.

He knows the cause of that streak! He knows why that white hair is present on the head of one so young! He remembers how, when he was Isolo Zuarez, an escaped convict from the Chincha Islands, he was adrift on the ocean in a small boat, together with a man and a boy.

The sun was blazing hot, and there were scarcely any provisions left.

The other man was half dead, and Staunton remembers how he intended to kill him outright so that he should give no further trouble, when the boy hotly intervened.

"Put down that axe," he had cried; "it's murder!" He had lifted the axe and the boy had jumped at him. In doing so he had slipped and the weapon fell on his head!

Both Isolo Staunton and Wilfrid Ellerton were rescued from their peril—but the blow the boy received had rendered him unconscious of all that had happened.

He had never since remembered.

The question that worries the criminal millionaire as he leaves Lady Medcalf-Mears' house is this—would his memory return?

If it should—what a grim irony of Fate it would be.

Staunton's blood is Spanish, his father has been President of Peru, and the ideal for the accomplishment of which he is amassing his many millions is to see Spain reinstated again as Queen of the Seas and Mistress of the East and West!

And now his ideal, his freedom, perhaps his very life hangs on the memory of a mere lad of twenty-three!

If Ellerton remembers the episode on the ocean it will mean, at least, a return to the Chinchas as a convict!

Staunton goes to his magnificent yacht, the Isola, lying alongside the Ocean Quay, Southampton, to talk the matter over with his right-hand friend and confidant, Don Ramiero Valdez y Valdivia.

The latter was another blue-blooded Spaniard, and he was the only person living to whom Isolo Staunton had told the story of his life.

The millionaire tells Valdez of this awkward coincidence of his meeting Ellerton again, and asks his advice.

Valdez strongly urges Staunton to go to extremes to get Wilfrid out of the way, but Isolo is not willing to compass the boy's death.

Then Don Ramiero advises the millionaire to invite to the yacht a Society party, for a trip to Norway. Ellerton is to be one of the guests, and during the cruise steps are to be taken for his removal.

To this plan Staunton agrees and the invitations are sent out.

Mercedes, the beautiful, fascinating daughter of the millionaire, is to do the duties of hostess, and among the guests are Captain Percy Iddison and Lady Maud Hyam.

When Mercedes and Ellerton meet, the former recognises the latter as the boy who rescued her from death once, many years ago in Chili.

"Do you remember," says Mercedes, "that afternoon when the Chilenos sacked and burnt Chorillos—when the warships were firing from the sea and the shells were bursting among the houses, blowing their walls out as though a volcano had broken out under them as it did once at Arequipa, and how a scream came through the air, and you, yes, I am sure it was you, caught a little girl—that was I—round the waist and jumped off the pier into the water with her and swam back to the beach—and how we found afterwards that the shell had smashed everything into ruins and killed everyone.

"They told me afterwards what a dreadful ruin it was. But surely you remember, don't you?"

"Remember, of course I do. As if anyone could forget a thing like that. Yes, I can see every detail of it now. I remember the dull, hoarse bang of the gun and the scream of the shells in the air—and you, were you really the little girl that I got hold of and jumped into the sea with because I thought it was going to kill us?"

"Us. I don't think, Mr. Ellerton, that you were thinking very much about us——"

The two are drawn together by the bonds of love, and many are the glances that pass between them.

If Staunton had only seen one of these, the crime which had already been decided upon would never have been committed, and many things which came to pass in consequence of it would never have happened.

Digitized by Google

SIXTH CHAPTER.

Soul to Soul.

THE rest of the day passed just as pleasantly as one would expect a day to pass, afloat on a summer sea on board what was, perhaps, the most luxurious craft in existence. But there was no chance of a renewal of even that unspoken intercourse which had been so strangely and unexpectedly established between Mercedes and Wilfrid Ellerton. Still less was it possible that their lips should translate into words what their souls had already said to each other through their eyes.

To begin with, the little incident that had taken place before breakfast had a very natural and decided effect on Mercedes Her instinct told her that Lady Maud had divined the secret which so far she had scarcely dared even to confess to her own consciousness, and the knowledge of this discovery had at once set her maidenly pride in arms. She felt that she had allowed the dearest secret that a woman can have, to become known even before she was quite certain that she had the right to possess such a secret at all; and therefore when, soon after breakfast, Lady Maud laughingly asked her whether she might congratulate her, she somewhat unexpectedly cut her short with a quick little gesture of frankly girlish petulance, and said, almost coldly:

"There is nothing that I know of, Lady Maud, that you or any other can congratulate me upon except, perhaps, upon the fact that I happen to be the daughter of the kindest and most generous of fathers, and that—well, in short, that I have the happiness of being Mercedes Staunton and the pleasure of being your hostess."

There was no possibility of mistaking either the tone or the meaning of the words, spoken as they were with that indescribable dignity that perhaps only Spanish blood can give to speech. Lady Maud at once saw that she had made the grave mistake of treading on what was evidently, for the present at least, forbidden ground, and so, being a young woman of more than ordinary common-sense and social experience, she begged pardon very prettily and in a quite non-committal way, and there the subject dropped.

Naturally the effect of her ill-timed remark was to produce exactly the opposite result to that which she would have wished for. When Mercedes met Ellerton about half-an-hour later she received him with an almost chilling reserve which astonished him almost as much as it hurt him, and so the words which he was so eager to speak remained unspoken, and once more a few trivial words carelessly uttered became, as it were, wheels in that vast machine which so remorselessly spins and weaves the web of human destiny.

It was again the Honourable Percy Iddison who, quite innocently and with the best of intentions, constituted himself the instrument of the Fates by getting up sports after the manner of passengers on ocean liners; and these, on the suggestion of Don Ramiero Valdez, were followed by a concert and dance in the evening, and so, during all that fateful day there came no opportunity for that little explanation whose results might have been so momentous.

But Lady Maud, still true to her conviction in spite of her hostess' almost studied avoidance of Ellerton, had made up her mind to undo, should that be in her power, the somewhat grave error which she now felt more than ever guilty of, and to this end, in the interval between the concert and the dance, she enlisted the by no means disinterested services of an almost equally responsible offender.

"I am perfectly certain, Percy," she said, in a low but nevertheless quite impressive tone as they were leaning over the after-rail, "that this is a clear case of love at first sight, which it is the bounden duty of people in our position to do our utmost to bring to its only proper conclusion, especially as I have an idea that both of us have already done something, quite unconsciously, to hinder, or at any rate to divert the course of true love—I, by a very foolishly premature remark I made this morning on the subject of congratulations, and you by making everybody so busy over these precious sports that the necessary tête-à-têtes were quite out of the question."

"All right, Maud. What do you want me to do?"

"Oh, it's only quite a trifle, but I want you to be careful, because its consequences may be very important, and, if the action of the little comedy isn't timed exactly, the plot may fail altogether. That sounds a little mixed, but of course you see what I mean."

"So far, yes," replied the other unconvincingly, "and now suppose the sweetest of conspirators reveals her plot to her most devoted accomplice."

"Don't be silly, Percy, it doesn't suit you," said Lady Maud in a superior tone, but at the same time slipping her hand through the arm that was resting on the rail. "You are never such a hopeless failure as when you are trying to make pretty speeches. Please don't forget that you would never have got through a certain proposal if I hadn't been shameless enough to help you."

In an instant he was seized by powerful hands, a rug was thrown over his head, and he was flung to the floor.

Digitized by Google

"It's very simple, dear, but it must be done carefully, and we mustn't raise any suspicions. When the dance is over I am going to inveigle Mercedes up on deck for a breath of sea air. You must watch us and manage to get Mr. Ellerton on the same part of the deck a few moments later."

The Honourable Percy entered heart and soul into the plot, and although the veriest novice at any sort of intrigue which could not be carried out on a battlefield, played his part so well and with such apparent unconsciousness that even Mercedes herself did not suspect anything till Ellerton, who had managed to direct their stroll to the same part of the deck, now happily vacant, on which their unspoken declaration had been so strangely made, stopped and said with such sudden seriousness that it took her completely by surprise, and for the moment compelled her attention:

"Mercedes, you remember what our hearts—our souls, I hope—said to each other here last night?"

The glow of an electric light just above them showed the flush that sprang into her cheeks and the flash in her eyes as she turned them swiftly up to his. She took a step aside to the rail, half turned and faced him, and began in a voice which she vainly tried to keep steady:

"Mr. Ellerton, have I ever given you the right——"

"That is exactly what I have felt myself in honour bound to ask you," he interrupted in a tone as low as hers, yet vibrating with such an intensity of passion that its force instantly swept away the little artificial barriers which Lady Maud had so unwittingly raised for the moment between them. "Unless my love, or, perhaps my presumption, had completely blinded me, your eyes said so last night, and surely they would tell the truth?"

"They did," she whispered, moving towards him ever so little. "Yes, they did, and why should my lips deny it? It was only something that Lady Maud said this morning that, well, vexed me because I thought she had found out, and so——"

"Oh, don't bother about explanations now," he interrupted again, speaking very gently and once more laying his hand on hers as she rested it on the rail. "No doubt you were quite right, though it hurt me a bit; still it was worth a thousand times that to hear you say those two words and to know—what I think I know now. Confound those lights," he added, with sudden inconsequence.

"Why, what is wrong with them?" she asked innocently.

"I want either solitude or Egyptian darkness for about five minutes," he whispered, closing his hand over hers again. "Surely you know why. Heavens! how lovely you are, my beautiful Mercedes!"

"Am I? Then I am glad of it—for your sake," she murmured, her warm Spanish blood flowing swiftly up from neck to brow. She leant back against the rail and laughed softly:

"And so that is why you want the solitude or the Egyptian darkness? What a very unconventional wooing, though! Of course you did begin years ago in the strictly conventional way by gallantly saving my life?"

"Here comes Papa along the deck with Don Ramiero. You won't say anything about it to-night, will you, Wilfrid? There's plenty of time. Let us keep our secret to ourselves for just a little. You know it's a luxury that I, at least, haven't enjoyed before."

"Of course—darling! Is not your wish law now? But if I don't get a kiss soon I shall——"

"No you won't, whatever it is. You have made me feel quite shamefully forward enough for the present. Now please talk about something sensible."

They sauntered on towards Staunton and Valdez, who were puffing slowly at their cigars and talking in low-toned Spanish. It may have been that the Spaniard's keen eyes saw something that escaped his master's as Mercedes and Ellerton strolled past them, chatting about odds and ends of happenings at Cowes. Possibly he did, for he there and then resolved that what had been decided on as to Ellerton's departure to the under-world, should be accomplished without further delay.

The new-made lovers continued their stroll—changing the subject of their conversation the moment they got out of earshot of the other promenaders—until four clear double-strokes on the bell under the navigating-bridge warned them that it was midnight.

"Heavens! Is it as late as that?" exclaimed Mercedes. "I must go below at once or papa will be coming to look for me. Come—Wilfrid, I really must. Why, we nearly have the deck to ourselves."

So they had, at least the after part of it behind the "Council Chamber," and Ellerton was not slow to grasp the possibilities of the situation.

He stopped and the next instant she felt his arm stealing round her waist. For a moment she recoiled, for it was the first time she had felt a man's caress save her father's. Then she remembered that she had already spoken her surrender, and so she yielded.

"Then we will say 'Good night' here," he said, in a whisper as he drew her close to him. "Good night, Mercedes—my darling!"

"Good night—dear!"

She looked up at him, her eyes shining in the moonbeams and her face transfigured in the clear white light, and then their lips met in that eloquent silence in which alone soul speaks to soul.

SEVENTH CHAPTER.

Imprisoned Below!

When Wilfrid Ellerton had said good-night to Mercedes at the entrance to the saloon, he took a long cigar out of his case, lit it, and strolled away aft again to think as quietly as his thrilling pulses would let him about this new-found glory of happiness which had so swiftly and unexpectedly shone into his life, and to wonder dimly what he had done to deserve it.

He had always looked upon himself with perfect modesty as a quite ordinary young man to whom the kindly Fates had given it to be born the son of a millionaire, and therefore with far brighter prospects in life than the son of a poor man would have had. For all he had known so far, his friends and acquaintances had just about the same opinion of him, and yet here without, so far as he could see, the slightest merit or desert on his part, the first love of such a girl as Mercedes Staunton had been suddenly, almost without warning, bestowed upon him.

He had perfect health, unsullied youth, an education which was by no means covered by his brilliant school and University career, and the crowning advantage of his father's name and vast wealth; and yet, such was his worship for his strangely-found love that, even with all this in his favour, he looked out into the future with a diffidence which he had never experienced before.

"Good evening, or, I suppose it would be more appropriate to say 'Good morning,' Mr. Ellerton," said a low, softly-modulated voice at his elbow as he was leaning on the after-rail, looking out over the glittering sea-path towards the rising moon and dreaming of unutterable happiness. "A very lovely scene, is it not? And yet those who do not know say that there is no beauty to be found in these northern latitudes of yours."

Digitized by Google

A swift whiff of smoke from a very excellent cigar accompanied the words. He turned with a feeling of almost fierce resentment at the interruption of his delicious reverie, and saw Don Ramiero standing beside him.

"Oh, yes, very pretty indeed," he replied, not very graciously; "but for all that I was just thinking that it's about time to turn in."

"Then, in that case, I trust that you will be inclined to defer your thoughts for a few minutes," replied the Spaniard pleasantly, "for, truth to tell, I have just come from our host, who is at this moment with the Captain on the bridge, to ask if you will do him the pleasure of joining him in just one more liqueur or a brandy and soda and a cigar in his own private sanctum here, which I do not think you have yet visited. If you will come with me he will join us in a minute or two."

Under other circumstances Ellerton would have been inclined to make a polite excuse on account of the lateness of the hour, but in view of the interview which he intended to have at no very distant date with his host, that was, of course, quite out of the question, and so he tossed his half-smoked cigar into the sea and said with very real pleasure:

"Thanks, that is exceedingly kind of him. I shall be delighted. After all, one need not be very particular about hours on such a delightful cruise as this. I was only wondering this evening what this place was," he went on, looking at the structure under whose shelter Mercedes had given him his first kiss.

"It is the one apartment in the yacht that our host reserves for his own use," replied Don Ramiero, as he led the way to the door, looking the while keenly about the now deserted decks, "and I can assure you, Mr. Ellerton, that it is not all of his guests who are invited to share his privacy in it."

"Then, of course this is an honour which I shall most highly appreciate," laughed Ellerton.

"The Señor, as we of his intimates call him among ourselves," murmured Don Ramiero, as he opened the double doors by means of the lever handle and an invisible spring, "no doubt has the best of reasons. He is not a man who makes mistakes in the choice of his friends. Will you do me the honour of going in first? The doors are a little difficult to manage."

"Thanks," said Ellerton, as he stepped over the high combing or threshold which is intended to keep the water out of deck cabins in heavy weather.

Just as he raised his foot from the outside deck the Spaniard gave him a sudden thrust forward between the shoulders. He lost his balance and stumbled with an exclamation of angry surprise into the dimly lighted apartment. In an instant he was seized by two powerful hands on each side, a rug was thrown over his head, and he was flung to the floor.

He struggled and tried to shout, but as his assailants forced him over on to his back, the rug, where it covered his face, was drenched with a pungently sweet-smelling liquid. As it soaked through he gasped once or twice for breath, gave one more desperate struggle to free himself, and then his limbs grew heavy, all the blood in his body seemed to rush to his head for a moment and flow back again as quickly; his breathing grew longer and quieter in spite of his will. Then came a swiftly fleeting dream of Mercedes and her melting eyes and trembling lips—and then darkness and oblivion.

A few moments later Don Ramiero's high tenor voice sounded shrilly along the deserted deck, shouting:

"Man overboard! Man overboard! Help! get the boats out! Stop the ship! For God's sake, stop the ship! Mr. Ellerton has fallen overboard!"

Almost instantly his words were echoed, not as an appeal, but as an authoritative command by Isolo Staunton, who had flung the door of the Captain's room under the bridge open and rushed out on deck.

"The bridge, there!" he shouted. "Dead slow—stop! Mr. Marshall, have the hands on deck and get the boats out at once. Great Heavens, how can that have happened? Valdez, come here and tell me about it. Steady, there, men. Not too much noise. We don't want to alarm the ladies. You can pick him up before they know anything about it if you're smart. A hundred pounds to the man who gets hold of him first. Handy now, with those boats!"

While he was speaking the telegraph had tinkled imperatively in the engine-room, and a swift shudder ran through the beautiful fabric of the yacht as the propellers slowed and stopped, and her twenty knots were reduced to ten, and five, and two, and nothing, until she began to drift slowly astern.

Meanwhile the soft "pad, pad" of many naked feet

She laid her hands on her father's shoulders, and looking him full in the eyes, said: "Is that true, father? Is he really—dead?"

Digitized by Google

sounded along both sides of the deck, orders were given in low, clear tones; the davits swung outwards, the crews climbed like so many cats into the boats, the falls whistled through the blocks, and they fell almost simultaneously into the water. The tackles were unhooked, and away the four boats sped astern on their eager search for what they would never find.

By this time Don Ramiero was telling Staunton, the Captain, and the First Officer in agitated tones how Mr. Ellerton, leaning too far over the stern-rail to watch the smooth action of the turbine propellers, had overbalanced himself just at the moment that the yacht gave a little pitch aft, and, before he could put out a hand to save him, had disappeared into the foaming wake that the flying yacht was leaving behind her. Then he had shouted for help—to stop the vessel—and that was all. Everything had happened with such appalling suddenness that he was still half-stunned and could hardly realise the calamity.

The recital was a perfect piece of acting, and Isolo Staunton never thought Ramiero Valdez a more valuable ally or a more accomplished scoundrel than he did while he was making it.

The sudden slowing-down and stopping of the yacht had, of course, aroused the guests on board who were going or had already gone to their berths, and a few of the men and one or two ladies who had not yet retired came up on deck to ask what was the matter. But, for quite essential reasons, discipline was as strict on the Isola as it was on board a man-of-war, and so, in accordance with Staunton's hurriedly-whispered instructions, the Captain came to the saloon-entrance where they were gathered, and said in his most genial tones:

"Nothing serious, I can assure you, ladies and gentlemen. Only a heated bearing which will take about half an hour to put right. Just the sort of accident that may happen every day even to one of His Majesty's ships, and, as our time is our own, it is, of course, the merest trifle. Pray don't allow it to interfere with your night's rest."

The officers and quartermasters within hearing heard the glibly-spoken lie without moving a muscle, and so the guests were satisfied and went below again.

Only Percy Iddison wondered why a triple-engined, turbine-driven yacht should be stopped for a single heated bearing, and only he happened to notice that four of the boats were missing. It immediately occurred to him that one of the sailors might have fallen overboard, and that their considerate host did not wish to frighten his lady guests. Of course the rescue would be a matter of no difficulty with such perfect equipment and in a smooth sea, and so, being accustomed to discipline himself, he concluded that it was no business of his to interfere, wherefore he held his peace and went below again with the rest.

But the next morning the truth, as Don Ramiero Valdez had arranged it, had to come out. Wilfrid Ellerton did not join the guests as usual in the before-breakfast promenade on the upper deck. Inquiries were made for him and by some mysterious means—no one quite knew how—it became known that his berth had not been occupied during the night. Then Iddison, with something like the feeling that he remembered from his first battle, thought of the missing boats, which were now all in their places again, and of that curious stoppage of all the engines for one paltry heated bearing.

As a matter of fact, he had been looking for Ellerton, with whom, in virtue of the little plot in which he had taken part the night before, he felt that sympathy which between men is akin to friendship, in order to invite him to the early morning cocktail, and not finding him, he had had it by himself.

As he came out of the smoking-room he saw Staunton and Don Ramiero, looking very serious, coming from the direction of the saloon entrance. He took three or four long, quick strides towards them and said abruptly:

"Mr. Staunton, Ellerton is not to be found anywhere on board, and I hear that he did not sleep in his berth last night. Is that true? Has anything happened to him?"

It so came to pass that just at this moment Mercedes strolled past with Lady Maud, to whom she had been apologising for her "foolish rudeness" the day before, and also imparting the most interesting information that one engaged young woman can tell and another hear. They heard Iddison's question and instantly stopped. Lady Maud looked at Mercedes. She was white to the lips. She stared wide-eyed at her father and began to sway a little from side to side. Lady Maud at once flung her arm round her and drew her close to her side. Then Staunton spoke.

"I most deeply regret to be obliged to say, Captain Iddison," he began in a tone whose emotion was most wonderfully simulated, "that last night we deceived you—I hope you will allow me to say with the best of intentions, especially as regards our lady guests—when we told you that our stoppage was due to a slight accident to the engines. The sad truth, which I am now compelled to tell you and my other guests, is that Mr. Wilfrid Ellerton fell overboard shortly after midnight, almost within reach of my friend, Señor Valdez, and that all our best efforts to save him were in vain. You will, I am sure, forgive the deception, for we hoped——"

Before he could utter another word Mercedes had shaken herself free from Lady Maud's arm. She crossed the deck with rapid steps, laid her hands on her father's shoulders, and, looking him full in the eyes, said in a whisper that everyone could hear:

"Is that true, father? Is he really drowned—dead?"

For an instant he looked at the lovely, piteously pleading face of the only being on earth that he loved; and, as he did so, the fatal truth struck home into his soul. His face blanched and his eyes fell before hers. But there was no going back now. What was done was done, and so he replied as steadily as he could:

"Yes, Mercedes, most unhappily it is true!"

"Merciful Heavens!" she murmured. "My life was his, for he saved it—and I loved him—and we only knew last night—and now he is dead—so soon dead!"

And before he could catch her in his arms, she had fallen fainting at his feet.

EIGHTH CHAPTER.

.. In the Council .. Chamber.

As Mercedes fell to the deck her father stooped and lifted her in his arms. For a moment his eyes met those of Valdez, already blank with amazement and fear, in a glance so full of horror and involuntary reproach, that his accomplice shrank away from him for the moment like a criminal suddenly faced with clear proof of his crime. Then he turned and walked rapidly away towards the saloon entrance, saying that he would call Miss Staunton's maid and summon the doctor.

He seemed to pass through an eternity of terrifying emotions during the next few minutes, but they were more of fear for the consequences of his crime than horror of its callous and inhuman wickedness. He knew now that his keen instinct had shown him the truth. He knew that the doomed man loved the daughter of the Lord of the Underworld. That of itself would naturally have been of no moment to him whatever—but the brief, yet terrible scene which he had just witnessed had also told him that Wilfrid Ellerton's love either was already or sometime would be returned. Knowing this, he had deliberately hastened the fate which

Digitized by Google

Isolo Staunton's own statement in the presence of his guests had made irrevocable. What would be his fate if this tyrant Croesus, who never forgave even a mistake, came to know of this knowledge?

It had all passed in a few moments, and yet, when they came to compare notes afterwards, it turned out that that swift exchange of strangely-meaning glances had been equally noted by both Lady Maud and her lover.

While she and Lady Medcalf-Mears went to the assistance of Mercedes, Iddison ran a long wicker-chair across the deck, and they laid her in it. By this time Don Ramiero had returned with the maid and Staunton's private physician, who always accompanied him on his yachting trips.

Like all the intimate associates and servants of this despot of an unknown domain, Dr. Eymar Billaud was a man of great ability in his own vocation, who possessed few, if any, moral principles which did not happen to harmonise with the interests of his employer. Isolo Staunton was wont to say in confidence to those who fancied that they were his trusted friends, that all he wanted was talent—genius, if he could get it. But he had no use for principle.

He was a Frenchman born in England and a graduate of both French and English Universities. A man who could pass in the society of both countries as a cultivated citizen of either, and who, save for his whole-souled and utterly heartless devotion to his science, was about as much of a man as he was a chimpanzee—to which poor relation of humanity he bore a quite suggestive facial resemblance.

He felt Mercedes' pulse, slightly raised one of her eyelids, and then, turning to Staunton, he said imperatively and in perfect English:

"Your daughter, sir, is suffering from a sudden and, I fear, very severe mental shock. She is only just alive. Let her be taken to her room at once and put to bed. I will prepare a restorative and make a further examination as soon as possible."

Without another look at his patient, he shuffled off to his own rooms on the main deck, and Mercedes was at once carried below. Lady Maud, who, among her many accomplishments, numbered a highly-trained genius for nursing, at once constituted herself head-nurse and saw that everything needful was done in preparation for the doctor's anxiously awaited visit.

Meanwhile Staunton, by a heroic effort of his imperious will, had regained sufficient composure to be able to say calmly, and yet, as Iddison could not help thinking, in a curiously strained, indeed, almost unnatural tone, to the dozen or so guests who were offering their politely expressed and wholly sincere sympathies:

"I need hardly assure you, ladies and gentlemen, how thankful I am for the sympathy which this sudden and utterly unexpected double catastrophe places me so much in need of. As you know, my daughter is not only my only child, she is all I have in the world, for she is motherless." His voice broke here with genuine emotion. There was a respectful silence for a moment, and he went on:

"Of the tragedy of last night I can hardly trust myself to speak. I will only say what I am sure you are all thinking—that a continuation of what was begun as a pleasure-cruise is now impossible, I and the yacht are entirely at your service, but I think that I shall be best consulting your wishes if I land you at the nearest British port, which I believe will be that of Edinburgh, from which I can telegraph the sad news to Sir Wilfrid Ellerton."

"I am quite sure, Mr. Staunton, that we all entirely agree with you. There is really nothing else to be done," said Lady Medcalf-Mears, to whom common consent had given, as it were, the social mothership of the little party.

Just then the head steward came and announced that breakfast was ready, as, of course, no bugle could be blown. The meal was a mournful function, made yet more so by the anxiety of waiting for the doctor's report. Staunton had shut himself up with his own bitter thoughts in the Council Chamber to wrestle with the ghastly situation which his deliberately-planned and ruthlessly-executed crime had created. He had given orders for Dr. Billaud to be sent to him the moment that the examination was concluded, but more than half-an-hour of torturing apprehension, mingled with impotent raging against the unforeseen penalty which had so strangely fallen upon him, passed before Don Ramiero opened the double doors and brought him in.

"Well, doctor," he said, in hard, strained tones, as they entered. "What is it? Brain fever? I may as well know the worst at once."

"My dear sir," replied Billaud, "I regret to say your daughter is suffering greatly. I cannot even tell you what the effects will be until they begin to develop."

"Not even what they may be?" asked Staunton, in a tone of almost pitiful anxiety.

"I do not care to prophesy," replied the doctor. "But from what I have seen the best that I can promise you is that there will be a period of acute delirium following the present condition of collapse, and that will be succeeded by a period of great weakness and depression, which will also be the period of the greatest danger. Fortunately Miss Staunton has an almost perfect constitution, and I have little fear of getting her through. There is, however," he continued, noticing a sudden look of relief in the hitherto dully staring eyes of his employer, "another contingency for which it will be necessary for you to be prepared."

"And that?" asked the millionaire, with a nervous start.

"It is quite possible," Billaud went on, the ghost of a smile flitting across his thin, almost ape-like lips, "that the ultimate development of your daughter's case, sir, may be this. I should first give you to understand that brain lesions resulting from severe mental shock——"

"Good Heavens, man, do you think I want to sit here and listen to a medical lecture?" exclaimed Staunton passionately, as he got up from his chair and began to walk up and down the room with quick, jerky strides. "Come to the point, please, and tell me straight out what more there is to fear."

Dr. Billaud was, not unnaturally, somewhat offended by the abruptness of the interruption, but he knew his position too well to resent it openly. Still he did not forget a prompt revenge.

"I beg your pardon, sir," he said deferentially, "you will see that only my extreme interest in the case was leading me into technicalities, quite out of place here, as I admit. To be quite brief, then, it is possible that there may be a very great similarity between the mental condition of Miss Staunton when she recovers her physical health and that of the young gentleman whom, for the present, I suppose I may call my other patient."

The words were quietly, almost gently spoken, and yet they went home into Isolo Staunton's consciousness like so many hammer-strokes. There was no mistaking their meaning; but after one terrible look at Valdez which sent a shiver into his soul, he stopped in his walk and, stooping over Billaud with clenched hands as though he were going to strike him, said in a hoarse, shaking voice:

"What do you mean? Explain yourself clearly, can't you! Don't torture me any longer!"

"My dear sir," said the Frenchman, shrinking back a little into his chair, "nothing, I assure you, could be further from my thoughts. I will express myself in the plainest words. I have reason to fear that when your daughter recovers, although her physical and mental health will probably be quite perfect, the effects of the shock will be found to have completely erased the events of this morning from her memory, and that she will return to reason in absolute ignorance of the untimely decease of Mr. Ellerton which you so feelingly described to your guests before breakfast."

For a few moments the three men looked at each other in silence. Dr. Billaud sat with compressed lips and frowning brows, something like a judge who has just delivered a weighty decision. Staunton stood motionless, leaning against the table, gripping the edge of it with his hands. Then Don Ramiero crossed himself and murmured in Spanish:

"Heavens! if that is so, it will be the act of God! Señor, Señor, cannot the wrong be undone even now? He is down yonder alive and well. Can we not——"

Digitized by Google

"No!" shouted Staunton. "No, we cannot, thanks to your meddling! Was not the affair first arranged for to-night? Where was your authority to do it last night? Had you any reason? Did you suspect that there might be love between them? You have been a good and faithful servant, Ramiero, but if I thought you had done that without telling me, by Jupiter! you should go down yonder with him and never see the light of day again!"

Dr. Billaud turned and looked at Don Ramiero. His swarthy complexion had turned almost grey. His lips were trembling and his pupils were dilated by fear—for he had seen that underworld of which Isolo Staunton was absolute lord, and he knew how awful such a fate might be made. By a supreme effort he managed to steady his shaking nerves, and exclaimed, with a note of reproach in his voice:

"No, Señor, no! How could you think such treason of one whose life is lived only in your interests? No! On my faith and honour, I knew nothing of this!"

Fortunately for him his master was too heavily stricken for the moment to take much notice either of his words or the manner of their utterance; but Billaud never took his eyes off his face, and his keen eyes saw that he was lying. There was little love lost between the Spaniard and the Frenchman, who was by no means displeased by his discovery, which might possibly be useful later on.

"That will do, Ramiero," said Staunton, in an altered voice, as his sudden passion died down. So far as he liked and respected any man, he liked and perhaps, to a greater extent, respected his father's faithful friend and counsellor, and already he repented his outburst of fury. "I am sorry! No doubt you acted to the best of your judgment. But, alas, I fear that there is no repairing what you have done. Will there be no cure for my daughter, Billaud, should she prove to be afflicted as you fear?" he went on, turning quickly to the other with a glance which for such a man was almost pathetic.

"My dear sir and most generous patron," replied the Frenchman with an admirably simulated note of emotion in his voice, "there is only one thing that I would not do in your service, and that is knowingly deceive you."

He looked hard at Valdez as he said this, as though he would add: "as others of your faithful servants do," and continued, "But, pray remember, I have not said that this result is inevitable. I only fear it, and therefore it was my duty to tell you of my fear. But if it does come there is only one possible remedy for it—and that is impossible."

"The possible impossible!" echoed Staunton eagerly. "How can that be? Surely you would not indulge in paradoxes on such a subject. What do you mean?"

"I mean, sir," answered Billaud slowly, "that the only cure for such a malady would be that Miss Staunton should again meet and talk with a man who, by your own statement and your own judgment, is already as good as dead."

"My God, yes, that is true!" Staunton gasped as the pitiless logic of the physician's words was irresistibly borne in on his brain. "Was there ever such a hideous tangle spread for the feet of man? No, no, Billaud, you are right. It is cruel, deadly cruel, and to my own darling, too! But there is no help for it!

"Yes, it is done!" he continued, in his old imperious tone as though in this moment he had already risen from the depths into which he had been stricken. "As we make our fate we must accept it, good or evil. She shall forget him, even as the world will."

"Then I presume, Señor," said Valdez, rising with a very distinct feeling of relief, "that you wish the original plan to be duly carried out?"

"In every detail," replied the despot in his usual cold, even tones. "We are now heading for the Firth of Forth, which we should reach this evening. My guests will land at Leith, and I shall do the same, as I intend to convey the—ah!—the sad tidings personally to Sir Wilfrid. You will remain in charge as usual, Ramiero, and to you, Doctor, I shall intrust my daughter. You shall have the two best trained nurses that money can hire in Edinburgh, and then you will, of course, prescribe a sea trip and complete isolation for your patient. The Isola will then proceed to the Anchorage, where you, Ramiero, will get rid of your charge and then bring away any cargo that may be ready for you."

And so, in these few words, spoken as calmly as though he were issuing the most commonplace of sailing orders, Isolo Staunton, so far as lay in his power, sealed the earthly fate of the only man on whom his beloved Mercedes had looked with the melting eyes of love.

NINTH CHAPTER.

Suspicions!

When the Isola reached Leith, which, thanks to her great speed, she did on the evening of the same day, Lady Maud parted very unwillingly from her charge, who, after Doctor Billaud had managed to administer the restorative he had prepared, had lain in a state of semi-consciousness all day.

In common with the other guests, she could not help thinking that the proposed arrangement was a somewhat strange one, especially in view of the fact that their host had decided to leave his daughter while she was in such a critical state, in order to carry the news of Wilfrid Ellerton's death personally to his father.

She had offered—nay, so far as the conventions permitted, she had almost asked—to go with her on the sea-trip which the physician had prescribed; but Staunton had declined so decisively, albeit most cordially, that she felt it hopeless to press the point. "He had the best of reasons for having every possible confidence in his friend Doctor Billaud," he had said; "and as he had made a point of having two trained nurses under him, Lady Maud would see that it was not only unnecessary, but impossible for him to avail himself of her most kindly and generous offer." After which, of course, there was nothing else to be said.

"I don't half like it, Maud," said the Honourable Percy, after a long pause, as they were strolling about the next morning enjoying the glorious view from the summit of Arthur's Seat.

"You don't like what, my dear Percy?" she asked. "Are you thinking about poor Mr. Ellerton and Mercedes?"

"Yes," he replied decisively, "and about our late host and the yacht and—well, about lots of things."

"Yes," she said; "I suppose that is only a natural thing for all of us to do under such terrible circumstances. For my part, I confess I have done nothing else since yesterday morning. But you have not answered my question. Surely you don't suspect anything—anything wrong, do you?"

"I can't say that I do or I don't," he returned, after another pause. "But for all that there are two things that I can't get over. In the first place, that fellow Valdez, who, for all his fine Spanish manners, I can't bring myself to like——"

"No, neither can I," Lady Maud interrupted quickly. "I'm rather glad we think the same on that point. Well?"

"Well, his story was that Ellerton, a young fellow who is not only a very good athlete, but who has been a sailor for some years, overbalanced himself and fell overboard like a baby or a drunken man from the deck of a yacht in a perfectly smooth sea. Now, does that strike you as being very likely on the face of it?"

Digitized by Google

"N-o, I can't say that it does, now that you put it that way," she replied in a somewhat awed tone, "but surely you don't mean there could be a possibility of anything like foul play. What earthly reason could there be for such a thing?"

"Then there was that look which Staunton gave Valdez when he picked his daughter up. Now, I've seen men stalking each other down like wild beasts; I've seen them blazing away at each other at close quarters; and I've seen them struggling together for dear life on the top of a precipice; but I tell you that I've never seen more concentrated hate and fury in one man's eyes, or more abject fear in another's, than I did yesterday morning in Staunton's and that Spaniard's. I've had very good reason, I can assure you, to know that men don't look at each other like that without some very good cause."

"Percy," said Lady Maud with a faint little smile, "there's one thing quite certain. You are distinctly in earnest on the subject."

"Yes, I'm what my young friend Fenning Brandon, the American Minister's son, you know, would call in dead earnest on this business.

"I've lots of friends here in England and all over the place, and the Governor and dear old Rollo and Queenie; —by the way, I wonder why they refused this mysterious millionaire's invitation on what I know to be absolutely false pretences, now I come to think of it?—have tons of influence and all that sort of thing, and I'll work it for all it's worth. Of course there may be nothing in it, but there'll be the sport of the hunt, anyhow, even if we don't kill in the end."

"My dearest of big boys and heroes!" exclaimed Lady Maud, stopping short and looking up at him with a dazzling smile, which made him wish fervently that the place was not quite so public. "That's splendid; and I believe you're right—I believe that there is something in it, and, as my American friend, Cora Kesteven, would put it, 'I'm right there with you all the time, if you think a woman's wit will be of any use and you'll have me?"

"Well, as we're going to have one another for better or worse before very long, and as you're several thousand times cleverer than I ever learnt how to be, we'll just make that another compact between us, and," he went on, taking her by the arm, "in a more suitable time and place we'll duly sign, seal, and deliver it. And now I'm hungry, and I don't think we shall be much more than in time for lunch."

"If there is one thing that I like about you more than another," she laughed, as she freed her hand from his arm and turned towards the sloping path, "it is that magnificent appetite of yours. I consider it a most happy augury for the future. It is almost impossible for a man with an appetite like that to be ill-tempered as long as it can be satisfied—and I hope I shall always be able to do that."

"I hope so," he said, as he pulled her hand through his arm, "you have no idea what a pig I am when I'm hungry. Hullo! Look down yonder, Maud, over the water. Is that our friend got away already? By Jove, he's been pretty quick about those nursing arrangements and the rest of it. Money again, I suppose. Let me have a look for a moment."

She took her hand from his arm and he got his field-glasses out of the case and put them to his eyes.

"Yes, that's the Isola right enough," he went on, as he focussed them, "and isn't she just spinning through it! Here, take a look. What a lovely craft she is! I should like to have young Billy's opinion of her."

"The young Billy" to whom he alluded was the Honourable William Anson Iddison, Lieutenant in the Navy, and presently second in command of His Majesty's Destroyer Scorcher. He was already, at twenty-two, the possessor of two medals, the Chinese and the Distinguished Service, and his most pious wish was for the promotion of his esteemed Commander to a position of dignity on board a cruiser. He loved the black, ugly, bull-nosed little Scorcher, and naturally wanted her for himself.

"Yes, there she goes," said Lady Maud when she had got the glasses right. "She is lovely, as you say. It seems incredible that anything so beautiful should be used for any evil purpose, so let us hope, for her sake as well, that we are wrong."

"With pleasure," he laughed rather grimly, putting out his chin a little, "but for all that I'd give something to be on board her this trip with Billy and two or three of his boys disguised as quarter-masters."

A good deal of light would have been thrown in places which Lady Maud and her lover were beginning to think so dark, if either of them could have listened to a parting conversation between Staunton, Don Ramiero, and Doctor Billaud in the Council Chamber half-an-hour before the Isola sailed.

For the first time in his active life, Isolo Staunton had repented him of the evil that he had done, not for repentance sake, but because of that greater evil which, all unknowingly, he had brought upon the one human being for whom his heart held a tender human feeling. He had passed a night of sleepless torment, raging vainly against what promised to be the inevitable consequences of his own act, till at last his love for Mecedes had overcome even his iron purpose, and for her sake, he had decided to run the tremendous risk of a compromise with Fate.

"I quite see the force of your arguments, gentlemen," he said towards the close of the conversation, "and I am entirely satisfied that you have been thinking only of my interests; but I have counted the risk, and for my daughter's sake I am prepared, in fact, resolved to take it. If the operation which you will perform, Doctor Billaud, does not restore your patient's past memory, then some excuse must, and shall be found, to bring him back to life. If, on the other hand, it does, then I shall at least have the satisfaction of knowing that his departure from the upper to the under world is not only necessary, but inevitable."

"Very well, sir," replied the Frenchman, "since that is your decision it shall be done. Señor Valdez and I have warned you, and therefore our duty in that regard is performed."

Thus was it decided that the captive on board the Isola should have one chance for his liberty and perhaps his life.

(Another long instalment of this serial next week.)

TO PARENTS.

THE Editor of THE BOYS' LEADER offers a situation in the offices of this firm at a salary of £100 a year to commence with to a boy, and a like situation of £100 a year to a girl.

The two successful competitors will be given the choice, after we have arranged with their parents, of entering either the editorial department, the art department, or the counting-house, so that every opportunity will be given to the boy or girl who shows any particular tendency towards one of these classes of work.

In addition to these two handsome awards, a further hundred consolation gifts will be distributed amongst those who come next. The conditions under which these offers are made are very simple. In THE BOYS' LEADER, published on Tuesday, November 3rd, will appear the following set of questions:

1.—Who wrote Robinson Crusoe?

2.—What famous British soldier is known as "Bobs"?

3.—Who is your favourite hero (not fiction), and why?

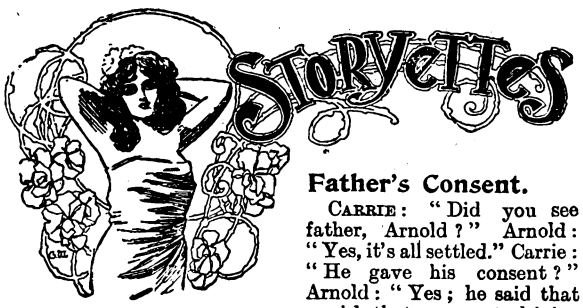
4.—Who made most runs in first-class cricket this summer?

5.—Which is your favourite book, and why?

6.—When was King Edward VII. born? Give year and day.

The boy and girl who most successfully answers all the questions set will be considered the winner.

Digitized by Google



Father's Consent.

CARRIE: "Did you see father, Arnold?" Arnold: "Yes, it's all settled." Carrie: "He gave his consent?" Arnold: "Yes; he said that a girl that was out driving and yachting and bicycling as much as you didn't need much of a home, anyway. Not very nice, was it?"

When the Lights are Low.

SHE: "When is a comfortable position uncomfortable?" He: "When anyone enters the room suddenly."

She Was Tired of Waiting.

HE: "Ethel, what can it mean? Last night I dreamt that I proposed to you." She: "I should say that you are more sensible asleep than awake."

The Very Reason.

"WHY don't you think of marriage?" asked the gushing young thing of thirty odd summers. "I do," answered the cynic. "It's thinking of it that keeps me a bachelor."

He Proposed Once Too Often.

WIFE: "When you proposed to me, John, did you think I would accept you?" Husband: "Not the first time." "The second?" "I wasn't going to propose more than once."

More Bachelor's Advice.

"THERE are two kinds of girls a fellow should never flirt with." "Oh, really?" "The girls who are so young they don't know any better, and the girls who are so old they mean business."

That Settled It.

"No, sir," exclaimed the irate sire, "my daughter can never be yours." "Quite right, sir," replied the cool youth; "she couldn't possibly be my daughter, but she's going to be my wife."

Better Late Than Never.

"INTELLIGENCE has just reached me," began Mr. Blodger, as he sat down to the dinner table. "Thank Heaven, if it has at last," exclaimed Mrs. Blodger. The meal was partaken of in silence.

Then He Squirmed.

"IF you insist on breaking our engagement, Miss Fickle, I shall make your letters public." "You are welcome to do so, Mr. Scamper; there is nothing in them that I am ashamed of, except the address on the envelope."

A Distinction With a Difference.

ANGRY FATHER-IN-LAW: "Didn't you tell me when you married my daughter that you were worth £40,000?" Son-in-Law: "No, sir; I said that I could lay my hands on £40,000; but had I done so I should now be in gaol."

He Should Have Said "Less Beautiful."

RICH HEIRESS: "But, Captain Hawleigh, would you love me when I grow old and ugly?" The Captain (gallantly): "You may grow older, my dear Miss Crœsus, but you can never grow uglier." And he wondered why she rejected him.

A Reassuring Simile.

SHE was going away. "Oh, John!" she sobbed. "J-John, are y-you quite sure you'll m-miss me?" "Darling," replied her big husband, "I'll miss you as much as I do the morning train." Thus assured, she picked up her bag, and with a weet smile, started for the seaside

Sisterly Love Again.

HE: "She looks as proud as though the whole world is under her feet!" She: "Well, she's right! Did you ever see her feet?"

Made a Name for Herself.

ISORA: "Your name is so curious." Azile: "Yes; I'm named after my rich aunt, Eliza; but I reversed it, as it looks so much nicer."

Severely Reprimanded.

WALTER (aged five): "Papa, when I grow up may I get married?" Papa: "My son, I regret to see you anticipating trouble so early in life."

How Very Provoking.

"HER marriage was a great disappointment to her friends." "Indeed?" "Oh, yes. They all predicted it would turn out unhappily, and it didn't."

The Chief Inducement.

SHE: "I don't want to marry you. I don't even want to talk to you!" He (a widower), eagerly: "That's the very reason I want you to marry me!"

A Competent Critic.

HE: "That must be a very interesting book you are reading." She: "Oh, it's awfully exciting! The heroine changes her gown six times in the first chapter."

There Had Been Rumours Before.

MAMIE: "I hear you are going to be married again." Edith: "Again? Why, I've never been married at all yet." "No; but I can't recall the number of times you were 'going to be.'"

Good Indication.

IDA: "Why do you like Harry? He kisses you so awkwardly." May: "That's just why I like him. If he went about it in a graceful manner I would know he had long been practising."

A Grievous Libel.

CUSTOMER: "Why doesn't Miss Robinson deal at your shop now?" Grocer: "One of my assistants insulted her." Customer: "How?" Grocer: "She overheard him telling someone that she was our oldest customer."

He Was so Considerate.

TOM: "Why are you so melancholy, old man?" Jack: "Miss Jones rejected me last night." Tom: "Well, never mind, there are others." Jack: "Yes, of course, but somehow I can't help feeling sorry for the poor girl."

George Would Not Object.

SHE: "Albert, I have come to the conclusion that I love George better than I love you, and——" He: "What about the engagement ring I gave you to wear?" She: "Oh, that's all right. George says he won't object if I wear it."

There Was a Reason.

MRS. MAINCHANCE (sentimentally): "I declare, darling, you hold the umbrella over me just as carefully as you did in our courting days—more carefully, if anything." Mr. Mainchance (prosaically): "I didn't have to buy your millinery in those days, Myrtilla."

His Courage Failed.

SENIOR PARTNER: "My dear Muller, you had the courage to save my daughter from drowning. You deserve to be rewarded. I will give you my daughter in marriage." Muller (bookkeeper): "It is really very kind of you; but I am not so courageous as you seem to think."

Real Economy.

ANXIOUS HUSBAND (at dinner): "Really, dear, turkey again? I'm afraid we won't manage at this rate!" Wife: "Really, dear, it's all management. I made so much turkey-stuffing that I had to order two more birds so that not a crumb should be left. Now you see how economical I am, you goose!"

Digitized by Google

The Man and the Foolish Little Girl.

A Correspondence That Brought an Alliance.

Once there was a Foolish Little Girl—that is, people (mostly her friends) called her that, for had she not been besought by three different men to be a wife, and had she not an equal number of times refused? And they were very "eligible," these men—they had much to offer in worldly goods, were pleasant to look upon, and they loved the Foolish Little Girl. But she shook her wayward head and elevated her dimpled chin and said "No!" three times very distinctly.

One day she did something to amuse herself. She saw an advertisement like this, in a newspaper: "Correspondence desired with bright, refined young woman. Object, to pass the time. Address A. B., &c.," and she answered.

They exchanged two letters each and then became confidential. Now, odd as it may seem, one will often reveal things to a practical stranger, particularly if it be under cover of mystery and such circumstances as surrounded these correspondents, that one would never confide to one's dear friend. Thus it happened that after the second letter each told the other a few things.

Said the Man to the Foolish Little Girl: "I am tired of everything—I hate Society—I haven't money enough to travel the world over as I would like—and I hate people in general and girls in particular, for it's all the fault of a girl that I'm in this discordant tone of mind. I want to get interested in something and I hit upon this scheme as being original and cheaper than a trip abroad. It's already succeeding. Tell me something about yourself and how you came to answer my advertisement."

The Little Girl wrote back among other things: "Perhaps my reasons are similar to your own—perhaps I haven't any reasons, but whether I have or not I'm being amused and that is something that hasn't happened since last summer when I knew—well, him—just him—no matter who he was or why I lost him. Nobody knows of it. No one in my family would sympathise if they did, but perhaps you can, for you have learnt your lesson too."

Their letters were frequent and long after this and were not so very silly, all things considered. One day something quite exciting happened. The Man touched upon a certain incident of his past summer holiday.

"The quarrel came so suddenly," he wrote, "so like the proverbial thunderbolt from a sunny sky, and she had grown so dear to me that I couldn't realise all at once that anything so ugly could come between us. In my surprise the words of explanation came haltingly. She misunderstood, and before I knew it she had said a few quick sentences and left me there, trying to comprehend what had happened.

Exactly at this point the Little Girl's big eyes began to open bigger than usual, and soon she let the paper fall from unheeding fingers and stared and stared at nothing while strange scraps of things pieced themselves together in her mind. Then she came to earth again, picked up the letter and read it through to the end, where for the first time his name stood forth fully instead of the old "A. B."

"Why didn't I guess it before?" said she to herself. "Who else could ever write such descriptions of that dear old place? Why nobody but us ever knew about that cove in the bay."

Then a sudden thought made her eyes open big again. "I wonder—I won-der—I w-o-n-d-e-r——" Then a violent headshake—"why, no! of course he doesn't know."

But he did. He knew after the very first confidential letter. For she was a very Foolish Little Girl, and she wrote her heart out in those letters.

Then another thing happened. One day the mamma of the Foolish Little Girl found a note. Note said, "Mamma, dear—when I return I shall be Mrs. Alden Brice. He's the one in the golf suit that you hated so last summer. He isn't very rich and I know what you all will say. But it has to be."

She was not so very foolish after all! May Harney.

"Penny Illustrated Paper" says: "In 'ANTIPON' the world is made richer by a marvellous discovery."

The "Sheffield Independent" says: 'ANTIPON' is a preparation which bids fair to revolutionise medical science."

"ANTIPON"
PERMANENTLY CURES
the most obstinate cases of EXCESSIVE OBESITY.

The Marvellously Successful Permanent Cure for Corpulence.

Illustrated London News. Everyone seems to know instinctively when one has too much or too little flesh upon one's bones, and the time may come to many when the burden grows oppressive and causes alarm. To such sufferers "Antipon" should prove advantageous, because it not only speedily absorbs and throws out of the system all superabundant adipose matter but increases strength and vitality.

Methodist Recorder. It is satisfactory to know that the new cure "Antipon" is the practical result of a specialist's researches and discoveries, so that reliance can be placed upon its efficacy.

Penny Illustrated Paper. In "Antipon," the great new permanent cure for corpulence, the world is made richer by a marvellous discovery. Cures or so-called cures, which purged and sweated the patient into a state of decline, are of the past. "Antipon" is something of a diametrically opposite nature, for whilst it is gradually absorbing and ejecting the gross deposits of superfluous fat which clog and debilitate the system and impede the action of the vital organs, it increases muscular strength and helps to revitalise the nervous system.

Weldon's Ladies' Journal. Readers troubled with embonpoint will find in "Antipon" a reliable and permanent cure, exceedingly pleasant to take, and, being a powerful fat absorbent, it dissolves and eliminates from the body all superfluous adipose, both the internal fat and the subcutaneous. It also forms a strength-giving tonic, improves the appetite, assists digestion, and tones up the whole system, without the sufferer incurring any distressing restrictions as to diet.

The Lady's Pictorial. To reduce superabundant fat is of vital importance. The wonderful new fat absorbent known as "Antipon," performs this work promptly, safely and with permanent effect. It goes to the very root of the evil; destroys the superfluous fat that impedes the free action of the internal organs, also the subcutaneous adipose, abdominal and general, that gives such an unseemly appearance to the sufferer. "Antipon" causes no discomfort of any kind, and is a harmless liquid of pure vegetable ingredients, agreeably bitter and refreshing to the palate. The reductive action of "Antipon" begins at once, and within a day and a night of the first dose the scales will proclaim a decrease. When the figure has been denuded of all superfluous fat and the patient is satisfied that normal weight has been attained, the doses may be discontinued,

THE CURE IS COMPLETE AND PERMANENT.

"ANTIPON" may be had of Chemists, in bottles, price 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d., or in case of disappointment, by sending cash remittance to the "ANTIPON" Company, 13 Buckingham Street, Strand, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A WOMAN'S HATE.

The Story of a Lover's Disappearance and a Girl's Faith.

THE news spread like wildfire that Brian Wyndhurst had taken the cheque for one thousand pounds, drawn but unsigned, had forged the signature of the head of the firm, cashed the cheque and absconded. The excitement in the large office was tremendous; it came like a thunderbolt on all the clerks and employées; and when it was carried from the premises of Morgan and Sons to the ears of Marian Arnold, Brian's sweetheart, it seemed to stiffen every muscle and nerve in her body and turn her to stone.

For a full minute she stood in this apparently petrified condition, gazing at her aunt with eyes that saw nothing; then she sank in a limp mass on the couch from which she had hastily risen. When she had sufficiently recovered to ask questions, she demanded more particulars.

"The gentleman is a detective," responded Mrs. Arnold uneasily. "Do you think you can go through the ordeal, Marian? He will ask you all manner of things about Brian."

"I must go through it," returned Marian firmly. "In the interest of justice—and Brian! There is some dreadful mistake! He could not do such a thing!"

"Well, collect yourself, my dear!" exhorted Mrs. Arnold, still mentally troubled. "Brian always seemed a nice, steady young fellow, but they hint at betting and—but I'll show him in!" she added hurriedly, as she saw the colour coming back with a rush to Marian's cheeks and interpreted that circumstance as the raising of the storm cone.

Detective-Inspector Mostyn entered and took the proffered seat; he began his business tactfully, and it did not take him long to place Marian in possession of all known facts and all conjectures.

Brian Wyndhurst was a trusted clerk in the firm; he was the only son of the woman whom John Morgan had loved but failed to win. When Brian was left an orphan, with scarcely a penny in the world, John Morgan had taken him in hand. Brian had been educated and then placed in a large commerical office; it was tacitly understood that if he showed sufficient capacity, he would ultimately become a partner.

Every Friday it was necessary to draw £1,000 from the bank by means of an open cheque for the purpose of paying the clerks and factory hands who were in receipt of weekly wages. This was done early on Friday morning and a special cheque book was used for these wages cheques. It was part of Brian's duty to take charge of this cheque book in a safe; he would write the cheque and Mr. Morgan would sign it on Friday morning; occasionally, in order to be ready, the cheque would be drawn on Thursday evening, although not signed till the next morning.

Brian generally cashed the cheque, taking most of it in gold, some in silver, and a small proportion in notes; he was usually accompanied by another clerk and they drove in a cab from the doors of the bank to the factory, where most of the money was left, and then back to the office. Once or twice Brian had cashed the cheque alone, laughing when the grey-haired cashier shook his head disapprovingly at the probable danger incurred by Brian.

What had occurred on the present occasion? Brian had left the office as usual on Thursday evening, but he did not put in an appearance on Friday morning. It was nearly eleven o'clock when the firm received a telegram from him, to the effect that he was not well enough to come to the office. Thereupon Mr. Morgan had taken his duplicate key from the drawer in his private safe and had opened the one in Brian's charge where the cheque book was usually kept, in order to sign the wages cheque and have it cashed. To his amazement the cheque was missing! The counterfoil was duly filled up, but the all-important slip of paper was gone. Mystified, but not especially uneasy as the cheque did not bear the necessary signature, he drew another himself and went off in a cab with a clerk to the bank to cash it. On his arrival, he received the stunning intelligence that a cheque had already been cashed and was shown the one which he had missed!

It bore his signature; he knew it was a forgery, but it was so cleverly done that he could not detect any flaw himself till he had subjected it to a searching examination through a pocket microscope.

Explanations followed. A slightly-built young fellow had cashed it, alone; he brought a letter of introduction from the firm and had a cab at the door. He said that Mr. Wyndhurst was ill.

The letter produced was typewritten on the firm's paper and signed by John Morgan—another clever imitation. Inquiries were at once made and the police informed. Brian, it was found, had not returned home last night, but had wired to say that he would stay with a friend. His drawers at the office, as well as the safe, were examined, and the state of the contents suggested that Brian had intended to abscond. Further examination was being made in order to ascertain whether his books had been falsified and whether he had been guilty of other thefts, but everything was in order so far. The only clue was a paper, evidently written by Brian under the influence of some strong agitation; this paper was a mass of figures with odd letters, indicative of betting transactions, and it also contained the name of a woman, Clara Beale.

That was all. Could Miss Arnold say anything of Brian's movements on the previous evening? Had she—hem!—any reason to suppose that Mr. Wyndhurst had been betting or——

"He always condemned gambling in unmeasured terms!" declared Marian decisively.

The detective was on the point of observing that people sometimes strongly condemn a thing as a cloak, while they do that same thing all the time; but he remembered himself just in time.

"I have not seen Mr. Wyndhurst, or heard from him, since Wednesday evening," said Marian. "I expected him to-night and if he doesn't come, I shall conclude that some evil has befallen him! I fear it is so, for he is the soul of honour and would not be guilty of so wicked a crime, so great an act of ingratitude!"

"Precisely!" acquiesced the officer, just a little drily. He had heard of that sort of thing so often! Such confidence was creditable to human nature, but it wasn't business from his point of view! "Was he all right on Wednesday evening, Miss Arnold? Not worried at all, but just as happy and buoyant as usual?"

"He did appear somewhat worried," admitted Marian hesitatingly. "He said that he might have something to tell me soon, but"—she blushed—"I understood that remark in a way which you will not understand!"

"Exactly!" remarked the detective sympathetically, but

Digitized by Google

looking much more alert. "Didn't explain what he was going to tell you soon, I suppose?"

"No! But surely you do not think him guilty? You are not looking for him in order to arrest him?"

Marian half rose from the couch in indignation, but dropped back again.

"We must find Mr. Wyndhurst, Miss Arnold,' was the evasive answer, "and then we shall get at the truth!"

The officer took his departure and Marian waited feverishly till the evening was far advanced, hoping against hope that Brian would appear; but he came not, and with a sharp pain at her heart she lay on her bed to pass the night in sleeplessness, and gradually forming the determination to join in the search herself on the morrow, if no tidings came of her missing lover. The morning journal brought her the intelligence that Brian Wyndhurst was suspected of the robbery and was being sought by the police with a view to his arrest.

Marian Arnold found herself face to face with a condition of things which demanded all her courage and which would have the effect of either crushing her and destroying her love for Brian Wyndhurst or transforming her from the simple, placid maiden into a woman of energy and determination. She was pretty, with attractive ways and a simple trustfulness calculated to charm a young man of such virility as Brian, just as his very manliness drew him to her as the one who would be capable of protecting her. She loved him, she had told herself, but she had never sounded the depths of her heart to learn how much she loved him. She was content to trust him, believing that he would do his best to make the path of life smooth for her, while she was filled with a mild determination to help him in his troubles and share his joys.

And in the course of a few hours, circumstances had effected a great change. This danger to Brian had removed the mist from her mental vision; she could clearly perceive those sterling qualities which had been but dimly visible to her; during the night of bitter anxiety and reflection she had probed the depths of her heart and had discovered the profundity of her love for Brian. The old placidity was gone; the Marian Arnold of that morning was a woman with a resolute countenance that denoted a set purpose.

Mrs. Arnold watched her niece with some anxiety; she was afraid that the girl would suddenly faint or go into a fit of hysterics; she was totally unprepared for what did occur, and it startled her a great deal more than a fainting fit would have done.

"Aunt," said Marian suddenly, breaking a long silence, "I am going out to-day to do what I can to find Brian!"

"But, my child, you cannot do anything!" expostulated Mrs. Arnold, when she had sufficiently recovered from her astonishment to be able to speak. "The detectives have the case in hand; they are more capable than you can be of——"

"I know," interrupted Marian quietly. "But there is one great difference between the detectives and myself—a difference which, I think, gives me an advantage. I am in love with Brian Wyndhurst, and love, although blind in some respects, is very sharp-sighted in others. I may find a clue which they have missed! They start with the assumption that Brian is guilty; I am confident that he is innocent. We shall view the facts from different standpoints. I am convinced that there is some plot against Brian!"

Mrs. Arnold remained silent; she did not feel so confident about Brian's innocence. He was a good fellow, but young men sometimes give way to temptation. However, she did not argue with Marian; twenty-four hours previously she would have spoken out boldly enough, but this Marian was not the niece of the past! So she held her tongue.

"I shall go to see Mrs. Mead, Brian's landlady; afterwards I shall call on Mr. Morgan!" declared Marian as she rose from the breakfast table. She had forced herself to eat in order to maintain her strength.

She carried her plans into execution. Mrs. Mead was somewhat perturbed by the visit at first, but she warmed to Marian when they were seated in her scrupulously clean, though humble parlour.

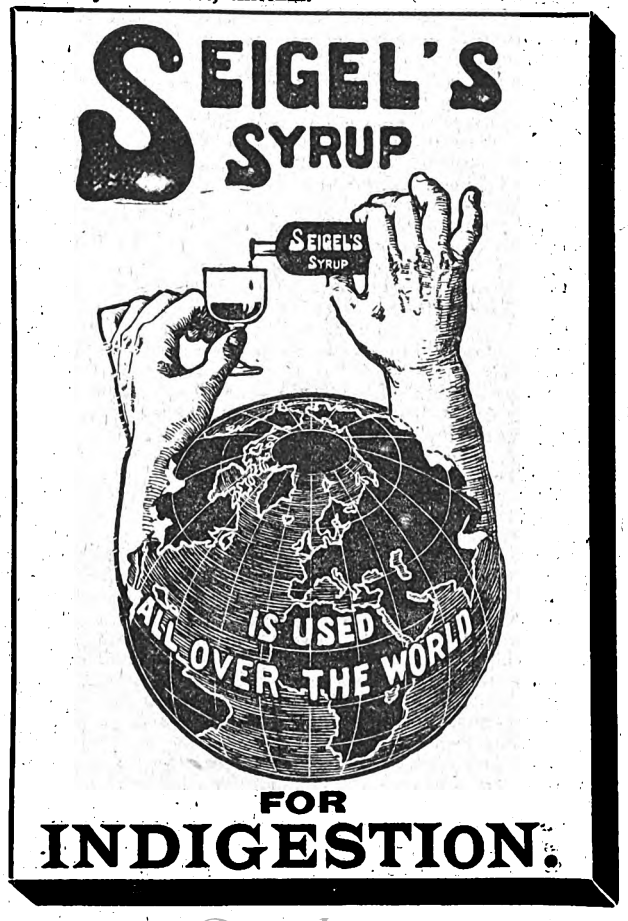
"So that is all you know?" queried Marian, fixing her keen

The Terrible Turk.

"He is a pitiless monster," writes one correspondent; and another, "Wherever he goes there is misery." Hard sayings, these, and all summed up in the word "unspeakable," applied to the Turk by Mr. Gladstone. It is matter for debate whether any nation is so bad as this. Of most people or things some good can be urged, but none of indigestion, which is responsible for more misery than a million Turks in arms could produce. It is the function of food to make rich, pure blood, and to sustain muscles, brain and nerves. When food fails to do this, the digestive organs are at fault, and only Mother Seigel's Syrup can set them right again. Seigel's Syrup is a gentle tonic, compounded of fruits, roots, and herbs, which assists nature to do its own work in its own way, regulating the system and stimulating the liver to healthy activity.

Marriage and Health.

Married men live longer than single men. So, at least, a study of the United States census returns would seem to indicate. But though marriage may be conducive to longevity, it certainly does not secure immunity from indigestion, biliousness, and the host of weakening and distressing ailments which have their origin in a disordered stomach and a torpid liver. Yet even that may be secured by the timely and regular use of Mother Seigel's Syrup, a natural tonic and digestant made of fruits, roots, and herbs. "For years I was a martyr to indigestion and biliousness, and was afraid to eat at all. Thanks to Seigel's Syrup I am now as well as I could wish to be." So says Mrs. Rose Warboys, of 100 Queen Street, Hitchin.



Digitized by Google

eyes on Mrs. Mead, after the landlady had repeated the particulars already made known. "You can tell me nothing more, nothing? You know what has been said — that he betted and that the name of a woman, not my name, was found on a paper in his drawer?"

Marian, full of loving trustfulness in Brian, waited for an emphatic reply that would confirm her own views; but Mrs. Mead looked half frightened, and gazed confusedly at the carpet. "Poor girl!" she murmured; "I really ought to tell her, for if she has been deceived, she ought to know it!" Marian saw the landlady's confusion; it struck a chill to her heart, but she cast aside the doubt and pressed the question.

"Well, miss, it'll be best for me to tell you," she answered slowly. "Mr. Wyndhurst did have something to do with another lady, because she came here for him once, and I believe he met her elsewhere. I'll tell you what I know, but for goodness' sake you mustn't tell the police that you've got it from me! They would send me to prison for hiding the facts! But I did it to save him, for he was a nice young gentleman and perhaps it was a first false step and——"

"Tell me all!" demanded Marian, her cheeks paling. "You may help me to save him!"

The last remark was ambiguous, and Mrs. Mead interpreted it to mean that Marian Arnold wished to assist Brian to escape the consequences of his false step. Mrs. Mead was flurried and unable to reason clearly.

"I can't tell you much about what happened before the evening of Mr. Wyndhurst's disappearance, Miss Arnold. A young lady came to see him once, but she would not give her name; it was evening and she wore a thick veil. All I can say is that she seemed very upright—perky in her manner, too. I believe Mr. Wyndhurst met her elsewhere and had been on intimate terms with her. Mr. Wyndhurst has been worried lately, I am sure of that! Well, the night before last he didn't come home and a telegram came from him, as I have told the police. But I didn't tell them that I went out after the telegram came and when I got home, rather late, I found that someone had been in! Oh, I was sure of that; you see, I am very particular how I arrange my things and I hate to see chairs and mats and other things crooked. Now, the mat inside the front door was crooked! Of course, I never left it like that!"

"What does that indicate?" asked Marian judicially.

"Someone had been in, someone who didn't wish me to know it, and so had been extra particular about wiping his feet! He, or she, had shifted the mat in wiping his feet so much! I didn't pay any attention at first, thinking it was Mr. Wyndhurst come home, after all. So I went to his room and found it locked. It is never locked unless he is in bed. I left him alone till the morning, but as he didn't come out and didn't answer my knocks, I got a duplicate key which I keep in a drawer and opened the door. He wasn't there and the bed hadn't been slept in!"

"Well?" inquired Marian, with a trace of eagerness and anxiety.

Mr. Wyndhurst had been in his room and had changed his suit. He had taken one suit from the drawer and had put the other, the one he wore when he left in the morning, back in the drawer again. And in changing he dropped something on the floor without noticing it. I'll show you."

She went away and returned a minute later with a small stamp-photograph of a young woman. It was at the time when these little novelties were in vogue and many persons stuck them on letters to friends. Marian Arnold examined the picture critically and a pang of jealousy shot through her; she shut out the feeling in an instant, feeling ashamed of her momentary defection. The woman was strikingly beautiful, and even this little imperfect picture corroborated Mrs. Mead's statement that she was very upright. Mechanically she turned it over; on the back was written "24 B. W." Those were Brian's initials, but it was not his handwriting, and what did the figures mean? Were they part of some cipher? The idea of a cipher occurred to her because Brian was fond of codes and ciphers, and they had amused themselves in their own correspondence with that kind of thing.

Mrs. Mead regarded all this as evidence of Brian's culpability, although she was loth to believe in it. Marian was puzzled by this last discovery, but she was more than ever of opinion that there was a plot against Brian. She soon quitted Mrs. Mead's parlour and hurried to the office of Morgan and Sons, where she saw the head of the firm.

Mr. John Morgan received her sympathetically; he had seen her before, and thought that she was likely to make Brian a sensible, loving wife; but this interview increased his admiration. She surprised him by her resolute air and keen insight. His feelings were the same as those of Mrs. Mead; he desired with all his strength to believe in Brian's innocence, but appearances were against the young man. He said so.

"It is wrong, Mr. Morgan! I am certain there is some plot and we shall prove it!" she cried vehemently. "At least, I will prove it, if others cannot. Love can succeed where mere official duty fails!"

"Really, Miss Arnold, you make me feel quite glad!" exclaimed the elderly man, taking her hand and pressing it warmly. "I entertain the greatest affection for Brian, and this affair—has—upset me!"

There were tears in his eyes when he ceased speaking, and he had to cough violently in order to recover his self-possession.

"Tell me the latest information," requested Marian. "Were the originals of the telegrams written by him?"

"It is his style, but not quite like his handwriting," replied Mr. Morgan. "It looks as if he were much agitated. The letter introducing the messenger to the bank was typewritten; the messenger himself had the appearance that seemed a mixture of femininity and masculinity, and he was dressed——"

Here Marian interrupted him, giving a description of the second suit, according to Mrs. Mead's words, and before Mr. Morgan could do more than exclaim "That's it!" she produced the stamp-photograph. "I should like the bank cashier to say if the messenger's features resemble those," she cried in agitation.

Then she told him all she had discovered. Mr. Morgan was amazed; but he pointed out sorrowfully that the police would take it all as further evidence of guilt.

"Never mind!" cried Marian warmly. "Let us get to the bottom of it, and we shall see. Have you got that typewritten letter?"

"The police have it, but I have a press copy and am studying it."

In response to her request he showed the copy.

"There is no doubt that it was done on one of my machines," he told her. You will see that the bottom of the "n" is broken towards the end of the letter. The clerk who generally uses the machine discovered the break yesterday morning."

"You have a clerk named Jackson," said Marian quietly. He can use the typewriter, but is not good at it and is not a correspondence clerk. He only uses one sort of machine. Was that letter written on that particular machine?"

Morgan reflected. Yes; he remembered the facts mentioned by Marian. It was the same machine.

"And he wrote that letter!" whispered Marian, leaning

Digitized by Google

ALFOSCO REG'D

Call or Write.

Allen Foster & Co

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS

47 GOLDEN LANE, LONDON, E.C.

Call or Write.

ALFOSCO REG'D

BUY DIRECT BY PARCEL POST FROM THE LEADING FIRM OF LONDON MANUFACTURERS.

10/6

Design No. 1416.—Girl's Stylish Paletot with shoulder cape and stole ends bell sleeves and trimmed fancy buttons and galon trimming. Very stylish design. Stocked in all sizes. Patterns free. Colours: Blue, Reseda, Fawn; Grey, Brown, Black, & Red. Lengths—

21	24	27	30in.
4/6	5/6	6/6	7/6
33	36	39in.
8/6	9/6	10/6

Any size sent. Carriage paid, 5d. extra.

Design No. 1240. 10/6

The Famous Half-Guinea Jacket of the Season, by far and away the best value ever offered. 30 inches long, full sac, single-breasted. Made in Black Vicuna, Grey Frieze, or in a smart Grey Tweed with narrow stripe. Collarless style with stole ends and two shoulder capes, trimmed good ornaments and tailor-stitching. Price only 10/6; carr. paid, 6d. ex. A Bargain. Satisfaction guaranteed. This Jacket, 33in. long, will be 11/6; 36in. long, 13/6; or 39in. long, 14/6. All sizes in stock. Send bust measurement under arms & length required.

Design No. 1102. 10/6.

Lady's Mackintosh.—Single-breasted, three short capes. Colours: Grey, Fawn, Navy, and Black. Special Value. Price 10/6, carr. paid 6d. extra. When ordering please state length at back.

Design No. 1460. 13/9

The Latest in Ladies' Coats and Skirts—The Coat is stylishly cut with shaped back, collarless style, with two capes and stole ends, trimmed tailor stitching, cord, and pretty buttons. Skirt is cut full and well made. Produced in A. F. & Co.'s New Zibeline Cloth, Specialite Serge, or Venetian Cloth. All Sizes and Colours. The Outfit complete, 13/9; carr. 6d.

13/9

Design No. 1042. 10/6.

Latest Fashion in Costume Skirts. The new kilted Skirt with pleated seams, the top of each kilt being finished off with drop ornament. Made in A. F. & Co.'s New Zibeline Cloth, or in their Specialite Serge or Venetian Cloth—all colours. This fashionable Skirt is lined throughout and well made. Price only 10/6; carr. 5d.

SEND FOR ONE.

Write for our New Sketch Book and Catalogue of Bargains, containing Hundreds of Illustrations of Latest Novelties in Ladies' and Children's Costumes and Jackets for the Winter Season. Sent with Patterns post free.

ALLEN FOSTER & CO.

THE LONDON MANUFACTURERS,
47 GOLDEN LANE, BARBICAN, LONDON, E.C.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "I may send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 57 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ross Hill, Torver, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1¾d. tins everywhere.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

Ask your grocer for

EPPS'S

(The most nutritious)

COCOA

And take no other.

YOUR FUTURE IS KNOWN.

For 1s. Mr. WILDE will send a Reading of the Stars W. T. STEAD, Esq., and many other prominent gentlemen have testified to the accuracy of their forecasts. Send the exact or approximate hour of your birth, if possible, date, year, &c., together with P.O. 1s. and stamp. Satisfaction will be guaranteed.

THE RESULT WILL ASTONISH YOU.

SEND TO-DAY TO (DEPT. P.S.S.)

GEO. WILDE, 143 High Holborn, London, W.C

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

of all Chemists, or Post Free on receipt of 15, 34, or 63 penny stamps or P.O.O. from the Sole Proprietors,

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Nottingham, Eng.

Digitized by Google

towards Mr. Morgan, as if afraid that even a whisper might be heard. "Brian has told me of one peculiarity of Jackson's typing and letter-writing; he always begins the first word of the letter under the "r" of 'Dear,' whereas most people begin farther in, so that the 'Dear Sir' stand quite clear. This letter is written in that way."

Mr. Morgan jumped excitedly from his chair. Touching the bell, he ordered the letter-book to be brought to him; an examination of the copies failed to reveal a single letter arranged in that way.

"That clerk must be watched and this portrait shown to the bank cashier and the police," said Mr. Morgan decisively. "Miss Arnold, we may hope yet."

"Yes," returned Marian slowly, "unless—unless they have murdered him."

"Heaven forbid!" said Mr. Morgan solemnly.

Two days elapsed, but the detectives, although they said they had an important clue, had arrived at no result. Marian herself had done some amateur detective work, but without success.

It was on the evening of the fourth day since Brian's disappearance that two people sat facing each other at a table in a fashionable restaurant; they were in a quiet corner and the place was almost empty, so they could talk freely in low tones. They were Jackson, Mr. Morgan's ledger clerk, and a woman who bore a striking resemblance to the stamp-photograph.

"I don't like this hanging about, Alice!" said Jackson moodily. "You doubled from Charing Cross to Calais with a Paris ticket; then went to Boulogne and came back in another guise. The police have traced you in that suit to Calais, but as you changed into feminine attire they lost you there. But I think that visit to Wyndhurst's lodgings and the change of suits was unnecessary."

"It made the case looker blacker against Brian, and that's what I wanted! I hate him for having refused me for that chit of a girl, and I have a dash of Spanish blood in my veins. When we have debts to pay, we pay them!"

There was such a fiendish glitter in her eyes that the weak-minded Jackson felt uncomfortable. He was in love with the beautiful demon; he couldn't help himself; and she had promised to marry him if he assisted her to have revenge on Brian.

"I have had revenge on him and on her at the same time with a goodly sum of money into the bargain!" she laughed. "They both suffer, and I glory in it! I have disgraced him! Oh; it is a splendid revenge!"

"It's too risky!" declared Jackson. "You were nearly caught by the landlady and you left the door locked. And I tell you, I'm confoundedly uncomfortable. It has just leaked out that you dropped a stamp-photograph on the floor!"

The woman said something angrily under her breath, and her manner was less easy.

"It's time we cleared out! You promised to marry me and that we should go to Mexico, where you had property. When are you going to carry out that promise? And where is my share of the £1,000? I ran a lot of risk!"

In her inmost consciousness the woman despised him, but he was a useful tool, and she had fooled him with a promise which she never intended to keep. She half regretted that she had returned to England, but she wanted to do further harm to Marian Arnold.

"All in good time!" she returned coolly. "I want to get Miss Arnold into the clutches of those who hold her lover, and then we will be off."

"Look here!" cried Jackson, paling. "I don't like this sort of thing. I hadn't any idea that you wanted to kill Wyndhurst, and I can't help to settle her as well! I can't!"

"I don't want you to!" said the woman scornfully. "Meet me at Dover two nights hence. You can travel by the nine o'clock from Charing Cross; I shall go sooner!"

After a few more remarks they left the restaurant. Alice Barfield was maturing a plot for the destruction of Marian, which she hoped to accomplish on the following evening.

But the best-laid plans go wrong at times, partly because the plotters have too much confidence in themselves. Alice Barfield planned to send someone to Marian on the next night with a mysterious message from Brian that would tempt Marian to venture into a trap; but on the next morning there arrived from Paris at the office of Morgan and Sons a note in Brian's handwriting to Mr. Morgan. It was to tell him that it was useless to search for the runaway, as he was beyond the arm of the law, and that to seek him would be to bring much greater disgrace on all concerned. That letter, which Alice had forced (as she thought) from the unwilling and desperate Brian under threat of a horrible death, was a terrible blow to John Morgan. It seemed to confirm his worst suspicions; in a hopeless sort of way he sent for Marian Arnold, and held the letter to her without a word.

Marian read it eagerly; she studied it excitedly; then, to Morgan's consternation, she waved it aloft with a triumphant laugh.

"He is not in Paris and he has not absconded!" she cried. "I can see that this letter was forced from him in order to throw us off the track; but an idea seized Brian and he finally consented, pretending to be unwilling all the time. He guessed that I might see the letter, and if I did that I should be able to read the cipher."

"Cipher!" echoed the bewildered John Morgan. "I see no hidden message or cryptogram. You're dreaming, my dear."

"Read every fourth letter in those words," said Marian, handing him the writing. "Every fourth letter written there goes to form a hidden message, and that message explains the figures and letters on the back of the stamp-photograph! He is kept a prisoner at 24 Bath Walk! Where is that?"

"Phew! About the worst street in the Metropolis, or in that part of it."

"We must rescue him at once!" said Marian. "They may kill him!"

The police counselled waiting till dark, and so it happened that while Alice was arranging to entice Marian into the same den, the girl was waiting near Bath Walk while a number of detectives raided the house and rescued Brian Wyndhurst, exhausted by exposure, ill-treatment, and anxiety, from the hands of the rascals who had been only too ready to do as Alice Barfield wished for a few pounds.

Alice, on learning from her female emissary, that Marian was out, had been seized by some misgiving; but instead of fleeing she had foolishly hastened to Bath Walk, where she was arrested just as Brian was released. She had the mortification, and fitting punishment, of seeing the meeting of the lovers.

Brian was taken to Mr. Morgan's home, where he received every attention.

The remainder of the plot was soon made public property. Brian had accepted an invitation and urgent request from Jackson to accompany him to a conversazione at a workmen's institute; but that was a ruse to get him into a lonely place.

He was drugged and conveyed to Bath Walk, and his keys were taken from him. He was stripped, and, on regaining consciousness, had to put on some loathsome clothing. Jackson took the office key and the key of the safe, while the woman took the key of his lodgings. It was Jackson who forged the signatures.

Jackson, on being arrested, volunteered all the information which the police wanted, but he gained little thereby. He was sentenced to two years' penal servitude. Alice Barfield suffered a heavier sentence, but she walked from the dock defiantly, unrelenting.

The bulk of the £1,000 was never recovered, but Mr. Morgan was not much troubled about it. As for Brian and Marian, they had suffered, but it had intensified their love, and, after a while, they even felt a little sorry for the accomplices who were wearing away some of the best years of their life in prison.

G. Merriam.

Digitized by Google

This Bale contains Pair Full-sized heavy Whitney Blankets, 1 quilt, red and white, blue and white; White Honeycomb Marcella or Red Twill your choice; Pair Full-size White Twill Sheets, 2 Pillow Cases, 1 Bolster Case, 5 Toilet Mats, 1 Toilet Cover, 2 Turkish Towels, Pair Fine Lace Curtains, 1 White Table Cloth, 1 Fringed Damask Table Cover, 6 Dusters, 2 Tea Cloths—28 Articles 49/6. How to pay. Send 6/- only, we send Bale, carriage paid for approval; balance can be paid in six monthly payments of 6/-, and one of 7/6. If you pay balance on receipt, send only 38/6, saving 5/-. Address below.

55 ARTICLES FOR 25/- ON CREDIT.

Our Gigantic Parcel contains 6 Table Knives and Forks, 6 Dessert Knives and Forks, 12 Tea Spoons, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 1 pair Sugar Tongs, 2 Table Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, and 2 Salt Spoons. We send, carriage paid, on receipt of 3s.; balance 1s. weekly.

PRUDENTIAL FURNISHING STORES, 150-150L Seven Sisters Rd., Holloway, N.

KEEP A GOOD HOLD ON HEALTH

50 years' British reputation has proved PAGE WOODCOCK'S (WIND PILLS to be THE safe, sure & speedy remedy for Wind on the Stomach. Indigestion. Biliousness. Sick Headache. Palpitation. Depression. Nervousness. Languor, &c. Sold by all Chemists, &c., at 1/1½ and 2/9.

Smiths

SULPHOLINE LOTION

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

PAWNBROKER'S SALE

Every article in new condition.

SPECIAL BARGAINS UNREDEEMED.

A full list sent post free on application.

13/6 Gent's magnificent 18-ct. Gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch, jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper, 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable curb (pocket to pocket) double Albert same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; three together.

12/6 Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch, jewelled movement; exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed) elegant West-End pattern the two together.

14/9 Furs.—Magnificent Alexandra Dagmar necklet and muff; beautiful real Russian sable hair, worth 4 guineas, not been worn; sacrifice for 14/9; approval willingly.

19/6 Genuine Italian Mandoline, by Stridente, Naples; fine tone; 21 ribbed, real rosewood, pearl and tortoiseshell inlaid, in saddler-made case; approval.

8/9 Feather Boas; bankrupt stock; special bargains: real Ostrich Feather Boas, beautifully curly; perfectly new, in box; colours: grey and white black and white, and natural.

10/6 Lustrous diamond and ruby Half-hoop Ring, set with 5 matchless doublet rubies and 8 real diamonds; solid gold, hall-marked.

7/6 Curb Chain Bracelet, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case.

6/9 Brooch; very handsome 18-carat rolled gold, 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls in case.

21/- Lady's solid gold Keyless Watch, jewelled in 10 rubies, beautifully engraved case, splendid time-keeper; 10 years' written warranty; week's free trial.

8/6 Fashionable Long Neck-chain; genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished; very choice design.

9/6 Organ Toned Melodeon; magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, and 4 acting stops, including Tremolo and Diapason action; rich powerful tone, perfect order.

9/6 Necklet with Heart Pendant, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise.

12/6 Magnificent 5-row Pearl Collarette; finest quality, mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case.

Any of the above articles sent on approval willingly.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK,

Southampton Buildings, Chancery Lane, London.

2½% DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS 2½% repayable on demand.

The BIRKBECK ALMANACK, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVENSCROFT, Managing Director.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM (CLOTTED)

absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil; invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1s. 4d.; 1lb. 2s. 4d.; 2lbs. 4s. 4d., free, supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by MRS. CONYERS, Morchard Bishop, Devon.

J. G. GRAVES'

TAILORING

For Men's and Boys' Suits, Overcoats, Mackintoshes, or Complete Outfitting, see our No. 5 Illustrated Catalogue. Particulars of Latest Styles, Patterns, Easy Terms of Payment, etc., fully described. Important Advantages to Cash Purchasers.

PROFITABLE AGENCIES offered to Persons with Spare Time.

J. G. GRAVES, 69 Division St., Sheffield.

If you wish to EAT WELL

—TAKE—

BEECHAM'S

PILLS.

You will EAT WELL,

because by their specific action on the digestive organs Beecham's Pills remove the sensation of fulness and oppression commonly experienced, give the appetite "edge," and restore the stomach to healthy and natural function.

Sold everywhere in Boxes price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 pills).

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Should Love Affairs be Kept Secret?

"SHOULD a girl tell her friends her love affairs?" inquires "GERTY." "I am just dying to confide in somebody my troubles and joys over my own affairs, but do not know whether it would not be unkind to my lover to make him a topic of conversation among other girls."

* * * * *

You are very wise and discreet, "GERTY." Certainly love affairs should not be the subject of "tittle-tattle." It is very unkind to a man to make him so pointed an object of interest to a lot of girls he does not know. If, however, you have one friend whom you can trust, I think you would be doing yourself much good by seeking her advice or consolation. Such feelings gain nothing by being "bottled up."

The Girl About Town.

"THE girl I am fond of," writes "GUS," "is a business girl, who attends an evening class three times a week. This means that she has to journey across town every night at a late hour. I am very nervous of her making these trips alone, yet could scarcely offer to see her home every night, as that would attract too much attention. Besides, I live in lodgings at the other end of the town. How would you advise me to act?"

* * * * *

I should change my lodgings, "GUS," and go to the neighbourhood in which she lives, if that is possible. If she is willing, there would then be nothing pointed about your seeing her home, as in any case you would be going that way. Neither need you always go to the door of her home, and thereby cause her embarrassment. Certainly a girl does need some kind of escort in crossing a big city late at night.

Should a Girl Tell Her Past?

"THE man who is now my fiancé," writes "ANNIE," "thinks that he is the only man who has ever kissed me. I have not denied this, but, as a matter of fact, I have had more than one previous love affair. Now to tell him this would, I fear, disturb his affection for me. Ought I, do you think, to tell him all about things, or should I leave it till later on?"

* * * * *

I think it is better to be candid now. It would be far better for him to know at the beginning all about your past affairs than to suddenly find out that you have been concealing things from him. It may be a blow to break the news to him, but if you do it carefully, he ought to be made to see that it is not unnatural that you should have attracted others. Besides he will afterwards admire you the more for being open with him, and what man is there whose vanity is not gratified by the thought that he has carried off in triumph a girl whom others have failed to win?

Asking a Girl Home.

"I AM very friendly with a certain girl," writes "CHARLIE," "but do not wish to propose to her until my people know her and like her. However, I do not quite know how this is to be managed, as I understand it is not etiquette for a man to invite a girl home without some chaperone."

* * * * *

"CHARLIE" is very sensible in his ideas. Certainly he had better postpone proposing until he has the approval of his family. As to inviting the girl to his home, "CHARLIE" should certainly include in the invitation one of her relations, her mother, sister, or brother, so as to place the affair on a formal social basis.

Friendship—Not Love.

"I AM very 'gone' on a certain man," writes "HELEN," "but every time we have discussed love and marriage, he has told me that on no account could he allow himself to go further with a girl than friendship. He pretends that he disapproves of marriage and says he will remain a bachelor. What am I to do to overcome such a feeling on his part?"

* * * * *

If you are really in love with him you have certainly done a good deal in winning the friendship of a man who poses as a woman-hater. In time, perhaps, you will persuade him to alter his views. But on no account try to draw him by petty devices, as such men are rarely attracted that way. Enjoy his friendship, and hope that in time something riper will result.

Not Jealous Enough.

"I AM worried, perhaps for a very absurd reason," writes "J. K. T." "My sweetheart is not a bit jealous. Whenever I talk of other girls I know, or have met, she just takes an interest in them, but never seems to be afraid of my carrying matters too far. Now do you think such a girl can be really fond of me? Is not jealousy a proper part of love?"

* * * * *

You are to be congratulated on having so very sensible a sweetheart. Evidently she has such perfect trust in you that the idea of your being unfaithful has never crossed her mind. No, jealousy is not a proper part of love. It is a very unpleasant and foolish passion, which does far more harm than good. However, don't try too hard to excite such feelings in your sweetheart. She might be deluded into jealousy, and such girls rarely forgive tricks.

Angling for Brothers.

"MOLLY" writes: "For some time I and my parents have lived in a small country village, where we have only very rarely been asked to visit our neighbours. It is six months since we last visited a certain family where there are five girls. The other day, a brother of mine (unmarried) returned from abroad. The day after his arrival we received an invitation to visit the family in question. How do you think I ought to view such proceedings?"

* * * * *

Evidently that family of girls had a business eye on your brother. It is, however, exceedingly rude and clumsy of them to show it quite so pointedly. To neglect you for six months, and then only ask you as a sort of cover for your brother, shows that they cannot be very desirable people to cultivate. You should decline the invitation, and save your brother from young ladies whose keenness to meet him is so badly disguised. At any rate, leave it to him to say whether or not he wishes to make their acquaintance.

Cynthia.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A SITUATION WORTH £100 A YEAR

For a BOY. (Parents may help their Son to win.)

A SITUATION WORTH £100 A YEAR

For a GIRL. (Parents may help their Daughter to win.)

Offered by THE BOYS' LEADER, "The Paper a Boy can take Home."
Published by the Proprietors of "Pearson's Weekly," &c.

The Editor of THE BOYS' LEADER offers a Situation in the Offices of PEARSON'S WEEKLY, THE BOYS' LEADER, &c., and a salary of £100 a year to commence with, to a boy; and a like Situation and Salary of £100 a year to a girl.

100 CONSOLATION GIFTS WILL ALSO BE AWARDED.

These will be offered by competition, and the competition is this:—

SIX QUESTIONS WILL APPEAR EVERY WEEK IN "THE BOYS' LEADER."

THIS IS THE FIRST SET.

1. Who wrote Robinson Crusoe?
2. What famous British soldier is known as "Bobs"?
3. Who is your favourite hero (not fiction), and why?
4. Who made most runs in first-class cricket this summer?
5. Which is your favourite book, and why?
6. When was King Edward VII. born. Give year and day?

The Second Set of Questions will appear in THE BOYS' LEADER (1d. every Tuesday), on Tuesday, November 10.

It will be noticed that some of the questions call for an expression of opinion only, and others you will have to search for in books.

Cut out and paste these questions on a sheet of foolscap paper numbering it No. 1. Write your reply to No. 1. immediately below, and then follow with No. 2, and so on, saying in what book you found the information and who helped you to find it.

Anybody may help you provided you say who. No competitor must be over 21 years of age. No reply must exceed fifty words. Keep all replies until the last set appears and until we tell you to send them in. Write plainly in ink on one side of the paper.

HINTS

Most towns and even villages have now a Reference Library, so it will be easy to get access to books.
Parents and friends may be able to tell you many of the replies, and you can use this information provided you tell us how you obtained it.
This competition will be a valuable education for a boy or girl, even if they do not wish to enter for the prizes.
The two successful competitors will be given the choice, after we have arranged with their parents, of entering one of the following departments of our offices:—The Editorial Department, the Art Department, the Counting House.
Should the winners live outside London, we have no doubt we shall be able to arrange with their parents as to their residence.
At all events, here is an opportunity for some boy and some girl to put their feet on the first rung of Fortune's Ladder, and we hope every parent who has his child's interest at heart will make an effort on their behalf

---

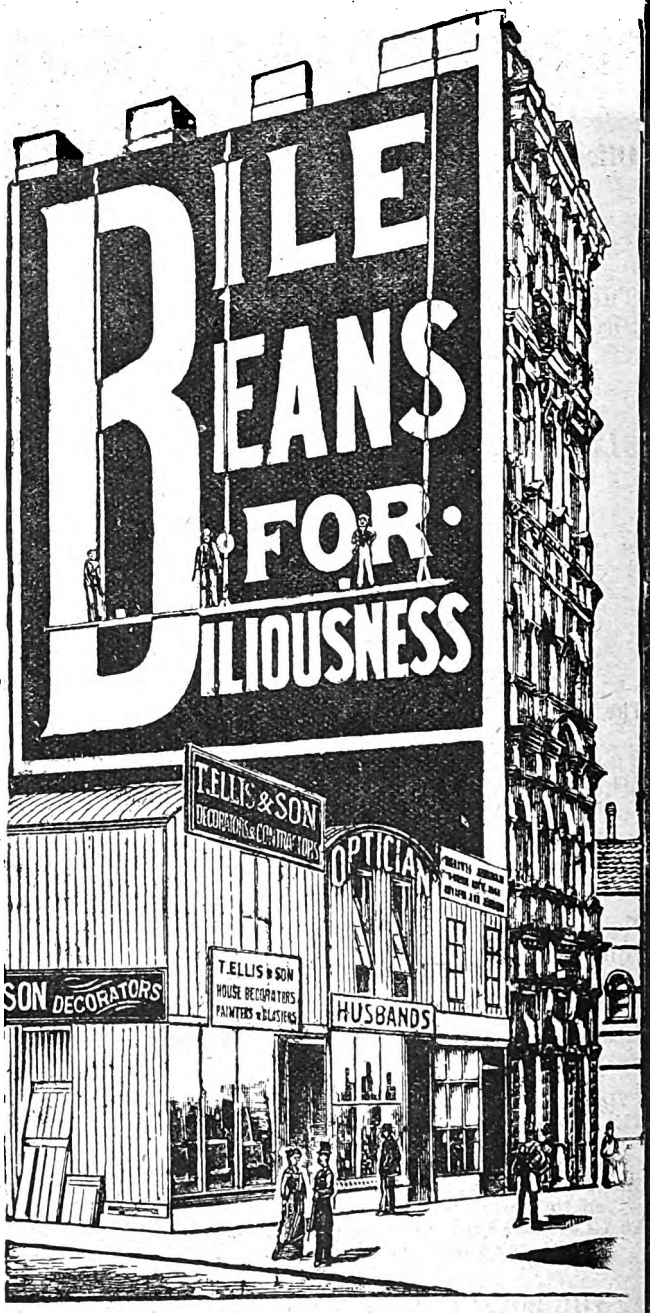
THE BOYS' LEADER is the best paper a boy and girl can read. It is only a few weeks' old, but has already, by reason of its healthy tone, taken the first place in this class of literature; and articles and stories are contributed by Jules Verne, George Manville Fenn, Theodore Roosevelt (President of the United States), Sir Henry Seton-Karr, M.P., Major Baden-Powell, T. P. O'Connor, M.P., Lord Ernest Hamilton, the late Max O'Rell, the Duke of Argyle, General Sir Evelyn Wood, G.C.B., &c., &c.

Digitized by Google

THE GREAT "AD"

OF THE WORLD'S GREATEST SPECIFIC.

THE accompanying sketch depicts a huge advertisement of the Bile Bean Manufacturing Company in Australia. The largest letter—the now world-famous "B"—stands forty feet in height, and compared with it the men of average height on the scaffolding appear to be mere pigmies. Bile Beans' most telling advertisement, however, is to be found inside the houses of the people, where the great army who have been benefited by them sing their praises and recommend them to others who suffer as they once did. The fame of Bile Beans has so far spread, and the manufacture of them so greatly increased, that the making and purveying of Bile Beans for Biliousness is now one of the largest medicinal enterprises in the world. This gigantic sign is a wonder of the advertising world. Bile Beans are a wonder of the medicinal world.



AUSTRALIA'S 40-FOOT BIG "B."

HOW BILE BEANS Cure INDIGESTION.

Many people fondly believe that if they can only get a change of air they will cease to suffer from indigestion, liver complaint, biliousness, or some similar ailment which may be troubling them. In this way vast sums of money are wasted every year in stays at the seaside or in the country. "I often went away for a change of air," says Mrs. Brown, of Park View, Leven, "but derived very little good fr m it, and in a few days I would have indigestion just as bad again. After any food I had most violent pains, accompanied with headache, sickness, and feelings of weakness. In the end I grew so debilitated that I could not do my housework. Sometimes I felt quite hungry, but I actually dare not eat because of the pain it occasioned me afterwards. Various doctors were consulted, and I took their prescriptions, but the relief I obtained was very meagre and only temporary.

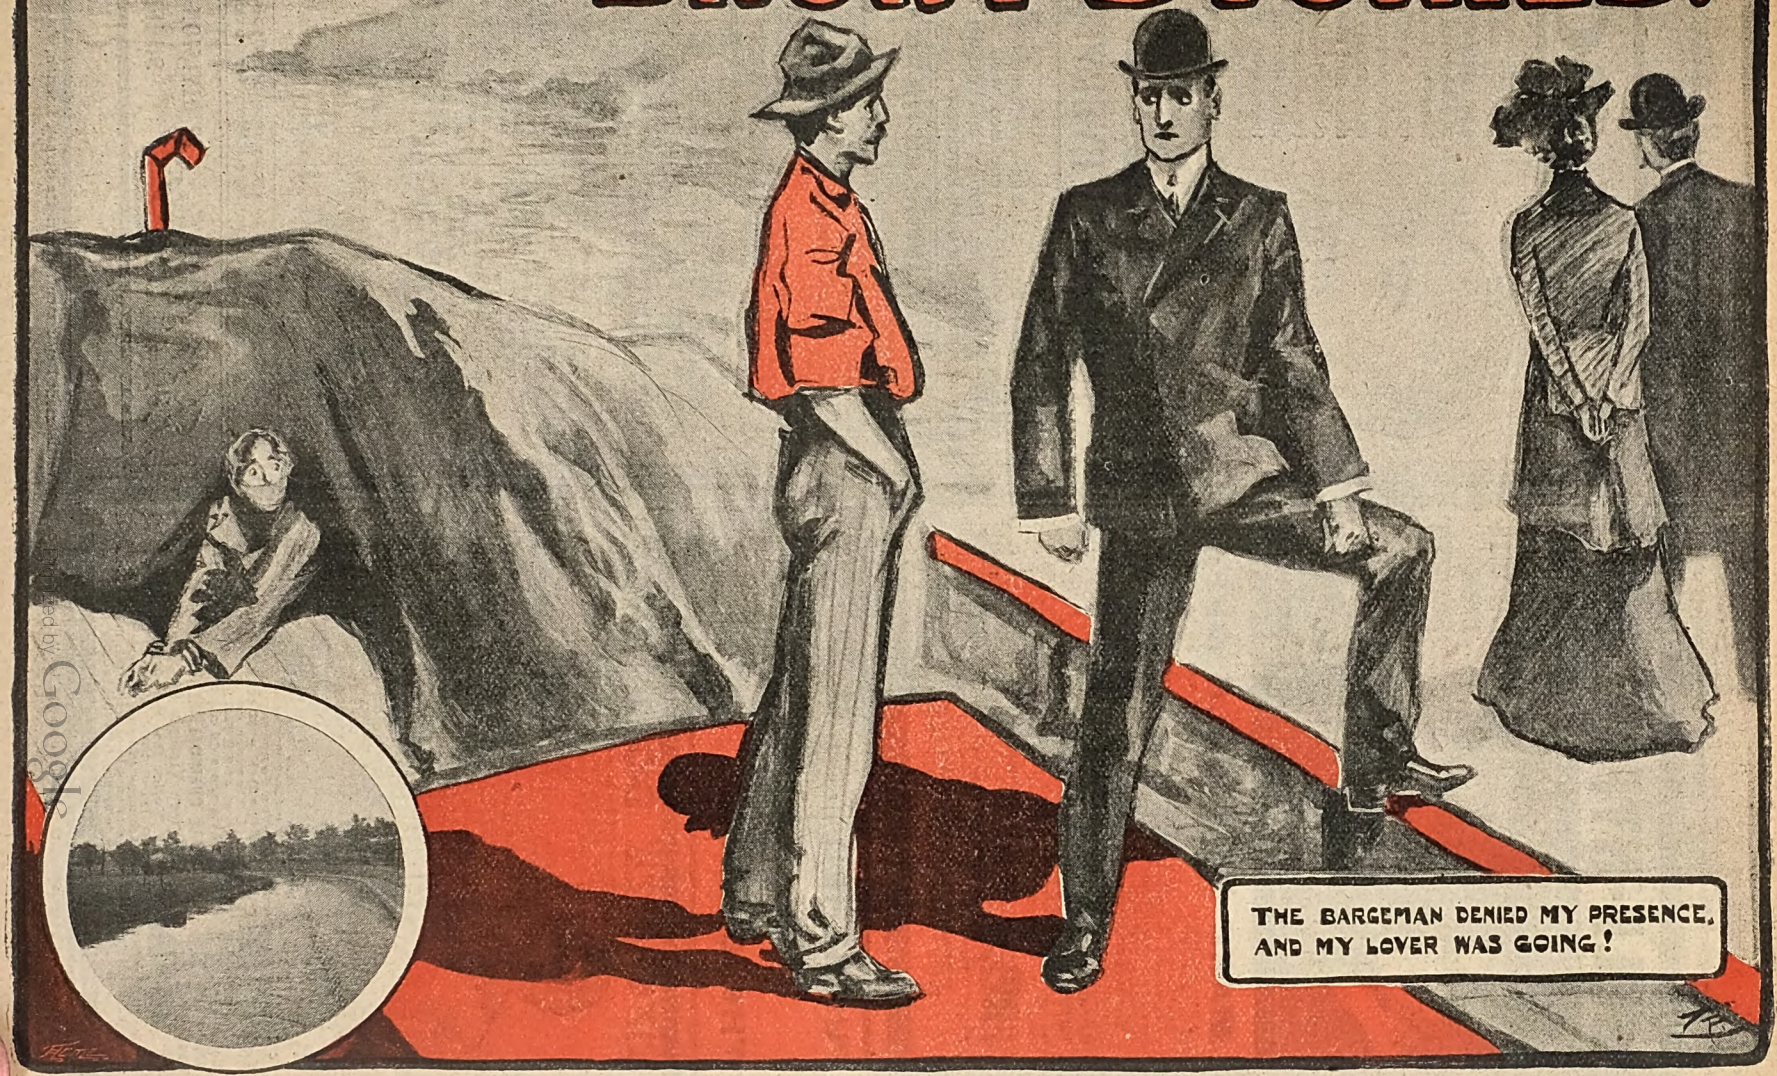
"At last I decided to give Bile Beans a trial. Soon after beginning with them I felt I was improving, so I persevered. The relief I gained was marvellous, and after a short course I found myself quite restored to health. I can now eat any kind of food with relish, and I am never more pleased than when I am recommending to other sufferers the medicine which cured me."

THE MEDICINE FOR THE MILLION.

BILE BEANS for Biliousness are the finest family medicine, and promptly and permanently cure Headache, Constipation, Colds, Liver Chill, Influenza, Piles, Liver Troubles, Bad Breath, Indigestion, Flatulence, Loss o Appetite, Dizziness, Buzzing in the Head, Sleeplessness, Debility, Anæmia, and all Female Ailments. Of all Medicine Vendors, 1/1½ and 2/9 per box (LARGE BOX CONTAINS THREE TIMES QUANTITY SMALL SIZE).

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES. 1D

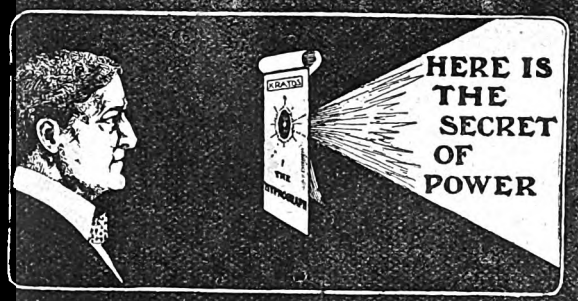


This little photograph shows the part of the canal where

No. 776. Week ending November 14, 1903.

Digitized by Google

SELF-HYPNOTISM



MAKE YOURSELF OVER

A new and unique device called The Hypnograph has been invented for Self-Hypnotism.

The idea is to use hypnotism on yourself and thus intentionally re-form your mind and character and improve your health through the well-known laws of auto-suggestion. It is perfectly harmless and a most beneficial, delightful and fascinating exercise.

The Hypnograph works with any one straight away. It impresses the mind with wonderful quickness and precision. It supplies a glorious opportunity to rapidly develop your Will-Power, Energy, Courage, Self-Confidence, Persistency, Concentration, and all the qualities of mind which make for Success in life.

The Hypnograph is strictly scientific. It is to mental work what the compass is to navigation. It cannot fail to help you. Until you have used it you cannot realize what a wonderful and beneficial thing it is.

FREE. At present The Hypnograph is not for sale, but is offered free in order to create an interest in our practical books on mental subjects. If you are sufficiently interested to want The Hypnograph write for the free Illustrated Booklet "The Power Within." enclosing 1d. Stamp for return postage.

RESEARCH PUBLISHING CO. (Dept. 437), Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, London, E.C.

PUBLISHED FOR THE DEAF.

A special description of the causes, prevention, and home treatment of deafness is contained in the REVIEW OF EAR, NOSE and THROAT DISEASES. Anyone whose hearing is failing should send for a free copy of this Medical Journal. Address all communications to The Editor, 10 Marble Arch, London, W.

LIFE-SIZE DOLL FREE!

"Baby's Clothes will now fit Dollie." GIRLS can get this beautiful Life-size Doll absolutely free for selling only ten packages of the Electric Polishing Fabric, at 6d. a package. Something new for cleaning and polishing Jewellery, Silver Ware, &c., without the use of powder, paste, or liquid. Sells at sight. Write to day, and we will send you the Fabric post paid. When sold send us the money (5s.) and we will send you post free this Life-size Doll, which is 2½ft. high, and can wear baby's clothes. When stuffed, this doll is an exact reproduction in fast colours of a hand-painted French creation, done on extra-heavy cloth that will not tear. The workmanship is perfect, the colour effects the very finest. The doll is intended to be stuffed with cotton wool or flock, &c. It is this century's model of the old-fashioned Rag Doll that Grandma used to make and would make Grandma open her eyes in wonder. Dollie is printed with Golden Hair, Rosy Cheeks, Brown Eyes, Kid-Coloured Body, Red Stockings, Black Shoes, and will stand alone. If Mamma can donate one of baby's out-grown dresses that her little daughter can put on and off, button and unbutton to her heart's desire, the Life-size Doll will live in that child's memory long after childhood's days have passed. If you do not care to sell our goods, we will send the Doll post free to any address in the United Kingdom on receipt of 2s., or a single packet of SHY-NALL on receipt of 6d. These Dolls are sold all the year round.

SHY-NALL,

SHY-NALL CHEMICAL CO. (Doll Dept. 38L), 75 Queen Victoria St., London, E.C.

Special Notice to Foreign and Colonial Readers only.—Orders from abroad for dolls or single packets of Shy-Nall must be accompanied by an additional 6d., and for the ten packets of Shy-Nall to be sent on sale or return 9d. must be enclosed for postage. Remittance to be made by Post Office Order only.

585,209

During the year 1902 I had accounts with five hundred and eighty-five thousand, two hundred and nine customers. I do not suppose that a single one of this enormous number did business merely to oblige me, they sent their orders in full confidence that they would be well served and on the understanding that unless thoroughly pleased with the goods there would be no obligation whatever to purchase. Seven days are always allowed for approval, and if you are not entirely satisfied send the package back.

"I PROVIDE EVERYTHING."

If the goods are perfectly satisfactory you can pay for them as you prefer: Cash or Easy Monthly Instalments, full particulars of which are enclosed with each Catalogue, together with Order Forms and details of Important Advantages offered to Cash Purchasers.

Any Departmental Catalogue sent Post Free on application.
MENTION THE NUMBER OF THE CATALOGUE YOU REQUIRE.

1. Watches. All my well-known Watch Specialities fully illustrated and described. My Watch Department is the Largest Watch-Sales Concern in the World.
2. Tools and Machinery. Thousands of illustrations. Every known Tool and Machine is supplied on Easy Terms of Payment.
3. Furniture. Every Furnishing requirement is illustrated. My System of Furnishing by Easy Instalments is fully explained. From £5 to £500 Special Arrangements.
4. Mantles & Costumes. A beautiful Album of the Fashions of the Season.
5. Gent's Tailoring. This Stylish Department is splendidly equipped, and is probably the Largest Clothing Business in Great Britain.
6. Boots and Shoes. Beautifully Illustrated. A Splendid Choice of the Newest Ideas in Foot Wear. Contractors to His Majesty's Government.
7. Bookselling Department. Catalogue describes a vast assortment of Standard and Current Literature.
8. Sheffield Cutlery and Plate. The produce of my own Factories illustrated and fully described. Hotel and Shipping Orders a Speciality.
9. Glass, China, Lamps and Stoves. Dinner and Tea Services, Toilet and Bedroom Ware, Lamps, Stoves, etc.
10. Clocks. Every known style and make supplied on Easy Terms of Payment.
11. General Draperies, etc. Dress Goods, Blankets, Sheets, Furs, Ladies' Outfitting, Babies' and Children's Clothing, etc.
12. Gold Jewellery and Diamonds. Engagement and Wedding Rings, Bracelets, Brooches, and all kinds of Gold Ornaments, fully illustrated and described.
13. General Fancy Goods. Bags, Umbrellas, Albums, every kind of Leather Goods for Wedding Presents and Home Use.
14. Cameras and Optical Goods. Hundreds of Designs by the most reliable makers.
15. Bicycles and Domestic Machinery. Cycles of all kinds, Mail Carts, Perambulators, Washing and Wringing Machines, Sewing and Knitting Machines, Knife Cleaning Machines, etc.
16. Musical Department. Pianos, Organs, and every known Musical Instrument supplied on Easy Payment Terms.
17. Army and Navy. A Catalogue containing Watches, Jewellery, Cutlery, Plate, Clothing, &c., specially compiled to meet the requirements of all grades of the services.
18. Colonial Department. A comprehensive volume (944 pages). Thousands of illustrations and prices of Goods in every Department. The finest work of reference published for Foreign and Colonial Trade. Special Cash Discount for Shipping Orders.
19. Harness and Vehicles of every description.

An Agency for my Firm is a very remunerative way of using spare time to advantage. Write for particulars.

J. G. Graves 69 DIVISION STREET, SHEFFIELD.

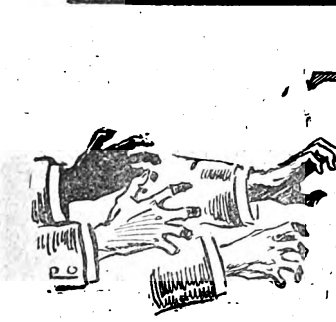
Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES.

No. 776.] Week Ending November 14th, 1903. [One Penny.

Fascinating New Series. Start To-day.



The Pursuit of Sara

For New Readers.

Miss Sara Gillespie, the relater of these experiences, was a typine in the firm of Templeton & Co.

The partners in the firm, Mr. Templeton, Mr. Harrington Shackell, and Mr. Rigby Starr, treated Sara most courteously, especially the senior partner, who, before very long, induced her to tell him all about her absent lover, Noel Masterman.

Noel was the nephew of Sir Francis Masterman, who in his will left him a thousand pounds. With this money he intended to buy a doctor's practice, and to give up the situation he was holding, that of medical attendant to a gentleman who was travelling on the Continent.

He came home to England on the death of the Baronet, but was soon recalled by telegram to Nice, as his patient had shown bad symptoms.

Noel was, however, loth to give up the idea of purchasing the practice he had in view, so, leaving the thousand pounds with them in notes, he signed a document authorising Templeton & Co. to act for him.

By a piece of trickery the firm converted this into a document authorising them to deal with his whole estate. He was heir to the baronetcy, in the event of the present holder of the title, Sir Herbert, his cousin, having no heir.

The next day Sara overheard the three partners gloating over the probable success of their schemes.

Then she was amazed and horrified to hear Shackell relate how, posing as Sir Herbert's valet, he had murdered the baronet in cold blood, and had been most careful to leave no clues behind him.

Little by little she understood the full meaning of the vile plot the scoundrels had in hand.

Her betrothed was now Sir Noel Masterman, and Templeton & Co. had full power over his estate!

She resolved on a bold scheme—to get possession of the notes and the document. Bursting into the room, she eluded her astounded employers, seized the precious papers, and fled.

Besides the £1,000 in notes, she had about five pounds with her. Sara wired to Noel to return at once, and then she took train to Bedford.

While there a murderous attack was made on her by Rigby Starr, disguised as a nurse.

He endeavoured to push Sara into the river by Newnham Bridge, but in his eagerness he was nearly drowned himself.

Sara escaped, and, still retaining the all-important paper relating to her lover's inheritance, made her way to Northampton.

Templeton & Co., she knew, would leave no stone unturned to find her; no course would be too desperate for them to take in order to regain the document.

At Northampton Sara rescued a little boy from death, and thereby gained the devoted friendship of a young girl named Maggie Dunkley. To her she confided all her troubles.

In this town, Sara was led to believe that Noel was an inmate of a lunatic asylum.

In disguise, Harrington Shackell enticed Sara to the racecourse, saying that he would rescue Noel for her.

Sara went, as invited, and another desperate attempt was then made by the firm to recover the papers.

They were, however, outwitted, and Miss Gillespie fled to Leicester. Here she met Sidney Ilford, an agent of the firm, who tried to get Sara to give up the papers to him.

He took a paper from his breast pocket and handed it to her, keeping a tight grip on her arm.

"Read," he said, "it will interest you."

From the document there stared at her a hideous and distorted likeness of herself!

With a cry she grasped the paper tight, and read, her cheeks aflame, the description of her face and figure that succeeded. It offered a reward of £100 to the person who arrested her! She was in a dire plight!

She just managed to run away from him. She reached her hotel to find an adjacent factory in flames.

Against her window a ladder was placed, and up came Templeton and Rigby Starr! In the latter's hand was a knife!

"Help! Help!" she screamed.

And then, with blind fury, Sara threw herself against the figure clambering into the room, and strove to force him back into the abyss below.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

WHAT HAPPENED BY THE CANAL.

LINKING my arm about his shoulders, I pressed him back with the strength that comes to all of us, even the weakest, at crises in our lives. Gripping the window frame—an inch or two above him—he strove to hoist himself, by sheer power of muscle, into the room. Leaning my whole weight forward, with a sudden jerk, I all but over-balanced him; involuntarily he let go of the frame, and, clutching at me for support, caught me round the neck.

The clasp almost throttled me; instinctively I staggered back, fighting for air.

This movement on my part gave him his chance. Like a flash he released me, aiming a blow at my head that all but knocked me off my feet. Blinded with pain and rage, I flew back to the window, slamming it down before he could withdraw his hand, so that he hung suspended by the wrist.

The cry of agony that broke from him was the signal for an onslaught on the door. Sidney Ilford, realising his partner was in danger, was fumbling nervously with the lock. In a second I crossed the room, jamming myself behind the door, so that when it opened I should be concealed from view.

The next minute the door flew back on its hinges, Ilford, with eyes and ears alone for Rigby rushed to his assistance. Darting from my hiding-place, I rushed from the room down the corridor to the landing, where, by good luck, I found the lift ready and waiting.

"To the hall!" I gasped. "I'm going out," and I settled my hat, somewhat askew from my exertions, straight on my head. When I reached the street, the suddenness of my escape seemed to daze me. It was but a minute since I was upstairs fighting a last forlorn and desperate fight for love and liberty. Now the struggle was over and I was free with the notes and document in my possession.

My mind, working quickly, mapped out a plan of campaign. Hurrying past Campbell Street, still blocked with the crowd of onlookers at the fire, I made my way down Granby Street to a hairdresser's on the right hand side of the name of Jackson, where I remembered having seen the legend "wig maker" in the window.

I had made up my mind not to be driven from Leicester, at any rate until I had seen Maggie and learnt the news she had to tell. In order to carry out my purpose, however, it was obvious that Templeton and Co. must be thrown off the scent. Hitherto I had been the quarry, they the dogs. Now it was time I should play another rôle. I would take a leaf out of their book, and so effectually disguise myself that they would not cast a second look in my direction.

After some difficulty I secured a wig that answered my requirements. Of smooth iron grey hair, it completely altered my appearance. From the hairdresser's I hurried to a chemist's, where I purchased a box of rouge, an eyebrow pencil, and a pocket mirror, while from a milliner's next door I procured a dowdy-looking "sailor" in black straw and a thin black veil. Laden with parcels I hailed a four-wheeled cab, and told him to drive down the London Road towards Victoria Park.

I waited till we were clear of the more crowded streets, and then quickly, though with apprehension, proceeded to fix on my wig. Straining my hair back from my forehead, I contrived to coil it into a neat, hard bump. It made my head rather an odd shape, but that was a secondary consideration. The grey wig, parted in smooth bands on my forehead, securely fastened, I turned my attention to the box of rouge. My natural complexion is pale, my skin dead white. By the time I had rubbed on plenty of red colour, deepened my eyebrows from pale brown to black, I do not think my dearest friend would have recognised me. I am sure Noel would have passed me by. In my black coat and skirt, my neat sailor hat and veil, I looked a middle-aged woman of healthy, if plain, appearance.

My toilette finished, I packed my hat into a parcel, and, stopping the cab, alighted on the outskirts of Victoria Park. The cabman, whatever he thought, made no comment on the alteration in my looks, but contented himself with demanding just double his legal fare.

I paid what he asked, then, turning into the park, quietly deposited my hat behind a clump of trees. Some ten minutes later, seated on the top of a tramcar, I passed Harrington Shackel tearing along the road at a terrific rate. He scanned the tram as it passed him, but his eyes passed me by indifferently; he did not know me!

Having dispatched a long and urgent wire to Maggie warning her against the renewed activities of Templeton and Co., and appointing the "Old Gateway" as our meeting-place for to-morrow morning at 12.30, I judged it time to get something to eat.

It was now close upon half-past four, the fire had died down, the crowd of sightseers dispersing thronged the streets.

A certain little restaurant at the corner of Campbell Street, "Bottini's," struck me as a pleasant refuge from the turmoil.

I entered and took a seat at the far end of the apartment facing the door.

I was half through an appetising meal of lamb cutlets and green peas, when my attention was arrested by the occupants of an adjoining table. I had paid but little attention to my surroundings hithero, thankful for a short respite from the danger and excitement that of late had been my daily portion. I had eaten my dinner oblivious of what was happening round me.

The sound of a sharp metallic laugh roused me. Turning my head, I saw, at the table next but one to mine, Templeton, Shackell, and Rigby Starr!

Forgetting my disguise, I was within an ace of starting to my feet and making a wild dash for the door. I only just saved myself from such an act of folly, and, trembling with the strain, I leant back half dead with fear.

"A wild cat!" cried Rigby, who had suffered most through my escapades. "I should like to throttle her."

"So you said before," interrupted Shackell, "you don't seem able to carry out your wishes."

"You've nothing to boast of," retorted the other, "she fooled you pretty well."

"For Heaven's sake don't quarrel," interrupted Templeton. "Time's precious, while you sit here and argue, the little cat may be making good her escape."

"No chance of that," said Rigby, "we're watching all the stations and the hotels. She can't give us the slip this time. Her red head's not easy to overlook."

"Leicester's a large place," said the senior partner. "A sharp-witted woman like her could contrive to lie low for some time."

"What do you think we ought to do, then?"

"We shall have to get at her through the people at Northampton. I've wired to an agent there, and told him to shadow the Dunkley girl till further orders. Meanwhile," he glanced at the clock, "we've other matters to discuss. Where's Ilford?" and he glanced sharply at Shackell.

"He's posted at the hotel. He persists in thinking Miss Gillespie will come back there to ask for letters."

"Maybe he's right. At any rate let him stay there for an hour or two. In all other regards," he lowered his voice and looked round cautiously, "things are very satisfactory. It could have been wished that the affair had been finished quicker, but——"

"Is the cash right? That's the question," said Starr.

The senior partner nodded.

Digitized by Google

"Not a doubt," he said, "and now," he rose as he spoke, "I think we'd better be going. Tell Ilford to meet me outside the Palace Music Hall at eight o'clock to report. Starr can take his place, and Shackell"—the senior partner smiled—"you know what you have to do?" he queried softly.

Harrington nodded, and the glint in his eyes sent a shiver through my very heart.

I had made shift to continue eating my dinner while they talked, holding an illustrated paper as a screen before my face. As Templeton turned to go, however, I forced myself to lay the paper down. Now was the time to test the efficacy of my disguise. If they recognised me, it was better they should do so here in a public restaurant where, at any rate, I should be safe from personal violence, than in a more remote spot.

Slowly I raised my eyes and looked at them all three in turn. They glanced at me, but took no notice and passed through the door.

As for me, I could hardly believe in my safety—and their stupidity. They had been within a few feet of me, had looked at and criticised me, and—blessings on my wig and my beautiful red cheeks, had not known that I was Sara!

My spirits rose at the thought of my cleverness. I grew bolder, and decided I would go to the Palace at eight o'clock and endeavour to overhear what took place between Templeton and Sidney Ilford. I was so elated with my small success that I under-estimated the resources of my enemy. Templeton was far too old and too experienced a general to be outmatched by me.

I waited in Bottini's till a quarter to eight, watching the stream of customers that in little groups of two and three came there to dine. Horsey-looking men with pretty women, clergymen with badly-dressed wives, one or two actresses from the local theatre with their local admirers, and a sprinkling of commercial travellers.

The streets, full of life and motion, were at their brightest when I left the little restaurant. The crowds outside the popular music hall reminded me of London, and brought a pang of home sickness. The hall itself, tastefully decorated, and bright with paint and gilding, was crammed to overflowing at the commencement of the show, with an appreciative and hilarious audience. I caught sight of Templeton's tall figure at the box office, and after a discreet interval I took a ticket in the same part of the house as he selected—the stalls. It happened by good fortune that my seat was in the very row immediately behind his. There was a vacant chair beside him, and once or twice he glanced round the theatre as though looking for the person for whom he had reserved it.

The performance had not long commenced before the guest arrived. It was Sidney Ilford—as I had expected. Under cover of a "serio-comic" with full orchestral accompaniment, Ilford rapidly detailed his movements.

Leaning forward, my eyes fixed on the stage, my face set in a smile of expectant delight, I contrived to overhear the conversation without rousing suspicion.

"She's not been back," said Sidney. "But about half an hour ago a boy came along with a telegram. I told him I was expecting a wire and glanced at the envelope to see the name on it. Imagine my delight when I realised it was for our dear Sara. Ray is the name she's chosen this time, as I happened to discover when she came to the hotel. I watched the boy deposit the wire in the office, and came off here, leaving Rigby on the watch outside."

"What's the use of that?" said the senior partner. "You should have offered to take the telegram to her, said she was downstairs at the door, or something of that sort. Whatever is the good of leaving the thing in the office?"

"I had to," was the answer. "She's given explicit instructions that letters and wires are to be delivered to her personally. I heard her myself."

"Then what do you propose to do?"

"You must go at once to the hotel and explain that you're a friend of the family, that she's stopping with your wife, and that you've called for her bag and any letters there may be. They'll believe your story like a rocket, especially if you offer to settle the bill. It's no use for me to try the game on, staying in the same hotel they wouldn't credit it, and Rigby they would recognise as well. I brought him down to the office when he fell through Sara's window. You're the only person they'll believe."

"Meantime the girl may go back and claim it?"

"Impossible, Rigby's posted on the steps of the hotel. She can't pass without his seeing her."

Turning my head I saw at a table near to mine, Templeton, Shackell, and Rigby Starr.

"I suppose the wire's from Northampton?" said Templeton.

"Perhaps, unless——" Ilford's head drew close to the other's, and his voice dropped to a whisper.

In my anxiety to catch what he was saying, I forgot the need of caution and turned my face from the stage towards him.

In an instant Templeton observed me.

"Have you dropped anything, madam?" he said coolly. "You appear to be looking in this direction."

"My programme," I stammered. "I think——"

"Your programme is in your hand," he said. Then, in a loud voice to Ilford:

"We will resume our conversation later on. Our talk distracts this lady's attention from the stage."

Several people heard the rebuff and stared at me in the delighted fashion people adopt when a third party is rebuked.

I sank back in the seat, nervously clutching the unhappy programme. My eyes upon the stage I took in nothing of the performance. Figures came and went, sang and danced, and to me the whole show was a blank. My mind was fixed on one thing, and one thing only. How should I circumvent Templeton, how stop him claiming my wire?

Digitized by Google

The number of a fresh turn went up. Templeton, glancing at his programme, announced that it was "Herbert Campbell."

"We may as well wait and hear him," he said.

Ilford nodded and laughed uproariously, as the great Herbert, in the garb of a policeman, walked, or rather waddled, on to the stage.

The two conspirators were safe for five minutes at least. If I left the theatre first, I should have a clear start. Once let me get out of the building, away from the blaze of light, the blare of sound, and some inspiration might come to me. But how could I leave without attracting their attention? I had already roused Templeton's suspicion, a move on my part would increase it. And yet, a middle-aged spinster—to all appearance I looked the part—could surely leave a music-hall without exciting comment. I might be shocked at the performance—alas! I had gazed with riveted attention at a short-skirted danseuse. What could I do?

Suddenly I started to my feet.

"I feel faint," I gasped, clutching hold of my neighbour, a dark, handsome-looking girl. "Please let me pass. I——"

"Lean on me," she answered readily. "Here, let the lady by, will you?" as one or two protested, "she's ill, poor thing."

"Shouldn't come to a hall, at her time of life," cried a shrill-voiced woman.

Careless of remark I clung to my pioneer, and passed down the row of seats in safety. Reaching the door I glanced back, and, to my horror, saw Templeton and Rigby preparing to leave.

"Thank you," I gasped, dropping the arm of the dark-haired girl. "It's very kind of you. I'm much obliged." and leaving her abruptly—and in open astonishment—I darted down the steps and across the road.

From where I stood I could see the entrance to the Palace plainly. I had not long to wait before Templeton appeared. In piteous indecision I watched the portly figure descend the steps, each minute gave me less time to act, brought him nearer to his goal—the wire that was lying at the hotel.

An urchin from the gutter, a pale-faced, keen-eyed Arab of the pavement nudged my arm.

"Mother's in gaol," he said in a hoarse voice, "and father's dead. I've no shoes"—he glanced at his bare feet—"and I'm hungry. Mother's in gaol."

He did not ask for money; only repeated his plaint, his eyes large and sombre fixed on mine. A sudden thought flashed through my mind.

"You see that gentleman?" Stooping, I caught hold of the boy's arm, and pointed to the senior partner.

"Which?" said the boy, with an artful leer.

"That one," I repeated, slipping a shilling in the grubby hand. "That tall, stout man with the high hat and grey whiskers. Do you think"—I clutched the urchin tight—"do you think you could—upset him?"

"I might," said the boy stolidly, "for half a crown."

"Here's three shillings. He's a bad man, a wicked man

The New Walk, Leicester, where Sara encountered Templeton, who penetrated her disguise.

He wants to put little boys like you in prison. He wants to put me in prison too. If you can upset him, throw him down so that he is quite a long time getting up, I shall be able to run away. Will you do it?"

"I'll butt him in the stomach," he replied cheerfully. "He'll go down—wollop," and the little wretch danced mirthfully.

"Mind you've promised," I cried, as he darted from me—a frail craft on which to set one's hopes.

He grimaced in reply, and grasping a packet of newspapers under his arm, raced to the fray. Speeding across the road, head down, voiced upraised crying his wares, he charged full tilt against the senior partner, and, bless his little dirty face, sent him spinning in the mud.

Miss Sara Gillespie as she was before she assumed her disguise.

I waited for no more, but ran at top speed, a pace unbefitting a middle-aged spinster—down Granby Street, not pausing till I came within sight of the Hotel.

I walked boldly and unchallenged past Rigby Starr, up the stairs right to the office. There, just inside the window, I could see my telegram. The sight gave me confidence and courage.

"Good evening," I said boldly to the manageress. "You had a young lady, a Miss Ray, stopping here? She is my niece"—I eased nearer to the door that fenced off the office from publicity. "She's a good girl," I said softly, "but, but—just a little flighty. Her mother, who lives in Northampton, met her in Granby Street to-day and took her home. She sent me on to explain to you and fetch her bag and pay her bill. You see, she had differences at home. A young man? More than one, I fear." I shook my head and looked unutterable things. "My goodness me, if there isn't a telegram for her." I stretched out my hand, and, yielding automatically to the demand, the manageress handed me the wire.

"Is Miss Ray not returning?" she asked.

"Dear me, no, her mother won't let her away again in a hurry. What did you say the bill was? Thank you, that will settle it, I think, and I'll occupy her room to-night. Name?" I paused. "Dunkley," I said. "Miss Dunkley from Northampton. One moment please. If anybody should inquire for my niece—a gentleman, you understand—don't let him know she's left, he'll go off post-haste to Northampton and worry my poor sister to death. Tell him Miss Ray's here, and that she's gone to bed. You understand? Good night," and clasping my telegram I rushed—my excitement was too great for steady walking—up one staircase—just as Templeton and Ilford came up the other.

I listened to the senior partner's well-phrased tale, and gloated over his discomfiture, when at the conclusion of his speech he was informed that "Miss Ray was upstairs in her room and had received her telegram."

"There's a mistake somewhere," the manageress continued. "I've had a lady here just now, Miss Dunkley, who assured me that Miss Ray had been with her mother since dinner. Perhaps you'd better see the lady?" She rang a bell and sent a chambermaid to summon me.

"Go up to No. 63 and say they're wanted."

"Kindly say that Mr. Masterman is here," said the senior partner, and the indignation that I felt at the heartless lie seemed to choke me. Swiftly I hastened up the stairs. Another flight and yet another. And then across the dark corridor into my room, where having locked the door, I cast myself upon the bed.

Digitized by Google

In answer to the maid's knock I sleepily asked "Who's there?" and in reply to her statement that Mr. Masterman awaited me, I bade her tell that gentleman "that I am not acquainted with anybody of that name."

I buried my head in the bed-clothes as her footsteps died away, and choked with hysterical laughter at the thought of the senior partner's face when she delivered her message.

"Checkmate!" I cried. "Checkmate!" Then, groping for the matches, I lit the gas and greedily opened the wire.

"I shall be with you to-morrow. Maggie Dunkley will not tell me where you are or I should come to-day. She fears I am an impostor. She sends this for me. Dearest, my heart's fond love, Noel."

From Noel, from my sweetheart! Dear Heaven, if I had failed in my attempt, if the telegram had fallen into Templeton's hands! And he will be with me to-morrow, all our troubles over, our sorrow past. The vile conspiracy that has separated us will be ended, done with at last.

The boy sped across the road, and sent Templeton spinning into the mud!

In a passion of tears, glad tears that spring from an overcharged but grateful heart, I kneel beside the open window turning my face upward to the sky. To-morrow the stars will shine upon us two together! The moon that casts its silver cloak over the blackened ruins of the factory will shine upon my heart and I—my dearest heart, my love, my Noel!

The wig that had done me such good service I plucked off and threw contemptuously aside. I let down my hair, and ran my fingers through its length. He loved it and admired it, therefore in my sight it was fair. To-morrow I should feel his arms about me, his dear lips upon my own. To-morrow——

Sunday dawned clear and bright. The bells chiming for early service woke me from pleasant dreams. It seemed to me an omen of good hope that the sun shone so pleasantly, that the air was warm and soft. Not until I was dressed did I remember with a shiver of compunction, that I should be compelled to put on that hideous wig. I came here last night as Miss Dunkley, middle-aged and grey-haired. I must depart in the same guise. Besides it would be more than probable that I should encounter one of the firm on guard outside the hotel. If I appeared red-haired and pale-cheeked, I should be discovered and my meeting with Noel prevented.

I was so excited at the prospect of re-union with him, that I forgot the conversation I had overheard in Bottini's restaurant. I did not remember that Templeton had spoken of having communicated with their agent in Northampton charging him to shadow Maggie Dunkley, wheresoever she might go.

Careless and light of heart I left the hotel, and all-impatient for the moment when my friend should tell me of Noel, hastened to the meeting place a good hour before the appointed time, and pacing to and fro in the shadow of the old gate, pictured the happy meeting that was in store for me.

Maggie, trim and neat in her Sunday frock and feathered hat, was punctual to the moment. Far too anxious to be prudent, I flew to her side, and heedless of hostile eyes, embraced her fervently.

She drew back astonished, as might be expected, from the clasp of the strange grey-haired woman.

"You don't know me, dear," I said, laughing. "Of course not, how should you recognise me? I'm Sara—Sara Gillespie. Look, and unpinning the sailor-hat I tore off my false grey locks, showing my own red hair as testimony.

I thought even at the moment that I caught an exclamation from the other side of the arch, but put it down in my heedlessness to the surprise that anyone might feel at the sight of a lady divesting herself of her head-dress.

"Dear goodness, you have given me a turn," cried Maggie, gazing at me as though doubtful even now of my bonâ fides.

"Where's Noel?" I cried eagerly. "Tell me, Maggie, what have you done with him?"

"I'm not sure, till I've asked you certain questions, if the young man who came is Noel," she answered. "Do you describe him, carefully, and I'll see if what you say agrees with the description I put down."

"Tall, broad-shouldered, clean-limbed. Dark brown hair, with a slight wave; clean-shaven, square white teeth, brown skin, and a lovely smile.'

Maggie grinned at my enthusiasm.

"I think it's all right," she said cautiously. "But to make sure I'd better repeat what he said. He told me that your full name was Sara Christabel Gillespie. Is that true?"

"Quite. You needn't worry, Maggie, it's the right man at last."

"You're sure? Remember you made a mistake before."

"Well, you shall be with me when I meet him, so if he is an impostor no harm can come."

"Very well, Jim thinks you'd better let him come as well. He'll bring Mr. Masterman along, and I'll go with you. What do you think of meeting him near the canal? It's pretty there, and nice and quiet. There are such lots of people in the parks on Sunday. Jim's sister-in-law has a cottage close to the waterside; we could go there and have tea."

"The canal or anywhere else so long as Noel is there," I answered. "Tell me, Maggie, why didn't he come with you this morning?"

"He wanted to," she answered, "but I was afraid. Jim said I must be sure that he's the right man before I let you see him. He's in Northampton now, waiting with Jim. He doesn't know I've come to Leicester," she added laughing. "I'm to send a telegram when I leave you, and when they get it Jim and he will set out at once. There's a train will bring them in about half-past three."

"Oh, Maggie," I cried half in despair, "you shouldn't have kept him from me."

"I like that," she answered angrily, "a nice state of things there would have been if I had brought the wrong one to you."

I realised the truth of the words, but, all the same, I felt a foolish sort of resentment that Noel had been kept from me. At length Maggie proposed that we should go to the house by the canal to wait there for Jim Goodman and my sweetheart.

"You'd better fasten on your wig," she added, "you'll be spotted at once without it."

I complied with the request, and together we set out for

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Goodman's house, calling at the post office on our way. The house proved to be quite half a mile from the canal, and one of a row of cottages off the Abbey Park Road. The place was small, the children numerous and noisy. It seemed impossible for me to spend the time waiting for Noel in such uncongenial fashion.

"I shall go for a walk," I announced. "I'm too restless to stop indoors. I'll be back here at three sharp, Maggie."

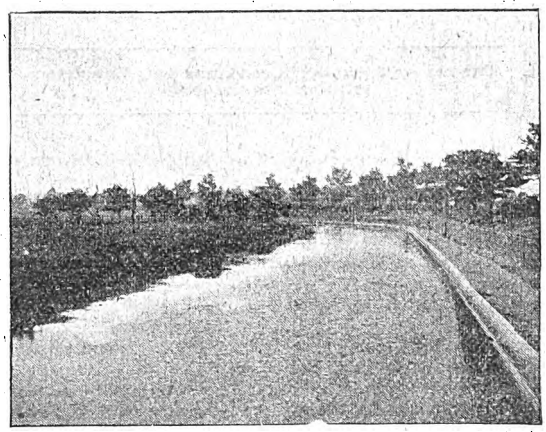
"Don't be late," she answered. "I'd better show you the spot where we arranged to meet. Jim thought you'd rather your young man shouldn't see you first of all at his sister's. It is not far, not more than ten minutes' walk."

She put on her hat and accompanied me with several small children across a stretch of meadow land to where the green-sward sloped to the water's edge. The towing path on the other side of the canal lay bare and brown in the bright sunshine. The scene was very beautiful, the day very pleasant.

"You won't mistake the spot?" asked Maggie. And then, "Don't you think you'd better wait with me at Gracie's? Suppose anything goes wrong?"

"Impossible," I answered. "You and Jim have been far too careful in your arrangements; I shall be back at the cottage at three."

I watched her figure cross the field, skirting a belt of trees and a pleasant hedgerow. Then, too restless and excited to remain still, I crossed the bridge a little higher up and tramped along the tow path till I reached St. Margaret's works. Leaving the water behind me, I tramped through the narrow streets till I gained the centre of the town. Leicester on Sunday morning after church is a sight worth seeing. All the work girls and operatives in their Sunday bravery throng the parks, the squares, and the principal streets. One hardly sees an ill-dressed girl; they keep indoors on Sunday!



The Canal, where Sara and Noel came so close together, and and yet were powerless to communicate with each other.

The seats in the Municipal Square were gay with flowers, feathers, and silks; dainty toilettes, costly gowns met one at every turn. I found a vacant place on one of the seats, and found distraction for my thoughts in watching the scene around me.

Suddenly from a group of bright colours, a blue frock and picture hat detailed itself.

"Are you better to-day?" said a pleasant voice; "you were bad last night, poor thing!"

Glancing up I recognised the girl, who, thinking I was faint, had escorted me from the music hall.

"Much better, thank you," I returned.

"I was quite anxious about you," she went on, "especially after the funny way you left me. You looked quite scared; I couldn't understand why you ran off like that. This gentleman," she motioned to a portly-looking person standing with his back towards us, "this gentleman was as concerned as me."

As she spoke the individual referred to turned, raised his hat, and advanced to meet me. Then, if ever, I had need of all my courage, my resources. The man who stood with outstretched hand before me was none other than the senior partner, Templeton himself!

The impulse of flight seized me once again, my eyes refused to meet his searching glance, my voice, sunk to a husky whisper, was beyond control. I gripped the seat hard, and waited till the ground steadied beneath my feet.

"It is very kind of you to feel concern on my behalf," I said and my voice was thin and quavering. "Few people care to trouble about an old woman like myself. I ought not to have ventured in a music hall in my frail state of health."

"Did you enjoy the entertainment, Miss——" He paused interrogatively, and in the accent of his voice, the twitching of the upper lip that showed the yellow pointed teeth, I realised he had penetrated my disguise. But—and in that lay my chance of escape—it was evident the dark-haired girl was not one of his employées. He had introduced himself to her notice on the common ground of their concern for me. It was obvious that in the event of a scene she would be more inclined to take my part than his. She had friends with her, a party of girls and young men. While I remained with them I was safe from any attack.

I disregarded Templeton's request for my name and answered placidly that "a part of the performance had seemed interesting."

Then turning to the girl in blue I laid my hand on her arm.

"I wonder if you'll take pity on a lonely old woman and let her spend an hour with you? I like young girls, especially when they're pretty and nice as you. It would be a real kindness if you'd bear with me a while?"

"Delighted, I'm sure," said the young lady with a little giggle, and linking her arm in mine, she led the way across the square and in the direction of "The New Walk"—a broad path shaded by leafy trees.

Her friends, following our lead, walked close behind; Templeton beside us. Up and down the Avenue we paced, the senior partner watchful and alert, purring soft speeches to the girl in blue, who, flattered at his attentions, kept giggling and throwing glances at her friends. In the middle of the walk, we suddenly encountered a couple of the "blue girl's" admirers, they seized on her, evidently regarding Templeton and myself as intruders of a most undesirable type.

The senior partner seized the opportunity to draw close to me. Impatience got the better of caution, for once his acumen failed.

"Thief!" he said. "Thief! I'll have you in gaol before the morning."

In a second I flashed past him to the girl in blue.

"My dear," I said, "your friend," I pointed to the senior partner, "is, I fear, insane. He has just accused me of theft. I never saw the man before last night. It has upset me terribly. I must ask you to remonstrate with him. I'm sure," I turned to the young men, "you would not see an old woman abused before your eyes? He spoke of taking me to prison."

"He's no friend of mine," said the girl quickly.

"Then how dare he walk with you?" cried one of the admirers, facing up to Templeton.

"If you don't mind, my dear," I whispered, "I will go away. I cannot bear a scene. My heart's not strong, but really your friend's too outrageous."

Leaving the senior partner the centre of an excited group, I slipped down a side turning, and hurried into a church conveniently near.

Here at any rate I was safe, in sanctuary no one could touch me!

The clock had chimed the hour of three before I felt able to leave the building. I was weak and trembling, full of forebodings and bitterly repentant that I had not stayed with Maggie at the cottage near the canal.

I took a tram from the Clock Tower to Abbey Park and arrived at the street where Mrs. Goodman's house was situated twenty minutes later. One of the children met me at the top of the road. She ran towards me, her face alight with expectation.

Digitized by Google

"You're not to go home," she said. "I was to tell you that Maggie was waiting for you by the water, and that you must not go near the house because somebody was watching."

She ran off, having delivered her message, without giving me time to question her further.

I was half inclined to disregard the injunction; I had promised Maggie to call for her, and it seemed unaccountable she should have changed the plan. Still, it would be risky to disregard so plain a warning. Possibly one of the firm was at this moment lurking round the corner.

And yet I was undecided, and when at last I turned my back on the road, and walked alone to the meeting place, I did so with a heavy heart.

There was no sign of anyone at the rendezvous. Steeped in the calm of a Sunday afternoon the landscape was void of man or woman. In the distance a barge lazily drifted towards me, drawn by a patient looking horse that plodded on without a driver. A distant clock chiming half-past three, I ran up the slope eagerly searching the horizon. No one in sight, only the barge lazily drifting nearer.

Should I return to Mrs. Goodman's cottage? The idea was not feasible. I might fall into the hands of the enemy, besides, in my absence, Maggie and Noel might arrive.

Was it possible the message given by the child was a false one? She might have been bribed to deliver it. I was sure Noel would be waiting for me at the cottage.

Noel—I started round in the direction of the house only to pause in piteous indecision.

Perhaps I should meet him on the road? He would not know me in this hideous disguise. And yet I dared not deprive myself of the poor shelter it afforded me. Surrounded as I was with plots, hemmed in by foes, more cunning, more powerful far than I, it would be madness to abandon that which had once saved me.

